

THE MYTHOLOGY
AND FABLES
OF THE
ANCIENTS,

Explain'd from

HISTORY.

By the Abbé ^{Ant. T. de} BANIER,

Member of the ROYAL ACADEMY of INSCRIPTIONS and BELLES-LETTRES.

VOL. I.

Translated from the Original FRENCH.

LONDON:

Printed for A. MILLAR, at Buchanan's-Head, against St. Clement's-Church in the Strand.

M.DCC.XXXIX.

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE Translator has endeavour'd to transfuse into our Language the Spirit as well as the Sense of his Author, and that in a plain simple Style, suitable to the Original, which is mostly narrative. A disagreeable Repetition of Words is avoided, without a scrupulous Nicety to vary the Phrase ; when it might have served no other purpose but to betray a childish Affectation. Most of the Authors referred to, have been consulted in the Originals, and the marginal References fill'd up when wanting, or corrected where, through error of the Press or otherwise, they had been wrong quoted. The Reader will also find some iv ADVERTISEMENT.

few Notes occasionally added, which are distinguished either by an Asterism, or Cross, from those of the Author, which are generally marked by Letters or Figures.

The AUTHOR's PREFACE.

THOUGH 'tis our happiness not to live in one of those Ages, when almost the whole World was plunged in an Abyss of Idolatry, yet 'tis far from being unnecessary to know the History of the Pagan Gods and Fables; Mythology, which teaches us to be acquainted with those Gods and Fables, makes so considerable a Part of the Belles-Lettres, that it cannot well be neglected. And indeed, we are daily conversant in the Works of Greeks and Romans, in those of their Poets especially, which we should often be at a loss to understand, were we not acquainted with the Fables to which they are eternally alluding.

Besides, every thing concurs to remind us of those ancient Fictions; such as Statues, Bas-Reliefs, Monuments of all sorts; and to be short, what do the Books of the Antiquaries, and the Cabinets of the Curious contain, but Figures of the Pagan Divinities, Instruments used in their Sacrifices, and what other Remains we have of the Pagan Superstition? Our Galleries, our Ceilings, our Pictures, our Statues are continually representing to us the same Objects: and as if History, sacred and profane, did not furnish out to us a sufficient number of important Facts, and such as are capable of inspiring us with virtuous Sentiments, we borrow our Arguments from Fable, in our Dramatick Poetry especially.

Our Theatres are every day resounding with the Complaints of Iphigenia and Andromache, the Outrages of Orestes, the Wrath of Achilles, and the unbridled Lust of Clytemnestra; nor are we ashamed to own, that we see those Heroes and Heroines daily upon our Stage, with new delight, while we can hardly bear a Representation of other Personages, that are more proper to awaken in us a noble Emulation.

Thus the Knowledge of Mythology is useful, and in some sort necessary, insomuch that one cannot be ignorant of it, but he must pass for a Man of narrow Education, deficient in the more essential Branches of polite Learning. But what makes Mythology still of greater Importance, and at the same time gives it a juster Claim to be the Object of our Curiosity, is to consider, that Fables are not mere Fictions, as I prove in the Introduction to this Work, but that they have a real Connection with the History of the first Ages, comprehend some of their considerable Transactions, and that most of the Gods had been Men, whose History makes a part of that of the particular Nations, from whom they had divine Honour.

To bring to light this Treasure of History, that lies hid under the Disguise of Fable, is the thing I had principally in my eye, when I entered into the Study of Mythology, and published a first Essay upon the Subject, under the Title of, An Historical Explication of Fables (1), which met with a favourable Reception from the Publick; but at the same time they seemed to wish for a Mythology more extensive, and that went deeper into the Subject. Such a Work, I have been often told by Persons of good Understanding, is wanting in our Language; for not to insist on the antiquated Style of any thing we have of the kind in French, we find none of them done in a systematical Way; they have not reduced Fables to any Source, nor to any determined time; they have not unfolded the Origin of the

(1) In two Vols. in 12mo. Anno 1710. To which was added, a third Vol. Anno 1715. There will soon be published a new Edition of it, by Briasson, for the benefit of Youth, to whom this Abridgment will be of great use.

the Gods, nor do they distinguish those Gods, who were often the same under different Names. In a word, if one meets with some Passages of History in them, they are buried under a heap of Allegory and arbitrary Moralizing (1). Farther, the Authors of these Books of Mythology, for want of the learned Discoveries that have since been made, followed uncertain Guides; and we are now better furnished than they were for handling this Subject. What Light has been cast upon it by Meziriac, Bochart, Vossius, and several others? Had these learned Men gone on in explaining all the Fables, as they have done those that had any Connection with the Subjects they had undertaken to explain, we should have had no need of a new Mythology. 'Twas to answer what was expected from me that I set about this Work, which now comes abroad. My Dissertations upon different Subjects of Fable, which are printed in the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles-Lettres, and the explanatory Notes I have added to my Translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses, are a proof that I had it always in my eye.

I had reap'd considerable Advantage before, in my Historical Explication, from the Discoveries made by the Learned of the last Age; and it will easily appear from this Mythology, that I have read them over carefully a second time, and that I have made the same use of some other Books, relating to my Subject, that have since been published; especially of the Critical Reflections upon ancient Nations; a Work of deep Learning, where the Author (*), who is compleatly Master of all the learned Languages, discovers no less Penetration than Learning thro' the whole. And indeed whether he be engaged in proving the Authentickness of a precious Fragment, so as to leave no room for calling it in question hereafter; or in tracing the Original of ancient Nations; or, in fine, in reducing most of the Fables to their primitive Source, it is always with an uncommon Erudition, and often by Discoveries that had escaped other Men of Learning.

(1) See in the first Chapter the Judgment I pass upon the Mythologies that have preceded this.

(*) M. Fourmont the elder.

Besides these Discoveries, being guided in my Enquiries by the Lights of a Society, in whom the deepest Learning is united with the most judicious Criticism, I have equally improved by the valuable Collection of their elaborate Works, and by the learned Conversations in which their Meetings are sometimes taken up.

With these helps, and by a continual Study for several Years, I have now made this Mythology ready for the Press; and in order to adapt it to every one's Taste, I have avoided, as much as possible, those intricate Questions, which are commonly disgusting to the greater number of Readers, and have said no more upon each Subject than what is most useful and of greatest concern; and it will be easy for the Reader to observe, that I have frequently had greater Regard to him than to my own Reputation: For an Author certainly pays him a considerable Compliment, when, for his sake, he suppresses learned Quotations that come in his way, and which would cost him but the bare trouble of transcribing.

This then is the Method I have followed. When I have recourse to the Testimony of an Author, I generally quote his words, and give a Translation of them; and where this Translation is abrupt, the Reasoning which goes before or comes after the Quotation, sufficiently supplies the Sense. I take all possible care, to quote those that are more ancient, in preference to others that are later; thus Homer and Hesiod among the Poets, Herodotus and some others among the Historians, are always preferred to those that followed them. Not that I neglect the last: They had access to consult Traditions, or Works that were extant in their own time; and the first to be sure left room for them to say somewhat new; but I am only speaking now of giving preference to the one above the other. The Poets who have transmitted to us so many Fictions, are for all that, whatever we may say of them, the first Depositories of the ancient Traditions of Greece, and her her first Historians, since it was very late before Prose-writing was there introduced. To the Poets and Historians, I have sometimes joined Medals and Inscriptions, because these are so many Monuments to vouch for ancient Tradition.

As for Moderns who have written upon this Subject, I only give their Opinion in general, and such of their Arguments as to me appeared the most conclusive. When they have made particular Dissertations upon these Subjects, I have only taken the Substance of them, and referred such as may have the Curiosity to read them, to the Dissertations themselves.

For what remains, I believe none will be able to reproach me, as if I had used the Discoveries of others without doing them at least the justice to acknowledge it. I always look'd upon Plagiarism as a very odious Crime: and to be sure, none would be a greater Plagiary than my self, had I not carefully acquainted my Reader with the Originals whence I borrowed, and whence every Author must of necessity borrow, who publishes such a Work as mine: A Work, which, in truth, brings less honour than a new System; tho' at the same time it is generally more useful to the Publick. They who will take the trouble to read the first Chapter of this Mythology, which is a Continuation of this Preface, will see to how many meer Suppositions those are obliged to have recourse, who have attempted to reduce Fables to one general System. For, in short, tho' every Nation had Fictions of its own, they are not so much the Result of a well-concerted Scheme, as the Production of human Fancy, that has a continual Bias towards the Marvellous.

My Design in this Work is to prove, that notwithstanding all the Ornaments which accompany Fables, yet it is no difficult matter to see, that they contain a Part of the History of primitive Times; and that neither the Allegory nor Moral were the primary Intention of those who invented them: an Opinion I am so far from having alter'd, that my late Studies do but establish me in it the more. Not as if there were not some

some particular Fictions, where it would be in vain to look for any Footsteps of History (*); but in general all of them almost have some relation to it, or are connected with Events that are supported by the best Authority of Antiquity.

Mythologists formerly thought they had unravel'd the Meaning of a Fable, whenever they had the Art to find out in it a Moral or an Allegory ; and this is the Amount of almost all their Explanations. The Learned of this Age, from a persuasion that the History of the Period after the Deluge lies hid under the ingenious Mask of Fable, have set themselves to take off the mysterious Mask which concealed the Truths that were under them from Persons of less Discernment. There are times which favour certain Opinions, and this of the Truth of Fables has so far prevailed, that from henceforth we must either frankly give up all Pretensions to make tolerable Sense of them, or reduce them to History.

There is however one Objection may be raised against this Opinion, which at first sight appears very solid. How shall we reduce to History, what the Greeks, for instance, tell us of their Gods, when these very Gods lived in that Period of time which they themselves call Unknown? What History can be drawn from an unknown Period, which would cease to be so, if we had any knowledge of it ?

That we may see where the stress of this Objection lies, we must call to mind Varro's famous Distribution of Times, into the Unknown, the Fabulous, and the Historical. The first includes all that happen'd in the World till Ogyges ; and in this Interval lived the Gods. The second carries you down from Ogyges to the Establishment of the Olympiads ; in which space of time appeared the Heroes and Demi-Gods. Lastly, from the Olympiads begins the Date of the historical Times.

In answer then to this Objection, I say, in the first place, that this Distinction had a Respect only to the Greeks ; for those times which they called unknown, were were by no means so, either in respect of Asia or Egypt, where powerful Monarchies subsisted, and a System of Religion was established from the most ancient times. The Greeks were not yet in being, or at least were but a rude and vagrant Multitude, that had neither Laws, Politeness, nor hardly any Religion, at a time when the eastern Nations were enjoying all the Advantages that accrue from Arts and Sciences.

(*) See the first Chapter.

2dly, Before we will allow this Objection to have any weight, it must be proved that those Gods, of whom we undertake to give the History, were originally Greeks; for it might then be alledg'd, that the Greeks, who knew nothing certain as to the times when their Gods, according to them, had lived, were utterly incapable to transmit the History of them to Posterity: but those Gods were originally Strangers to them. The Colonies from Egypt and Phenicia, that came at several times to settle in Greece, brought thither the Religion and Gods of their Country. This is a Truth that cannot be denied; and Herodotus, who was instructed in the Egyptian Religion by their own Priests, positively affirms it. The Gods of the Greeks were therefore originally from Egypt and Phenicia, and had been the Objects of religious Worship in those two Countries, long before the Colonies I speak of, had arrived in Greece. The Phenicians and Egyptians, who had cultivated the Arts and Sciences from the earliest Ages, had written the History of their Religion; and nothing is more famous in all Antiquity, than the Books composed by Mercury Trismegistus upon that Subject. It is true, the Language in which they were writ, was a sacred Language, understood only by the Priests. But may we not suppose, that the Leaders of the Colonies, who came in quest of Settlements in the Islands of the Mediterranean, the Archipelago, and in Greece, brought with them some of those Priests to take care of things that concerned Religion; and that these Priests instructed the Greeks, upon their adopting the Worship of Gods whom those Strangers were come to establish in their Country?

This

This Supposition will not be deny'd, since 'tis agreed; that Inachus, who conducted the first Colony into Greece, communicated to it the Knowledge of that sacred Language; that is to say, the Hieroglyphicks in which it was expressed. Even long before the Arrival of that Colony, the Egyptians had begun to instruct the Greeks in Matters of Religion. “ The Pelasgi, “ who are to be reckoned among the most ancient In“ habitants of Greece, honour'd Gods, says Herodotus, “ of whom they had no Knowledge, offering up their “ Prayers and Sacrifices to them in general. Being “ desirous at last to know their Names, they consulted “ the Oracle of Dodona, the only one which was then in “ Greece, where they received Satisfaction from Stran“ gers, who served the Oracle.” Now the Oracle of Dodona, according to the same Author, had been founded by an Egyptian Woman, and these Strangers who instructed the Pelasgi, could be no other than Egyptians.

But altho' even some of the Gods had derived their Original from Greece, or had made a Conquest of it, as Jupiter and the Titan Princes? and tho' upon account of that Conquest they had been deify'd in that Period, when the Greeks knew not the use of Letters; are there not however several ways of handing down to Posterity signal Facts? Festivals, Games, Hymns, Songs, Columns, Mounds of Earth, a Pile of Stones, or, in fine, a Tradition delivered down from Father to Son: By all these, the World might have come to the knowledge of those famous Men, who had merited divine Honours: And consequently it is not impossible to know their History; and the historical Explications we give of the Fables, that are intermixed with it, are not without foundation.

Sometimes Events fall out in the World so remarkable, that they are not liable to be forgot. Of this kind in old times were the Conquests of the Titan Princes, who are said in the sacred Writings to have had dominion over the Earth; and those of Bacchus and Osiris: and in whatever way the Remembrance of them them has been continued to Posterity, it is certain that the World has not been quite in the dark about them, nor were they invented by Diodorus Siculus and other Ancients, who have written their History.

That the Pagan Gods were the Jewish Patriarchs, as several learned Men pretend ; or that they had been ancient Kings of Egypt, Phenicia, and other neighbouring Nations, is what I am not now to enquire into : But still it is unquestionable that their History was known, and that Traditions about them were delivered down to Posterity, which might be depended upon.

If it is true, after what I have been advancing, that the Fables of the Gods may be reduced to History, no body, I presume, will doubt but the same may be done as to those of the Heroes and Demi-Gods, since the Greeks were able to transmit their History to us in writing. We need not enquire at present how long they continued without the use of Letters : this at least is beyond doubt, that they learned it from Cadmus, who brought them the Phenician Alphabet, as I shall prove in its proper place. Now the Heroes of Greece, and the Events which gave rise to their Heroism, are posterior to the planting of that Colony, which came and settled in Bæotia under the Conduct of that Leader ; consequently they happened at a time when the Greeks wanted not helps sufficient for writing their History. The name of the fabulous Times, which Varro gives to those Ages when the Heroes appeared, and which (according to Scaliger) ought to have been stiled the Heroick Times, by no means determines us to believe, that they knew nothing certain about them, since the Conquests of the Argonauts, the War of the *Centaur*s and Lapithæ, the Labours of Hercules, the two Wars of Thebes and that of Troy, are Events that cannot be called in question : that learned Roman therefore has called them fabulous, for no other reason but because the History of those Events is mingled with an infinite deal of Fictions, which needs not appear surprizing. For if the Greeks are so often accused of having

having sacrificed Truth to their Propensity towards the Marvellous, even in their more known and later Histories, how much less would they pay a Regard to it, when they were treating of remote Ages, when it was not easy to refute them?

Let us set this Answer yet in another light. The Greeks were instructed by the Eastern People, and particularly by the Egyptians, in the History of the Gods who lived in that space of time, which Varro called the Unknown Times. Cadmus taught them the Use of Letters, and enabled them to write the History of their own Heroes, that is to say, the History of the fabulous Times. The Works in which it was contained, were probably subsisting in the time of Homer and Hesiod, who borrowed from thence the Ground-work of their Poems, or at least gathered it from a Tradition which would then be fresh enough. I am persuaded, that those Poems occasion'd the loss of most other Works of greater Antiquity; for it has happen'd oftner than once, that one good Book has made those that preceded it be first forgot, and then be quite extinct. But as Homer and Hesiod had not employed all the Traditions that were current in their time, the other Poets who came after made use of them; and hence we find such Diversity of them in Sophocles, Euripides, and other tragical Writers. As for the Prose Writers, who made historical Collections afterwards of those ancient Events, such as Apollodorus, Diodorus, and some others, they have taken their Accounts of them, either from that same Tradition, or from Works which were extant in their time, and which had likewise been composed upon others of greater Antiquity.

Thus it is that the History of the Gods and Heroes was delivered down from one Age to another; and this at the same time is the Foundation of the historical Explications of Fables. But let us suppose for once, that the Greeks did not write till very late; that Homer was their first Author, and that their first Production in Poetry was a Master-piece, which would be a very extraordinary ordinary case to be sure ; yet I maintain, that that Poet would have had sufficient Materials for his two Poems. Greece esteemed nothing more sacred than the Fables, which made a part of her Religion ; and that they should be lost was impossible, if I may be allowed the Expression. The Pictures, Statues, Games and Feasts, were continually bringing them into remembrance ; and Athens, which, according to Pausanias, had some of those Statues and Pictures in every Quarter of the City, and in all the Temples, was able herself alone to preserve the Tradition of them.

Then add to this, that some Sages of Greece, not satisfied with the Informations they had received from the Colonies that had come into their Country at different times, went themselves into Egypt, to fetch new Discoveries from thence ; some such there were who undertook this Journey even before the Trojan War, that is in that very time which Varro calls Fabulous. Diodorus, who had also travelled into that Country, is positive in asserting this, and enters into a Detail of the particular Discoveries which those Sages had fetched from thence, and afterwards communicated to the Greeks. “ The Priests read in their Annals, says this “ Author (a), that their Country had been visited by “ Orpheus, Museus, Melampus, and Dædalus, (for I “ make no mention of Homer, nor of others who “ performed the same Expedition in the times later “ than the Trojan War) and there is none of them, of “ whose Passage and Abode in their Country they have “ not some Marks to shew ; such as their Picture, or “ some Work of theirs, or even some Place which bears “ their Name. They give besides several Proofs, to “ evince that all those Sages borrowed from Egypt “ whatever was most wonderful in the Sciences they “ profess’d. Orpheus, say the Egyptians, brought back “ from this Expedition his Mysteries, his Orgies, and “ the whole Fable of the infernal Regions.

“ They say, it was Melampus who brought from the “ same

(a) L. i. c. 36.

“ same Country into Greece the Festivals of Bacchus,
 “ the Fable of Saturn, the Battle of the Titans, the “ Dangers and Distresses of the Gods, &c.”

There is no occasion at present for tracing this Author in the other Particulars he relates upon this Subject; I have taken notice of them elsewhere: But still it is certain, that those Sages gathered several Informations from Egypt, concerning its Religion and Mysteries.

Herodotus agrees (a), that this same Melampus, a Man of eminent Wisdom and Knowledge, had learned from the Egyptians, and afterwards taught the Greeks, what belong'd to the Worship and Mysteries of Bacchus, bating a few Alterations he had introduced out of his own head. There is indeed this difference between these two Authors, that Diodorus Siculus affirms Melampus to have got his Discoveries from Egypt, whether he had travell'd; whereas Herodotus says, he had them from Cadmus; but that comes to the same thing for my purpose.

The Greeks then had sufficient means of knowing and transmitting to us the History of the Gods; and still greater Assistances for that of the Heroes; and consequently the Objection I propose falls to the ground.

As a Mythology ought to contain not only all that regards the Gods and the Heroes, explain their Fables, and reduce them to their Sources; but as it ought also to comprehend the System of Idolatry, its Rise, its Advances, and whatever concerns the Pagan Worship and Ceremonies, I have taken into this of mine, all these different Subjects; and here is the Order I thought fit to range them in.

After I have examined in the first Chapter, what Parts of Learning a Mythologist ought to be master of, and delivered my Sentiments concerning the several Works we have upon Mythology, I endeavour to prove the Truth of the Fables in the following Chapters: I give account of their different Sources, Classes, &c. and these

(a) L. 2. c. 49.

these are the Contents of the first Book, which is a kind of necessary Introduction to the understanding of the whole. The second contains the different Theogonies of the known Nations; whether Chaldeans, Phenicians, Egyptians, Atlantidæ, Greeks, Indians, Chinese, or Savages of America; and here you will see what were their Opinions about the Formation of the World, and about the Origin of their Gods. In the third, I treat of the Rise and Progress of Idolatry: there I shew to what excess it was carried, and the infinite number of Gods it adopted. Passing from thence to the Worship of those Gods, I speak of the Victims, Sacrifices, and the Instruments they made use of in that Act of Religion; of the Priests, Temples, Altars, consecrated Groves, Sanctuaries or Asyla, Festivals, &c. In the fourth, which is a Continuation of the third, I consider the Superstitions that were justified by Idolatry; which leads me to speak of the Oracles, the Sibyls, the different sorts of Divination, the Auspices, Aruspices, Auguries, judicial Astrology, Magick, Presages, Prodigies, Expiations, Forms of Devoting, Evocations, &c.

In the fifth, I lay open the Opinions of the Philosophers, Historians, and Poets, about the Nature of the Gods and Genii, which the Pagan World introduc'd; and after I have divided those Gods and Genii into their different Classes, I close this Treatise of Idolatry, with some general Reflections, that serve equally to shew its Absurdity, and the Extremity to which it was carried.

But because it is not enough that I have given an Account of those Gods in general, and it being farther requisite that I give a more distinct Idea and fuller History of them, I come next to consider, first the Gods of the Egyptians, then of the Arabians their Neighbours, then of the Ethiopians. From thence I go on to those of the Carthaginians and other African Nations, of whose Religion we have any Knowledge; and this is the Subject of the sixth Book. In the seventh, I treat of the Gods of the Chaldeans, Syrians, Phenicians, Per-
a sians,

sians, Cappadocians, and other Asiatics ; and I carry on my Enquiries even to those of the Scythians, the Sarmatians, and other People in the North of Asia.

The Sequel contains the History of the European Deities ; those I mean of the Greeks, Romans, Gauls, Germans, Spaniards, &c. an immense Field, which I have distributed into several Books.

Last of all, I come to the Heroes and Demi-Gods ; and in order to give a more particular Account of them, I dive into the bottom of the ancient History of Greece, of the several Nations by whom it was peopled, and of all the Events that rendered that Country so famous ; and I have closed this Work with an Explication of the Fables that have no Connection with the Facts related in the several Volumes.

You will find at the beginning of every Volume, a Table of the Chapters, shewing more particularly all the Subjects I treat of ; and at the end of the last Volume, a general Table, which I have endeavour'd to make as comprehensive as possible.

Some Persons may wish I had inserted into this Work the Figures of the Gods, and I acknowledge they would have conduced to make them be more easily understood, and frequently have saved me long Details ; but besides that they would have considerably raised the Price of the Book, I thought it might suffice to direct to the Books where they are to be found ; Books now very common, and well enough known.

CONTENTS

OF THE

FIRST VOLUME.

BOOK I.

C ontaining preliminary Questions necessary to be understood in the Study of Mythology.	pag. 1
Chap. I. General Reflections upon Mythology. —	2
Art. I. What Learning a Mythologist ought to be master of. —	3
Art. II. What Extremes he ought to avoid. —	8
Art. III. Of the Manner how one ought to proceed in the Explnation of Fable. —	17
Chap. II. In which'tis proved that the Fables are not mere Allegories, but comprehend several ancient Facts.	20
Chap. III. Division of Fables. —	20
Chap. IV. Conjectures about the Origin of Fables. —	32
Chap. V. A Continuation of the Enquiry into the Origin of Fables. —	48
Chap. VI. Continuation of the same Subject. —	65
Chap. VII. In which the Origin of Ovid's Metamorphoies, and of some other Poets, is examined.	76

B O O K II.

O*F the different Theogonies whereof we have any Remains in Antiquity; or the Sentiments of the Ancients about the Origin of the World and of the Gods.*

	79
Chap. I. The Tradition of the Chaldeans. ———	80
Chap. II. The Theogony of the Phenicians. ———	88
Chap. III. The Theogony of the Egyptians.	102
Chap. IV. The Theogony of the Atlantidæ.	106
Chap. V. The Theogony of the Greeks. ———	109
Chap. VI. The Cosmogony and Theogony of Ovid.	125
Chap. VII. The Theogony of the Chinese and Indians.	130
Chap. VIII. The Theogony of the Indian Brachmans.	138
Chap. IX. The Theogony of the Americans. ———	140
Chap. X. Of the Pagan Theology, and in particular of that of the Poets. ——— ———	148

B O O K III.

Which treats of Idolatry.

A Preliminary Remark. ———	160
Chap. I. Of the Origin and Progress of Idolatry.	161
Chap. II. At what Period of time Idolatry began.	172
Chap. III. Idolatry proved to have begun with the Worship of the Heavenly Bodies. ———	182
Chap. IV. Of the Progress of Idolatry.	192
Chap. V. Of the Temples of the Pagans.	210
Chap. VI. Of Altars. ——— ———	233
Chap. VII. Of Consecrated Groves. ———	239
Chap. VIII. Of the Asyla. ———	242
Chap.

CONTENTS.

xxi

Chap. IX. Of the Statues of the Gods, and of the Manner in which they were represented.	— 246
Chap. X. Of the Sacrifices and Victims.	254
Chap. XI. Of the Instruments that were made use of in the Sacrifices, and other Ceremonies of Religion.	276
Chap. XII. Of the Priests and other Ministers of the Sacrifices.	— 280
Chap. XIII. Of the Festivals of the Greeks and Romans.	— 297
Chap. XIV. Of the publick Supplications, the Lectisternia, Evocations, and Forms of Devoting.	— 316
Chap. XV. Of the religious Ceremonies practised at the founding of Cities.	— 323

* BOOK IV.

Which treats of the Superstitions authorized by Idolatry.

C hap. I. Of the Oracles.	— 325
Art. I. The Oracle of Dodona.	— 329
Art. II. The Oracle of Jupiter Hammon.	332
Art. III. The Oracle of Delphi.	— 334
Art. IV. The Oracle of Trophonius.	— 340
Art. V. Of other Oracles.	— 344
Chap. II. History of the Sibyls.	— 360
Art. I. If there were Sibyls.	361
Art. II. Of the Number of the Sibyls.	— 364
Art. III. What Ground there was to believe that the Sibyls were endued with the Gift of Prophecy.	369
Art. IV. Of the Collection of the Sibylline Verses.	372
Art. V. In what manner the Sibyls delivered their Oracles, and what we are to think of the long Life that was attributed to them.	382
Art. VI. Of the Worship paid to the Sibyls.	387
Chap. III. Of Divination.	— 391
Chap. IV. Of Auguries, Auspices, and Aruspices.	396
Chap.

* Here begin the Contents of the second Volume of the Original.

Chap. V. Of Presages and Prodigies.	409
Chap. VI. Of Expiations.	417
Chap. VII. Of Magick.	424
Chap. VIII. Of Astrology.	433

B O O K V.

O F the Nature of the Gods; of their Division into several Classes.	437
Chap. I. Of the Nature of the Gods.	438
Chap. II. Wherein the Nature of the Pagan Gods is more particularly examined.	442
Chap. III. Wherein Answers are given to the Objections that may be raised against the Opinion, that several of the Pagan Deities had been Men; with new Proofs to confirm it.	449
Chap. IV. Of the Progeny of the Gods.	458
Chap. V. Distribution of the Pagan Gods into several Classes.	460
Chap. 6. Of the Nature of the Genii or Demons.	466
Chap. VII. General Reflections upon Idolatry.	474

B O O K VI.

Of the Gods worship'd in the Eastern Countries.

C Hap. I. Of the Gods of the Egyptians.	486
Art. I. The History of Osiris and Isis.	494
Art. II. The History of Typhon.	503
Art. III. History of the Worship paid to Isis and Osiris.	516
Chap. II. Of the other Gods of Egypt.	524
Art. I. Serapis or Sarapis.	ibid.
Art. II. Orus.	527

C O N T E N T S.

xxii

Art. III. Harpocrates.	529
Art. IV. Macedo, Anubis.	532
Art. V. Canopus.	534
Art. VI. Pan.	536
Chap. III. Of the Worship paid by the Egyptians to Animals.	542
Chap. IV. Of what nature that Animal Worship was.	547
Chap. V. Of some other Gods of the Egyptians.	555
Chap. VI. Of the Pageants and publick Ceremonies of the Egyptians, and some other People.	556
Chap. VII. Explanation of the Ifiac Table.	561
Chap. VIII. Of the Gods of the Arabians.	567
Chap. IX. Of the Gods of the Ethiopians.	572
Chap. X. Of the Gods of the Carthaginians, and some other People in Africa.	574

E R R A T A.

- P. 33. In the Note l. ult. for Epistles, read Epitaphs.
 P. 41. l. (21) del. the Troops of.
 P. 62. l. 4. for 1600, read 1800.

MYTHOLOGY and FABLES

Explain'd by

HISTORY.

BOOK I.

Containing some preliminary Questions, necessary to be understood in the Study of Mythology.

BEFORE we enter upon a particular Account of Mythology, and an Explication of the Fables it contains, I judg'd it previously necessary to examine several general Questions ; the Knowledge whereof will be of very great use to our Readers.

CHAP. I.

General Reflections on Mythology.

THE Knowledge of Mythology is not, to be sure, so necessary at present, as it appear'd to the primitive Fathers of the Church, whose Design was to establish Christianity upon the ruin of Idolatry, or by learned Apologies to vindicate their Religion from the Calumnies publish'd against it. They were obliged to unfold the darkest Mysteries of Paganism, to represent it in its blackest Colours ; they had to answer subtle Philosophers, who, in order to take off from the Absurdity charged upon their Worship, had recourse to allegorical Explanations, that seem to give a plausible Meaning to their most impious

B

Rites.

Rites. On the one side, were the Works of Porphyry, Jamblichus, Proclus, Photinus, and several other Platonic Philosophers ; on the other, the Apologies of the Fathers of the first Centuries, Justin, Arnobius, Theodoret, Lactantius, Clemens of Alexandria, Tertullian, St. Austin, &c.

Truth at length has triumphed over Error ; and if there are still found among gross and ignorant Nations some Remains of the ancient Superstition, it is not Religion that authorizes them ; and they too dwindle away in proportion as the World becomes more enlighten'd.

I am confident however, that the Knowledge of Mythology is still very beneficial. It is a Part of the Belles-Lettres, and is of infinite use to our understanding the Poets, and some of the Historians, who recite the ancient Fables, or make frequent Allusions to them. We find every where these Fables of theirs ; and they continue to be the Subject of our Dramatick and Lyrick Pieces, and of our Pictures. Now it must be own'd, 1°. That in reading the Poets, where we find these ancient Fictions so skilfully managed, we have a strong Curiosity to penetrate into their Meaning. 2°. That Explanations, when happy and detach'd from moralizing and trivial Allegories, which was the farthest length our first Mythologists went, cast a great Light upon these ancient Authors, and make them much easier to be understood. And within these just Bounds I confine the Usefulness of Mythology.

I am not ignorant, that we have already a vast number of both ancient and modern Books upon this Subject ; and yet I thought we still wanted one more compleat and methodical than any has been hitherto. How far I am in the right, will appear when I come to consider such of them as I am acquainted with ; but I must first premise, that none ought to be discouraged by what I have done, from exercising their Talents upon the same Subject. For I am far from thinking, that I have exhausted it ; and I hope none, who know me, will judge me capable of that mean Jealousy we are apt to to conceive against those who put their Sickle to a Harvest we thought reserv'd for ourselves alone: the Field I have been cultivating for so many Years, is large enough to admit of many Labourers.

As these Reflections might carry me too far, I shall confine myself in this Chapter to an Examination of these principal Heads. First, What Learning a Mythologist should be master of, and what Books he must have read. Secondly, What Advantage he may draw from Systems already devised for explaining Fable. Lastly, How he ought to proceed in that Explanation he himself makes choice of.

ARTICLE I.

What Learning a Mythologist ought to be master of.

By Mythology, I understand the Knowledge of Fable, and at the same time of the Pagan Religion, its Mysteries, Ceremonies, and the Worship paid to its false Divinities.

'Tis obvious, that one who would be skill'd in Fable, must have read with care Homer and Hesiod, more especially the Poets of the Tragick kind, who have drawn from them the Subjects of their Poems, and such as have made Collections of them, either in Verse, as Ovid; or in Prose, as Antoninus Liberalis, Diodorus Siculus, Apollodorus, Hyginus, and some others.

When a Mythologist is thoroughly acquainted with the Fable, he has, properly speaking, advanced but the first step. As Fables are capable of several Senses, and are as it were so many Veils, under which the Ancients concealed a number of Truths; they who set themselves to explain them, have taken different sides, each imagining, he discovered in them what the Turn of his Genius, or the Plan of his Studies made him desirous to find out. There the Naturalist has perceived the Mysteries of Nature; the Politician, Maxims of Government; the Philosopher, Morality; the Chymist, the Secrets of his Art; and so others. Hence so many different Systems, not so much as one of them capable of solving all the Difficulties that occur upon this Subject, as we shall see in the Course of these Reflections.

Fables are of several sorts. There are the historical, physical, allegorical, and moral ones; and others, which are no more than mere Apologues. The first are ancient Histories intermix'd with a great deal of Fiction: these I take to be by far the more numerous. The physical Fables are such, as were invented by some philosophical Poets; as when they said, the Ocean was the Father of the Rivers; the Moon match'd with the Air, and became Mother of the Dew, and almost the whole Cosmogonies of ancient Nations, which I am to give account of afterwards. The allegorical ones were a kind of Parables, that had a secret mystical Sense, as that which we find in Plato, of Porus and Penia, or Riches and Poverty, whose Offspring was Love. The moral Fables, are such as were invented to convey Lessons of Morality under an insinuating Veil; as the Story of Narcissus, design'd to expose the Folly of Self-love, when it exceeds due Bounds. Under the Fables of the moral kind, I comprehend all Apologues, where the Beasts are commonly the Speakers, to teach Men their Duty, or to censure their Faults. There are Fables that seem to aim at no other End but to amuse, as the Milesian Tales, and those of the Sybarites. In fine, there are others of a mix'd nature, which are built upon an historical Bottom, and at the same time carry a manifest Allusion either to Physicks or Morality.

The Mythologist must give the greatest Attention to unfold and penetrate into all these Senses, neither presuming that a Fable is purely physical or moral, because it glances at Physicks or Morality; nor yet that it is entirely historical, because he may discover in it some Event in History: this is a Rock which the Bulk of those who essay'd to explain the Fables have split upon.

As for the Knowledge of the Pagan Religion and Mysteries, which are chiefly founded on Fables, what a vast stock of Learning must a Mythologist acquire, before he can be master of it? Besides all the Poets and Historians, he must be particularly well read in the Works of the Philosophers, who lived at the beginning of Christianity; and in those of the Fathers and Apologists for Christianity, who attacked them, or defended themselves from their Calumnies: the Works I mean of Justin Martyr, Eusebius, Clement of Alexandria, Lactantius, Theodoret, Arnobius, more especially St. Augustin de Civitate Dei.

I have singled out to a Mythologist these ancient Authors, not as if there was no necessity for him to read an infinity of other Works: for a good Mythology, such as would answer the Conception I have of it, ought to contain not only the Doctrines and Ceremonies of the Pagan Religion, but all the other Branches of this Theology; the Priests and their Vestments, the Temples, the peculiar Attributes of their Gods, the Sacrifices, different Victims, Mysteries, Auguries and Divinations at the Altars, the Oracles, Lots, Games, Festivals, Altars, &c. And for these I am to direct him to the Authors he is to consult, without pretending however to give him a compleat List of them. For the Temples, Soothsayers and Oracles, he ought to read Van-Dale, and the Treatise of Julius Cæsar Bulengerus; for the Festivals, Fasoldus, Castellanus, John Johnston, and Meursius; for the Games with which Religion was mix'd, the same Meursius; for the Altars, a Treatise upon them by Father Berthold; for the Mysteries of Ceres and Bacchus, John-Henry; and for the Bacchanalia in particular, John-Nicholas Eggelins; for those of Ceres, or the Mysteries of Eleusis, Meursius, and M. Le Clerc, who has reduced him to a clearer Method; for those of Mithras, M. della Torre, Bishop of Adria; for those of Atys and Cybele, Laurentius Pignorius; for those of Isis and Osiris, Plutarch upon that Subject, and the same Pignorius; for the Oracle of Dodona in particular, he may consult Herodotus, the Fragment of Stephen of Byzantium the Grammarian, with James Trig- landius's Notes, and what the Abbé Sallier has publish'd in our Memoirs (1); for the Asyla, John Osiander, and the late Abbé Boissi; for the Lots, the Auguries, and other Methods of Divining, Bulengerus; in general for several Ceremonies and religious Customs, Pitiscus and Rosinus; provided, as Reinesius has remark'd, we give no credit to the latter but when he quotes the Ancients; for the Vows and votive Tables, the Treatise of James-Philip Thomassinus: With regard to the Oaths, always connected with Religion, the small Treatise of J. B. Hansenius; for the Sacrifices and Priests, Merula. In fine, he may read what Montfaucon has collected from these and several other Authors, in his Antiquity explain'd in Sculptures: and a great number of other Pieces scatter'd up and down in the The-saurus of Grævius and Gronovius, and in the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles-Lettres.

No doubt it will be objected to me, that we have compleat Mythologies already, and numbers of Authors who have given us laborious Treatises on Fable. 'Tis true, and I shall now endeavour by a short Examination of these Works to estimate their Merit. I am not to speak of Diodorus Siculus, nor Apollodorus, nor Hyginus, because they have done no more than barely to collect Fables, as Ovid, Antoninus Liberalis, and others, without giving any just Explanation of them. Palephatus, who attempted to explain them, is a Guide not to be relied on. Conon's fifty Narrations are hardly of any greater use. Heraclides, and an Anonymous Author, who has given us two Treatises de Rebus incredibilibus, have indeed reduced to History the Fables they relate; but these Works, or rather these Fragments, are too short, and cite no Authority for the Facts they advance. The Catasterisms of Eratostratus the Cyrenian, a much shorter Work than that of Hyginus, contains the History of the Constellations and of some Stars; and one who would be acquainted with the poetical and astronomical Heavens, must give them a reading, as well as the Treatise of Cæsius

(1) Mém. of the Acad. of Belles-Lettres, v. r.

Chap. I. Explain'd by History. 7

Cæsius or Bleau, not neglecting even what the Abbé Artigaut has done upon the same Subject. Phurnutus's Book upon the Nature of the Gods is merely stuffed with Allegories, and is of very little use to a Mythologist. The Work of the Philosopher Sallust is a very succinct Treatise, where you have a mixture of Moralizing and Physicks, but nothing instructive or particular. As for Heracrides of Pontus's Book, one may judge from the bare Title of it, The Allegories of Homer, whether we ought to have any great Opinion of the Work. The three first Books of Planciades Fulgentius, the Latin Mythologist, are well worth the reading. The Work of Lactantius Placidus contains nothing but the Arguments of Ovid's Metamorphoses abridg'd, and that of the Philosopher Albricus the Manner of representing the Gods with their Attributes. What we have now extant of Ptolemy Hephestion, is but a Summary of the seven Books he had composed upon Mythology; and all that now remains serves but to make us lament the loss of the Work itself. That of Parthenius of Nice has this to recommend it, that he draws from ancient Authors the fabulous Stories he relates; but it takes in too few of them. The Metamorphoses of Antoninus Liberalis are much inferiour in merit to Ovid's; but then he has some which the Latin Poet wants.

To come now to the modern Mythologists, I shall speak my Opinion of such of them as I have seen. In the Front of them I place Natalis Comes, a learned Author, who perhaps had render'd our Labours on the same Subject superfluous, if his too great Prejudice in favour of the allegorical and moral Sense had allowed him to give a little more Application only to find out the History of the Fable. Besides he wanted the Helps, which Vossius, Bochart, and others since his time, have furnished us with by their learned Discoveries. The Mythology of Cartari, and its Continuation by Du Verdier, has nothing very instructive, nor well digested. The Genealogy of the Gods by Boccace has this Peculiarity, that the Author had been acquainted with, and cites Books, which at present are not to be had. The Work of Lylio Gyraldi is extremely well done, so far as it goes; but besides that all the Subjects we look for in a Book of Mythology are not to be found there, he has quite overlook'd the History couch'd under the ancient Fictions; what he has done better, is the List of the Surnames of the Gods he mentions: it appears to have been composed with a great deal of care, though he frequently neglects to explain these Names. The Commentary of Vigenere on Philostratus's Pictures is full of Learning, but has too great a mixture of Physicks and Moralizing; and that in a Language which is now grown obsolete.

8. MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book I.

ARTICLE II.

What Extremes be ought to avoid.

Having considered the preliminary Knowledge a Mythologist ought to acquire, I shall now shew him the Errors he ought to shun, with respect to the Systems that have been contrived for explaining Fable: for though there is not one of them that can answer all Objections; no general Rules that will serve for all Occasions; yet I am confident, that there is none of them but what some Advantage may be drawn from.

Examination of the Systems offer'd by the Learned for explaining Fables.

One of the principal and most ancient is that of the Platonick Philosophers, who being hard put to it by the Objections of the Defenders of Christianity, whose Design was to prove the Absurdity of Paganism from that of the Fables it was founded upon, pretended that these Fables were but Allegories, that wrap'd up grand Mysteries, and especially that of the different Productions of second Causes, animated by the same Spirit that had disintangled and extracted them from the Chaos where they were blended in confusion: That the Multiplicity of Gods, with worshipping whom they were reproach'd, were only Genii, of an inferiour Order to the first Mover, who had committed to them the Government of the World ; and in fine, that the things, which appear'd either absurd or obscene, were only Mysteries under which the Generation of Plants and Animals lay conceal'd.

of

My Intention is not to transcribe here the Answers of the Fathers, who demonstrated to these Philosophers, that the Fables were the true Histories of their Gods, to palliate whose Crimes, they had recourse to ingenious Allegories, when too late ; nor am I to insist upon their Replies to the Stoicks, who abandon'd the Establish'd Religion only by embracing Atheism, and owning no other Divinity but an universal Spirit, extended like Matter which it animated : This is what Virgil (1) has express'd in these celebrated Lines.

*Spiritus intus alit, totamque infusa per artus
Mens agitat molem, & magno se corpore miscet.*

This in effect, was the favourite Doctrine of the Stoicks (2), of Strato, Protagoras, Pliny, and has since been revived by Spinoza. But the System I have been now explaining, though false in general, because Fables never were a Work of deep Design, nor composed with a view to one Whole, does yet explain in a very ingenious manner the Allegories they sometimes contain ; and Plato himself, the Master of the Philosophers, who framed this System, explain'd some of them upon this Principle.

Some learned Men of the last Age have taken another Method to investigate the Sense of Fable. Kircher alledg'd, he had found out the Solution of them in the Explanation of the Hieroglyphicks, or of the sacred Language of the Egyptians ; an Hypothesis false in general, and exceeding precarious, by reason of our being little acquainted with this mysterious Language ; and because the Fables happen not to be all of Egyptian Production. However, this Country having been peopled among the first, even soon after the Dispersion of the Sons of Ncab, and there being Fables that appear as old as this primitive Separation, since Idolatry with which they are connected then arose, nothing conduces conduces more towards their being understood, and to put the Mythologist in a way of explaining them, than Knowledge of the Religion and Ceremonies of this ancient People; and therefore it may be of use to read the Œdipus Ægyptiacus of this learned Jesuit.

(1) Æn. L. 6. V. 126.

(2) Cic. L. 1. De Nat. Deor.

The celebrated Bochart thought most of the Fables might be explain'd, by the equivocal Words of the ancient Phœnician Language; but his Hypothesis would not be tenable, was it to be carried any great length. The Fables were not all invented by the Phœnicians; nor can we be sure of understanding their Language so fully as to succeed in explaining those that were. It is certain however, that these People were the first who carried on Traffick and Navigation. Besides, it is undeniable, that there have been found in almost every Island in the Mediterranean, upon the Coasts of Asia Minor, in Greece, and as far as the inmost Recesses of Spain, Marks of their Residence in these several Countries, and Vestiges of their Religion: consequently, what Light must an Insight into Languages throw upon the Fables, and what vast Assistance may one derive from the Works of this learned Author? What a world of ingenious Explications has he either given himself, or enabled so many others, particularly Le Clerc, to give?

The System of those who are for referring all the Fables to Scripture misunderstood, or to corrupted Traditions, is certainly false when taken in general. There are a world of things in the Fables, that have no manner of Connection with the Facts recorded in the sacred Books; nay more, these Books were in the custody of a People jealous of their Religion, far from being communicative, much despised, and but little known till the Conquests of Alexander. However, we may be easily convinced, by reading the Works of Pere Thémassin, Huetius, the Author of Homer Hebraizing, Daniel Clazenius's Book, intitled, Theologia Gentilis, the Comparison of Fable with Scripture, and still more by perusing the Reflections of M. Fourmont the elder upon ancient Nations, that one may have the good fortune to discover, among these ancient Fictions, some Remains of the Hebrew Traditions. But to give here my Opinion upon this Subject, there is not one of the Authors I have been naming, but has gone to an Extreme. Dangerous it is for a Person to allow himself to be dazzled by the first Glimpses of Resemblance that strike the Sight; this is a Rock which Men of Parts have split upon. If the late Bishop of Avanches had contented himself with saying, that there was no difficulty in tracing some Affinity between Moses and the Mercury of the Greeks; such an Affinity as might indeed very naturally be found between two Persons, either in Character, or some one of their Actions, he had merited Praise for running the parallel between them; but to suffer the Charm of this Discovery to transport him into an Opinion, that the Legislator of the Hebrews had been the Model of almost all the Pagan Gods, as also his Sister Miriam, or his Wife Zippora, of all their Goddesses; this is one of those Sallies, into which Men are sometimes carried by too much Learning. (a)

That the Pagans had been informed of the Travels both of Abraham and Moses, is a Fact that could easily be proved; but that these Travels, and the Prodigies that accompanied them, were intended by the ancient Poets in the History of Jasen, and of the Argonautick Expedition, is an Hypothesis, which all the Efforts of a modern Author have never been able to render probable (1).

In like manner, however, certain it is, that Truth did not rise out of Error, but that Truth itself, by being misunderstood, gave rise to that multitude of Fables, by which almost the whole World has been seduced for many Ages; and consequently, however they may deserve Praise who have search'd into the Bosom of Error itself for a Discovery of this ancient Truth, yet we cannot choose but blame them for carrying rying their Conjectures too far : for instance, when they advance, that one may find Traces of the Mystery of the Trinity, either in the Works of Plato, as Justin, Eusebius, Clemens of Alexandria, and some others have imagin'd ; or in the hieroglyphical Figures of the Isiack Table (1), according to others ; or in the Divinities of the ancient Germans, as Cluverius alledges ; or in the three principal Gods of the East-Indies, Brama, Vichneu, and Routren ; or in the three-headed Idol of Japan ; or in fine, in that of Peru, named Tanga-Tanga, which, according to Acosta, signifies One in three, or three in one ; what is this but an Affectation of learned Singularity, at the expence of that very Truth they value themselves on searching after ? Would God reveal this ineffable Mystery to these People in a clearer manner than he had done even to the Hebrews ?

(a) See the fourteenth Source of Fables, C. 5. where this Thought is explain'd at more length.

(1) Comparison of Fable with Scripture, T. 2.

That all the Inhabitants of this Globe are sprung from one common Stock, is a Truth we are oblig'd by Religion to believe ; that some of them, even after a long Separation, preserv'd the Memory of those sorts of Events which are not liable to be forgot, such as the Deluge ; this too is a thing hardly to be question'd, notwithstanding the different manner in which People most remote from us have told the Story to their first Discoverers : but to think to find among them Remains of our Mysteries ; a visible Conformity in their Manners to those of our primitive Patriarchs ; to suppose they had a Notion, and that pretty exact, of the Orgies of Bacchus, the Mysteries of Isis and Osiris, the Fable of Jason and Medea, &c. this is one of those Extravagancies they must unavoidably fall into, who, the moment they are struck with some faint Appearance of Probability, begin by forming a Scheme, and afterwards endeavour to establish it upon forc'd Comparisons.

The System of those, who reduce Fables to ancient History, though disfigur'd by the Poets, who were the first Historians ; a System that appears most relish'd at this day, and which I have been encourag'd to embrace, by the Success of some learned Men of the last Age, who have so happily explained some particular Fables, even this would have its Inconveniences, was one to reduce all to History; since it is certain that some Fables are no more than pure Allegories, either upon some Virtue, or Vice, or else on some of the Productions of Nature: others, whose foundation is in History, tho' the Ancients have chose to transmit them to us allegorically, as in the Fable of Niobe's Children, who were cut off by the Contagion that raged in Thebes, and are said poetically to have been slain by Apollo and Diana, because they attributed Death, if it was sudden or occasioned by Pestilence, to Apollo for Males, and to Diana for Females, as may be seen in an hundred Passages of Homer; and all from an Opinion that contagious Distempers were owing to the Influences of the Sun and Moon, represented by the Arrows of these two Divinities.

(1) See Montfaucon's Antiq. Vol. 2. P. 2. C. 1.

This System, taken with these and some other Restrictions, is the most rational, and will be found most satisfactory, when apply'd to Particulars: but then we must not attempt to explain all the Circumstances of every Fable, and if we would explain them to the purpose, we must take them from the Poets of greatest Antiquity, such as Homer and Hesiod, where they are much more simple, and express more naturally the Facts to which they refer; and that sometimes, without all those Ornaments that were superadded to them by After-ages, either to make them more venerable, because they were a part of Religion, or more surprising, because it is natural for Man to delight in the Marvellous. Several Examples of this might be given, but I shall content my self with that of Bellerophon, whose History is very fully told in the Iliad (1), without making the least mention of the Horse Pegasus, who is said by later Authors to have been broke by Minerva for the use of this Hero. This ancient Poet says as little of the Centaurs, according to the Idea they had of them in After-times: He represents them indeed as a Race of brutal Savages,

(1) L. 6. v. 221.

Savages, but by no means Monsters, Half-men and Half-horses: If I am not mistaken, Pindar was the first who painted them in that form.

I don't say that a Fable was not invented in the time of these ancient Poets, because they have it not. They neither had occasion nor intention to mention every one: but all I plead for is this, whenever they relate a Fable, such Circumstances as they want appear to be the Invention of after-times: Thus for instance, Hesiod tells us, that Jason had by Medea, Medus, without saying any more; whence I conclude, the Circumstance of Medus's being the Father of the Medes, to have been only added to this Fable after his time. Hesiod could never say such a thing, since the Medes, who only begun to appear about 750 Years before Christ, could not possibly be known to a Poet who liv'd 900 Years before this Æra. When the same Poet speaks of Maia, one of the Pleiades, and Mother of Mercury, he says nothing of the six other Sisters, who together with her formed the Constellation of that Name; much less would he mention the seventh, named Merope, who, as the later Poets tell us, is never to be seen, because she alone had matched with a Mortal, while her Sisters had been married to Gods. This Physical Fable, whereby we are taught that this Star has been sunk for a long time in the unfathomable depths of Æther, and which is told both by Ovid and Hyginus, was undoubtedly neither known to Homer nor Hesiod.

Another Rule to be observed by such as adopt the Historical System, is still to bear in mind that Fables are a Whole ill-match'd, which was never a Work of Meditation, invented at one time, in one Country, or by the same Persons. This Reflection I made in the Preface to my Translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses. I proved too in my Explication of Fables, that neither Egypt nor Phenicia had given birth to them all, altho' the greater number came from thence; that many of them were invented in Greece and Italy, and others of them but of modern Invention: such was that of Æneas's Ships, transformed by Cybele into Sea-Nymphs; a Fable which which Ovid has copied from Virgil, nor are we able to trace this Tradition higher than the time of Augustus.

I add, it is easy for one to fall into mistakes; sometimes a Fable may be look'd upon as modern, when it is of great antiquity; and thus for preventing mistakes in examining it, he must try, if possible, to discover its Original: and as to that, I take the Names of the Personages of these Fables to be very proper to mark out the Country where they had their birth. Whenever these Names are related to the Languages of the East, we may be sure they are the Product of Egypt or Phenicia. When they are Greek, as those of Daphne, the Heliades, the Myrmidons, Alopi, Galanthis, one may take it for granted that the Fables concerning these Personages are of Grecian Extraction; and in fine, when the Names are Latin, such as Carmenta, Flora, and Anna Perenna, we may conclude, the Fables delivered concerning them to have been invented in Italy. As a Confirmation of this Rule, these last Fictions are never to be met with out of the Latin Territory, nor the others out of Greece.

But this Rule too has its inconvenience; for if, because Matuta and Portumnus are Latin Names, we should infer that the Fable about them had its rise in Italy, we should be in a mistake; since we find it in Greece under the names of Leucothoe and Palemon, and this same Palemon, Selden has fully made out (1) to be the Melicertus of the Phenicians. Thus it is, one may sometimes discover the Original of Fables, and their Transportation from Egypt or from Phenicia, into Greece, Italy, and other Countries; for perhaps there is not one where they have not been found.

We must not however imagine, that these People I now named had invented all of them: Asia minor, the Isles, Greece, the Gauls and Spain, were undoubtedly peopled by the Descendants of Japhet, from the earliest Ages; and these as well as others had a Religion and Fables of their own, when the first Phenician and Egyptian Colonies arrived amongst them: and if these Colonies introduced thither their Gods and Worship, the others were not behind in their turn to communicate to them the Knowledge of Divinities they had worshipped before a Stranger had come amongst them. Hamon and Belus, for example, were the leading Deities of Egypt and Phenicia, as Jupiter was the greatest of the Gods of Greece. We find however in the earliest Antiquity, that Hamon and Belus had also the Appellation of Jupiter; which could be the Effect of nothing else but that Communication of Religion I have mentioned.

(1) Synt. de Diis Syriis.

The People who adopted foreign Divinities, in process of time made so considerable Alterations in the Worship they paid them, and even in their Names, that it was frequently impossible to know their true Original; insomuch that Colonies were no longer acquainted with their own Gods when they met with them in Countries, where their Worship had been introduced by others before them, and never dream'd but the Deities worshipped there, were different from theirs; which to be sure occasioned no small Confusion in the ancient Mythology. Some learned Men of the last Age (1) have in great measure cleared up this so essential an Article. They have, for example, found out that the Thentat of the Gauls, the Hermes of the Greeks, and the Mercury of the Latins, were the same with the Tbot or Tbau of the Egyptians; that the Belenus of the Celtæ, the Apollo of the Greeks, and the Mithras of the Persians, were the Osiris and Orus of the same Egyptians; that Diana and Lucina were their Isis; and the Alilat of the Arabians, the Astarté of the Syrians, and the celestial Venus of the Greeks, were the Planet we call the Hesperus or Evening-Star. Some, even Authors of Learning, among whom we may reckon Bochart, Father Thomassin, Cumberland, Vossius, M. Huet, M. Fourmont, and others, think they have found out these ancient Gods in the Patriarchs; Saturn in Noah or Abraham; Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto, in Shem, Ham, and Japhet, and so of others: But this Article still requires to be more fully considered, and perhaps we shall be able in the course of this Work, to discover a Resemblance, or rather rather an Identity, between the eight or twelve great Gods, mentioned in Herodotus, and those of the Greeks and other Nations.

(1) Bochart, Selden, M. le Clerc, Perizonius, and several others.

ARTICLE III.

Of the Manner how one ought to proceed in the Explanation of Fable.

Before I put an end to these Reflections, it will not be amiss to shew those for whose use they are designed, in what manner they are to proceed in explaining the Fables. To understand them fully, it is necessary first to examine from the Contexture of the Fable, whether it exhibits the Idea of some historical Fact, or whether it be only an Allusion to some of Nature's Operations, or to some Virtue; and the most simple Reflection is often sufficient to unfold this Mystery. Whenever the Fable appears to be Historical, we must first clear away any Circumstances that are out of Nature: A Poet in describing Events, does not tell them simply and as an Historian would do, but intermixes Machinery, Ambages Deorumque ministeria, as Petronius has it. We must then set aside this Interposition of the Gods, and ascribe either to Valour, Prudence or Address, what the Poet attributes to Mars, Minerva, or Mercury. We must also examine in what Language the Fable to be examined is written, and we shall often find a meer Ambiguity in that Language has given rise to the Fiction; of this Bochart furnishes us with numbers of Examples. It is impracticable, nor could it be of great use to explain all the Circumstances of the Fables, most of which were the late Invention of Poets as they had occasion to use them; so that we must take them from the most ancient Poets, where they are commonly more simple, as has been already remarked. It is also necessary to be acquainted with the Ancients, to see if the Fact contained in the Fable, be connected with some other Incident in History; for then it will be easy to strip it of the Marvellous. The Expedition of the Argonauts, for example, and the Labours of Hercules, are historical Truths:

With how many fictitious Embellishments have they been set off? The most perplexing Difficulty in the way of a Mythologist consists in unravelling the Intricacy of different Opinions about one and the same Fable, which is told in so many ways, and so different from one another, that it is impossible to reconcile them all.

Let us suppose, for instance, we were to examine the Partition of the World among the three Sons of Saturn; at first we shall be astonished at the diversity of Sentiments there is among the Learned about this Subject.

The Historians (1) we shall find delivering quite opposite Traditions, tho' of equal Antiquity. While the bulk of them shall suppose this Partition to have really happened, others will give a relation of Facts that destroy it. We shall be told, for example, that Neptune came out of Libye, and Minerva from the Banks of the Lake Triton in the same Country; so that they could have nothing in common with Jupiter, to whom they could not so much as be Relations. The first thing is to examine these different Traditions, and abandon such as appear contradictory, and inconsistent with Facts for which we have the Authority of good Authors.

This is the Method, which has been observed by our best Mythologists, and I know none of them has adopted this Fable, without having first enquired what might have given rise to it. The most Judicious, such as Gerard Vossius, Marsham, Bochart, and Father Thomassin, are of opinion that the Partition of the World among the Sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japhet, was the Original of the Tradition of the same Partition among Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto; and considering it in this light, they have not been wanting to draw very curious Comparisons, between the three fabulous Princes, and the three Sons of the Patriarch. However, these same Authors vary amongst themselves in tracing the Resemblance between them, and where the Comparison is the same, the Persons compared are different. After all all, what Similitude can be found between Shem and Jupiter, Ham and Pluto? The only rational Inference one could draw from the Opinion of these great Men, is not, that the two Families, which cannot be confounded without receding from all the Ancients, make but one; but barely the Truth of this Proposition, that the Greeks often embellished the History of their fabulous times, with that of the Eastern Nations, whence they derived their Original.

(1) See Dicæorus Sic.

The Empire of the Titans, according to the Ancients, was exceeding extensive. These Princes were possessed of Phrygia, Thrace, a part of Greece, the Island of Crete, and several other Provinces, to the inmost Recesses of Spain. To these Sanchoniathon (1) seems to join Syria; and Diodorus (2) adds a part of Africa and the Kingdoms of Mauritania. I am not now to enter upon the Proofs of this Fact, which is very fully discussed in Father Pezron's Treatise upon the Origin and Antiquity of the Language of the Celtæ. I shall only say here, that this learned Man contends that the Division which was made of this vast Empire, came in after-times to be taken for the Partition of the World: that Asia remaining in the hands of Jupiter, the most potent of the three Brothers, made him be looked upon as the God of Olympus, a celebrated Mountain where he had his Residence, and which was afterwards taken for Heaven itself: that the Sea and Islands, which fell to Neptune, occasioned their giving him the Title of God of the Sea: and that Spain, the extremity of the then known World, thought to be a very low Country in respect of Asia, and famous for its excellent Mines of Gold and Silver, falling to Pluto, occasioned him to be taken for the God of the infernal Regions.

A Mythologist should state and carefully canvass these different Opinions, to enable the Reader to judge of them; and he may determine himself in favour of that which appears to him the most probable, and support it if he can by new Arguments, without giving himself much trouble about the Objections that may be raised against

C 2

(1) In Euseb. Præp. Evang. (2) L. 3.

against him. For one may venture here to affirm, that nothing stronger will ever be advanced to disprove these three Titan Princes to have been Brothers, than what may be said in defence of it.

C H A P. II.

In which 'tis proved that Fables are not mere Allegories, but comprehend several ancient Facts.

FABLES are to be no otherwise accounted of than so many beautiful Veils, under which the Truths of ancient History are concealed; and however they may be disguised by the great number of Ornaments mixed with them, it is not absolutely impossible to unfold the historical Facts they contain. I grant there are some Circumstances, in the Fables which were merely of Poetical Invention; but there is a deal of Probability that they had a true Foundation (a): and tho' we are not to take all that they have said of their Gods and Heroes in the literal Sense, yet it would be as wrong to reject it altogether, and the rather that they frequently speak of Persons whose Deeds we have recorded in History; which gives Pausanias (1) occasion to say, “ In every Period of time, singular and extraordinary Events, in proportion as they were remote from the Memory of Men, so much the less did they retain the air of Credibility, thro' their fault who built Fables upon the foundation of Truth.”

I know the Poets have sometimes gone the length even of inventing the Personages they describe; but it is easy to discover these, and to be sure no reasonable man judges of Saturn or Neptune, as he does of Fortune and of Destiny. There is no impossibility to distinguish amongst all these Poetical Personages, the real from the figurative or allegorical. Learned Men have done it before me, nor did St. Augustin, Lactantius, and Arnobius

(a) Non enim res ipsas gestas finxerunt Poetæ, sed gestis addiderunt quemdam colorem rebus. Lact. de falsa Rel. lib. 1. c. 12.

(1) In Att. c. 2.

bius judge this Article unworthy their Consideration, believing they did no small service to Religion, by shewing to the World that the ancient Pagan Divinities had been no other than Men. I own, for my part, if there was nothing in all the Fables of the Poets but some Allegories, I don't see what great value we ought to have for their Works: nothing to me would appear more insipid. Whereas, if it is true that they comprize ancient Facts, their making use of such numbers of Fables has nothing at all surprizing; it gives us even a better opinion of the Genius of the Greeks, since we see that in spite of their invincible byas towards Fictions, they did not however feed themselves with Tales of mere Invention (a); and tho' they have embellished their Narratives, yet we know at least that they contain several Truths of Importance. Accordingly it is certain that the greatest Men of Antiquity, have always had a high Idea of the Poets, whom they looked upon as the earliest Historians. Strabo says (1), the Historians came nearer to the Character of Homer, in proportion as they were more ancient; which makes Casaubon say (b), that in reading Herodotus, he thought he was reading Homer himself. Shall we believe in good earnest, that Alexander would have held this Poet in such esteem, had he looked upon him only as a mere Relater of Fables? and would he have envied the happy Lot of Achilles in having such a one to sing his Praises? Where had been the sense of wishing for an Historian, who instead of describing the true Atchievements of that Prince, would have wrote none but fabulous ones? He well knew, that amidst those Fictions brought in by the Poet, to give a colouring to the Ground of his History, he preserved the Character of his Hero in perfection. Pausanias is of the same opinion with Strabo, as well as Polybius, Herodotus, and so many others. We know how Dionysius of Halicarnassus, who is so grave and so judicious an Author, explains the Adventures of Æneas and

C 3

(a) See M. le Clerc Bibl. chois. Tom. 2.

(1) Lib. 2.

(b) Notæ in Strabon. lib. 1. Ac mihi quidem persæpe Herodotum eum lego, Homerum aliquem videor legere.

and the other Trojans. Nor are we ignorant that Titus Livius, in the Fables that relate to the Antiquity of Rome, brings back the Gods to Men, as in that about the Birth of Romulus, his Education, &c. Does he not reduce to History the Voyages of Antenor and Æneas, the Wars and Victories of the last, and his Apotheosis? Is not the Subject of the Æneid considered by him in the same light as Polybius and Strabo had done the Iliad and Odyssey? When Cicero is enumerating the Sages, does he not bring in Nestor and Ulysses? would he have given mere Phantoms a place among them? Has he not explained the Fables of Atlas, Cepheus, and Prometheus (a)? Are we not taught by him, that what gave occasion to feign that the one supported the Heavens on his Shoulders, and the other was chained to Mount Caucasus, was their indefatigable Application to contemplate the Heavenly Bodies? I might bring in here the Authority of most of the Ancients: I might produce that of the primitive Fathers of the Church, Arnobius, Lactantius, and several others, who looked upon Fables to be founded on true Histories; and I might finish this List with the Names of the most Illustrious of our Moderns, who have traced out in ancient Fictions, so many Remains of the Tradition of the primitive Ages.

But, say you, would not this be granting enough, to allow Fables to comprehend the Philosophy and Religion of the Ancients? I grant we have some Allegories mixed with them, which point that way; but still it was the primary Intention of the Poets, to comprize in these Fables the History of their Heroes; and we wander from their true Scope, when we confine our Views entirely to the Allegory. Is it really credible, that when they tell us Bacchus was clapped into Jupiter's Thigh, they only meant to let us know, that Wine, of which that God is the Symbol, must, in order to ripen, have a moderate Heat, as there is in that part of the

(a) Nec vero Cælum Atlas sustinere, nec Prometheus affixus Caucasus, nec Cepheus stellatus . . . nisi cælestium divina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem Fabulæ conduxisset. Tusc. Quæst. l. 5.

the Body? That the Combat of the Gods in Homer signifies no more than the Struggle of our Passions, or the Conjunction of the Planets in the same Point of the Zodiac, according to the Reveries of some Scholiasts? That Vulcan is only represented lame, because Fire without Fuel, goes out, Deficit; claudicat (a)? Is it to be thought, that when they tell us how Jupiter decreed upon Pluto's carrying off Proserpine, that she should be six Months in Hell, and six Months with her Mother Ceres, they designed only to inform us that the Grain is lodged six Months in the Earth, and six Months out of it (b)? That they have made up a match between Jupiter and Juno, only because Jupiter is the Air, and Juno the Earth; and Jupiter by sending Showers upon the Earth, makes it fertile? That the bad understanding betwixt this married Couple, and the Jealousies of Juno, teach us nothing else, but that the Air put into commotion raises Storms which work such havock upon the Earth (c)? For my part, it is what I shall never be persuaded of, and I doubt not but Homer would be not a little surprized, was he to come into the World and know all that is attributed to him; in truth, would he cry out in the Words of the ingenious Author of The Dialogues of the Dead (d), I was suspicious enough that some People of wonderful Penetration, would discover things that never came into my head: As it requires no great Cunning to make a Prophecy which some time or other shall hit on an Event, so it is a mighty easy thing to make a Fable that may chance to be turned to an ingenious Allegory. And if he should be ask'd, whether it was really so that he had wrapped up deep Mysteries in his Works. he would ingenuously acknowledge, he had not thought upon it; but, that knowing there was a strong Sympathy between Truth and Falshood, and that the Mind of Man does not always seek after Truth, he thought fit to borrow the Disguise of Fiction, to make Truth be the more relished.

C 4

relished.

(a) St. Augustin, after the ancient Poets.

(b) Sallust L. de Diis & Mundo. (c) Eusebius after Plutarch explains it in this manner. (d) Dialogue of Homer and Es.

relished. It is no new thing to make Authors speak what they never thought; and if we must have recourse to Allegories, all we shall learn from it is, according to the Remark of a learned Modern (1), that the first Inhabitants of Greece made their whole Wisdom consist in expressing trivial things in a very obscure manner. Who knows not that Rain makes the Earth prolific? And yet according to the Patrons of Allegory, they could not tell us this, till of the Earth and Air they had made their Jupiter and Juno, whom they afterwards came to worship as Gods. The Ancients proceeded in a way of honest Simplicity; as they knew little about Virtue and Vice, when they reckoned their first Kings among their Gods, they recorded their Actions good or bad, as formerly; and after representing Jupiter striking the Titans with Thunder, they transformed him to a Goat, or a Satyr, to ensnare simple Shepherdesses.

But, it will be said, are there not things we meet with in the Poets that can only be understood allegorically? Are they not every moment taking Jupiter for the Air, Ceres for the Corn, Bacchus for Wine? Sine Cerere & Baccho friget Venus. Manet sub Jove frigido Venator, &c. In like manner, when we read in one of Nævius's Verses, Coquus dedit Neptunum, Venerem, Cereferem, is not this his Meaning, The Cook provided Fish, Herbs, and Bread? as Justus Lipsius explains it (2). When they tell us, the Ocean is the Father of the Rivers, the Sirens are the Daughters of Acheloüs, &c. is not this evidently allegorizing Nature? It is so; but this is by no means the ancient state of Fables: Their Bacchus is considered as a conquering Prince; Jupiter as a King in Crete, renowned for his Conquests; Ceres as a Queen of Sicily, who taught her People Agriculture; and so for others: and it was only in after-times that they affixed to these ancient Fables, an Idea of the Elements and of universal Nature; which only proves that there is a great deal of Allegory intermixed with them, which is not denied; and this to be sure is the very thing that makes their Explanation so difficult, the Poets

(1) M. le Clerc.

(2) Nat. Lat. l. 2. c. 1.

Poets passing at once from History to Physicks. Thus we are to look upon those Allegories, as so many Metaphors and figurative Ways of speaking, that were added to denote the Characters of the Persons spoken of. The Arrival, for example, of Cecrops in Greece, the Laws he introduced, and the Care he took to polish the Inhabitants of Attica, are historical Facts, which one might tell in the natural way; and possibly they that wrote them first, blended no Fiction with them; however they gave out afterwards, that Cecrops was compounded of two Natures (a), the upper part of his Body that of a Man, and the other that of a Serpent: an Allegory teaching us, that this Prince ruled over two Nations; the Egyptians, a People justly denominated Men from their sweet and refined Manners; and the Greeks, who in their fierce unpolished Nature bore a resemblance to the Serpents, that dwelt like them in Dens and Forests. Thus every Fable almost has two Parts, the one historical, and the other metaphorical. Atlas, for example, was a Prince given to Astronomy, who made use of the Sphere in studying the Motion of the Stars; here is the History, which they thus express; he carried the Heavens upon his Shoulders, and this is the Parable. Proteus was a Prince of great Wisdom and Foresight, Eloquence and Cunning, this was his Character: it is happily enough expressed, by saying he turned himself into a great many Shapes. Dedalus was the Invention of Sails instead of the Oars that were formerly in use, and he happily made his escape out of the hands of Minos; this is the matter of fact: to inform us of it, we are told in a figurative Stile, that he had made himself Wings on which he flew away; a lively Expression that finely marks the Swiftneſs of a Ship under fail.

The Poets, to gain Admirers, have interwoven these amusing Fictions into the Histories they chose to relate. Something of this Disposition is natural to Men, especially to the Eastern People, from whom we have most of the Fables: this Temper still prevails amongst them; and

(a) Gemino de corpore is Ovid's Expression for it.

and we see from their Books so full of Parables, that they remain at this day what the Greeks were in the most fabulous Times.

But if on the other side the Poets thought themselves obliged to invent Fables that they might divert their Readers, yet they very well knew that we have no great Love to be fed with mere Chimæras. Thus it became necessary for them to seek some Foundation for these Fictions: and the History of the World supplying them with Events of an extraordinary and wondrous nature, which with a few Ornaments had all the Charm of Fable; what could hinder their making choice of them, to be the foundation of their Works, rather than invent Tales, with which one could not choose but soon be cloy'd?

Strabo's judicious remark upon the Voyages of Ulysses, where Homer has interspers'd so many Fables, is a good confirmation of what I have been saying.

“ When we have ancient History before us, says “ that Author, we must examine in this Light what “ is said by them, who maintain that Ulysses reach'd
 “ the Seas of Italy and Sicily, as Homer has said,
 “ and by others who deny it; for each of these “ Opinions has something good and something bad,
 “ and it is possible for one to be in the right, and “ also in the wrong, on either side of the Question.
 “ One is in the right to believe that Homer from a “ Persuasion of Ulysses's having actually sail'd to all “ those Places, has laid the Foundation of his Fable
 “ in a Subject undoubtedly true; though he has han“ dled it in the poetical Way, that is, by mixing it with “ Fiction; for Tokens of his Voyages are to be seen “ in those Seas. But one would be in an error to “ take for circumstantiated History all the rest of the “ Fiction, as his Ocean, his infernal Regions, his “ Metamorphoses, the horrid Form of Scylla, the “ Cyclops, and so forth. He who should contend “ that all these Articles are so many Historical Truths, “ would be as little worth the refuting, as one who “ should maintain that Ulysses really arriv'd at Ithaca, “ just in the manner it is told by Homer.” Both
 the

the one and the other of these Opinions are ridiculous ; we are to hold the mean, and select what is historical from among the embellishments of Fiction. Thus to conjecture right upon this Subject, two Extremes are to be avoided. The Ground of the Fable must be considered as something historically true, and at the same time all the Ornaments believed fictitious : This Principle must be deeply rooted in the Mind, that Fables are not wholly of the nature of Fictions ; that they are Histories of the Times furthest back, which have been disfigured, either through the Ignorance of the People, the Artifice of the Priests, or the Genius of the Poets, who have always preferred the Gaudy and Sparkling to the Solid. But the question is, how to clear up all this ? One is liable to mistake for Truth what is nothing but a Fiction ; and the only Circumstance, perhaps, that has Truth in it, shall pass for Fable. Have we any Rules whereby to distinguish right in the Case ? Undoubtedly we have : The first thing to be done is to clear the Fable of all that appears in it supernatural, all that pompous Apparatus of Fictions, which are glaring and obvious. Thus, in all the Battles that Homer describes, whenever he brings his Gods into the Field, let them forthwith be set aside ; the Part he ascribes to Minerva, is to be attributed to Prudence and the good Conduct of the Generals ; to the Valour of Hector, what he places to the account of Mars ; Chance it is rather than Pallas that brought Ulysses to an interview with Nausicaa, Alcinous's Daughter, and by the mysterious Cloud, with which he was shrouded by the Goddess, we are to understand the Darkeness of the Night, under whose Protection the King of Ithaca entered the Town of the Pheacians without being discovered. We are not to think that Priam was really conducted by Mercury into the Tent of Achilles, as Homer describes it ; but only that this King set out by Night to recover Hector's Body from the Greeks, declaring upon his Arrival he had come with Gifts to mitigate the Conqueror of his Son. When you see a Hero carry'd off the Field by a Goddess, you are only to fancy this an Allegory to hide his Flight. If the Poets speak of Giants whose Head touch'd the Heavens, represent to yourself a Race of Men monstrous by reason of their Crimes, rather than any enormous Height of Stature. If we are told that Hercules with his Hands separated the two Mountains Calpé and Abyla, which lying between Africa and Spain, had stopt the Course of the Ocean, and that the Sea forthwith rush'd in with violence upon the Land, and formed that vast Gulf we call the Mediterranean; you may believe that in the time of some Hercules, (for there were several of them) the Ocean opened a Passage to itself, with the assistance, perhaps, of an Earthquake, and got between Europe and Africa: and then you will not be far from the Truth, and may boast of having found out the first Key to the Fables.

28 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book I.

But you will say, when we have thus divested Fables of whatever is out of Nature, is all the rest true? Not so neither; before we can judge of that, we must, if possible, consult the ancient Historians; and where they fail us (for they don't always record such sorts of Events) we must have recourse to Medals, Inscriptions, and other antique Monuments; and where none of these are to be had, we must go to the Etymology of Words, and search into the antient Languages for unravelling most of those ancient Fictions. We must examine with attention, what may have given rise to them: Sometimes an equivocal Word in a Language the Poet did not understand, has led him to broach a Fable, while, according to his Taste, he preferred that meaning which had something of the Marvelous, before the other, where nothing offered but what was natural. It is true, one detracts a great deal from the Beauty of these Fictions, by explaining them; as soon as they come to be stript of their Ornaments, they produce the same effect with a Piece of Perspective in a Theatrical Decoration; they must not be look'd at too near. It gives one pain

pain to find the Conquest of the Dragons which vomited Fire, and the subduing the brazen-footed Bulls that kept the golden Fleece, turn out to be nothing but a false Key which Medea gave Jason to carry off her Father's Treasures, which a good Wall with double Gates render'd inaccessible. Accustom'd as we are to form to ourselves the Idea of a great Hero, whenever we hear Hercules mention'd, it surprizes us to see all the Glory of so many illustrious Actions given away amongst some Merchants that traded in different Countries, where they settled a few Colonies : To see in Ganymede whom Jupiter carried off, and Hyacinth whom Apollo slew, only two young Princes, the one stolen away by a King of Lydia, and the other killed by an Accident : In the Wings of Dedalus and Icarus, a Ship under Sail : In all the Changes of Achelous, only frequent Inundations ; and in the Combat of Hercules with the God of that River, a Dyke that was rais'd to hinder its overflowing. I shall make it appear that the Minotaur with Pasiphae, and the rest of that Fable, contain nothing but an Intrigue of the Queen of Crete with a Captain named Taurus ; and the artifice of Dedalus, only a sly Confident : That Scylla and Charybdis, those two formidable Monsters that devoured Passengers, were only two Rocks near the Island of Sicily, where Ships were in danger : That the frightful Monster which ravaged the Plains of Troy, meant only the Inundations of the Sea ; and what occasion'd their saying, the fair Hesione was expos'd to this Monster, was, because she was to be given to him, who put a stop to these Inundations : That it was not really Jupiter who transformed himself into a Shower of Gold, but Prætus who corrupted the Fidelity of the Keepers, to get Access into the Tower where Danae was shut up : That the Fable of Bellerophon who combated the Chimæra, barely informs us that this Prince defeated some Troops of the Lycians. Instead of representing Hercules encountering the Hydra of Lerna, we shall shew you a Man that drained a marshy Country. That Jupiter thundering

ing against the Giants, is a Prince that quells a Sedition : Atlas bearing Heaven upon his Shoulders, a King that study'd Astronomy with a Globe in his hand : The Golden Apples of the delightful Garden of the Hesperides and their Dragon, Oranges watch'd by mastiff Dogs. Truth, let it be ever so simple, ought to appear more lovely, and give greater delight when divested of Ornaments, than when set off with all that marvellous Dress it wears in the the Poets (a).

C H A P. III.

Division of the Fables.

I Find among the Poets six kinds of Fables (b) ; Historical, Philosophical, Allegorical, Moral, Mix'd, or invented merely for the sake of the Fable.

The first are ancient Histories, mix'd with several Fictions ; such are those which speak of Hercules, Jason, &c. instead of telling us in the simple way, that the latter went to recover the Treasures which Phrixus had carried to Colchis, they have given us the Fable of the Golden Fleece.

The Philosophical Fables are those which the Ancients invented as apt Parables to wrap up the Mysteries of their Philosophy ; as when the Ocean is said to be the Father of the Rivers ; the Moon to have married the Air, and become the Mother of the Dew.

The Allegorical were likewise Parables where some Mystical Sense lay concealed, as that in Plato about Porus and Penia, or Riches and Poverty, whose Offspring was Pleasure.

The Moral Fables are those they have contrived for the conveyance of some Precepts of Morality, as that which tells us (1) Jupiter sends the Stars upon this Earth in the day-time, to take notice of the Actions of Men: so the Fables of Æsop, and in general all Apologues.

(a) Melius est quodcunque verum, quam omne quod ex arbitrio fingi potest.

(b) The Word for Fable in Greek is Μῦθος, as much as to say, Discourse by way of Eminence.

There are also mix'd Fables, which are made up of Allegory and Morality, but have nothing Historical, such is the Fable of Até, related by Homer (2). Até, according to this Poet, was Jupiter's Daughter; her Name marks her Character, and her Inclinations; accordingly she thought upon nothing but doing mischief. Odious as she was to Gods and Men, Jupiter seized her by the Hair of the Head, and threw her down head-long from the height of Heaven, whither he made an Oath she should never enter more.

'Tis easy to see the Poet, under this Fable, design'd to represent the proneness we have to Evil, or Evil itself, under an Allegorical Figure; for having describ'd this mischievous Imp, who, according to him, traverses the whole Earth, with an incredible Celerity, doing all the mischief in her power; he adds, that her Sisters, likewise Jupiter's Daughters, whom he calls αἰται, Prayers, come always after her to repair, as far as lies in their power, the Evil done by her; but being lame, they move far slower than their Sister: as much as to say, Men are always more forward to sin, and more in earnest, than when they exercise Repentance, and make Reparation.

The Fables invented merely for the sake of Fable, have no other end, but to divert, as that of Psyche (3) and what we call the Milesian Tales, and those of the Sybarites.

Fables of the Historical kind, are easily distinguished, because mention is made in them of People we know elsewhere. Such as are composed for Amusement are likewise easy to be discovered, by the ridiculous Stories they tell of unknown Persons. The Sense of the Moral and Allegorical Fables is obvious; as for the Philosophical ones, they are full of Prosopopœias that animate Nature:

(1) Plaut. Prol. de Rud. (2) Iliad. 19. (3) See Apuleius's Golden Ass.

Nature: There Earth and Air are hid under the borrowed Names of Jupiter and Juno.

Generally speaking there are very few Fables in the ancient Poets, but contain some Passages of History; it is only they that came after that have added to them Circumstances of pure Invention. When Homer, for example, says, (1) Æolus gave Ulysses the Winds shut up in a Bag, whence his Companions let them out; this is a cover'd Piece of History, which informs us that this Prince foretold Ulysses what Wind was to blow for some days, and that the Shipwreck he suffer'd, was owing entirely to his neglecting to follow his Counsel. But when Virgil adds (2), that the same Æolus, at Juno's Request, raised a terrible Storm, which drove Æneas's Fleet upon the Coast of Africa, it is a mere Fable founded upon the Opinion of Æolus's being God of the Winds. Those Fables too which we have called Philosophical, were at first Historical, and it was after their invention they were join'd with the Idea of natural Things: Hence those mix'd Fables, if we may so call them, comprehending an Historical Fact, and a Piece of Natural Philosophy, like that of Myrrha and Leucothoë, changed into the Tree that bears Frankincense, and that of Clytia into the Heliotrope.

But before we enter upon an Explication of the Fables, it will be proper to lay open their Sources, and examine into their Origin; which shall be the Subject of the following Chapter.

C H A P. IV.

Conjectures about the Origin of Fables.

First Source of Fables, Vanity. VANITY has undoubtedly been the first Source of Fable (a); Men not having been always pleased with Truth in its own beautiful Simplicity, began to think it needed foreign Ornaments to set it off. Thus, they who first described described the Actions of their Heroes, intermixed a thousand Fictions with them, whether it was their Intention to raise them to higher Esteem, or the more powerfully to incite others to Virtue by setting great Examples before them. But little did they know the Nature of true Virtue, since, to attract our Love, it must be represented in Patterns we can imitate, whereas those drawn by them were quite inimitable. I add, they were far from understanding wherein consists distinguished Worth, since they have inadvertently intermix'd their Accounts of these pretended illustrious Actions, with such derogating Circumstances, as take from their Heroes all the Merit, which might otherwise have accrued from them. If Perseus kills Medusa, he surprizes her sleeping: if he rescues Andromeda, he has Mercury's Wings. If Bellerophon vanquishes the Chimæra, he is mounted on Pegasus. Achilles is clad in Armour forged by Vulcan, and is invulnerable too. Jason kills the Dragon, but not till he has a Potion given him by Medea to lay the Monster asleep; and Theseus is beholden to Ariadne's Thread for getting out of the Labyrinth. We may conclude with Mr. Boileau, 'Tis Truth alone makes Beauty, nothing can charm when Truth is wanting; her Empire is universal, nor can even Fable please without her (a).

(1) Odyss. l. 10. (2) Æn. l. 1.

(a) See the Proposal of a Book upon that Subject, published by Father Tournemine in the Journals of Trevoux, Ans. 1720.

Let us come to a second Source. Before Second Source the use of Letters was introduced, signal of Fable.
Events and glorious Deeds had no other Monuments but the Memories of Men, or at most, some Hieroglyphicks, whose sense was always so undetermined as to mean every thing they pleased (b); so that to perpetuate
the

(a) Rien n'est beau que le vrai, le vrai seul est aimable ;
Il doit regner par tout, & meme dans la Fable.

(b) There were some other means besides of preserving History ; such as the Festivals established for perpetuating the Memory of some signal Event. Of this we see several Examples among the Hebrews.
Heaps of Stones raised upon the same Occasion, as was done by Jo- shua after he had passed thro' Jordan: Pillars, like those of Hercules, Bacchus, and Sesostris: Songs and Hymns, such as we find not only in the Books of Moses, but also in what we are told concerning the Books of Orpheus, Linus, and Homer: Seals and Intaglias, as are the most part of our Antiques. Lastly, after the Invention of Letters, Inscriptions, Epistles, Memoirs, &c.

the Memory of illustrious Atchievements, the Fathers related them to their Children; and as the Custom is never to say things to young People in a simple way, they intermixed in their Narratives, Circumstances that served to imprint them strongly on their Minds. They had the same way of acting towards Strangers. Thus the Memory and Imagination of Children were filled with high Notions, and they coming in course to relate the same Stories, added still some other Circumstances to them. When in after-times these Stories came to be put in writing to fill up their Annals, or when they had occasion to make them the Subject of their Poems, finding no other Monuments or Memorials but this confused distorted Tradition, they were obliged to make use of it; and by this means they have eternized Fables, by transferring them from the Memory, where they had been deposited, into Monuments which were to last for Ages. And wou'd to God this had only been the Disease of the earlier Ages, when for want of Letters and Chronology, so few things were accurately known; but by a kind of Contagion, it communicated it self even to the most famous Historians, who in writing the History of great Men, have often intermixed the most monstrous Fables, without the least Explication. What might possibly mislead them is this, and I offer it as the third Source:

Third Source, It was an ancient Custom to praise their false Eloquence Heroes after their Death, and upon their of Orators. festival Days, in studied Panegyricks, where the young Orators, whose Genius they wanted to prove by these first Essays, gave themselves full liberty to feign and invent, believing this would gain them a Character for sprightly Genius's. Thus they made it their business to represent the Heroes, not what they had been, but such as they ought to be, according to the chimerical Notion of Greatness they had form'd to themselves. They especially never failed to exalt them to Heaven, and confer Divinity upon them without the least reserve; this was the Title to Nobility most sought after in early times. These Orators, far from being blamed, were praised for their fertile Invention ; their best Performances were preserved ; they frequently learn'd them by heart ; and if they were Verses or Songs, they sung them in publick. Out of these Memorials they afterwards composed Histories : the Historian himself was not sorry to be the Publisher of extraordinary Things, which were warranted only by these relations. Diodorus (1) tells something like this of the Egyptians, with respect to their deceased Kings : He says, the whole Kingdom went into Mourning, and that they sung the Praises of the Dead in Verse ; these funeral Pieces no doubt were preserved by the Priests, who made use of them in writing the History of these Princes. The Greeks, great Imitators of the Egyptians, practised this Method, not only towards their Kings, but likewise towards those who had planted Colonies, or brought any Art to perfection amongst them. It is easy to conceive that this Practice must have introduced numbers of Fables into History ; for what is not a lively wanton Imagination capable of, when licensed to roam unconfined over the wide Field of flattering Ideas ?
 I from

If one was to attempt, even now-a-days, to compile a History of our own Heroes from most of their Panegyrics, or their funeral Sermons, it would be no less fabulous than those of Antiquity, except in the point of Deification. I am not at all surprized that ancient History should be so full of Fables, when it was writ upon such precarious Memorials ; but I am astonished to see the sottish Vanity of the Roman Historians, who have so often given into the Fabulous, either to flatter their Emperors, or that they might not come short of the Greeks in the Marvellous, or to shew the visible Protection of the Gods over their great Men. Hence those frequent Apotheoses, that multitude of Prodigies they relate so gravely, and what else of the supernatural kind their Histories are full of. I forgive the credulous Valerius Maximus, and Dion Cassius, too if you will, for justifying, as they have done, the Prodigies they rehearse : but I think it hardly pardonable in Titus Livius, and still less in Pliny, who for all his being so sceptical, had not always the Courage to reject some things, that might justly have been condemned, even by one of a more religious turn than he. And yet they too may plead some kind of Excuse for themselves ; they lived under a Religion that gave a Sanction to those fabulous Adventures, and at a time when it was of dangerous consequence to attack popular Prejudices in any manner whatsoever. But 'tis quite pitiful in Sandoval and the other Historians in the Reign of Charles V, in Mezeray himself, and M. de Perfixe, without reckoning the Historians of the Holy War, to see them relating, as it were by concert, Miracles, which were disbelieved even by the Vulgar. I know well enough, it is the part of an Historian, to use Montagne's Phrase, to couch in writing what he finds in the Records whence he borrows ; but I know as well that he ought also to give his own Judgment about it : for in truth, the fabulous part adds nothing to the Glory of great Men ; the only purpose it can serve is, to sink the Credit that is due to true matters of fact. Those great Men, whose Deeds have been recorded by the Persons we were speaking of, had they not enough of personal Merit, without supposing Nature put to the expence of producing extraordinary Operations to do them honour ?

(1) Lib. 1.

Fourth Source, History has likewise suffered a great deal from the many fabulous Relations, that the Relations of Travellers. have been introduced by Travellers and Merchants. People in that way of life are often ignorant, and almost always Lyars ; thus it was easy for such to deceive others, who had been first deceived themselves. When one is returned from some distant Country, he must have a great many fine things to say about it ; had he nothing to tell but what is common, he himself would think his time had been very ill spent, and others would be apt to make the same judgment. Why, say they, run so many hazards, why travel so far in quest of People made like ourselves ? If this be all, he had e'en as good have staid at home. Thus, nothing they thought could compensate the Fatigue of a tedious Voyage, but to propagate the Opinion of their having seen Things wondrous and astonishing ; and being themselves imposed upon by the People they had been among, who for the honour of their Country were sure to embellish its History, they imposed upon others in their turn by their romantick Stories. It is hard for one who is sure of being believed, to resist the Charm of telling Wonders and Rarities. Of all People in the world, the Egyptians, whose Theology was all a Mystery, and their very Language a Quibble, were most guilty of imposing upon Strangers.

It is a Custom received in all Countries: for this, we need but see how many Fables the Natives of America and the Indies gave out to their first Discoverers. The Merchants made use of the Natives as Guides and Guards, in Places where they came either to establish Colonies, or a Correspondence ; they needed their Assistance especially against the wild Beasts which swarm'd in the Woods: these had often Occasion to distinguish themselves by their Valour ; and hence I don't doubt, came the Hercules's, and the other Subduers of Monsters and Avengers of Wrongs, of which fabulous History is so full. It was, I doubt not, upon those relations of Merchants and Travellers, the Poets founded the Elysian Fields in the charming Country of Betica, or in the Canary Islands ; hence also we have those Fables which give Monsters to some Countries, and Harpies to others, which intimate that there were Nations covered with eternal Darkness, others that lived underground, others that had but one Eye, or who were of a Giant-like Form ; that the Sun and Stars went every Evening to bed in the Ocean, and numbers of such like Fictions built upon some exaggerated Relations (a).

Let us proceed to a fifth Original. The Poets and Painters are undoubtedly the Persons by whom Fables have been mostly produced in the World:

*Fifth Source,
the Poets, Painters, and the Stage.*

D 3

—Pictoribus

(a) Consult what Strabo has upon this Subject, l. 15, p. 1033, and 1038.

Pictoribus atque Poetis

Quidlibet audendi semper fuit æqua potestas (1).

As they have always aimed at pleasing more than instructing, they preferred an ingenious Falshood to a known Truth. If a Poet had occasion to flatter, or console a dejected Prince upon the loss of a Son, it was but giving him a place amongst the Stars or among the Gods, as Laëtantius has it (a): such as had been Lovers of the Belles-Lettres, were considered either as Sons or Favourites of Apollo. This was the reason why Hycinth passed for the Minion of that God; and because he was killed by the stroke of a Coit which the Wind unluckily turned aside, they feign'd that Boreas in a fit of Jealousy was the Author of that Accident. Success justified the happy Rashness of the Poets; their Works were read with pleasure, and nothing in them pleased so much as Fiction: they laid it down as a Maxim in Poetry, never to tell a thing in a natural way. The Shepherdesses were Nymphs or Naiads; Ships became sometimes flying Horses, as in the Story of Bellerophon; and sometimes Dragons, as in that of Medea: The Shepherds were all Satyrs or Fauns; Men on horseback, Centaurs: every Lover of Musick, an Apollo; and every Physician, an Esculapius: your fine Singers, all so many Muses; and every Beauty, a Venus; lewd Women were Sirens and Harpies; every celebrated Huntress, a Diana: Oranges, must be Apples of Gold; and Arrows and Darts, Lightning and Bolts of Thunder. They went farther: for finding they were Masters of painting and characterizing Persons and Things as they pleased, to shew that their Art lay chiefly in Fiction, they made it their particular Study to contradict the Truth; and for fear of agreeing with the Historians, they changed the Characters of the Persons they sp'ke of. Homer, of a faithless Prostitute has made his prudent chaste Penelope; and Virgil,

(1) Hor. Art. Poet.

(a) Accesserunt autem Poetæ, ut compositis ad Voluptatem carminibus, ad caelum eos, id est ad Herceas, sustulerunt; sicut faciunt qui apud reges non malos panegyricis mendacibus adulantur. In II. l. 1.

gil, of a Traitor to his Country, has given us the Pious Hero; of a Renegado who lost a Battel against Mezentius, and with it his Life, he has made a Conqueror and Demi-god. The same Poet has made no scruple to dishonour a Princess of strict Virtue (1), and to divest her of the Reputation she had for Chastity and Courage, to give her an infamous Passion, and a Cowardice capable of Despair. All of them have conspired to make Tantalus pass for a Miser, and have set him in the front of such in the Center of Hell, where he suffers a cruel Punishment, in proportion to his Avarice; he who, as Pindar relates it, was a most religious Prince, and a very generous Man.

But it was not merely Inclination to sooth and flatter, that laid the Poets under a necessity of Forgery and Lyes; they were often obliged to it by the Meanness of their Subjects. What they had to say would frequently have been low and vulgar, unless they had artfully brought in something fictitious and supernatural. If one were to make an Analysis of their Poems, they might be reduced to almost nothing: there are numbers of Merchants and Soldiers, who have gone thro' many more occasional Dangers, than either Æneas, Ulysses, or Achilles.

What would the Æneid, Iliad, or Odysssey be, was it not for the eternal Interposition of the Gods, and perpetual mixture of Truths of small concern, with the most interesting Fictions? A Man (2) saved from his Country's Ruin, in company with other Exiles, fits out a few Ships, embarks, arrives in Thrace, in Macedon, and some of the Archipelago Islands; after staying some time in Crete, he goes on to Sicily, where having passed the Fare of Messina, he arrives at length in Italy by the mouth of the Tiber, where he first killed his Rival, and then married. Another (3) is absent from his native Home for many years; in the meantime his Family-affairs are all in disorder, his Estate is squandered away, his Wife and Son are harassed; at length he returns, after having undergone some Dangers,

D 4

(1) Dido.

(2) Æneas.

(3) Ulysses.

gers, finds out some of his Domesticks who had persevered in their Duty, and with their Assistance sets all again to rights by destroying his Enemies. Another (1) having fallen out with Agamemnon, withdraws to his Tent: the Trojans take advantage of the Misunderstanding between the Generals, gain the superiority, beat the Greeks, force their Entrenchments, set fire to their Ships; Patroclus borrows the Armour of Achilles, and kills Sarpedon: Hector avenges the Death of his Friend, and kills Patroclus; then Achilles leaves his Tent, drives the Trojans back to their Walls; and having forced them to enter the Town, finds Hector alone, kills him, and drags his dead Body round the Tomb of his Friend, to whom he performs magnificent Funeral-Rites. Here you see the three finest Poems we have now extant, founded on very ordinary pieces of History, and supported by the merit of Heroes of no extraordinary Character; thus, their Authors were obliged to furnish numberless Fables to bear them out, and to embellish the Truths they blended with them. Instead of saying, for example, Ulysses arrived incognito at Alcinous's House, Homer (2) makes him be conducted by Minerva, who covers him with a Cloud. Virgil, who faithfully imitates the Greek Poet, brings Æneas and Dido together after the same manner, under the Conduct of Venus (3). If the Delights of the Country of the Lotophagi detain Ulysses's Companions too long, we are told, it was the Fruits of that Island made those who eat of them lose all remembrance of their native Home (4). Do they loiter at Circe's Court, giving a loose to Riot and Debauchery? this pretended Sorceress is said to have transform'd them into Swine. We are not to be told simply, that Ulysses was exposed to a great many Storms; he must likewise suffer the addition of Neptune's Resentment, who takes this way to avenge his Son Polyphemus. What Mysteries, what Preparations before Achilles kills Hector! his Mother brings him the Armour of Vulcan's Manufacture, she had dip't him in Syx to make him invulnerable. Minerva

(1) Achilles. (2) Odyss. l. 16. (3) Æn. l. 1. (4) Odyss. l. 9, nerva takes the Form of Deiphobus, to impose upon Hector by the imagined Assistance of his Brother. Jupiter (1) takes the Scales, weighs the Destinies of those two Heroes; and seeing Hector's sink down as far as Hell, he abandons him, and Achilles takes away his Life. Nothing is done among them but by Machinery; for every purpose they employ the Power of some Deity. “ There every Method of enchanting us is practised, “ all Nature assumes a Body, and looks, and Boileau's Art “ lives, and thinks: every Virtue becomes of Poetry. “ a Divinity; Minerva is Prudence, and Venus Beauty. “ 'Tis no longer the Exhalations that produce the “ Thunder, it is Jupiter armed, to affright Mortals; “ the Mariners behold a threatening Storm arise, 'tis “ angry Neptune chiding the Waves. Echo is no “ longer a Sound that reverberates in the Air. it is a “ Nymph in Tears bewailing her Narcissus (a).”

Thus it is the Poets adorn their Subjects, and fill them with sprightly and ingenious Images. You need not be apprehensive of their saying in a simple way, that the Troops of the two Aloidae, those proud Giants who made war upon Jupiter, increased their Forces by new Levies; they'll say, these Giants themselves grew a Cubit every day (2). Homer, instead of describing how after the bloody Battel that was fought upon the Banks of Xanthus, the Channel of the River having been choaked up with dead Bodies, the Water overflowed its Banks and flooded all the Plain, till they took these Bodies out of the Water, and kindling a Funeral-Pile consumed them to Ashes; instead of this, the Poet

(1) Il. l. 23.

(a) Là pour nous enchanter tout est mis en usage,
Tout prends un corps, une ame, un esprit, un visage:
Chaque Vertu devient une Divinité,
Minerve est la Prudence, & Venus la Beauté.
Ce n'est plus le vapeur qui produit le Tonnerre,
C'est Jupiter arme pour effrayer la terre
Un orage terrible aux yeux des Matelots,
C'est Neptune en courroux qui gourmande les flots,
Echo n'est plus un Son qui dans l'air retentisse.
C'est une Nymphe en pleurs qui se plaint de Narcisse.

Despreaux Art. Poet.

(2) Hom. Odyf. l. 11.

Poet (1) images that the River feeling himself oppress'd in his Channel, complained of it to Achilles, and not receiving satisfaction from that Hero, he swelled against him, and pursued him with so much Rapidity that he had certainly drowned him, if Neptune and Minerva, commissioned by Jupiter, had not given him promise of a speedy Satisfaction. The same Poet, when he would let us know that the Inundations of the Sea, some time after the Retreat of the Greeks, demolished the famous Wall they had rear'd up during the Siege of Troy, to screen themselves from the attacks of the Enemy, says (2), that Neptune provoked by this Enterprize of the Greeks, asked permission from Jupiter to beat it down with his Trident; and having engaged Apollo in his quarrel, they laboured in concert, to overturn the Work. If the Pheacian Vessel which had carried Ulysses to Ithaca, is shipwreck'd in the return, we are sure to be told that Neptune was so angry, that the Ship had been made use of to carry Ulysses, that he turned it to a Rock (3). If Turnus caused Æneas's Fleet to be burn'd, Virgil brings Cybele into play, who transforms these Vessels into Sea-Nymphs. Wherever any fine Building was to be seen, such as the Walls of Troy, the Towers of Argos, and others, it was always the Gods who had been their Architects;

—————Cerno Cyclopum sacras

Turres, Labore majus humano decus.

Senec. in Thyest. Act. 3.

We are not simply told that Ulysses was wise and prudent; they take care he shall have Minerva to be his Guide.

Instead of relating how Æneas at the beginning of the Spring being on the Coasts of Sicily, was driven by a Storm from that Island, there is brought upon the stage an incensed Juno, Æolus, the Winds, Neptune, &c. An Historian would tell us, without any Figure, that Berce incited the Trojan Matrons to burn their Fleet, for fear of seeing them exposed to new Hardships: a Poet shall play off that Part by the Machinery of the Goddess Iris, under the shape of that Phrygian Lady (4).
If

(1) Il. l. 21. (2) Il. l. 9. (3) Odyss. l. 14. (4) Æn. l. 5.

If a Prince in History is an able Statesman and Politician, the Poets give him many Heads ; if he be valiant, he is a Man with many Arms ; if he be crafty and designing, they make him assume various Shapes. Instead of saying that Nauplius, upon information of the Approach of the Grecian Fleet, caused Fires to be kindled to draw them in towards the Rocks that encompassed his Island, by which means they were lost ; a Poet uses the Interposition of the Goddess Minerva, who thus avenges upon Ajax, the Indignity he offered to Cassandra in her Temple. When they would tell us that a Hero, impatient to know his Destiny, uses some piece of Conjuratation, after the Fashion of the Times, the Poet makes him go down to Hell ; and allowing his Imagination to take its full swing, he broaches a thousand Fables. In a word, thro' the whole of their Works we may remark a premeditated subversion of the Laws of Truth ; and instead of that Air of Simplicity it requires, they have adopted Transport and Fury, according to the Character given them by Petronius, to tell their Story like Men possessed of a prophetick Enthusiasm, and full of Fury from the God by whom they are agitated (a).

We may add, that the Theatres serv'd to introduce a great many Fables : it is on the The Theatres. Stage the liberty of disguising Truth reigns triumphant : the Imagination and Senses are struck in a far more lively manner, when an Author has Skill to carry on his Plot at the expence of Truth, than if he should represent it just as it happened. Pasiphae in love with a Captain named Taurus, had never made the same impression on the Theatres of Greece, where she was mortally hated for the sake of Minos, as the representing her enamour'd of a Bull whom Neptune had produced from the Sea. It affects one much more to see Andromeda or Hesione expos'd to Monsters, than to Pirates ; and and Dido in despair for the loss of a Lover, stabbing herself to the Heart, makes much stronger Impression upon us, than if she killed herself for the loss of a Husband, according to the true History. Thus Men have placed a Merit in lying with Art, in inventing by certain Rules, in feigning Actions, Conversations, Sentiments ; and Fable has mounted the Theatre as her Throne.

(a) Non enim res gestæ versibus comprehendendæ sunt, quod longè melius Historici faciunt ; sed per ambages, Deorumque ministeria. & fabulosum sententiarum tormentum præcipiendus est liber spiritus, ut potius furentis animi vaticinatio appareat, quam religiosæ orationis sub testibus fides. Petr. Sat.

Painters and Sculptors. In fine, the Painters working upon Poetical Fancies, may be reckoned instrumental in propagating some Fables ; and to them, perhaps, we owe in part at least, the Existence of Centaurs, Sirens, Harpies, Nymphs, Satyrs, and Fauns, which they have painted from the Portraits of them given by the Poets, or from some Relations of Travellers and Fishermen. They have even frequently promoted the Credit of fabulous Stories, by representing them with Art ; a thing so true, as I shall take notice afterwards, that the Pagans owed the Existence of many of their Gods, to some fine Statues, or Pictures well done.

A sixth Source, the Plurality, or Unity of Names. As it frequently happen'd that one and the same Person had several Names, a Case very common among the Eastern Nations ; in process of time, they who came to read their undigested Histories, and inconsistent Adventures, mistook them for different Persons. Hence that multiplicity of Heroes ; the Actions and Travels of one were distributed among several ; by Mercury, for example, was design'd Thaut in Egypt ; Teutat among our ancient Gauls ; Hermes among the Greeks ; Pluto is the Dis of the Celtæ, the Adès of the Greeks ; the Summanus of the Latins ; the Soranus of the Sabines. And as sometimes the Hero or God was not known in one Country, but under one single Name, and they knew little about his Exploits elsewhere ; when they came to read of other Adventures, other Names, or other Qualities than those they had heard of, they never questioned but the Persons spoken of were different ; hence that prodigious Number of Jupiters, Mercurys, &c. Sometimes again we have have this Practice inverted ; and when the Case was, that several Persons went under the same Name, they ascribed to one what belong'd to many, and the Adventures of all were crouded into the History of him who was best known. Such is the History of Hercules of Thebes, where they have foisted in the Actions and Travels of the Phenician Hercules, and several other Heroes of the same Name. Such likewise is the History of Jupiter, the Son of Saturn, where they have amass'd the Adventures of several Kings of Crete, who bore the same Name, which was common to their ancient Kings, as that of Pharaoh or Ptolemy was in Egypt, or that of Cæsar among the Roman Emperors.

Ignorance in Philosophy, and especially in Physicks, has also given rise to many Fables ; that Curiosity, which is so natural to Men, has always determin'd them to seek after the Cause of astonishing Events (a); and in the barbarous Ages, when so little Advancement had been made in the Knowledge of Nature, they had recourse to gross and sensible Representations : They gave Life to every thing, to the Rivers, the Fountains, the Stars: here was an admirable Expedient for shortening their Enquiries, ; nothing is more easy than to refer effects, whose Principles are unknown, to some living Cause. They proceeded, through length of time, to deify Objects they at first represented only in human Form : The Sun was worship'd under the name of Apollo, and the Moon under that of Diana. A dread of their Influences, which are thought to extend to all Things here below, was certainly the cause of their Deification, and of that Worship which was introduced in order to appease their imaginary Resentment. The Priests instituted for that purpose, invented Stories, and publish'd Apparitions of their pretended Deities, to keep up thereby a gainful Worship. They made People believe, for example, that Diana had fallen in love with Endymion, and that the cause of her Eclipses, was owing to the Interviews she had with her

A seventh Original, Ignorance in Philosophy.

(a) See F. Tournemine's Proposal, Loc. cit.

her Gallant on the Mountains of Caria; but as ill luck would have it, these Amours could not last for ever, and this put them upon the hard shift of accounting for her Eclipses another way. They gave out that Sorceresses, especially those of Theffaly, (where poisonous Plants were more common, by reason of the foam Cerberus had dropt there, when he was brought from Hell, according to another Fable) had power by their Enchantments to draw down the Moon to the Earth (a).

In like manner, as they were unacquainted with the Cause of the Winds, they believed it was boisterous Deities raised such Commotions in the Earth and Sea; and to check their daring Insults, they set over them a superiour Deity; Æolus, for Reasons to be given in his History, was appointed their King (1).

Every River and Fountain had also a tutelar Deity; and whether it was the Rivers got the Names of the first Kings who inhabited in the Country, thro' which they ran, or whether it was the Kings were named from them, as we shall hear afterwards; in a course of Years they came to be confounded together, and they made a Divinity of the Prince, for the sake of the (a) The Origin of this Fable came from one Aganice, Daughter of Hector, a Theffalian, who having learn'd the Cause and the Time of Eclipses, whenever any was to happen, gave out, that she was going by her Enchantments to draw down the Moon to the Earth; directing at the same time the Theffalian Women to join with her, in making a hideous Noise, to cause her to re-ascend to her Orb. Accordingly, whenever they perceived the beginning of an Eclipse, they raised a clattering din with Kettles and other Instruments, to hinder the Yellings and Prayers of the Sorceresses from being heard.

*Cantus, & e curru Lunam deducere tentat,
Et faceret, si non ara repulsa forent.*

As Tibullus has it, L. 1. El. 6. The Indians and Chineses, at this very day, believe the Cause of Eclipses, is owing to a Dragon's going about to swallow up the Moon; and some of them roar hideously, to cause him to let go his hold, while others plunge into the Water up to the Neck, to supplicate him not to devour her wholly. Were we to trace back this Custom to its Source, we should find it derived from Egypt, where Isis, who was the Symbol of the Moon, was honoured with a like Noise of Kettles, Timbrels, Tabors, &c. See Nic. Frischlin. l. 3. Astr. p. 454.

(1) Virg. Æneid.

the River. Had they occasion to talk about Iris, or the Rainbow, whose Nature they knew nothing of, they forg'd a Divinity of it ; its Beauty made it pass for the Daughter of Thaumas, a poetical Personage, whose Name signifies Marvellous ; and because, in all appearance, they had learn'd from the traditional Accounts of the Deluge, that God had set forth the Rainbow as a Token of Reconciliation, hence they look'd upon their Iris as the Messenger of the Gods, and of Juno especially, because the Rainbow declares the Disposition of the Air, which that Goddess represents. The very Name of Iris was given her, if we will take Plato's word for it (a), to point out her Employment.

Thus were form'd several Physical Divinities, and so many Astronomical Fables, as we shall shew in the Sequel. What wretched Philosophy this was ! But it was the best they had ; and when it came of course to the Poets turn to embellish those gross Ideas, with all the Ornaments their Muses so fertile in Invention could furnish them with, Men became so fond of considering Nature only under these captivating Images, that it was a considerable time before they so much as dream'd of carrying their Discoveries to any greater length. What is worst of all, Religion was concerned in this System ; every new Divinity brought in a load of Ceremonies ; and such as pretended to see with their own Eyes, were look'd upon as Impious. Thus the unfortunate Anaxagoras was punish'd with Death, for having taught that the Sun was not animated, and that it was nothing but a Mass of Iron about the bigness of the Peloponnesus (b). From the whole, we may

(a) He derives this Name from ἱρην Nunciare. The Learned Vossius traces its Derivation from IR or H IR, Angel or Messenger. Pausanias says it comes from ἔρις Discord. Because Iris's Messages had a Tendency to Discord and War, as those of Mercury to Peace and Quiet.

(b) Vid. General Dict. in Anaxagor. Diogenes Laertius says of him ἀσεβείας κρινεῖται διότι τὸν ἡλίου μύδρον ἔλεγε διάπυρον. The Word μύδρος signifies a huge Stone, a Mass of Iron, and sometimes is applied to any inanimate, or insensitive Being.

may conclude, that they are in the right, who thought a part of the ancient Philosophy was couch'd under their Fables; but then they must needs own it was a Philosophy of a gross nature, and a System founded on the report of the Senses, and such as might have enter'd into the Imagination of a Clown.

C H A P. V.

A Continuation of our Enquiry into the Origin of Fables.

Eighth Source, the Settlement of Colonies and Invention of Arts.

ALL Mankind having perished by the Deluge, except Noah and his Family, it must have been a very considerable time before the World was repeopled; nor is it a thing to be doubted, as we shall see by and by, but the Countries most adjacent to the Place where the Ark rested, were the first inhabited. Thus Syria, Palestine, Arabia, and Egypt, were peopled long before the Western Climates. They who came first into Greece, lived there in a State of Ignorance and astonishing Rudeness, without Arts, or Laws, either written or traditional, their Cloathing the Leaves, and their Food the Herbs of the Field, the Rocks and Caverns served them for Lodging, and their only Care was to shelter themselves from the wild Beasts that replenished the Woods. They had hardly any other Conveniences of Life, but such as they became masters of, by waging War with the brute Animals. One who is ever so little read in the Poets, and acquainted with Antiquity, will be at no loss to find out the first Inhabitants of Greece from this Description (1).

When Strangers came amongst them from Egypt or Phenicia, People of Politeness and Learning, as the times then were, they endeavoured to soften the savage Temper of that barbarous Nation, whether that they might by this means discover the Riches of their

(2) See Diod. Sic. l. 2.

their Country, or prevail on them to allow some Colonies to be settled amongst them for carrying on Commerce. In course they communicated to them their Customs, their Diet and Dress; they taught them to eat wild Chestnuts and other Fruits, instead of the Herbs they lived upon, frequently with the no small hazard of their Lives; and this, by the way, gave rise to the Fable, which intimated, that they had been taught to eat Acorns; a thing false in itself, for Acorns are in no case fit for human Nourishment; and yet we meet with this Fiction in all the ancient Traditions. The same People taught them next to clothe themselves with the Skins of the Animals they slew; they shewed them how the Earth by culture was capable to produce Fruits much fitter for Food than those it yielded of itself; thus they accustom'd them by degrees to Agriculture, and sowing of Grain. To their Huts scattered here and there through the Fields, succeeded first Villages, then Towns: They abandon'd their brutal way of living without the Laws of Marriage, and brought the Duties of that State under Regulation; the necessity of distinguishing their Grounds, soon fixed their Land-Marks. This Fashion of wearing Skins appearing too homely, they learnt to strip off the Wool, and dress it for use. This Reformation appeared so admirable; that they thought they could never carry their Gratitude far enough towards the Persons who had been the Instruments of bringing it about: They took them for Men commission'd by Heaven; and accounted them Gods.

Such without doubt were the first Gods of the Greeks: Hence have sprung all the Fables of Lycaon, Phoroneus, Cecrops, and the rest, as we shall shew when we come to explain them in their proper Place; and to give but a few Examples at present, this is what gave rise to the Fable of Prometheus, his having form'd a Man of temper'd Clay, because in truth it was he who civilized and gave Laws to a rough and barbarous Race; an Hyperbole allowable on such an Occasion, since he truly made the Man by forming ing his Mind to Reason : Just so, Apollo for his surprising Skill in Musick and Medicine, came to be consider'd as the God of these Arts ; Mercury for the same reason was the God of Eloquence ; Ceres the Goddess of Corn ; Minerva of Manufactures in Wool ; and so of the rest.

As their Religion was accommodated to every corrupt Byass and Inclination of the Heart, they made no great difficulty about altering, adding, or retrenching their System, new Ceremonies were easily brought about, and the Reasons they founded them upon were wholly fabulous. The Priests by trumping up Stories of their own, found a way to change a Worship that was quite barren of Emoluments, for another more profitable, nor were they ever very scrupulous on that head. So soon as they lighted upon any new Deity, they vied with one another in raising Altars to his Honour, and they strove together who should tell the most Wonders about him ; and as it brought considerable Reputation to a Country to be the Birth-place of a God, every one contended for his being a Native of theirs ; they counterfeited Memoirs stuffed with Fables ; Impostors supported the Credit of pretended Apparitions invented by the Priests, and inserted by the Poets into their Works : Hence that System, so monstrous and so full of Fables, which Pagan Theology sets before us.

A ninth Source, Add to these, that the great Men of those Times were commonly acted by a foolish Ambition, of being thought descended from Gods: To be Heroes, nothing less would satisfy them, than to have Jupiter or Apollo for their Ancestors ; and we may be sure there would be Genealogists to be found then, full as complaisant as at present, so that they were at no great loss to get the Branches of their Family set out, where the Stock was some God : Accordingly almost all the ancient Pedigrees were much in this manner ; Jupiter was the Founder of the Family, after him came Hercules, &c.

Many of the Learned in the last Age, and some
in

in the present, have alledged, that most of the Fables derived their Origin from the Sacred Books not well understood, and that the Traditions of the chosen People preserved in Phenicia, Egypt, and the other adjacent Countries, adulterated in process of time, had given rise to a vast many Fables. They add farther, that Colonies having come from the Countries bordering upon Palestine, and settled in the Islands of the Mediterranean, and in Greece, had brought thither these Traditions thus disfigured, and that they were still more vitiated afterwards by the additional Fictions of the Poets; in fine, that the Patriarchs, especially those who lived after the Deluge, Abraham, Jacob, Esau, Moses, and some others, were the first Gods of the Pagan World; and that their illustrious Atchievements, their Conquests, and Laws, had influenced the People to deify them. Among these learned Authors, we may reckon the famous Bochart, Gerard Vossius, Huetius, Thomassin, &c.

It is agreed, that Moses and Jeshua were well known, not only in Egypt and Phenicia, but likewise in several other Countries, that the last especially having carry'd his Conquests a great way into Palestine, spread such a terrour over the Coasts of Syria, that several, it is thought, ship'd themselves off with their Goods for foreign Parts, rather than come under his Dominion; that some of them came as far as the Confines of the Ocean, where, as we are assured, they set up Pillars with this Inscription, (a) Nos hi sumus qui fugerunt a facie Josue filii Navæ prædonis; We are the Persons that fled for shelter from that Robber Joshua the Son of Nun (b).

It is likewise certain, that Inachus, Cecrops, Danaus, Cadmus, and some others, came out of Egypt and Phenicia, and introduced their respective Colonies into Greece, and the neighbouring Isles; and probably

E 2

(a) Procopius in Vandal. The Criticks find several Marks of Imposture in this Inscription.

(b) See 1. Bochart Geogr. Sacra. 2. Voss. de Idol. 3. Huetius Demonstr. 4. Thomassin. Lect. des Poetes.

probably, having their Heads full of the Exploits of those great Men, they would rehearse them to the Inhabitants of the Country, and the Greeks, fond of the pompous and supernatural, would be sure to make use of them for embellishing the History of their Heroes in after-times. As a Proof of it, the Accounts of Hercules especially, and Bacchus, are thought to agree in many Things with the History of those famous Israelites. Accordingly, very curious Parallels have been drawn : A celebrated Prelate has even gone the length of confounding all the Heroes in Fable with those of the Bible, and finds in Moses alone the Origin of Apollo, Priapus, Esculapius, Prometheus, Tiresias, Typhon, Perseus, Orpheus, Janus, Adonis, and numbers of others ; and in Zipporah, Moses's Wife, or in Miriam his Sister, almost all the Goddeses, as Astarté, Venus, Cybelé, Ceres, Diana, the Muses, the Destinies, &c. (1). And another learned Author even alledges that Homer, in his Poems, has given a History of the Scripture-Heroes under borrowed Names (2).

In fine, some years ago this very ancient Opinion has been revived by two Authors, who have carried it yet farther than any I have named. The first is M. de Lavaux, in a Piece entitled, Comparison of Fable with Sacred History; who, to give greater Weight to his Opinion, quotes two of the Fathers, and some ecclesiastical Writers, by whom it was maintained before him ; these are Justin, Origen, Tertullian, Minutius Felix, Cyril, Arnobius, Lactantius, St. Augustin, Theodoret, St. Athanasius, Philo, Josephus, and others. The second is M. Fourmont, of the Academy of Belles Lettres, in his Critical Reflections upon the History of ancient Nations. As this learned Academick understands ancient Languages to the bottom, he is the Man who has enlarged most upon this Subject; and he has applied, with such exactness, to the Patriarchs, the Characters of the first Men drawn by Sanchoniathon;

(1) Read the 4 Prop. of Huetius's Demonst. Evangel.

(2) See the Book intitled Homer Hebraizing.

Sanctoniaton; He finds so great affinity between their Names, and those given them in Scripture, and their Characters and Actions so nearly resembling what is said of them by Moses, that it is often pretty difficult to hold out against his Arguments. Farther, says he, in his Preface, can one be blamed for following a multitude of Authors, all of them eminent either for Knowledge or Piety; and for endeavouring to find in the Patriarchs the Gods whom the Pagan World revered, Saturn in Noah, Pluto in Shem, Jupiter Hammon in Cham, Neptune in Japhet, as Bochart has made out; Belus and Jupiter in Nimrod, as others have maintained; Minerva in the Idea we have of the Trinity, which is the Opinion of Father Tournemine the Jesuit; Apollo in Jubal, with Father Thomassin, and so of the rest? Besides, continues he, nothing is more advantageous to Religion than this Opinion; in the same way Huetius delivers himself upon the Subject (a).

However great an Esteem I have for these great Men, I can never be induced to think that any wrong use the Poets could make of the Old Testament, was capable of producing such a Heap of Fables, as is alledged: For, in the first place, the Jews were a People greatly contemned by their Neighbours, little known to distant Nations, and extremely jealous of their Law, and their Ceremonies, which they concealed from Strangers, as being Profane in their eyes, even at a time when they were obliged to live among them. In like manner, granting the Miracles wrought by God in Egypt in the time of Moses to have been published, yet it is very unlikely that they who reported them to the Greeks, would have any great Value for a Man who must have been so odious to them; I make no doubt but they gave the preference even to their own Magicians: or rather, would they not do all that in them lay, to cut off the very Memory of a Man who had plagued them so much?

E 3

Farther,

(a) Quo argumento vix validius ullum aut splendidius, ex genere eorum quæ ratio suppeditat, ad fanciendam Scripturæ Sacræ dignitatem reperio, quæ, &c. Demonst. Evang. p. 4. c. 3.

Farther, shall we contradict all ancient History, and the most authentick Monuments which mention the Heroes of Greece, let us know their Names, their Parentage, and the Place of their Nativity, to believe upon the Authority of a few trifling Etymologies, or some slight Traces of Resemblance, that they were only copied from Moses? Might not several similar Events have happen'd in different places? Might not Agamemnon have thought of sacrificing his Daughter Iphigenia, under the apprehension of losing the Command of a fine Army, without any necessity of confounding this Event with Jephtha's Sacrifice, whatever Resemblance we may find between the two Princesses in their Name (a) and the Time when they lived (b)? The same may be said of Deucalion's Deluge, of Minerva sprung from Jupiter's Brain, and some other Fables, that seem to have an affinity with Scripture-Truths. Is it impossible to see the same Events return upon the Theatre of the World? Will there not always be Sacrifices made to Ambition? Will not Murders, Parricides, &c. be seen every day? So true it is, that one perfectly acquainted with the History of past Ages, would see a variety of Things recur, which have already come about more than once. After all, if there be an affinity between Fables and the History of Moses, or of Sampson, it is only to be considered as a remnant of Tradition, which nothing has been able to deface. There is no denying, for instance, that the Remembrance of the universal Deluge, preserved among all Nations, has contributed to the embellishing of Deucalion's; that some Circumstances have been borrowed from Noah's History, to that of Satan and his Children, who lived shortly after; especially with respect to the Division of the World, as also in some other things: but to think almost all the Fables may be accounted for by that pretended Abuse of Moses's Books, is to grope in the dark.

Are

(a) The Daughter of Jephtha was called Iphianassa, the Name which Homer gives to the Daughter of Agamemnon.

(b) The sacrificing Iphigenia happened in the time of Jephtha.

Are Men really in earnest when they tell us, the Transformations of Proteus were invented merely from what the Scripture says of Moses's Rod (1)? That Mercury was taken for the Messenger of the Gods, and the Confidant in their Amours, from nothing else but the Story of Canaan's Curiosity, which drew down Noah's Curse upon him (2)? That the History of the Muses has no other Foundation but the Corruption of Moses's Name ; and that they ascribed to them the Invention of Dancing and Musick, only because Miriam, whom the Greeks might possibly call Musa, sung a Song to a Dance (3)? That the Fable which speaks of Mercury's conducting the Souls into Hell, is founded upon Moses's causing the Earth to swallow up Dathan and Abiram (4)? That Euristheus persecuting Hercules, is Moses giving Joshua the Management? That Vulcan falling from Heaven, is Moses coming down from the Mount? That Hercules's Combat with Achelous, is the Passage over Jordan? That Prometheus loosed from Mount Caucasus by Hercules, is Moses's praying upon the Mount while Joshua is defeating the Amalekites (5)? If one was to refine upon every minute Resemblance, I too might say, that the Dog which knew Ulysses upon his return to Ithaca (6) is the same with that of Tobit, which caressed his young Master upon his return to Raguel? That Achilles's Discourse to his Horse, (7) is in imitation of Balaam's Conversation with his As (8)? That the Expedition of the Argonauts, is but a diversify'd Relation of Abraham's Journeyings, and those of the Israelites in the Desert (9): That the Story of Philemon and Baucis is that of Abraham and Sarah; or of Lot and his Wife (10): That the Fable of Niobe, is a Copy of Job's Afflictions (11): That of Laomedon, and of the Gods who built Troy, the History of Laban and Jacob (12): That the Story of Orion, is drawn from that

E 4

(1) See Huet. Loc. cit. (2) Bochart Phaleg. l. 1. (3) Huet. Loc. cit. (4) Id. ib. (5) Id. ib. (6) Odyss. l. 7. (7) Il. l. 19. (8) Nun. 22. (9) Compar. of Fables, T. 1. p. 153. (10) Id. T. 2. 47. (11) Id. T. 2. p. 59. (12) Id. Tom. 2. p. 151.

that of Jacob and Sarah; and so a world of others I could name, which however is no such easy matter to prove.

Farther, if there be such a perfect Conformity between the Heroes of the Bible and those in Fable, why do our most celebrated Authors differ among themselves? Why is Mercury, according to Bochart, the same with Canaan, and in Huetius the same with Moses? How comes the one to tell us Hercules is Sampson, and the other that he is Joshua? The one that Noah is Saturn, and the other that he is Abraham? This variety of Opinions is a strong Presumption against the Hypothesis of these learned Moderns: It must also be own'd that however studied those Comparisons be, of which their Books are full, there are still some things there that are but mere Suppositions, to say no worse. Should a learned Author, who, in examining the Annals of China, had found a considerable Resemblance between one of their Emperors and one of our Kings of France in Name, Disposition and Manners, take it into his head, that either the King of France must have been Emperor of China, or the Chinese Monarch King of France, I would fain know what reception he might expect from the World.

There is nothing so arbitrary as the Etymologies of Names we may often read of, and the Interpretation of them is wholly in the power of Fancy. I am of opinion, that Orpheus and others travel'd into Egypt, in that very Period when the Israelites dwelt there; but at the same time, I believe they got more Information from thence in the pernicious Science of Magick, or at least in the vain Superstitions of that idolatrous People, than in the Knowledge of the true God, whatever several of the learned, after S. Justin (1), have thought on that head; and besides, we have nothing remaining of this Orpheus. In what, I pray you, do those who travel into foreign Countries take care to be informed, if it is not in their Religion, Laws, and Customs? Do they not consult

(1) Cohort. ad Græcos.

consult their Priests and Doctors, rather than those of a People under captivity, hated, persecuted, and withal not very forward to reveal their Mysteries to Strangers? I don't indeed deny, that those ancient Poets were acquainted with several Truths, as the Unity of the Godhead, the Immortality of the Soul, the Punishments of Hell, the Rewards of Paradise; Truths which notwithstanding that Apparatus of Fictions, with which they are dressed up, are conspicuous in several places of their Works: But are we therefore to believe they borrowed them from our inspired Writings? Are they not rather the precious remains of Tradition, which nothing can deface; Sparks of Reason and Nature's Light, which are, to use Tertullian's Words, the Testimony of a Soul naturally Christian? Testimonium Animæ, naturaliter Christianæ (1). In a word, they are the Seeds of eternal Truth, that remained rooted in the Mind of Man, in his primitive State of Innocence, and had the God of Nature for their Author as well as the Sacred Books. Non multum refert an a deo formata sit Animæ conscientia, an literis Dei (2).

We may add, that Fables having taken their rise but a few Ages after the Deluge, when there was still a recent enough Tradition of what had happened, even before Noah; it is pretty probable that they who followed them, would be sure to adopt some strokes of those antient Truths. Thus the Chaos, the Golden Age, and so many other Fables, are copied from the account Moses gives of the Creation, the State of Innocence, and the happy Society primitive Mortals lived in. But as to those numberless Circumstances, wherein Thomassin (3) and after him the Author of Homer Hebraizing, find Moses and that ancient Poet agreeing together; I am of opinion, they would not have seen quite so many, unless they had been favourably disposed to find them. Let us then leave Greece in the possession of her Heroes and Heroism, and content ourselves with saying, that however there are some Fables whose Original is owing to that Pagan gan Practice of perverting Scripture and Tradition ; yet the number of such is not so great, as is commonly believ'd.

(1) Tert. de Test. Animæ. (2) Idem ibid. (3) Act. des Poet.

'Tis indeed undeniable, that Sanctioniathon alludes to the History of the first Race of Men, tho' he has quite distorted it, as I hope to shew, when the Fragment of that Author we have preserved by Eusebius, comes under Consideration : But this Author, who liv'd before, or not long after the Trojan War, and who was not known in Greece till Philo of Byblos translated him in the Time of Hadrian ; was he Preceptor to Hesiod and Homer, in whom we find all the Depth of the Grecian Mythology ? It is own'd likewise, that the Greeks had the Knowledge of their Gods from the Egyptian and Phenician Colonies that settled among them ; but the History of the Patriarchs must have been considerably obscured in the time of Inachus, Cecrops and Cadmus, Idolatry having been propagated through the East several Ages before. We shall however take care, as occasion offers, to give the Opinion of these learned Men, that the Reader may be able to judge for himself what side of the Question to take ; for 'tis his Instruction we seek after, without intending to byass him in favour of one Hypothesis more than another.

Eleventh Source, A more plentiful Source of Fables, and Ignorance of an- more favourable to their Introduction, cient History. is the Ignorance of Chronology and ancient History. As it was very late before they came to have the use of Letters, especially in Greece, several Ages passed, during which they had no other way of preserving the Memory of remarkable Events but by Tradition, or at best by some Monuments, which in time became very ambiguous. Even when they began to use writing, their first Compositions were not connected Histories, but Encomiums, Songs, and Genealogies, stuffed with Fables, which the Priests took pains to dress up in the manner already hinted (1) ; infomuch, that nothing was to be found but Confusion

(1) See the first Chapter.

sion over all ; and even such as were inclined to see farther into the History of Antiquity, after tracing back about three or four Generations, found themselves in the Labyrinth of the History of the Gods, where they were every moment stumbling upon Jupiter, Saturn, Cælus, and Tellus. The Greeks especially had no farther account to give of their Original ; this was the limiting Point of their whole Tradition, even among Persons of better Understanding. As for others, they innocently gave out, that their Ancestors had sprung from the Earth like Mushrooms, or Pismires in the Forest of Egina (a), or from Cadmus's Dragon's Teeth. However, as they were fond of being thought ancient, like most other Nations, they forged a fabulous History of imaginary Kings, Gods and Heroes, that never had a being : And when they wanted to speak of the early times, about which they had got a few hints from the Colonies that had settled among them, they only substituted Fable in the room of true History. If the Creation of the World was the point in question, out came the Fable of a Chaos: If it was about the first Inventors of Arts, instead of Adam and Cain, who were the first that cultivated the Ground, they ascribed the whole Honour of the Invention to Ceres and Triptolemus ; Pan, according to them, instead of Abel, was the first that led a pastoral Life ; to Apollo was given the Invention of Musick, whereas it is Jubal's by right : Vulcan with his Cyclops, pass'd for him who had taught to forge Iron and Metals, in place of Tubal-Cain : Bacchus with them, was the God of the Vine, which Noah dress'd ; substituting at every moment their modern Divinities, in room of the ancient Patriarchs, whom we learn from Scripture to have been the first and true Inventors of Arts. They were mere Children, as Aristotle taxes them, whenever they had occasion to speak of remote Times. They were even so weak as to believe, that it was their Colonies had peopled
all

(a) ————— *Qui rupto robore nati,
Compositique luto nullos habuere parentes.*

Juv. Sat. 6.

all the other Countries, and deriv'd the Names of such of them as they knew, from the Names of their Heroes. Thus Europe was derived from Europa the Sister of Cadmus ; Asia from the Mother of Prometheus ; Africk from the Daughter of Epaphe ; Armenia from Armenus ; Media from Medus ; the Persians from Perseus ; and so others : not knowing that such Names were given to Places at their being first inhabited, as denoted the Qualities of the Country or the Manners and Customs of the People who came to it, as the learned Bocbart proves (1). Thus Europe got the Name from the Whiteness of its Inhabitants ; the Celtæ were so called upon account of their light-colour'd Hair ; the Latins, because they were addicted to Magick ; the Lestrigonians, on account of their savage Nature ; the Cretans, for their Dexterity in handling the Bow ; the Thracians, from their Nobility. Sometimes too, the Number of Animals found in a Country, gave occasion to its getting a Name that bore an Allusion to them. Thus that of Spain was taken from the Rabbits it was full of ; the Island of Rhodes, from the Serpents ; the Town of Lyons, from the Ravens ; the Isle of Icarus, from the Fish : sometimes also the Names were derived from the Woods and Forests with which a Country was covered, as the Pyrenees ; or from the Pasture-Grounds, as the Parnassus : in fine, from the Fruits found in them, as Sais, in Egypt, from the Olive-Trees that grew there in abundance : Portugal, from its great number of Almond-Trees : or sometimes from the Vulcano's that issued from the Mountains, as Mount Ætna ; and so of others.

The smallest Ambiguities gave rise to a Fable. Plutarch, in the Life of Lycurgus, tells us, upon the Authority of an Ancient, that Apollo having given some Cretans a Dolphin for their Guide, they came to Phocis, where they built the Town Cyrra : we plainly see they had been conveyed thither in a Ship named the Dolphin. So that it is not among the Greek Writers, we are to seek for the Origin of ancient Nations, nor other Monu-

(1) In his Chan.

Monuments of Antiquity ; they did nothing but copied from the Egyptians and other Eastern People, who had themselves filled their ancient History with Fables.

Whenever they had occasion to find out the Origin of Towns and the Founders of them, it was always some Hero, a Son of some of their Gods. The City of Cyparissa in Phocis, was environ'd with Cypresses, whence it had the Name ; and that of Daulis in the same Country, was encompassed with Trees (1), whence its Name was borrowed. These Originals were too simple, they chose rather to have recourse to one Cyparissus, and to the pretended Daulis a Tyrant, who gave their Name to these two Cities. Lycoreus had built that of Lycoreus upon the Parnassus, which had got its Name from the many Wolves that were there. We might add here an infinite number of other Examples, but these may suffice for what I have just now advanced.

'Tis therefore in the sacred Scripture that the Truth of Antiquity must be sought after : The profane Historians commence only at the time of Ezra, that is, the last of the sacred Historians, unless you take in the Author of the Maccabees. Homer himself, and Hesiod, their most ancient Poets, and their greatest Divines too, lived not till a long time after the War of Troy. As for Dares the Phrygian, Dictys of Crete, and some others, granting they were not fictitious Authors, as they really are, they must have lived but about the time of the Trojan War, a Period corresponding to the time of the Judges ; and would still have been much later than the Events recorded by Moses. So that the Greeks were far from being instructed in the History of the Times a little farther back, and their History never had any shew of Probability, till the time of the Olympiads, before which, Varro owns, there is nothing to be seen in it but Confusion and Chimæras.

But to clear up this whole matter, and to ascertain the time when Fables arose, we must distinguish three sorts of Time ; the Times unknown, the Fabulous, and the

(1) Eustath. upon the second Book of the Iliad.

the Historical (1). The first, which are as it were the Infancy and Nonage of the World, comprehend what had passed from the Chaos, or rather from the Creation, to the Deluge of Ogyges, that fell out towards the 1600th Year before Christ. The fabulous Times take in a Series of Events from the Deluge until the first Olympiad, where the historical Times begin. It is proper to remark, that this famous Division made by Varro, has a regard only to the Greek History; for not only the Israelites, but even the Egyptians and Phenicians, had some knowledge of the earliest Times, by means of Tradition and Annals, tho' often dash'd with Fables: but here we have to do only with the Greeks, who had but a very confused Knowledge of the first Ages of the World; and 'tis within the compass of the second Period that we are to place the Origin of that prodigious number of Fables we find dispers'd thro' their Poets. It must however be acknowledged, that all the Ages of the fabulous Period, were not equally fruitful in Fables and Heroism: without doubt, the one that has furnished us with the greatest Stock of them, was that of the Siege of Troy.

That famous City was twice taken; the first time by Hercules, and 30 or 35 Years after, that is to say, the Year before Christ 1282, by the Grecian Army, under the Conduct of Agamemnon. At the time of its being first taken, we see upon the stage Telamon, Hercules, Theseus, Jeson, Orpheus, Castor and Pollux, and all those other Heroes of the Golden Fleece. At the second Siege appear the Sons or Grandsons of the former, Agamemnon, Menelaus, Achilles, Diomedes, Ajax, Heñor, Paris, Æneas, &c. and in the time which interven'd between these two Epochs, happen'd the two Wars of Thebes, where appear'd Adrastus, Œdipus, Etheocles, Polynices, Capaneus, and numbers of others, the eternal Subjects of poetical Fables. Happy Age for Poems and Tragedies! Accordingly the Theatres of Greece have a thousand times resounded with these illustrious Names. To which we may add, that those of

France

(1) *Ἀσκητορ, Μυθικόν, Ἱστορικόν. See Censorinus.

France yet ring with them every day ; infomuch that the Heroes of our own Age, who often deserve the Name better than those of Antiquity, dare not appear there but under borrow'd Names. Nor is this the thing that surprizes most ; no, 'tis to see the Divinities of Pagan Fashion introduced every day upon our Stage: despicable Divinities ! exhibiting in a Christian City, the hideous Representation of their Debaucheries ; infomuch that one is doubly shocked, to see ancient Idolatry reviv'd there, with all the Pomp and Pageantry it formerly wore at Athens or Rome, and to think on the dangerous Lessons our Youth imbibe from a System of mere Pagan Morality.

In fine, the Greek History, hitherto so fabulous, put on a new Shape by the Re-establishment of the Olympiads ; from thence the Chronology of Facts began to be fixed.

Authors are not fully agreed about the time when the Olympick Games, that introduced this turn in History, were instituted. Their Origin is buried in the profoundest Obscurity. Diodorus Siculus says no more but that they were founded by the Cretan Hercules, without telling us either at what time, or on what occasion ; but the most received Opinion among the Learned (1), is that Pelops was the Author of them, and that their first Celebration was in Elis, the twenty-ninth Year of the Reign of Acrisus, the thirty-fourth of the Reign of Sicyon, nineteenth King of Sicyone. ; and in order to adjust these prophane Epochs to Scripture-Chronology, this was the twenty-third Year of Deborah's holding the Judge's Office. Atreus, Son of Pelops, renewed them, by a Decree for their second Celebration, the Year before Christ 1418. Last of all, Hercules, upon his return from the Conquest of the Golden-Fleece, assembled the Argonauts upon the Banks of the River Alpheus, near the City Pisa in Elis, to solemnize these very Games, as an Act of Thanksgiving for their happy Success in their Expedition ; and they promised to re-assemble there for the same effect, at the end of four Years.

(1) See Scaliger after Eusebius.

Years. These Games however were discontinued, till Iphitus King of Elis re-established them 442 Years after, the Year before the Christian Æra 777. This became the Grecian Æra, and henceforth they only reckon'd by Olympiads ; from which Period their History is no longer so full of Fables.

This Division, as I have already remarked, proceeds from the Greeks, who were ignorant of Antiquities ; and those very Times they call unknown or fabulous, are Times very well known when we bring them to an Agreement with sacred History, and even with that of Egypt, and of several other Nations in Asia, a thing which has not been neglected by the Learned : and this is what makes Scaliger (1) frequently complain, and that with deep regret, of those who gave them the name of Fabulous, rather than of Heroick, which would suit with them better. Diodorus Siculus had said before him, that however we cannot give the same credit to the Accounts we have of those ancient times, as to what has passed in our own, yet we are not to look upon all that they relate of them as Fables, since they include the Actions of those Heroes who are now so celebrated.

Be that as it will, the Olympiads have scattered bright Beams of Light over the Chaos of History. So that the Learned are infinitely indebted to them ; but none, as I know, has paid his Acknowledgments to them with greater warmth than the same Scaliger I have been quoting. He makes them one of the prettiest Compliments could possibly come from a Scholar: “ Hail! “ says he, ye divine Olympiads, sacred Depositaries of “ Truth ; ’tis yours to check the presumptuous Rash- “ ness of Chronologists ; by you, Gleams of Light are “ diffused over History ; how many Truths had been “ buried in the Abyss of Ignorance, but for you ! In fine, “ by your means it is, we know with Certainty the “ memorable Transactions even of Ages so remote (2).”

But enough of this Article ; we go on to the thirteenth Source, taken from the Ignorance of Languages.

CHAP.

(1) Can. Isag. l. 3. (2) Animadv. in Euseb. Chron.

C H A P. VI.

Continuation of the same Subject.

Ignorance of Languages, the Phenician especially, has also been a Thirteenth Source, Ignorance of Languages. Source of an infinite deal of Fables.

'Tis certain that several Countries in Greece were peopled by Colonies from Phenicia; whose Language, without doubt, would mix it self with that of the Countries they came into (a); and as the Phenician Language has many equivocal Words, the Greeks, who in after-times read their ancient History, which abounded with Phenician Phrases, finding there these equivocal Words, were sure to explain them in a sense that was most to their taste. There is even little room to doubt, but that the Phenicians knowing what strong propension they had towards Fictions, would impose upon their Credulity as often as they were consulted. This was the Origin of numberless Fables: of which the following are examples, most of them taken from Bochart.

The word Alpha, or Ilpha, in the Phenician Language, signifying equally a Bull or a Ship; the Greeks instead of saying Europa had been conveyed in a Ship into Crete, gave out that Jupiter transform'd into a Bull had carry'd her off. In the same Language, the Phenicians called themselves Hevæens, or Achiviens; and as the word Chiva signifies a Serpent, the Greeks lighting upon it in the Annals of Cadmus, feigned the Story of that Prince's being changed into a Serpent. Once more, from the word Sir, which imports a Song, they have made up the Fable of the Sirens. Æolus had never passed among them for the God of the Winds and Tempests, but for the word Æol, or Chol, which signifies a Tempest. That Fable, which says the Ship of the Argonauts spoke, and that Minerva had set at the Helm one of the Oaks of the Forest of Dodona, that gave Oracular Responses, owes its Origin likewise to a double Entendre in the Phenician Tongue, where the same Word signifies, to speak, and to govern a Ship (1).

(a) Bochart and Vossius have unanswerably proved, that the Alphabet Cadmus brought into Greece was Phenician; the Pelasgian was in use there before, and of the two together one Language was composed.

From the word Moun, or Mon, which imports Vice, they have made the God Momus, the Cenfor of the Faults of Men (2). The Fable of the famous Fountain of Castalia, in Bæotia, takes its rise in like manner from an equivocal Sound: as it run with a murmuring Noise that appeared to have something singular (a), and the effect of its Water being to disorder the Imagination of those who drunk it, they fancied at first it communicated the Gift of Prophecy; and when the question was, how it came by this Virtue, they invented a Fable. A Nymph, say they, was beloved by Apollo (3); while the God was one day in pursuit of her, she threw herself into this Fountain: Apollo, as a Consolation for the loss of his Mistress, imparted to the Water the Gift of Prophecy. Had the Greeks understood the Hebrew Language, they might easily have seen that the word Castalia, comes from Castala, which signifies Noise (4); nor would they have run into such ridiculous Fables, the ordinary resort of their Ignorance. We have much the same Account to give of the Origin of the Fountain Hippocrene, which, they say, sprung forth upon Pegasus's striking his Foot against Mount Helicon, because the word Pigran, whence comes Hippigrana, and then Hippocrene, imports, to spring from the Earth (b). The Fable of the Fountain Arethusa and Alpheus her Lover, so well described by Ovid, has its Foundation in nothing else but such a poor Quibble. The Phenicians, upon their Arrival in Sicily, seeing that Fountain environ'd with Willows, named it perhaps Alphaga,

as

(1) See the Fable of the Argonauts, T. 3. (2) Le Clerc upon Hesiod

(a) Castaliæque sonans liquido pede labitur unda. Virg. in Gulice

(3) Lotativus. (4) Bochart Chan. l. 1. c. 16.

(b) See Bochart's Chan. l. 1. c. 16. and M. Le Clerc upon Hesiod
From Pigran the Greeks have made ἵππικρῆνν tanquam ab equo de cuncta voce; ideo Persio fons caballinus; hinc nata fabula de fonte terra edito, equi ungula percussa.

as much as to say, the Fountain of Willows (1). The Greeks who landed afterwards in the same Place, not understanding the Signification of the Word, and calling to mind their River Alpheus (2), imagined, that since the Fountain and the River had nearly the same Name, they must have had the same Original too; and upon this, some sprightly Wit made up the Romance of the Amours between the God of the River and the Nymph Arethusa. Almost all the succeeding Historians were befooled by this Fable, and gravely told that Alpheus crossed the Sea, and repaired into the Island of Sicily, nigh to the Fountain of Arethusa (a). One and the same Phenician Root of the word Nabhasch might equally stand for a Keeper, or a Dragon: When they read any History where this Word occur'd, to denote the Keeper of something of Value, they were sure to say it was a Dragon. Hence all those Fables of the famous Dragons, whom they set to keep the Garden of the Hesperides, the Golden-Fleece, the Cave at Delphi, and the famous Fountain of Thebes. In the room of Men they have set over them so many Monsters; and what has authorized the Freedom they took, in applying the Phenician Word to that Sense, is, that to be the Guardian of a thing of Worth, and to watch for its Preservation, one must be vigilant and sharp-sighted; which is imported in the Greek Words ὄφis and δρῶν (b). This is what has often deceived Palæphatus, Diodorus, and some others, who for explaining these Fables have substituted others in their room, and introduced Personages to whom they have given the Name of Draco. Just so when the Poets tell us, that the Gods terrified by the Menaces of the Giants, cloathed themselves in Egypt with the Figure of several Animals (3), this is founded upon bare Allusions to the Phenician or Hebrew

F 2

brew

(1) Bochart, l. 1. c. 18. (2) It runs thro' Elis.

(a) Bochart believes the word Arethusa comes from the Phenician word Arith, which signifies a Rivulet.

(b) Le Clerc upon Hesiod, p. 63. These Words, says that Author, come from ὄφis and δρῶν videre. Igitur credibile est eandem vocem Pheniciâ lingua & Serpentem & Custodem significasse.

(3) Ovid. Met. l. 5.

brew Names, which gave occasion to these Fables. Thus, to condescend upon Examples, 'tis unquestionably certain, that their reason for transforming the God Anubis into a Dog, is, that Nobeab signifies, to bark: Apis into an Ox, because Abir signifies an Ox: Venus into a Fish: Juno into a Heifer, because Astarot, which was Juno's Name, signifies Flocks: and Dag, which was that of Venus, or Astarté, imports a Fish. Here I might produce a world of other Examples; but I hope before I have done to give so many Proofs of it, as to convince the most incredulous.

What remains at present is to prove, that not only the equivocal Words in the Eastern Languages have made way for numberless Fables, but those of other Languages besides.

The equivocal Words in Greek, for instance, have produced a vast Number. From Crios (1), which was the Name of the Governour to Atbamas's Children, and signified a Ram, they have made up the Fable of the Ram with the Golden Fleece, as we shall shew at more length, when it comes to be explain'd. In like manner, they have turn'd Lycaon into a Wolf, because his Name and that of the Animal are the same. They have given it out that Cyrus was suckled by a Bitch, because his Nurse, the Wife of Astyages's Cow-herd, was called in Greek, Cyno (2), and in the Language of the Medes, Spaco, Names which import a Bitch (3). That Venus sprung from Sea-foam, because Aphrodité, which was the Name given to that Goddess, signified Foam. That the Temple of Delphi had been built with Wax, and the Wings of the Bees Apollo had brought from the Hyperborean Regions, because Pteras (4), whose Name imports a Wing, had been the Architect. The same thing is to be said of other Fables, where we meet with some Infants that have been nurs'd by She-Goats, as Ægistbes; or by a Hind, as Telephus, the Son of Hercules, because their Names answer to the Names of those Animals.

But

(1) ὁ κριὸς, (2) αὐτὸ τῆς κυνὸς. (3) Herodot. l. 1. (4) τὸ πτερόν, Penna.

But to add more Probability to all these Origins, it will be proper to shew in a few Words, Source. and by incontestable Examples, that the Greeks got most of their Fables from Egypt and Phenicia.

The Greeks are far from being so ancient as the other People of the East ; Arts and Politeness were reigning in Egypt, when the Western Nations were still living in a brutish Rusticity : 'twas from Colonies that came from the East, that they learnt to build Cities, to live in Society, and to wear Clothes. From them they had the Ceremonies of Religion, the Worship of the Gods, and Sacrifices. This is a thing not to be called in question, after the plainest Testimony of the most ancient Authors. The Fables were interwoven with Religion, they were the Foundation it was built upon : it was Fable that introduced a multiplicity of Gods which they substituted in room of the true one : thus by learning the Religion of the Egyptians, the Greeks learned their Fables likewise. Certain it is, for instance, that the Worship of Bacchus was formed upon that of Osiris ; Diodorus says so in more places than one (1). The obscene Representations of their Hermes and Priapus, were they not the same with the Phallus of the Egyptians ? For all that Herodotus has said to the contrary, it was the Pelasgi who taught them these infamous Mysteries : The Pelasgi, notwithstanding they were so ancient in Greece, were modern in comparison of the Egyptians ; and as they were Vagrants, some one of them might have left Arcadia, their first place of Abode, and travelled into Egypt. Cadmus and Melampus had brought that Worship into Greece ; and the former underwent a load of Persecution, so as to be even expelled the Kingdom, only for opposing the Innovations they had introduced into the Festivals of that ancient Divinity. Such was the temper of the Greeks ; they changed both the Names and Ceremonies of the Eastern Deities, to make it afterwards be believed that they were Natives of their own Country ; as we see in this Example, in that of Isis, whom they named Diana, and in an infinity of others. The

(1) L. 1. (2) L. 2.

Fable of Derceto, or of Atergatis, is it not the very same with that of Dagon? Is not this a Name the Greeks have compounded of these two, Adir and Agon, a great Fish? as Selden demonstrates (1): and is not this the reason of Ovid's saying, Derceto was turn'd into a Fish? The Fable of Venus and Adonis, was it not originally from Syria? and if they gave out that this Goddess sprung from the Sea, the reason is, that her Worship was conveyed from the Coasts of Syria into Cyprus, from that to Cythera, and thence into Greece. Io changed into a Cow, is it not the same with Isis, whom the Egyptians worshipped under the Figure of that Animal? And if, according to Plutarch (2), there was an ancient Tradition importing that Goddess to have been metamorphosed into a Swallow, is it not owing to this, as Bochart remarks (3), that Sis in the Eastern Languages signifies a Swallow? The Fable of Arachné changed into a Spider, comes it not from the Hebrew Word Arag, which signifies to spin? a Term the Scripture uses for the Nets the Spiders weave. That of Esculapius suckled by a Bitch, is it not also of Phœnician growth? And tho' Sanchoniathon had not said it in so many words, might we not see the Composition of that Name and Fable in the two Hebrew Words, Is Calibi, Vir caninus, whence the Greeks have made their Asclepius, and the Latins their Esculapius? Why, I pray you, was Diana said to have been changed into a Cat, but because that Goddess, according to Herodotus (4), was called in Egypt, Bubaste; which signifies a Cat, in the Language of the Country, as we learn from Stephanus (5). The Mercury of the Latins, the Hermes of the Greeks, and the Teutat of the Gauls, were they not all copied from the ancient Thot of the Egyptians? The whole Train of Fables the Poets wrought into their Hades; in one word, their whole Poetical System of Hell, was it not derived from Egypt? Diodorus Siculus (6), and Porphyry (7) are clear upon this head, and

(1) De Diis Syriis, Synt. 2. c. 3. (2) In Iside. (3) De Animal. p. 2. l. 10. (4) L. 2. p. 156. (5) In voce Bubastis. (6) L. 1. (7) L. 5. de Abst.

and we shall prove it at very great length in the Sequel. Did not Pythagoras borrow from that same People all his Reveries about the Metempsychosis, and Homer his Fable of the Metamorphoses of Proteus? I might produce several others besides; but what we have given are more than sufficient to evince that the far greater Part of the Greek and Latin Fables came from Egypt and Phenicia: That Bochart and some others were in the right to have frequent recourse to the Eastern Languages for unravelling them; and that any difficulty we have in finding them out, is owing to this, that the Greeks, who on the one hand had an extreme Attachment to Fictions, and on the other, coveted a Name of great Antiquity, chusing rather to ascribe their Original to the Pismires of the Forest of Egina, or to Cadmus's Teeth of a Serpent, than to own their Descent from a foreign People, turned every thing, Names, Adventures, and even the Ceremonies of Religion into Fable; intending thereby to shew, that the Origin of all was among them, and that they were indebted to no Nation either for their Gods, or their Heroes. This, without doubt, is the Reason, why in the Greek Poets we meet with the Egyptian Fables so disfigured, that it would be difficult to trace their Origin without the help of the Languages; and why we see such a Difference between what Plutarch and Diodorus say of Isis and Osiris after the Priests of Egypt, and what the Poets tell us of Io, Bacchus, and Diana, that it would tempt one to think the Divinities are not the same.

In the first Chapter we laid down Rules and Examples to distinguish in general, the Oriental Fables from the Greek and Latin. This would be the proper Place to speak of the time when the Fables begun; but to fix them to a precise Epoch, is a thing impossible: we only know they are very ancient, since we find them in the oldest Remains we have of prophane Antiquity; to which we may add, that the different manner they are told in by the earliest Poets, is an unquestionable Proof of their having been diffused, before their time, thro' the Nations whose ancient Tradition was probably wrought into them. But to say something more particular, I am of opinion, if Fables, as well as Idolatry which they appear so naturally connected with, were not introduced before the Deluge, so as to corrupt the Religion of Cain and his Family, they sprung up at least soon after, in the Family of Ham and his Son Canaan, the first Founders of Idolatry. Thus we may look upon Phenicia and Egypt as the first Theater of Fable, whence they passed with the Colonies to the West, and to Greece especially, where they incredibly multiplied, the Greeks having a powerful Bias towards Fictions. From Greece they came into Italy, and the other Countries.

It is certain that one who traces ancient Tradition but a little, may easily find this to have been the Progress of Idolatry and Fables, which always kept pace with one another. We are not then to imagine Homer and Hesiod were the Inventers of those Fables: Idolatry was elder than either of them, and by consequence, Fables, that have a necessary Connection with it, were so too. The Poets who had gone before those now mentioned, had in all appearance filled their Works with them, and I make no doubt but Homer had Models which he has imitated. Wou'd ever the Greek Poetry have set out with such masterly Pieces? Undoubtedly there had been Poets before him, who had handled the Subject of the Trojan War, and had composed Iliads, wherein it is likely the Intercourse of the Gods with Men, and the other Fables took place, as in the Iliad and Odyssey; for we must not think the Gods of Greece owe their Origin to the Poems of Homer and Hesiod. These two Poets, and those that went before them, had in their Works followed the Principles of the Theology of their Country, the System whereof had been formed from the time of Cecrops, who established in Greece the Worship of the Egyptian and Phenician Divinities, as appears from the Testimony of the Ancients, as may be seen in St. Epiphanius (1). The other Heads of Colonies, such as Cadmus, who brought into Greece the Mysteries of Bacchus and Osiris, pursued the same Method; now these these Heads of Colonies were all of them prior to these two Poets by many Ages. But to say all in a word, the Greek Poetry is nothing but a Copy of that ancient Poetry so well known in the East, and which Moses has so happily employ'd in those admirable Songs, wherein he celebrates with so much Majesty, the Victories of the God of Hosts over the Enemies of the Hebrews; and perhaps too it is that sacred Intercourse of the God of Israel with his People, (a thing so often intimated by that divine Legislator) which has given the Poets that came after, a handle to bring in their Gods with Men, upon all occasions, not having any other way to explain that divine Providence which directs all Events, and appears in these divine Songs so deeply concern'd for our Interests. Thus the earliest Truths have given rise to Fables of the greatest Antiquity, which were afterwards multiplied according to the Humour of the People that adopted them.

(1) In his first Book of Heresies, Sect 7.

We may farther remark, that the Fables which came from Phenicia and Egypt, were not all of them propagated westward, I mean towards Greece and Italy; many of 'em passed over into the Indies with the Colonies that settled there; hence there are few Countries where a Tradition is not to be found of the Combat of the Giants, and of the War they waged with the Gods, as may be seen in several Authors (a). In the most distant Countries you meet with many traces of ancient Fables, where, disfigured as they are, they may yet be known: thus it is likewise with the Idolatry of these Nations; notwithstanding the Changes it has undergone, still it appears to be derived from the ancient, which the Colonies had brought with them into remote Climates. Upon which, Laffiteau's Work may be consulted, with respect to the Savages of America, whose Manners, according to him, resemble those of primitive Mortals. But it is time to pass on to another Source.

As

(a) See what M. Dellon has wrote on this head, in his third Volume of the Divinities worshipp'd by the Indian Nations, those especially upon the Coasts of Malabar, and the adjacent Countries; and what Father Laffiteau has said upon it in his Manners of the Savages, V. 2.

A fifteenth Source, Ignorance of Geography.

As in those early Periods the Art of Navigation was brought to no great perfection, and they were but little acquainted with Geography, their Voyages were extremely hazardous. When they came afterwards to relate these Voyages, they mingled with them a deal of Fables; thus they never spoke of the Ocean but as a Place overspread with Darkness, where the Sun went every Evening to bed in the Palace of Tethys (a).

The Rocks that form the Streights of Scylla and Charybdis, passed for two Monsters that swallow'd up their Ships. The Symplegades or the Cyaneæ at the mouth of the Euxine Sea, were represented as though they run together to devour Vessels as they were sailing between them: the Cimmerians, as a People buried in eternal Darkness: the Arimaspians and Iffedonians, as Men that had but one Eye: the Hyperboreans, as a Race that lived a thousand Years without Pain or Sicknes, distressed with none of the Injuries of Life. Here was a People covered over with Feathers; there Man-Monsters wanting Heads, as the Acephali; or with a Dog's Head, as the Cynocephali; some whose Ears reach'd down to their Heels; others, in fine, who had but one Foot, for such are the ridiculous Fictions their Relations of the Indies and Northern Regions were made up of: every where they were obliged to quell tremendous Monsters. If any one visited the Persian Gulph, he told how he had come to the Extremity of the rising Sun, and to that Region where Aurora opens the Barrier of the Day. Perseus, for having stoutly ventur'd to pass the Straights of Gibraltar, in his way to the Orkneys, had the winged Pegasus given him, with the Equipage of Pluto and Mercury; as if it had been impossible to accomplish so long a Voyage, without some supernatural Assistance.

What ridiculous Fables, what childish Fictions do we meet with in the spurious Orpheus, in Apollonius Rhodius, on the Subject of the Return of the Argonauts; how many many unknown Countries and People do they make them light upon in that chimerical Voyage? Who is there can tell where lay the Cimmerians of Homer, and where the Island of Calypso?

(a) . . . Tartessos stabulanti conscia Phœbo. Sil. Ital. l. 3.
Presserat Occiduus Tartessia Littora Phœbus. Ovid. Met. l. 14.

To all these Sources of Fable we may add, a Concern to save the Honour of the Ladies. If a frail Princess yielded to her Lover, there were Flatterers enough to call in some friendly Deity to screen her Sixteenth and last Source, the pretended Interviews with the Gods.

Reputation: He could be no other than a God in human Form who had triumph'd over the coy insensible Fair; by this means her Reputation was safe, and the Gallantries of that sort, far from being infamous, were highly honourable. There was not a Man, even to the too good-natur'd Spouse himself, but humoured the thing; and the Story of Paulina and Mundus is not the only Monument we have of the sottish Credulity of Husbands. Mundus, a young Roman Knight, had deeply fallen in love with Paulina, and after all his Efforts to touch her Heart had prov'd in vain, he be-thought him of gaining the Priests of Anubis, who assured Paulina that the God was enamour'd with her; that very night was Paulina led to the Temple by her own Husband. A few days after, Mundus, whom she chanc'd to meet, let her into the Secret. Paulina, in a desperate Fit, carried her Complaint before Tiberius; who, as much Tiberius as he was, caused the Priests of Anubis to be burnt, the Statue of the God to be thrown into the Tiber, and Mundus he sent into exile (1).

Certain it is, that an infinite deal of Fables draw their Origin from this Source: witness that of Rhea Silvia, the Mother of Rhemus and Romulus (2). Her Uncle Amulius got into her Cell, and her Father Numitor spread it abroad that the Twins she brought forth had been begot by the God of War. Often the Priests themselves, when they were not proof against a Woman's Charms, made her believe she was the Favourite of the God they serv'd, and she put herself in order for lying in in the Temple, whither she was conducted by the Parents, in form (1). Thus at Babylon, a Woman, one of those whom Jupiter Belus had left his Priest to single out, laid herself down in his Temple. Hence that great stock of Children they have father'd upon the Gods.

(1) Jos. Ant. l. 18. (2) Dion. Halic. Ant. Rom. l. 1. Tit. Liv. l. 1.

C H A P. VII.

In which the Origin of Ovid's Metamorphoses, and those of some other Poets, is examin'd.

THAT nothing of consequence about the Origin of Fables may be omitted, we must add to what has been said in the foregoing Chapters, that almost the whole of those we find in the Metamorphoses of Ovid, Hyginus, and Antoninus Liberalis, are merely founded upon figurative and metaphorical ways of speaking: they are commonly real Matters of Fact, with an addition of some supernatural Circumstance by way of Embellishment. The retired Life, for example, which Cadmus and Hermione led in Illyricum, after they were dispossessed of the Throne of Thebes, gave rise, no doubt, to the Story of their being turned to Serpents; especially with the help of the equivocal Terms, which we shall speak of in their History. The Cruelty of Lycaon, who offered up human Sacrifices to Jupiter Lycæus, occasioned his Metamorphosis into a Wolf. Ceyx and Alcyone have been transformed into King's-fishers, to give us the Idea of a perfect Love between Man and Wife. When any Princess had died of Grief for the loss of her Husband or Children, the Elegy composed upon that occasion turn'd upon changing her to a Fountain or Rock. The Agility and Nimbleness of Periclymenus, Nestor's Brother, who was slain by Hercules, gave them a handle to say, that young Prince assum'd all kind of Shapes, and turned himself to an Eagle. We are to think the same way of Proteus, Thetis, and Metra the Daughter of Erisichthon. If any one made himself odious, as Ascalaphus, they had him chang'd to

(1) Herod. l. 1. c. 381.

to an Owl. Midas's Stupidity, or possibly his exquisite Sense of Hearing, made him be complimented with the Ears of an Ass. Amphion is said to have rear'd up the Walls of Thebes by the Sound of his Lyre, because he had the Eloquence to persuade a barbarous People to build a City, and dwell there in Society: Orpheus to have charm'd the Tygers and Lions, and made the Trees and Rocks sensible of his harmonious Notes, because he had such an insinuating persuasive Art, that nothing could stand before the force of his Eloquence. Instead of saying that such a one was cured of a desperate Disease, as Hippolitus, they gave him out to be risen from the Dead; and the Physician, who had taken care of him, was always Esculapius.

Sometimes a Similitude of Names gave rise to the Transformation; thus, Picus was turned to a Woodpecker, Cygnus to a Swan, Hierax to a Spar-Hawk, Alopis to a Fox, the Cercopes to Monkeys. In fine, we meet with Fables; which are the Product of the Poet's Imagination: thus, to let us know that Cephalus rose betimes in the Morning to go a hunting, they feigned that Aurora in love with the Boy, forc'd him away; that Hebé, the Goddess of Youth, made Iolas Hercules's Companion to renew his Age, because he lived to a great length of Years, and retain'd his Vigour to the Extremity of old Age: that Jason was beloved by Ceres, because 'twas he brought Agriculture to perfection, an Art introduced into Greece by that Goddess: that Endymion had interviews with Diana on the Mountains of Caria, because there it was that Shepherd apply'd himself to study the Course of the Moon; and so of others.

We meet with others that are only metaphorical Descriptions of some natural Effects; thus the Amours of Apollo and Daphne, denote the perpetual Verdure of the Laurel, called Daphne by the Greeks. In short, we may take it for granted that all the Transformations they attribute to Jupiter and the other Gods, were nothing but so many Symbols to signify such means as the Princes that bore these Names practised, in order to seduce seduce their Mistresses. Thus, the Gold Pretus employ'd for inticing Danaë, made them say, he turn'd himself into a Shower of Gold ; or else, as Eustathius observes (1), these pretended Metamorphoses were nothing but so many Gold Medals engraved with some such Devices, and which Gallants made presents of to their Mistresses ; Presents more effectual by the rarity of the Metal, and the fineness of the Engraving, to make impression upon Women, than real Metamorphoses.

One Remark more is necessary before we conclude this Article ; that there never was a Country more productive of Fables than Greece. Not content with those she got from the East, she invented an infinite deal of new ones. To be convinced of this, we need but examine that immense Collection of them Ovid has made up, and we shall see that of the fifteen Books, which comprehend his Metamorphoses, thirteen, or thereabout, are composed of nothing but Greek Fables. In the first Chapter I have laid down Rules and Examples to distinguish them. The Language in which they appear to have been framed, is the least precarious. If the Names are taken from the Eastern Languages, they are foreign to Greece ; and if they are Latin Names, the Fables are to be reckon'd of an Italian Original. Now upon this Principle, there are few of them in Ovid's Metamorphoses, but are originally Greek ; for if you except those about the Chaos ; the Formation of Man ; the Companions of Cadmus sprung from the Serpent's Teeth ; that of Derceto chang'd to a Fish, Semiramis to a Pigeon, Pyramus and Thisbe, Ino and Melicertus, Cadmus and Hermione, the Medusa, Atlas, Andromede, Ceres, Ascalaphus, the Gods conceal'd in Egypt, Minerva, Proteus, Byblis, Memnon, the Cabiri, and a few others ; and those in short which comprehend the half of the fourteenth Book, and the whole fifteenth, which are evidently made up of Fables purely Latin, all the rest are originally Greek, as might easily be made out.

Such

(1) Upon the first Book of the Iliad.

Such is the Origin of most of the Fables; and when we cannot find the Solution of them in the Sources I have mentioned, it may easily be found in those Metaphors.

But after having laid open the Sources of so many particular Fables, we must go some steps higher, to a Spring more remote, and give the History of the Cosmogonies and Theogonies of the ancient Nations; that is to say, their manner of conceiving the Origin and Formation of the World, and the Generations of their Gods; here it is chiefly we shall see, to how many Errors Man is abandoned, when he has no other Guide but his own Light.

B O O K II.

Of the different Theogonies, of which we have any Remains in Antiquity; or the Sentiments of the Ancients about the Origin of the World, and of the Gods.

SINCE the Opinion of the Ancients about the Origin of the Gods was always mix'd with that of the Origin of the World, as a learned English Writer (1) has very well observed, and as is easy to be judg'd from the celebrated Fragment of Sanchoiathen; I shall be obliged in this Book to explain the one as well as the other.

They who are only acquainted with Mythology from the Works of the Greeks and Romans, whether in Prose or Verse, are apt to take the former for the Founder and Inventor of those monstrous Fictions their Religion was made up of, and of all the Gods they ador'd. But certain it is, the Greeks were Moderns when compared with with the Eastern Nations ; it was late before their Country was peopled, and they had their Religion, Ceremonies and Mysteries from Phenician and Egyptian Colonies. Thus, 'tis among the Asiatics we are to seek for the Origin of Idolatry. I shall begin with the Tradition of the Chaldeans, as the most ancient People we know, and from them I shall pass on to others.

(1) Cudwor. Intel. Sys. p. 342.

C H A P. I.

The Tradition of the Chaldeans.

THERE is no disputing the Chaldeans the Honour of being one of the most ancient Nations in the World. Nimrod, their first King, lived even in the time of Peleg, and he is looked upon to be the Author of the mad Project of the Tower of Babel. This People, according to Josephus (1), took care from the earliest Periods of time, to preserve, by publick Inscriptions and other Monuments, the Memory of all Occurrences, and to employ the wisest Men of their Nation in writing their Annals ; but there is no better Proof of the Antiquity of the Chaldeans, than the agreement of their Opinion about the Origin of the World, the ten Generations that went before, and the other ten that came after the Deluge, with Moses's Writings.

The History of the Chaldeans had been wrote by four ancient Authors, Berosus, Abydenus, Apollodorus, and Alexander Polybistor : we have only some Fragments of their Works now remaining in Josephus, Eusebius, and Syncellus. 'Tis in the last (2) we find that small piece of Berosus upon their Theogony. A Man, or rather a Monster, half Man and half Fish, sprung from the Red Sea, appear'd, says that Author, near a Place in the Neighbourhood of Babylon. He had two Heads ; that of the Man was below that of the Fish. To his Fish's Tail were joined the Feet of a Man, and he had human Voice and Speech ; his Image is preserved to this very day in Painting. Berosus says of him that he was ζῶον ἡμίφρονον, which

(1) L. contra Apion.

(2) Pag. 28, and 29.

which Goar translates, Animal ratione destitutum ; but as this does not appear agreeable to the Idea the Chaldean Author had of him, and Aphrenon not being a Greek word, it must be an Error in the Text of Syncellus, and ought to be read ἀρρενν, strenuus, as a learned Modern conjectures. Be that as it will, this Monster, according to the Chaldean Author, abode with Men by day, without Food, and taught them the Knowledge of Letters and Sciences, and the Practice of Arts, to build Cities and Temples, to enact Laws, to apply themselves to Geometry, to sow and gather Grain and Fruits ; in a word, whatever could contribute to civilize their Manners. At Sun-setting, he withdrew into the Sea, and spent the Night in the Waters. Other such Monsters appeared after him, and Berosus promised to unfold these Mysteries in his History of the Kings, but we have nothing of that Work remaining. The same Author adds, that Oannes had wrote a Book about the Origin of Things, in which he taught that there was a time when all was Water and Darknes, and in them were contained Animals of a monstrous Form, Men with two Wings, others with four, having two Heads upon the same Body, one of a Man, the other of a Woman, with the Distinctions of either Sex. That some were seen with the Legs and Horns of a Goat ; while others had the fore or hind Parts of a Horse, like the Hippocentaurs. Others were born with the Head of a Man and the Body of a Bull ; that the Dogs had four Tails, with the Hind-parts of a Fish. That all the Animals, in short, were of a monstrous and irregular Make, and like the Representations of them to be seen in the Temple of Belus. This Author added farther, that a Woman named Omoroca (a) was Mistress of the Universe, and that Belus clove her asunder,

(a) The Learned have sought out many Etymologies of the Name of this Omoroca. I agree with Syncellus, who makes it signify the same thing with Thalath in the Chaldaick, or the Greek Thalatta, or Thalassa, the Sea : which brings it to one of the most ancient Opinions, the same which was adopted by Thales the Milesian, that Water was the Principle of all Things ; or, to say the same thing poetically with Homer, that the Ocean was the Father of the Gods.

form'd Earth of the one Part, and Heaven of the other, and put all those Monsters to death. Then this God divided the Darkness, separated Earth from Heaven, and ranged the Universe in order; and after the Destruction of the Animals, who could not support the Splendor of the Light, seeing the World desolate, he ordered one of the Gods to cut off his Head, to mix with Earth the Blood which flow'd from the Wound, and of it to frame Men and Animals; after which, he fram'd the Stars and the Planets, and thus finish'd the Production of all Beings.

This, according to Alexander Polyhistor, is what the first Book of Berosus contained, that is, a gross System of Physicks, and a Theogony no less so. 'Tis true, this Author thought the whole System allegorical; but what Allegories could render it supportable? However, monstrous as it is, it appears to be only a disfigured Tradition of the History of the Creation, taken either from the Books of Moses, or from a Tradition still more ancient. It seems plain, that the place where Moses speaks of the Darkness that covered the Earth, then mix'd with the Water, & Tenebræ erant super faciem abyssi (1), is the Foundation of this whole Cosmogony, in which the Chaldeans had feign'd those Monsters, whose History we have now read, to give a more sensible and hideous Description of that State of Confusion which reigned in the World immediately after the Creation.

As to what regards the forming of Man, 'tis evident that the History thereof is likewise taken from the Description of Moses, who says, that God, after he had as it were exerted himself in the Production of this Master-piece, took of the Earth, which he tempered with Water, and breath'd into it a living Spirit. These last Words, it would seem, gave the Author of the Chaldean System occasion to say, that Bel had order'd his Head to be cut off; or, according to another Tradition, that he himself had cut off that of Omoroca, whence Berosus concludes, this was the cause of Man's being endued with Intelligence. As

(1) Gen. c. i. v. 2.

As for those Man-monsters, who had two Heads, four Arms, and both Sexes, we may reckon the Idea of them to have been likewise taken from those Words of Moses; where the Historian, in the second Chapter, making a Recapitulation of what he had said in the first, subjoins, in speaking of Adam and Eve, Masculum & Fœminam creavit illos; and 'tis this Notion of the Chaldeans, to mention it by the by, has given rise to the Fable of the Androgynes, so celebrated in Plato's Dialogue, intitled, The Banquet; a Fable, which this Philosopher puts in the mouth of Aristophanes one of the Speakers. “The Gods, says he (1), form'd Man “at first of a round Figure, with two Bodies, two Faces, “four Legs, four Feet, and both Sexes.” These Men were of such extraordinary Strength, that they resolv'd to make war upon the Gods. Jupiter, incens'd by this Enterprize, was going to destroy them, as he had done the Giants, who attempted to scale Heaven; but foreseeing that he must have entirely extinguish'd the human Race, he contented himself with parting them asunder; that being thus divided into two Parts, henceforth they might neither be so strong nor so daring. At the same time he gave Orders to Apollo to adjust these two half Bodies, and to stretch over the Breast and the other Parts of the Body, the Skin, as it is at present, and which bears a Mark in the Navel that it has been fastened to it, and knotted as one shuts a Purse: These two Parts of one Body thus disjoined, want to be reunited; and this is the Origin of Love.

It is easy to see, that this Fiction is drawn from the History, which Moses gives of the Formation of the Woman, who was taken from one of Adam's Ribs, and was Bone of his Bone, and Flesh of his Flesh (2). In vain does the Mind of Man use all its Efforts to corrupt the Truth; it leaves always some Tracts of Light to lead us to find it out.

There were some Rabbins, who did not differ much from the Opinion of the Chaldeans, in saying that A-

(1) Plato in the Banquet.

(2) Gen. 2.

dam's Body was created double, Male and Female, and that these Bodies being join'd together by the Shoulders, God separated them (1).

To speak my mind now concerning Oannes and the Fragment of Berosus, it is proper to observe, 1°. That this Author, after the Description he gives of the Babylonish Country, subjoins immediately after, The Appearance of that extraordinary Man happened in the first Year, while this Year is relative to no other. Thus nothing can be concluded as to the time when he appear'd. 2°. The Name of Oannes, or Oes, as Helladius calls him, seems to be formed from the Syriack word Oneda, which signifies a Traveller, or a Stranger. Thus the whole Story amounts to this, that at a time, which cannot be determined, there arrived by Sea a Man, who taught the Chaldeans some Principles of Philosophy, and some Knowledge of ancient Traditions, and left them Memoirs upon that Subject. Their Reason for representing him as a kind of Monster, Half-man, Half-Fish, was his being all over scaly: they said, he retired by Night into the Sea, only because he returned every Evening to his Ship: he ate nothing, because he took his Meals on shipboard; and so of the rest. What Helladius, of whom Photius has preserved to us a Fragment (2), says of Oes, or Oen, confirms the Explication I have now given of this Fable: for this Author, whose Account agrees well enough with what Berosus has related, adds, that Oen, who had the Hands, the Feet, and the Head of a Man, was really a Man, and was only taken for a Fish, because he was covered from head to foot with Fish-skins. What he says afterwards of its being given out, that he was hatch'd from the primitive Egg, whence all other Beings were taken, has no other Foundation but the Resemblance between his Name and the Greek word Oon, an Egg; or rather the ancient Fable, which supposed the Universe sprung from an Egg. We may remark, by the by, that Hyginus likewise says, probably copying after

(1) See Hicifeg. Hist. of the Patri. To. 1. p. 35.

(2) 2 Eib. Ccd 279.

ter these two Authors, that Eubannés, or, as the printed Copies have it, Eubadnés, whose Name is a Corruption of Oannes, came by Sea into Chaldea, and there taught Astrology.

George Syncellus (1), who has preserved to us the Fragments of several Ancients, says, that, according to Abydenus, a second Annedotus, or an Animal resembling Oannes, had likewise come out of the Sea, under the Reign of Amillarus, who dwelt in the Town of Pantibibla (a) six and twenty Sares, from the Foundation of the Chaldean Monarchy. But Apollodorus said, as the same Syncellus has it, that it was only under the succeeding Reign he appear'd, that is, in the time of Ammenon. In which Polybistor was to be blam'd, for having introduc'd, after Berosus, his Oannes in the first Year; that is, probably, at the beginning of that same Monarchy. The same Apollodorus speaks of a fourth Annedotus, who had likewise come out of the Sea under the Reign of Daonus: and Abydenus mentions four Persons, who came at that time by Sea, to give the Chaldeans a more full Explication of what Oannes had taught them only in a summary way; he names these four Doctors, Euedocus, Eneugamus, Eneubulus, and Anementus.

Such was the Tradition of the Chaldeans about the Origin of the World, where it is plain they suppose Gods prior to the Formation of the World. We see there is no mention of their Birth, as in the Tradition of the Phenicians, and other Nations which I shall speak of in the following Chapter. Be that as it will, here are the ten first Generations according to the

G 3

Opi-

(1) Chronog. p. 38. Paris 1652.

(a) Scaliger upon Eusebius, p. 406, remarks very justly, that the Ancients have taken no notice of the Town named Pantibibla. What if it was the Sipphara of Ptolemy, where Xixutras, who is the same with Noah, deposited the Memoirs he had composed before the Deluge? Since the Name may be derived from the Chaldaick word Sepher, or Spher, a Book, a Collection; and that is precisely the Sense, which the word Pantibibla bears in Greek. Sir Isaac Newton, in his Chronology, takes that Town for the Sepharvaim mentioned in the second Book of Kings, Ch. 19. v. 13.

Opinion of the Chaldeans, with the Duration of each Reign in Sares (a),

According to Afri- canus.	According to Aby- denus, in the same Author.	According to A- pollodorus in the same Author.
1 Alorus reign'd Sares 10	1 Alorus , 10	1 Alorus , 10
2 Alasparus , 3	2 Alaparus , 3	2 Alaparus ,
3 Amelon , 13	3 Amillarus , 13	3 Amelon ,
4 Amenon , 12	4 Amenon , 12	4 Amenon ,
5 Metelarus , 18	5 Megalarus , 18	5 Megalarus , 18
6 Daonus , 29	6 Daos , 10	6 Daonus , 10
7 Evedorachus 18	7 Evedorescus , 18	7 Evedoriscus , 18
8 Amphis , 10	8 Anedaphus , 9	8 Amenpsinus , 10
9 Otiartes , 8	9	9 Otiartes , 8
10 Xixutrus , 18	10 Sisutrus ,	10 Xixutrus , 18

Since in this System of the Chaldeans, it is taken for granted, that Alorus is Adam, there is no doubt but Xixutrus must be Noah. Accordingly they report it was in his time the Deluge happened; where, by the by, the Chaldeick Authors are more honest than Sanckoniathon, whom I shall speak of afterwards; the latter describing the ten first Generations of the infant World, and the ten immediately succeeding, by an unpardonable Prevarication takes no notice of this celebrated Event. What the Authors I have been quoting say about it, is to this effect (1).

Chronus or Saturn, having appear'd to Xixutrus in a Dream, forewarned him, that on the fifteenth of the Month

(a) The Antients divided Time into Sares, Neres, and Sofes. The Sare, (Saros) according to Syncecius, denoted three thousand six hundred Years; the Nere, (Neros) six hundred; and the Sofe, (Soffos) sixty: which makes the Duration of the first Reigns an infinite number of Years, every King having reigned several Sares: but when one considers the Sares only as Years of Days, the Computation of these ancient Authors agrees well enough with the Years assigned by Moses to the first Patriarchs. See upon this Subject, Scaliger, Petavius, and the other Chronologists, and in particular the Universal History, published by an English Society.

(1) See Synceci. loc. cit.

Month Dæsius, Mankind were to be destroyed by a Deluge, and enjoin'd him to write down the Origin, the History, and the End of all things; and to conceal his Memoirs under ground, in the City of the Sun, named Sippara. After this, he was to build a Ship, to lay up there necessary Provisions, and enter into it himself, his Friends, and Relations, and shut in with him the Birds and four-footed Beasts. Xixutrus put his Orders punctually in execution, and made a Ship which was two Furlongs in breadth, and five in length; and no sooner had he entered into it than the Earth was drowned.

Some time after, seeing the Waters abated, he let go some Fowls, which finding neither Nourishment nor Resting-place, returned into the Vessel. A few days after, he sent out others that returned with bits of Mud at their Claws. The third time he let them go, they appeared no more; whence he concluded, that the Earth was beginning to be sufficiently discovered. Then he made a Window in the Vessel, and finding it had rested on a Mountain, he came forth, with his Wife, his Daughter, and the Pilot; and having paid Adoration to the Earth, raised an Altar, and offered Sacrifice to the Gods, he and they that were with him disappear'd. Those that staid in the Ship, finding that they did not return, came out and made search for them, but in vain: only they heard a Voice sounding these Words in their Ears, Xixutrus, by the merit of his Piety, is translated to Heaven, and ranked among the Gods, with those who accompanied him. The same Voice exhorted them to be religious, and to repair to Babylon, after digging up at Sippara the Memoirs that had been deposited there. The Voice being heard no more, they set about rebuilding the City I have named, with some others.

C H A P. II.

The Theogony of the Phenicians.

S*anchoniathon*, Priest of Berytha, who is reckoned to have lived before the War of Troy, had wrote upon the Cosmogony and Theogony of the Phenicians. Eusebius, who has preserved to us a long Fragment of this Treatise (1), recites a Passage in favour of this Author, which needs not be suspected, since it is taken from Porphyry the greatest Enemy the Christians ever had. This Author reports, that Sanchniathon had wrote about the Jews, things very true; that he agreed with their own Writers, and had learn'd several Circumstances which he relates, from Jerombaal Priest of Jevo; that he had dedicated his Work to Abibail King of Phenicia; that not only this Prince, but they who were commissioned to examine his Books, were agreed as to the Truth of this Author's History.—In fine, that he had taken what he advanc'd, partly from the Registers of particular Towns, and partly from the Archives, which were carefully preserv'd in the Temples.

Time has destroy'd the Work of this ancient Author; it was yet extant in the first Ages of Christianity, since it is about that time, that is, about the Reign of the Antonines, that Philo of Byblos translated it into Greek, and divided it into nine Books (2). In the Prefaces, he had annex'd to them, he said, “That Sanchniathon, a Man of Learning and great Experience, being passionately desirous to know the Histories of all Nations, and that from their Origin, had made an exact Scrutiny into the Writings of Thaautus, from an Assurance, that as he had been the Inventor of Letters, he must have been likewise the first Historian.” ’Twas therefore from the Works of this Chief of the Learned, the celebrated Mercury, that the Phenician Author had taken the Foundation of his History. After this, he finds fault with the Greeks, for having turned real Matters of Fact into dry Allegories, or physical Explications ; and for having entirely subverted the History of the Gods by their Attempts to make it all an Allegory, introducing in the room of Truth chimerical Notions, and Mysteries which had as little Reality.
having

(1) Præp. Evang. L. 1. c. 1.(2) See Eusebius, ibid.

This Translation, which appears, from what Remains we have of it, to have been interpolated by Philo, and adapted to the Ideas of the Greeks in his time, is not subsisting at present ; all we have of it is a long Fragment preserv'd by Eusebius.

What is farther unlucky, (for it is proper that we give a plain and exact Account of this Fragment,) besides its being interpolated by Philo, as has been now said, Eusebius in reciting it, instead of having copied it just as it was, has intermix'd with it, as one who reads it with Attention will easily perceive, not only the Reflections of the Greek Translator, but also others of his own, which very much weakens the Authority of this valuable Remain of Phenician Antiquities ; while it is not always easy to distinguish what is Santhoniaton's from the Additions of Philo or Eusebius.

It is very evident, for example, that wherever mention is made of the Greeks, as when it is said they were misled by equivocal Words to take one thing for another ; or where speaking of Thot or Thaut, it is added, this is the same whom the Greeks call Hermes ; it is evident, I say, that these are Reflections of Philo or Eusebius : for if Santhoniaton be as ancient as is alledged, the Greeks were hardly known to the Phenicians in his time ; or at least their Religion, which they received from the Phenicians themselves, by the Colonies that came and settled among them, was not yet changed into that form it had in the time of Hesiod and Homer, who did not live till above 400 Years after Santhoniaton.

But whatever be in that, I here give the Fragment, which may be divided into three Parts. They who would see the entire Translation of it, need only read the Reflections of Mr. Fourmont upon ancient Nations

tions(1). The first contains the Cosmogony of the Phenicians ; the second, the History of the primitive World before the Deluge, altho' this Author says not a word of that noted Event ; and the third treats of those who liv'd after, who are the Descendants of the former.

1°. According to this ancient Author, “ The first “ Principle of the Universe was a dark and spirituous “ Air ; a Chaos full of Confusion, and without Light ; “ eternal, and of an endless duration. The Spirit “ falling in love with its own Principles, entered into “ close Union with them ; and this Union was called “ Love. Hence sprung Mot or Mod, that is to say, “ either a Slime, or rather an aqueous Mixture, which “ was the seminal Principle of all the Creatures, and “ the Generation of the Universe. The first Animals “ were void of Sensation, they ingender'd others en-“ dued with Intelligence, who were named Zophasemin, “ that is, Contemplators of the Heavens. Immediately “ after Mot, the Sun, the Moon, the Stars smaller “ and greater, began to appear and shine forth. The “ Earth being strongly illuminated by the intense Heat, “ communicated to the Earth and to the Sea, the “ Winds were produced with Clouds that fell down in “ Showers of Rain, and the Waters with which the “ Earth had been overflowed being sucked up by the “ Heat of the Sun, were again united in the Air,
 “ where jostling against one another, they formed “ Lightnings and Thunder ; whose Noise awakened
 “ the intelligent Animals, and terrified them so, that “ they began to stir in the Earth and in the Sea.”

This first Portion of the Fragment, has only a regard, as we see, to the Formation of Beings ; and 'tis not to my purpose to dwell upon that Subject. It suffices to observe, that this System of the Phenicians led to Atheism, God being left out in the Formation of the Universe. Sanchoniathon even says, that the Spirit, such as he conceives it to be, had no Knowledge of its own proper Production.

(1) Tom. i. p. 4. & seq.

2^o. The Phenician Author, after this Account of the Origin of the World, enters upon the History of the first Man and first Woman, whom Philo his Translator calls Protogonus and Æon; and adds, “ That the latter found the Fruits of Trees “ to be proper Nourishment. The Children of “ these Parents of Human Kind, who were Genus and “ Genea, dwelt in Phenicia. In time of a great Drought, “ they stretch’d forth their hands towards the Sun, “ whom they look’d upon as the sole God and Sovereign of Heaven, and gave him the name of Beelshamen; which, in the Phenician Language, signifies “ Lord of the Heavens. Genus afterwards begat other “ Men, who were named Phos, Pur, Phlox, that is, “ Light, Fire, and Flame: these are they, who by “ rubbing two pieces of Wood against one another, “ found out the use of Fire. Their Sons, who were “ of an enormous Size, gave their Names to the “ Mountains which they possessed; hence the Names “ of Mount Cassius, Libanus, Antilibanus, Brathys, &c.

“ The Offspring of those Giants were Memrurus “ and Hypsuranius. The latter dwelt at Tyre, and invented the Art of building Cottages of Reeds and “ Rushes, and the Papyrus; and his Brother, with “ whom he quarrell’d, taught Men to clothe themselves with the Skins of Beasts. Nor was this all, “ for an impetuous Wind having kindled a Forest hard “ by Tyre, he took a Tree, cut off its Branches, and “ having launched it in the Sea, made use of it for a “ Ship. He also paid a religious Homage to two “ Stones he had consecrated to the Wind and Fire, and “ pour’d out Libations to them of the Blood of certain “ Animals.” And this, by the way, is the second Example of a Worship paid to created Beings; the Sun, as we have seen, having been the first Object of Idolatry.

“ After the Death of Memrurus and Hypsuranius, “ continues Sanhoniathon, their Children consecrated “ to them misshapen pieces of Wood and Stone, which “ they adored, and instituted anniversary Festivals to “ their honour.”

This

This is the first time we find religious Worship ascribed to dead Men.

“ Several Years after this Generation, which is the “ sixth, came Agreus and Halieus, Inventors of Fishing “ and Hunting, as their Names import. These had “ Offspring two Brothers, who invented the Art of “ making Instruments of Iron. He of the two, whose “ Name was Chryser, the same with Hephæstus or “ Vulcan, gave himself to the abominable Study of In“ cantations and Sorceries; invented the Hook, the “ Bait, and Fishing-Line, the Use of Barks fit for “ that purpose, and Sails too. So many Inventions “ procured him after his Death divine Honours, under “ the name of Zeumichius, or Jupiter the Engineer.
 “ These two ingenious Brothers are also thought to “ have invented the Art of making Walls of Brick.
 “ Their Sons were Technites, or the Artist, and Geinus “ Autoëthon, that is, home-born Man of the Earth; they “ having found out the Secret of mixing Straw with “ Brick, form’d Tiles thereof, which they dried in the “ Sun. Their two Sons named Agrai the Swain, and “ Agrotes the Husbandman, devoted themselves to the “ rural Life and to Hunting. They were also stiled A- “ letæ and Titans. In fine, Amynus and Magus, the “ Counter-wizard and the Conjurer, were the last of “ this primitive Race; and they taught Men the Art
 “ of building Villages, and of gathering their Flocks “ into them. There was also in their time, in the “ Neighbourhood of Byblos, one Eliou, a Name that “ may be render’d in Greek, Hypsistus, the Most High,
 “ who had to Wife Beruth. They had a Son, named “ Epigeus, who was afterwards called Uranus, and a “ Daughter, who went by the name of Gé; and ’tis “ the Names of those two Children the Greeks have “ given to Heaven and Earth.

“ Hypsistus having died at a Hunting-match, was “ advanced to divine Honours, and had Libations and “ Sacrifices offered to him. Uranus possess’d his Father’s “ Throne, and having married his Sister Gé, had se“ veral

“veral Children by her ; Ilus, who was stiled Cbro-nus or Saturn, Betylus, Dagon, and Atlas.”

These, according to the Phenician Author, were the ten first Generations, which, if we except that of Elion or Hypsisus, are those of the Line of Cain ; on which we have four Remarks to make. First, That this ancient Author, who had a mind to favour Idolatry, was willing to mention none but Cain's Descendants, who are reckon'd, not without reason, to have been the Founders of Idolatry. Secondly, That he makes no mention of the Deluge, which, according to the Fathers of the Church, was sent to punish this Race for their Crimes, the greatest of which was the sacrilegious Worship they paid to the Creatures. A third Remark is, that Sanchoiathon counts ten Generations in the Lineage of Cain, tho' Moses reckons only eight, passing from the third to the sixth, or from Enoch to Irak. But we may suppose, that Moses, whose Aim was principally to take notice of the Race of Seth, or that of the Just, has not in the same way followed that of Cain, especially the fourth and fifth Generation, because perhaps they were Men who did not deserve to be named ; for 'tis not likely, that the eight Generations of Cain were of equal duration with the ten of Seth, of whom Moses makes mention. The last Remark is, that the Phenician Author, as well as Moses, ascribes to those Descendants of Cain the most part of useful Inventions, altho' the two Authors are not always agreed as to the time when, nor the Persons by whom, these Discoveries were made ; Sanchoiathon giving to one Race what Moses gives to another, as one may be convinced by reading the first Chapter of Genesis.

These ten Generations, I said, belonged to Cain's Descendants, except Hypsisus, because the Learned, after Cumberland, who has given a large Explication of this Fragment of the Phenician Author, contend, that this Hypsisus was the Father of Noah, and that the reason of his being mentioned so transiently is, that he

he was an Enemy to the Idolaters, whose Cause Sanchoniathon pleads.

For the Reader's Satisfaction, I shall set down the two Tables of Cain's Descendants.

According to Moses.	According to Sanchoniathon.
1. Adam, Eve.	1. Protogonus, Æon.
2. Cain.	2. Genus, Genea.
3. Enoch.	3. Phos, Pur, Phlox.
4.	4. Cassius, Libanus.
5.	5. Memrimus, Ufous.
6. Irad.	6. Agreus, Halieus.
7. Mekujack.	7. Chrysor or Hephestus.
8. Metbusack.	8. Technites, Geinus.
9. Lamech.	9. Agrus, Agrotus.
10. Jabal, Jubal, Tubal-Cain.	10. Amynus, Magus.

In Moses, as we see, Cain's Race ends with the last of the Persons I have now named, because they themselves or their Descendants perished by the Deluge, not so much as one of them being saved. If you ask how it comes then to be continued by Sanchoniathon, in the third Part of his Abstract I am now going to transcribe; the Answer is easy, that he has taken in Noah's Descendants to make up this second Decad: this will appear evident by the Reflections afterwards to be made.

3^o “ Of those, says Sanchoniathon, meaning Amynus
 “ and Magus, were born Misor and Sydic, the Free and “ the Just, who found out the use of Salt. The for“ mer was Father to Thaautus, who first invented Let“ ters; this is the Thoot or Thoor of the Egyptians, “ the Thogit or Thoyth of the Alexandrians, and the “ Hermes of the Greeks: the Sons of Sydic were the “ Dioscouri or Cabiri, afterwards named Corybantes or “ Samothraces. These built a Ship and improved the “ Art of Navigation; and among their Children there “ were some who found out the use of Simples, Re“ medies against the Bite of Animals, and in fine, the “ Art of Enchantments, or the method of curing these “ Bites by Spells.

“ Uranus, whose Children were alive in the time of “ those we have been now speaking of, having suc“ ceeded his Father Elion, had by his Sister Gé the four “ Sons already named, Chronus, Betylus, Atlas, and “ Dagon or Siton, whose Surname was Zeus Arotrius, “ or Jupiter the Tiller, from his having invented the “ Art of sowing Corn; he had also several other Chil“ dren by different Concubines. Gé, displeas'd with “ the Gallantries of her Spouse, made bitter Complaints “ to him upon that account; which obliged him to “ turn her off. But having an Affection for her, he “ took her back, and had several Children by her,
 “ whom he sought afterwards to destroy. Chronus, ar“ riving at the age of Man, espoused his Mother's “ quarrel, placed at the head of his Counsel Hermes “ Trismegistus, who was his Secretary, made vigorous “ oppositions to the Designs of Uranus, expelled him
 “ the Kingdom, and succeeded to his Power; in the “ Scuffle having taken a Concubine whom his Father “ tenderly lov'd, he gave her, tho' big with Child, in “ marriage to Dagon; soon after he had her, she was “ delivered of a Male Child, who was named De- “ maroon.

“ Chronos, for his Security, built a Wall round his “ House, and founded Byblos, the first City of Pheni- “ cia (a). Some time after, having conceiv'd a violent “ Jealousy against his Brother Atlas, by the advice of “ Trismegistus he caused him to be thrown into a Pit,
 “ where he perished. Chronus had then two Daugh“ ters, Persephoné or Proserpine, who died a Virgin,
 “ and Athené or Minerva; he had also a Son named “ Sadid, whom he put to death. He cut off his “ Daughter's Head too, by which Actions he greatly “ amazed the Gods; those I mean of his Party, who “ were

(a) The Phenician Author had already mentioned Tyre, as the first Town of that Country: possibly it was only made up of a few Cottages, but Byblos a Town more regularly built.

“ were denominated Eloim (a). About that time, con“ tinues the Phenician Author, the Offspring of the “ Dioscuri having built Ships, put to Sea, and being “ driven ashore near Mount Cassius, there built a “ Temple.

“ In the mean time, Uranus, tho’ in exile, was still “ plotting against his Son Chronus, and sent him three “ of his Daughters, Astarte, Rhea, and Dione, on pur“ pose to cut him off. But he having seiz’d upon “ them, took them into the number of his Concubines,
 “ as he had done Eimarmene and Hora, who were sent “ to him upon the same design. He had seven “ Daughters by Astarte, named Titanidæ, or Artemidæ;
 “ and two Sons, Potbos and Eros, Desire and Love.
 “ By Rhea he had seven Sons, the youngest of them,
 “ to whom the Author gives no Name, was added to “ the number of the Gods at the very moment of his “ Birth; that is, he was consecrated to the Gods, and “ to divine Service; he had likewise some Daughters
 “ by Dione, who are not named. The same Chronus “ or Saturn, had in Perea three Sons, Chronus, after “ the Name of his Father, Zeus-Belus, and Apollo (b).

“ Sydic, or the Just, having married one of the Ti- “ tanidæ we have now mentioned, had a Son by her “ named Asclepius.” Upon which ’tis proper to remark, before we go any further, that Sydic, being, according to some Authors, Shem the Son of Noah, or U- ranus, he must according to Sanchoniathon, have passed over into the Land of Canaan, and there married a Daughter of Cham, who is the Chronus of this Author.
Asclepius his Son is the only one of Sydic’s Children whom he mentions; for he concerned himself only for his own Country, which was Phenicia, peopled by Cham and his Descendants.

“ Be

(a) Eloim is the plural of Eloah, and signifies the Gods. Cum- berland renders the word Chronians, that is, those of Chronus’s Party.

(b) M. Fourmont, in translating this Passage, seems to be in a mistake, unless it be an error of the Press; for instead of the three Sons Sanchoniathon gives Chronus, ἡγεὺς ποταμῶν, he names four of them, Chronus, Zeus or Jupiter, Belus, and Apollo; whereas it should be read Ζεὺς-Εὐρέας καὶ Ἀπόλλων. Ref. Crit. T. 1. p. 16.

“ Be that as it will, the Author subjoins that these were “ contemporary with Pontus, with Nereus (a) his Son,
 “ and with Typhon. Pontus had two Children, a Son “ named Poseidon or Neptune, and a Daughter called “ Sidon, who being a charming Singer, was the first who “ composed Odes. Demaroon was Father to Melicer- “ tus, otherwise called Hercules (b). Then it was that “ Uranus engaged in a new War against Pontus, whom “ he deserted, and joined with Demaroon. This last “ falls upon Pontus and is routed by him, so that he is “ obliged to make a vow to the Gods for his Life.
 “ Ilus, that is Chronos or Saturn, in the thirty-second “ Year of his Reign, having laid an Ambuscade for “ his Father Uranus in a Thicket watered by Foun“ tains and Rivulets, cut his Privities with the “ stroke of a Sabre; and in that very place was Uranus “ deify'd. There it was he gave up the ghost, and “ there they shew the Blood that issued from his “ Wound, mingled with the Streams: the Place where “ this happen'd is still to be seen.”

Here then (and 'tis a Reflection which Eusebius has subjoin'd to the Recital of the Phenician Author) you have the History of Chronos or Saturn, and what is true Matter of Fact in relation to a Prince, whose Reign the Greeks have look'd upon as so happy, that of it they have made the Golden Age.

After some other things, the Author thus goes on (c). “ Astarte the Great, Jupiter Demaroon, and “ Adodus the King of Gods, reigned in the Coun“ try, according to the Counsels of Chronos or Saturn.
 “ Astarte, as a sign of her Royalty, set upon her Head
 “ that of a Bull. Traversing the Earth, she found a “ Star

(a) Cumberland by Arguments not easily answered, proves Nereus to be Japhet, as may be seen in that Piece of his, and in a Remark of the English Authors who have publish'd a first Vol. of The Universal History.

(b) This is the Phenician Hercules, the most ancient of all, who had a Temple at Gadira or Cadiz, which was still subsisting in the time of Silius Italicus, who speaks of it in his second Book.

(c) This last Article seems greatly intermix'd with Philo's Reflections.

“ Star fallen from Heaven (a) ; this she took and con“ secrated in the holy Island of Tyre. Astarte, accord“ ing to the Phenicians, is Aphrodite or Venus. Chro- “ nos in like manner taking the tour of the Earth, gave “ his Daughter Athene the Kingdom of Attica. In the “ mean time, Pestilence and Famine having arose, “ Chronos offers up to his Father Uranus his Son Sa-
 “ dic, and circumcises himself, ordering all the Soldiers “ of his Army to do the same. Some time after, a Son “ whom he had by Rhea, called Mouth, was rank’d “ among the Gods. The Name given this Son by “ the Greeks, may be rendered in Greek Θάνατος, or “ Pluto. Chronos afterwards gave away two of his “ Cities, to wit, Byblos to the Goddess Baalit or Di-
 “ one, Beryt to Neptune and to the Cabiri, the Agroti
 “ or Labourers, and to the Fishers, that is, to the Gods “ called αλιεῖς. But before this happened, the God “ Thaautus drew the Portraiture of the other Gods, of “ Saturn or Chronos, of Dagon, &c. thence to form
 “ the sacred Characters of the Letters. As an Emblem “ of Sovereignty, he gave Chronos four Eyes, two be“ fore and two behind. Of these four Eyes two were “ shut, while the other two were awake (1). In like “ manner, upon each Shoulder he placed a pair of “ Wings, two of which were expanded, the others re“ maining in a state of rest ; his Design being to re“ present by the Eyes, that Chronos when gone to rest, “ was still awake, and while awake was at rest ; by “ the Wings, that tho’ in repose he was incessantly fly“ ing, while with that Motion he enjoy’d undisturb’d “ Tranquillity. To the other Gods he gave only two “ Wings, one upon each Shoulder, to shew that they “ were only to be upon the wing to accompany Chro- “ nos. He likewise added to the Figure of Chronos
 “ two Wings more upon the Crown of his Head ; the “ one to denote the superiour Wisdom of his Govern“ ment, the other to point out the Delicacy of his Sen“ sations.

(a) An Eagle, as we shall shew in the Remarks upon this Fragment. (1) Here is the Origin of Janus, who was the Saturn of the Latins.

“ fations. Cronos having gone to the Country of the South, made over to the God Thaautus the full Pro“ perty of the Kingdom of Egypt.”

After having translated this Fragment, Philo of Byblos adds, that this History was left to the Posterity of Sydic, and that the Son of Thabion, that is Sanchoniathon himself, after he had turned it to Allegory, and interspersed it with some physical Ideas about the Origin of the World, had delivered over the Scheme thereof to the Prophets of the Orgies.

“ The Greeks, continues the same Translator, who
 “ in refinement of Genius excelled all other Nations, “ appropriated every ancient History to themselves, “ exaggerated and embellished them, aiming at no“ thing but to amuse by their Narrations; and hence “ they have turned these same Histories into a quite “ new shape. Hence it is that Hesiod and the other “ Cyclick Poets have forged Theogonies, Gigantomachies, “ Titanomachies, and other Pieces, by which “ they have in a manner stifled the Truth. Our “ Ears accustomed from our Infancy to their Fictions, “ prepossessed with Opinions that have been “ in vogue for several Ages, retain the vain Impression “ of those Fables as a sacred Depositum. And because “ Time has insensibly rivetted those idle Tales in our “ Imaginations, they have now got such fast hold “ thereof, that it is extremely difficult to dislodge them.
 “ Hence it comes to pass, that even Truth when it is “ discovered to Men, appears to have the air of Falshood, “ while fabulous Narrations, be they ever so “ absurd, pass for the most authentic Facts.”

Such is the Fragment of Sanchoniathon. As I shall have occasion in the course of this Work to speak of all the Personages mentioned by that Author, I shall subjoin here only a few Reflections.

I. As to the Genuineness of this Piece, Authors are greatly divided; some maintaining that it is really the Phenician Author's, tho' interpolated by Philo his Translator, and intermix'd with several Reflections which are none of Sanchoniathon's, while the far greater number have always look'd upon it as spurious. The celebrated Cumberland, and M. Fourmont the elder, are the two Writers, who have maintained its Genuineness with most Strength and Learning. In the latter especially (1) you may see the History of the Opinions of the Learned upon this Subject, and the Arguments he brings to refute them.

2. It is not to be doubted but Santhoniathon had taken the Idea of his Theogony from Traditions of very great Antiquity, tho' they had been already corrupted by the Phenicians, who had mixed Fictions with them; but at the same time 'tis evident, that the Author, with a view to gain Credit to Idolatry, has said nothing of the Genealogies before the Deluge, except in the Line of Cain, no mention being made of that of Seth.

3. The Author is clearer and freer from Interpolations as to those ten first Generations, of which we have given the Table, than in relation to those that followed the Deluge, where we find more Confusion, and less Connection; altho' it is easy to see, he was willing to carry them as far down as to the Family of Abraham, and to some of his Descendants (2).

4. Next to the gaining credit to Idolatry, the Author's main scope seems to have been, to shew who were the Inventors of Arts, wherein he sometimes agrees with Moses, and at the same time to give the History of Apotheoses; never failing to point out those, who for useful Inventions had been rank'd among the Gods, and honoured with a publick Worship.

5. Whence it follows, in the fifth place, that having given to the supreme Being little or no share in the Formation of the World, his Cosmogony is a Scheme of Atheism (3), and by one of the grossest Contradictions, his Theogony is an extravagant Sally of Imagination.

6. Allowing those I now mentioned to have been this Author's Designs in writing, as 'tis evident they really were, this accounts for his taking no notice of the

(1) Crit. Refl. upon Anc Nat. l. 1. (2) See a Table of them by M. Fourmont, l. 1. p. 86. (3) See Enf. Loc. cit. Cumberland. and M. Fourmont.

the Deluge, which he undoubtedly knew as well as the Chaldeans and Egyptians, who have spoke of it.

7. Altho' it were even less evident than it is, that it was from this Phenician History the Greeks borrow'd their Theogony, as shall be shewn afterwards, yet the Reflection of Philo of Byblos, which we have now seen at the end of the Fragment, would leave no room to doubt of it.

8. Eusebius, to whom we are indebted for this Fragment, maintained that the Phenician Cosmogony was a direct Introduction to Atheism, as we have remarked in the fifth Reflection; and in this he is followed by the famous Cumberland, who justly considered this System concerning the Origin of the World, as solely design'd to apologize for the idolatrous Worship paid to different Parts of the Universe, and to mere Mortals; Thaautus having involved Sanchoniathon his Copyer in that grossest of all Pagan Darknes, which is to leave out the Supreme Being in the Formation and Government of the World, and having attempted to introduce the Religion of the Egyptians and Phenicians, who honoured the Creature instead of the Creator. Yet a celebrated Modern (1) contends, that by giving a favourable interpretation to Sanchoniathon's Words, it appears, the Phenicians supposed two Principles, the one a Chaos, darksome and obscure, the other a Wind, Πνεῦμα, or rather an Intelligence endued with Goodness, which rang'd the World into its present Order: and that the Phenician Author, by saying this Intelligence knew not his own Production, means only that it was eternal, and had never been produced. But this Phenician Cosmogony being taken from the Books of Thaautus, 'tis proper to suspend our Judgment, till we have given the Egyptian Cosmogony and Theogony, which are to be the Subject of the following Chapter.

(1) Cudw. Intel. Sys.

C H A P. III.

The Theogony of the Egyptians.

THE Apologists for Christianity were obliged to search into the earliest Antiquity for the Origin of other Religions, and none has laboured herein more successfully than Eusebius of Cesarea. What precious Remains has he preserved, which must have been destroy'd by the Injuries of Time, had not he been at the pains to collect them into his Work? Besides the celebrated Fragment we have spoke of in the former Chapter, we owe to him a great many other Pieces upon the ancient Religion of the Egyptians, Greeks, and several other Nations. 'Tis in his Works we can trace by what steps Idolatry came to its growth; how various and fluctuating the Opinions of Philosophers have been about physical Principles, and about the Origin of the World in particular. The Fragment we have just now transcrib'd, has properly a regard to none but the Phenicians; but what were the Gods of Phenicia but the Gods of Egypt (a)? And whence had Greece hers, according to Herodotus, Plato, Plutarch, and so many others, but from Egypt and Phenicia? Sanchoiathon appears to have copied Thot, or Thaut: now Thot was an Egyptian, and the most learned Man of his time. We must therefore expect to find the Ideas of the Egyptians as to the Origin of the World, and of the Gods, to be pretty near the same with those of the Phenicians we have been now speaking of. Diodorus Siculus, in the Passage I am going to quote, has explained them, without naming however the Egyptians in particular; and Eusebius seems to have copied him (1), tho' the Chapter where he treats of that Subject be intitled, Of the Cosmogony

(a) We are not here to examine whether the Egyptians had their Gods from the Phenicians, as some learned Men alledge, or whether Idolatry passed from Egypt into Phenicia, because it is impossible to make the discovery, nor would it be of great use if we could.

(1) Euseb. Præp. Evang.

Cosmogony of the Greeks. But we know that these had it from the Egyptians.

In the Beginning, says Diodorus Siculus (1), the Heavens and the Earth had but one Form, their Natures being blended together; but being afterwards separated, the World assumed that orderly Disposition which we now see. By the agitation of the Air, the fiery Particles mounted upwards, and gave the Sun, Moon, and other Luminaries their circular Motion. The solid Matter sunk downward, and formed the Earth and the Sea, whence sprung the Fishes and Animals, much after the same manner as we still see in Egypt, Swarms of Insects and other Animals spring from the Earth that has been overflow'd with the Waters of the Nile.

Eusebius has well observed, that this System, as well as that of the Phenicians, derived from the same Original, excludes the Creator from having any hand in the Formation of the Universe. In confirmation of his Judgment, he cites a Passage of Porphyry, who, in his Epistle to Anebo the Egyptian Priest, writes that Chæremôn and others believed there was nothing prior to this visible World; that the Planets and Stars were the true Gods of the Egyptians, and that the Sun was to be reckon'd the Artificer of the Universe: and 'tis proper to remark, that this is the amount of that Abstract of the Egyptian Theology, given by Diogenes Laertius (2), who had himself taken it from Manetho and from Hecataeus, who before him had said, that Matter was the first Principle, the Sun and Moon the first Divinities of that ancient People, and adored by them under the Names of Osiris and Isis.

'Tis worth remarking, however, that a Modern of great Abilities (3), has done more justice to the Egyptians, proving from Eusebius himself, that they believed that an intelligent Being, whom they named Cncph, presided over the Formation of the World. They represented this Being, according to Porphyry, under the

H 4

Figure

(1) Diod. l. 1. p. 6, and 7. Edit. Wechel. 1604. (2) In Proëmio.
(3) Cudw. Intel. Sys. p. 318.

Figure of a Man, holding a Girdle and a Scepter, with magnificent Plumes upon his Head, and out of his Mouth proceeded an Egg, from which, in its turn, proceeded another God whom they named Phta, and the Greeks Vulcan. They themselves gave the Explication of this mysterious Figure. The Plumes that overshadow'd his Head, denoted the hidden invisible Nature of that Intelligence, the Power he had of communicating Life, his universal Sovereignty, and the Spirituality of his Operations. The Egg, which proceeds out of his Mouth, signified the World, which is his Workmanship. These same People sometimes represented the Divinity under the Emblem of a Serpent, with the Head of a Spar-hawk, who by opening its Eyes fills the World with Light, and by shutting them covers it with Darknefs. The Opinion of this modern Author may be confirmed by the Testimony of Jamblicus, who in the time of Eusebius, had apply'd himself much to the Study of the ancient Egyptian Theology, and he endeavours to make good what Chæremôn had advanced, that they did not generally believe that an inanimate Nature was the Original of all things ; but that in the World, as well as in ourselves, they owned a Soul superiour to Nature, and the Intelligence who created the World, superiour to the Soul.

Whatever we suppose to have been the Sentiments of the ancient Egyptian Philosophers, and of Thaautus their Master, one thing is certain, that their Theogony is an Idolatry of a gross nature, which was the Original and Source of that of the Greeks and several other Nations, as we shall see in the Sequel. And indeed, according to Socrates, whose Testimony is quoted by Eusebius (1), the Egyptians struck with the view of the Sun and the other Luminaries, imagined them to be the Sovereigns of the World, and the primary Deities who govern'd the same. The Sun they stiled Osiris, and the Moon Isis. Osiris, said they, signifies, full of Eyes, or extremely quick-sighted: Isis is the same as παλαιά, the Ancient, or the Aged, and this Name was appropriated to the Moon, on account of her eternal Birth.

(1) Præp. Evan. l. i. p. 17.

But they did not stop here: when one has set out in the dark, he loses himself in proportion as he advances. Diodorus Siculus, who had carefully collected the Egyptian Traditions, tells us, their great Gods were "Ἥλιος, the Sun, Χρόνος, Saturn, Rhea, Ζεὺς Jupiter, Ἥρα, Juno, Ἡφαιστος, Vulcan, Ἐστὴρ, Vesta, Ἑρμῆς, Mercury; that they reputed him the last, but were not agreed whether the Sun or Vulcan had reigned first. Here, to mention it by the by, are the eight great Gods of the Egyptians, of whom Herodotus speaks several times, tho' he does not name them.

Chronos, continues Diodorus Siculus (1), having married Rhea, became, according to some, the Father of Osiris and Isis, and according to others, of Jupiter and Juno. From Jupiter, according to the latter, sprung five other Gods, Osiris, Isis, Typhon, Apollo, and Aphrodite or Venus. Osiris, added they, was the same with Bacchus, Isis the same with Ceres. Anubis, and Macedo sprung from Apollo, who accompanied Osiris in his Conquests. Osiris, setting out on his Expeditions, left in his room Busiris his Brother; upon his return from the Indies, Typhon assassinated him, and they deify'd him upon account of his heroic Deeds, and the Oxen Apis and Mnevis, that had been consecrated to him, were themselves worshipped as Divinities. But as in Apotheoses they frequently changed the Names of the Persons deify'd, Osiris was called Serapis, Dionysius, Pluto, Jupiter, Pan, &c. Isis his Wife was also ranked among the Goddesses, and worshipped under the Names of Tesmophoros, of Selene or the Moon, of Hera or Juno, &c. Orus, Son to Isis, and the last of the Gods, having escaped the Ambuscades of the Titans, reigned over Egypt, and after his Death was numbered with the Gods; and 'tis he whom the Greeks named Apollo.

Such, according to Diodorus Siculus, is the Cosmogony and Theogony of the Egyptians; and 'tis easy to see that it had been corrupted by the Greeks, and adapted to their manner. What we may conclude of them with most certainty, is, that this ancient People owned owned two sorts of Deities: The Stars, especially the Sun and Moon; and illustrious Men, to whom for their good Services they paid a religious Worship. But be this Theology drawn from the Books of Thaut or Thot, or from some Tradition preserved by the Egyptian Priests, still we are sure the Greeks form'd their System upon it, as we shall see in order.

(1) P. 15.

C H A P. IV.

The Theogony of the Atlantidæ.

D*Iodorus Siculus* (1) is the only one of the Ancients, by whom we have preserved the Theogony of the People in the western parts of Africk, who were called the Atlantidæ: As these People, says he, relate some things concerning the Origin and Birth of the Gods, which have a considerable Affinity with what the Greeks themselves say of them, 'tis not improper to repeat them. They valued themselves, continues our Historian, upon their being possessed of a Country that had been the Birth-place of the Gods, and cited for a proof of it, that Place where Homer makes Juno say, she was going to the Extremities of the Earth, to visit Oceanus and Tetys, the Father and Mother of the Gods.

Uranus, or Cælus, according to them, was their first King: he taught his Subjects, who had hitherto wandered without any fix'd Residence, to live in Society, to cultivate the Ground, and to enjoy the Blessings it offered them. Uranus applying himself to Astronomy, regulated the Year by the Course of the Sun, and the Months by that of the Moon; and by calculating the Motions of the Stars he form'd Predictions, whose Accomplishment astonished the Atlantidæ so much, that they believ'd their Prince had somewhat divine about him, and after his Decease they inroll'd him among the Gods. Uranus had by several Wives, forty-five Children; Titæa alone had brought him eighteen. These last, tho' each had a Name of his own, went by the general Designation of Titans, from that of their Mother.

This

(1) Liv. 3. c. 4. p. 189. Edit. Wetzel.

This Princess, after her Death, received likewise divine Honours, and the Earth was called after her Name, as Heaven had been after that of her Husband,

Among the Daughters of Uranus and Titæa, the two eldest distinguished themselves by their Merit and Virtue. The first, who was called the Queen by way of Eminence, and who is thought to have been the same with Rhea or Pandora, took great care of the Education of her Brothers and Sisters, and this Diodorus remarks to have been the reason for calling her the Great Mother. This Princess, who had always profess'd great Chastity, being desirous at last to leave Heirs to her Father, married Hyperion her Brother, and by him had two Sons, Helion and Selene, who distinguished themselves as much by their Prudence and Wisdom, as they were remarkable for their Beauty. Their Uncles, jealous to see in Helion a Prince so perfect, and in Selene all the Beauty of her Sex united to the most consummate Wisdom, and fearing that the Empire might devolve upon them, assassinated Hyperion, and flung Helion into the River Po: Selene, who bore the most tender Affection to her Brother, threw herself down from the top of the Palace. The Queen seeking her Son along the banks of the River, fell asleep thro' Fatigue and Anguish; and saw in a Dream Helion, who foretold her that the Titans were to be punished for their Cruelty, and she and her Children advanced to divine Honours; that the celestial Fire by which we are enlighten'd, should henceforth bear the Name of Helion, and the Planet formerly called Mene, should take the Name of Selene (1). Rhea awaking, related her Vision, ordered divine Honours to be paid to her Children, commanded that none should ever touch her Body, and on a sudden, seized with an outrageous Madness, run all over the Fields with her Hair dishevell'd, and holding Cymbals in her Hands, whose Noise mingled with her Howlings, spread Terror wherever she pass'd. Her Subjects seeing their Queen in such a deplorable Condition, were going to stop her; but no sooner had a presumptuous Hand touch'd touched her, than Heaven gave a Signal in her behalf, and appeared all inflam'd, a violent Rain came pouring down, mingled with Peals of Thunder, and the Queen was suddenly snatch'd out of sight. After this Event the Atlantidæ confer'd divine Honours upon their Queen, whom they named the Great Mother of the Gods, and worshipped the two great Luminaries under the Names of Helion and Selene.

(1) The Moon.

In the mean time the Titan Princes, especially Saturn and Atlas, after the Death of their Father Uranus, made a division of his Empire. The western Parts of Africk fell to the last, who gave his Name to that celebrated Mountain that has since been denominated Mount-Atlas: And this Prince having entirely devoted himself to Astronomy and to the Study of the Sphere, gave rise to the Fiction that this Mountain bore up the Heavens. Hesperus was he of his Sons who distinguished himself most by his Piety and other Virtues; but one day as he had ascended Atlas to study the Heavens, he was snatched away in a Cloud, and to him they assigned a Place in the Star that bears his Name, and paid him the same Honours that are given to the other Gods.

To Atlas were born seven Daughters, named the Atlantidæ, to wit, Maia, Eleëtra, Taygete, Asterope, Merope, Helcyonæ, and Celæno. They were all married either to Heroes or Gods; and as several Nations valued themselves for having derived their Original from them, hence they came to be placed after their death in the Heavens, where they form the Constellation of Pleiades.

The Atlantidæ were far from making the same encomiums on Saturn, who shared the Empire with his Brother Atlas: He was cruel, and extremely avaritious. This Prince having married his Sister Rhea, had by her Jupiter, who was surnamed Olympian. 'Tis true they acknowledged another Jupiter, Brother to Uranus, and King of Crete, but far less celebrated than his Nephew, who after he had made a Conquest of the World, and conferred many Blessings upon Mankind, became the greatest of all the Gods. Such,

Such, according to Diodorus Siculus, is the Theogony of the Atlantidæ, which bears a considerable resemblance to that of the Greeks; tho' 'tis not certain whether these had it from those People of Africa, or whether they learned it from the Greeks. I shall make but a few Remarks upon this piece of History, because I am to explain this whole Mythology at length, in the History of the Gods of Greece (1). I observe then what is surprizing, 1. That Diodorus makes no mention of Neptune, the Knowledge and Worship of whom, according to Herodotus (2), came into Greece from Libya, where he was known and worshipped from time immemorial. 2. That he says as little about Tritonian Minerva, whom the Ancients believed to have been born upon the Banks of the Lake Triton in Africk, and who must likewise have been known to the Atlantidæ. My last Remark is, that it appears from the whole of what we have now quoted, that the Worship of the Stars, of the Sun and Moon in particular, was the first and most ancient Religion of these, as of every other Nation.

C H A P. V.

The Theogony of the Greeks.

GREECE never had but a very confused Idea of the History of her own Religion. Devoting herself implicitly to her ancient Poets, in this so important an Article, she looked upon them as her first Divines; while these Poets, as Strabo judiciously remarks (3), whether from ignorance of Antiquity, or from Flattery to the Greek Princes, had in complaisance to them contrived all the Genealogies of their Gods, to make it be believ'd that they were descended from them. Thus whenever we meet with any Hero in their Works, we need not trace far back till we find at the head of his Genealogy, a Hercules, a Jupiter, or some other God. That foolish humour of laying claim to great Antiquity, betrays itself in almost every People; but never were any so intoxicated with it as the Greeks.
Thus,

(1) Tom. 2. (2) L. 2. (3) L. 10.

Thus 'tis surprizing to see them, who could not but know that they had received several Colonies from Egypt and Phenicia, and by them their Gods and the Ceremonies of their Religion, still pretending that these same Gods were either originally from Greece, or from Thrace, or from Phrygia; for this is the amount of the whole System of their Poets. Two or three Words of Herodotus, who says, that the Gods of the Greeks came from Egypt, are preferable to all that their Poets have deliver'd upon this Subject.

Be that as it will, we shall take a view of their Theogony. Orpheus and Hesiod shall be our Vouchers, for 'tis plain, the other Poets who came after, have done no more than copied them. 'Tis true, none of Orpheus's Works are now extant; but his Sentiments may be gather'd, 1°. From the Pythagorean Philosophers, who renewed his Doctrine; 2°. From a Manuscript of Damascius, intitled, περὶ ἀρχῶν, cited by Cumberland (1), and by Cudworth (2); 3°. From an Abstract of Orpheus's Cosmogony, done by Timotheus, a Writer on Chronology. These are the Sources whence we shall borrow the System of this ancient Poet.

Very different Accounts are given of Orpheus's Theology. As it was he who first introduced among the Greeks, the religious Rites of Paganism, some have accused him of having invented the Names of the Gods, and forged their Genealogies; adding, that in this he has been imitated by Homer and Hesiod. Damascius, in that same Manuscript I just now quoted, says, he represented one of the Principles of the World, under the Figure of a Dragon, with one Head of a Bull, and another of a Lion (3), with the Face of a God in the middle, and on his Shoulders Wings of Gold. However, notwithstanding this extravagant Assertion, he was looked upon to be a profound Philosopher, and a Man endued with Inspiration; and by the help of Allegory, they found out in this same whimsical Device, the sublimest of Mysteries. Tho' it appears from what
the

(1) Upon Sanchoniathon, l. 2. (2) Intell. Syst. (3) V. Cumberland. l. 2. p. 280. 8vo. Land. 1720.

the Ancients have quoted of this Poet, that he is to be considered as the Apostle of Polytheism, yet several learned Men are persuaded of his having acknowledged one God, supreme and uncreated, the Author of the Universe; and they found their Opinion, not only upon that high Esteem he was in among the Sects of Philosophers who set most up for Religion, namely, the Pythagoreans and Platonists; but also because it was probably from his Writings that these two Sects derived their Ideas in Philosophy and Divinity. This Opinion, advantageous for Orpheus, has a better Foundation, if credit be given to the Abstract of Timotheus; for we learn from him, that this ancient Poet, in describing the Generation of the Gods, the Creation of the World, and the Formation of Man, had advanced nothing near so extravagant as what some Authors have laid to his charge. According to that Abridgment, Orpheus's Theogony amounts nearly to this.

In the beginning God formed the Æther, or the Gods, and on every side of the Æther there was a Chaos, and Night covered all that was under the Æther: meaning thereby that Night was prior to the Creation; that the Earth was invisible by reason of the Obscurity that covered it; but that the Light darting thro' the Æther, enlightned the whole World. This is that Light he calls the eldest of all Beings, to which an Oracle had given the Names of Counsel, Light, Fountain of Life. Timotheus adds, that according to the Doctrine of Orpheus, it was by the Power of this Being, all the other immaterial Beings, as also the Sun, the Moon, &c. were created. That Mankind were form'd of the Earth by the same Divinity, and received from thence a reasonable Soul. In fine, the same Author asserts, that Orpheus had published another Piece, wherein he taught, that all things had been produced by one sole God, who had three Names, and that this God was himself all things.

But whatever be in that, for it is a very easy matter to palm Opinions upon an Author of such Antiquity, and whose Writings possibly were lost long before Ti-

Orpheus wrote in his behalf ; one thing is certain, that the primitive Fathers of the Church prefer'd the Theology of Orpheus to that of any other Pagan, whence it should seem, if that ancient Poet introduced Polytheism, he did it rather in compliance with the gross Conceptions of those he had a mind to civilize, than that he was convinced of the thing. But what is more particularly observable as to the Doctrine of this ancient Poet, is, that he was the first who taught the Greeks the Doctrine of the primitive Egg, whence all other Beings proceeded (1) ; an Opinion very ancient, which without doubt he had learned from the Egyptians, who, as well as several other Nations, represented the World under this Emblem. The Phenicians gave their Sophasemim the form of an Egg, and made use of this Representation in their Orgies. The same Symbol was employed by the Chaldeans, the Persians, the Indians, and even the Chinese ; and 'tis not improbable that this was the primary Opinion of all those who undertook to explain the Formation of the World.

The Orphicks, that is, the Mysteries establish'd by Orpheus, at least if they be taken according to the System of Proclus the Platonick Philosopher, form likewise another kind of Theogony. According to these Philosophers, Orpheus believed the Government of the World had not always belonged to the same God, but that six of them had successively contended for it, and wrested it out of one another's hands. Phanes had been invested with it in his turn ; and this Phanes was no other than the Egyptian Bacchus, that is to say, Osiris.

Now we come to the Theogony of Hesiod, of which the following is an Abstract.

In the beginning was the Chaos ; after this, Terra, the Earth ; then Love, the fairest of the immortal Gods. Chaos engender'd Erebus and Night, from whose Mixture was born Æther, and the Day. Terra formed afterwards Cælus, or Heaven, and the Stars, the Mansion of the immortal Gods. She likewise formed the Mountains, and by her Marriage with Cælus, she brought forth Oceanus,

(1) Plut. in Symp. Macrobian. Sat. l. 7. c. 16.

Oceanus, the Ocean, and with him Cæus, Creius, Hyperion, Iapetus, Thea, Rhea, Themis, Mnemosyne, Phæbe, Tethys, and Saturn. She engender'd likewise the Cyclops, Bronte, Sterope, and Arge, who forged the Thunder Jupiter was armed with. These Cyclops resembled the other Gods in every thing, except that they had but one eye in the middle of their Forehead. Cælus and Terra had other Children besides, the proud Titans, Cottus, Briareus, and Gyges, who had an hundred Hands, and fifty Heads. In the mean time Cælus kept his Sons so close shut up, that they were not allowed to see the Day ; which was so very afflicting to their Mother Terra, that having forged a Scythe, Saturn seized it, and lying in ambuscade, surprized Cælus as he was coming to lie with Terra, and cut off his Privities. Of the Blood that came from the Wound were form'd the Giants, Furies, and Nymphs ; and these same Parts being thrown into the Sea, and mixing with the Foam, gave birth to the beautiful Venus who took up her Residence at Cythera. Her they named Aphrodite, because she was born of the Sea-Foam ; Cyprina, because it was near the Isle of Cyprus she had her Birth ; and Cytherea, because she came first into the Island of that Name. Love and Cupid were her inseparable Companions, and this Goddess became the Darling of Gods and Men. In the mean time, Cælus was continually at odds with the Titans his Sons, and threatening to punish them.

Farther, Night of herself alone, without the intervention of any other God, brought forth the hateful Destiny, and the black Parca ; Death, Sleep, and Dreams of all sorts ; then Momus, Ærumna or Anxiety, accompanied with Pain and Discontent ; the Hesperides, who have the keeping of the Golden Apples and of the Trees that bear them on the other side of the Ocean ; the three Parcæ, or Destinies, Clotbo, Lachesis, and Atropos, the unrelenting Goddesses who spin out our Days, always ready to avenge the Crimes of Gods and Men ; Nemesis, the eternal Bane of Human-kind ; Fraud and Friendship ; Old-age and Discord, who brought into the World painful Travel, Oblivion, Pestilence, silence* and doleful Sorrows, bloody Battels, Slaughters, Massacres, and all the Scenes of human Destruction; Quarrels, Dissensions, false and treacherous Speeches, Contempt of Laws; Knavery, and the Oath that often brings the greatest Ruin upon the Perjured.

Pontus, from his Commerce with Terra, had the just Nereus, Thaumas, Phorcys, the beautiful Ceto and Eurybia. From Nereus and Doris the Daughter of Oceanus, came the Nereids (1), to the number of fifty. Thaumas wedded Electra, Daughter of Oceanus, who was Mother of Iris, and of the Harpies, Aello, and Ocyrete (2). Phorcys had by Ceto, Pecphredo and Enyo, who got the Name of Graia, because they had grey Hairs from their Birth; he had likewise by the same Marriage, the three Gorgons, Stheno, Euryale, and Medusa †, from whose Blood, when Perseus had cut off her Head, sprung the Horse Pegasus and Chrysaor; who having married Callirhoe, Daughter of Oceanus, had by her Geryon with his three Heads. The same Callirhoe brought forth a Monster that neither resembled Gods nor Men, Echidna, the one half of whose Body was that of a lovely Nymph, the other half, a Serpent, ugly and terrible. Tho' the Gods kept her imprison'd in a Den in Syria, yet she conceived by Typhon, Orcus, Cerberus, the Hydra of Lerna, the Chimæra whom Bellerophon slew, the Sphinx who occasioned so many Disasters to Thebes, the Lion of Nemea, put to death by Hercules. Ceto had by Phorcys, the Dragon that kept the Garden of the Hesperides. Tethys had by Oceanus, all the Rivers, the Nile, Alpheus, &c. and a great many Nymphs who inhabit the Fountains and Floods. Here the Poet enumerates several, and says, there were three thousand of them, answering to the same number of Rivers, all the Offspring of Oceanus and Tethys. Tela had by Hyperion, the Sun, the Moon, and the fair Aurora; and Creius, by his Marriage with Eurybea, Astreus, Perfes, and Pallas. Astreus ‡ having match'd with

* In Hesiod λειυες. (1) Their Names shall be given afterwards.

(2) Virgil adds Celeus to the Number. † ἡ μὲν ἐν ὀφίῃ, says Hesiod, but the rest ἀφ' αἰνῶν. ‡ So in Hesiod.

with Aurora, begat the Winds, Lucifer that beautiful Morning-Star, and the Stars that adorn the Heavens. From the Conjunction of Pallas with Styx, the Daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, were born Zelus, fair Nicé, Force and Violence, the inseparable Companions of Jupiter; for when this God wanted to be avenged of the Titans, and called for all the Gods to his assistance, Styx was the first that arrived at Olympus with her Sons; which pleased Jupiter so much, that he conferr'd High Honours upon this Goddess, loaded her with Presents, order'd her Name to be used in the inviolable Oath of the Gods, and kept her Children with him.

Phæbe had by Caus the charming Latona, and Asteria, who was afterwards married to Perses, and became Mother of Hecate, whom Jupiter honoured above any other Goddess, giving her an absolute Power over Earth, Sea, and Heaven, insomuch that there is never a Sacrifice or Prayer offered to the Gods without invoking her. She presides over War, over the Councils of Kings, and bestows Victory in Battels.

Rhea having united with Saturn, had by him illustrious Children, Vesta, Ceres, Juno, Pluto, Neptune, and Jupiter the Father of Gods and Men; but that God learning from an Oracle deliver'd by Cælus and Terra, that one of his Children should dethrone him, he devoured them as Rhea brought them forth; which threw her into extremity of Affliction. So that when she was near her time of being delivered of Jupiter, she consulted her Parents to know in what manner she might rescue him from the Cruelty of his Father, and by their advice she secretly withdrew into Crete, where she was delivered, and presented Saturn with a Stone wrapp'd about with Swaddling-clothes, which he swallowed. Jupiter being grown up, delivered Cælus, whom Saturn had loaded with Chains. Cælus, in return for his Service, gave him Thunder, whereby he became the Sovereign of Gods and Men.

In the mean time, Iapetus having wedded Clymene Daughter of Oceanus, she brought into the world Atlas, 116 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book II.

Menetius, the artful Prometheus, and the foolish Epimetheus. Menetius, who was defiled with various Crimes, Jupiter crush'd with a Thunderbolt and sent down to Hell; Atlas he employ'd in propping the Heavens with his Shoulders, in the Country of the Hesperides, at the Extremities of the Earth; and Prometheus he bound fast to a Pillar with strong Chains, an Eagle continually preying upon his Liver, which was renew'd every night, as a Punishment for putting a Cheat upon the God in a Sacrifice he offered him.

Hesiod after this gives account of the War of Jupiter against his Father Saturn and the Titans, over whom the Father of the Gods having gained the Victory, drove them from Olympus, and condemned to the Bottom of Tartarus, in the Extremities of the Earth, Cottus, Gyges, and Briareus. Neptune took the last to be his Son-in-law, giving him in Marriage his Daughter Cymopolia.

In the mean time, Terra having matched with Tartarus, brought forth the last of her Sons, Typhon, on whose Shoulders grew an hundred Serpents Heads. Fire flash'd from their Eyes, and dreadful Voices issued forth from every Mouth. Heaven was in danger, and Jupiter himself was threatned with the loss of his Empire; but the God array'd with Thunder, overthrew the presumptuous Giant, and plung'd him headlong into the bottom of Tartarus. This is that Typhon, to whom the Winds owe their Original, except Notus, Boreas, and Zephyrus, who are the Offspring of the Gods (a).

Jupiter, now established in the peaceful Possession of Olympus, and in Dominion over the Gods, took to Wife Metis (1), a Goddess who surpass'd all, both Gods and Men, in Knowledge. But when she was about to be delivered of Minerva, Jupiter inform'd that she was to have a Son, for whom the Sovereignty of the Universe was ordain'd, swallowed the Mother and the Child, that he might learn from her Good and Evil. After this he married Themis, who brought forth the Seasons, Eunomia, Dice, Irene, and the three Destinies, Clotho, Lachesis,

(a) The South, North, and West Winds.

(1) Prudence.

Lachesis, and Atropos. He had likewise by Eurynome Daughter of Oceanus, the three Graces, Aglaia, Euphrosyne, and Thalia; and by Ceres, Proserpina, whom Pluto carried off. Being enamour'd of Mnemosyne, he made her Mother to the nine Muses. Latona bore him Apollo and Diana. In fine, his last Wife was Juno, who made him Father to Hebe, Mars, and Lucina. She also brought forth Vulcan, but at the moment of his Birth she fell out with her Husband, who had none upon his side but the sage Minerva, having produced her from his Brain.

Neptune had by Amphitrite, Triton; and Venus had by Mars, Terrour and Fear, who accompany this God in Battles, and the fair Harmonia the Wife of Cadmus. Maia, Daughter of Atlas, became Mother to Mercury by Jupiter, who had likewise Bacchus by Semele, Cadmus's Daughter, and Hercules by Alcmena. Vulcan married Aglaia, the youngest of the Graces; Bacchus, Ariadne Daughter of Minos; and Hercules, after his Deification, the youthful Hebe, Daughter to Jupiter and Juno. The fair Perseis bore to the Sun, Circe, and Æetes, who by the Advice of the Gods wedded the charming Idyia, Daughter of Oceanus, by whom he had Medea.

After this Account of the Genealogies of the Gods, Hesiod takes notice of the Children born by Goddesses to mortal Men, who were adopted into the number of the Gods. Ceres became Mother of Plutus, the God of Riches. Harmonia, Venus's Daughter, had by Cadmus, Ino, Semele, Agave, and Autonoe, who married Aristeus and Polydorus. Chrysaor had by the beautiful Callirhoe Daughter of Oceanus, the gigantick Geryon, who was worsted by Hercules. Aurora bore to Titbonus, Memnon King of Egypt *, and Hemathion; and to Cephalus Phaeton (a), who was so dear to Venus. Jason having married Medea, Æetes's Daughter, by her had Medus. Psametke, one of the Nereids, marrying

I 3

Æacus,

* Hesiod calls him King of the Æthiopians.

(a) Not the same whom Ovid speaks of, Met. l. 2. and who was the Son of Sol and Clymene.

Æacus, became Mother to Phocus. Thetis, Peleus's Spouse, bore him a Son Achilles; and Anchises had by Venus the pious Æneas, in the Woods of Mount Ida. Circe, Daughter to the Sun, had by Ulysses Agrius and Latinus. Lastly, Calypso brought the same Ulysses two Sons Nausitobus and Nausinon.

Such is the Theogony of the Greeks; a monstrous Composition of History and Fables, where we see every moment Physicks of a gross nature, blended with distorted Traditions; natural Generations mix'd with metaphorical ones; Names plainly allegorical along with those that are real; the whole collected by Hesiod, in a kind of Poem, that has neither Art, Invention, nor any Charm, unless it be a few splendid Epithets with which he has set it off. I judg'd it necessary however to give an account of it, as being the Foundation of the Greek Fables, which I explain in the course of this Work.

Aristophanes, the same whom Plato in his Banquet, as was observ'd (1), brings in delivering the Fable of the Androgyni, has also wrought into his Comedy of the Birds, the Substance of the Greek Theogony and Cosmogony, with more Method and Perspicuity than Hesiod.

In the Beginning, as he makes one of his Actors speak, were the Chaos, the black Erebus, and the vast Tartarus; but as yet there was neither Earth, nor Air, nor Heavens. Night, with her sable Wings, laid the first Egg in the wide Womb of Erebus, whence sprung after some time Beneficent Love, adorn'd with golden Wings. From the Union of Love with Chaos, arose Men and Animals. Farther, the Gods had not a Being till all things were mingled together by Love; but from this Commixtion were engender'd the Heavens and the Earth, as well as the Race of the immortal Gods.

This Theogony, inserted in a Comedy by way of Derision, undoubtedly made a Part of some ancient System, whose Author is not known. But let that be as it will; to return to Hesiod, it appears from his other Works, Works, that the Men of the Golden Age became Demons, Δαίμονες, or good Genii: These, according to him, are the Guardians of Men, the Earth having fallen to their lot. Those of the Silver Age were changed into Manes, or subterraneous Genii, happy tho' mortal; as if there could possibly be Happiness without Immortality. Those of the Brazen Age went down to the infernal Regions. In fine, those of the Heroick Age took possession of the Fortunate Islands, or the Elysian Fields, situated at the Extremities of the World.

There is yet a fourth Greek Theogony may be drawn from an Author very ancient, if it be true, that it was follow'd by Pronapides Homer's Preceptor, as is alledg'd by Boccace (1), from a Fragment of Theodontius, which probably was extant in his Time. According to this ancient Theogony, the most reasonable of all, there was but one sole God the Eternal, by whom all the other Gods were produced. It was not allowed to give any Name to this first Being (a), and none was able to declare his Nature. Anaxagoras thought he gave some Definition of him in calling him the Mind (2). However as the most simple Ideas have thro' Time been altered, Lactantius a Scholiast upon Statius calls this Sovereign Being Daimogorgon, as the Author I have quoted does after Theodontius; a Name which imports the Genius of the Earth, and which, by the Description they give of this God, as shall be seen in its Place, answers but indifferently to the Idea the first Philosophers form'd of him. For, in a word, and it is worth our noticing, the Poets, who were the first Theologists of Greece, have if I may speak so, turn'd their own Ideas into Persons, and compos'd Theogonies each in his own Way; but they seem always to suppose a Being truly independent. They are even mostly agreed upon an Eternity, an Ontogony or Generation of Beings, some of them celestial, others terrestrial or infernal; but Dæmogorgon and Achlys in their System have a Being before the

I 4

(1) Geneal. of the Gods, L. 1. C. 3.

(a) Et triplicis mundi summum, quem scire nefas est, Illum. sed taceo—— says Statius, Theb. L. 4. v. 316.

(2) Νοῦς.

the World, even before Chaos itself. Their Acmon, their Hypsisus, have an existence before Heaven, whom the Latins call Cælus, and the Greeks Ouranos. Nay more, according to them, Terra, Tartarus and Love were prior to Cælus, since Hesiod we see makes him even the Son of Terra. Acmon is taken for the Father of Cælus, by Phornutus, Hesychius, and Simmias of Rhodes his Scholiast; and the same Acmon is the Son of Manes, in Polybistor and in Stephanus. Cælus was first Father to the Hecatoncheires, next to the Cyclops, then to the Titans and Saturn, who in his turn became Father to the other Gods. Next came the Earth-born Giants, and the last of them is Typhon. After the Gods and Giants, quite different as we see from the Titans, who were the Gods of the Race of Cælus, came the Demi-Gods, from the Commerce of Gods with Women, or of Goddesses with Men.

In a word, the Greeks consider'd all those as Gods, who had liv'd from the beginning of the World, till their supposed Division of the Universe between Jupiter, Neptune and Pluto; that is, if we would reconcile Fables with History, till the time of Phaleg and Nimrod. They had but a very confused Knowledge of the first Times, which has happen'd to them in common with all the Nations that preserv'd ancient Annals, such as the Egyptians, the Chineses, &c. It is easy to see, that they have only disguised the true ancient Tradition which Moses alone has preserv'd, and that they have thereby fallen into the most monstrous Errors, of which the following is a very authentick Example, that may suffice for the present.

We find in the Text of the Septuagint, that the Giants came from Angels embracing the Daughters of Men: This Opinion has also been followed by the most ancient Interpreters of Scripture; as also by Philo, Josephus, S. Justin, Athenagoras, Clemens Alexandrinus, &c. It has been adopted by several learned Rabbis, and is still generally receiv'd by all the Mahometans. Was not this a sufficient Handle for those who were acquainted with this Tradition, to say the Gods had been enamour'd mour'd of mortal Women, and had Children by them? The Angels in Scripture are stiled Sons of God, so that it is probable, the Gods of Greece were form'd upon the Idea of the Angels good and bad: Thence proceeded the Egregores of the Hebrews, the Annedots of the Chaldeans, the Gennes, in short, the Genii, the Æons, the Archontes, the Titans, the Giants, and all the Gods or Demi-Gods of Paganism.

The Book of Enoch, no doubt, contributed a great deal to the adopting that Opinion of the Angels having been familiar with the Daughters of Men. This Work is certainly spurious, but withal it is very ancient, since it was known to the Apostles, by whom it is cited. Thus Dodwel and Father Pezron were in the wrong to call its Antiquity in question, merely because the Greeks were Strangers to it, as if they had been acquainted with all the ancient Books before they had them translated in their own Language.

But now that we are fallen upon this Article, it will not be amiss that we give some short account of the Book, and then lay open the Origin of the Fable it contains, which Philastrius ranks in the Number of the Heresies.

When Men had multiply'd, says the Author, they had Daughters of an exquisite Beauty, so amiable that the Egregores, or the Guardian Angels, conceived a violent Passion for them. They came down from Heaven, alighted upon Mount Hermon, join'd in League together, and bound themselves by Oath to stand by one another. After this, having embrac'd these Virgins, they conceiv'd the Giants, and the Nephelim, Sons of the Giants, from whom came the Eliud.

The Author names twenty of these leading Angels, who taught Men several Arts, especially the pernicious Art of Magick, and the Use of Arms. To which he adds, that God seeing what horrid Enormities the Giants and their Sons committed, sent down to the Earth Michael, Gabriel, Raphael and Uriel. Michael the Archangel seiz'd Semixas the Head of these Rebel-Angels, bound him with his Associates, and condemn'd them them to the lowest Parts of the Earth, where they are reserv'd to the day of their Judgment. After this he sowed Diffension among their Children, who extirpated one another.

I explain this Fable in the Article of the Giants (1). It is founded merely upon a Phrase in Scripture not well understood, and upon an Ambiguity: The first Interpreters finding in Job the Epithet Son of God ascrib'd to the Angels, apply'd it likewise to the Angels in the Passage in Genesis, where it is only the Sons of Seth are meant, who are design'd Sons of God in opposition to the Descendants of Cain: Videntes filii Dei filias hominum, &c (2). These being smitten with the Beauty of the Daughters of Cain's Race, match'd with them, had Sons by them, who became terrible more for the Enormity of their Crimes than of their Stature; for the word Nephelim, applied to them in Genesis, signifies equally Giants, or Persons dissolute and immoral in their Lives.

But passing that, I shall only borrow a Reflection from M. Fourmont, who may be consulted on this Article (3), wherein he takes the Names of the twenty Apostate Angels from the fictitious Book of Enoch, and explains them with Erudition. The Reflection is, that the Author of this Book introduces five sorts of Personages. 1. Men, of the Seed of Adam. 2. The Egregores, or Angels of Heaven. 3. The Giants, sprung from the Egregores. 4. The Nephelim, Sons of the Giants. 5. The Eliud, Sons of the Nephelim. In which this Author seems to correspond with Hesiod, in whose Theogony we find these five Classes, with little Variation, as has been remark'd.

I should no doubt be censured, if, after what I have said in this Chapter concerning Hesiod and Orpheus, and some other Greek Poets, I should take no notice of Homer, who, in both his Poems, has, with so much Apparatus, employ'd the same Gods with Hesiod and
Or-

(1) See the History of Jupiter, Vol. IV. (2) Gen. c. 6. v. 2.
(3) Refl. Crit. L. 2. S. 2.

Orpheus; but 'tis observable, that this great Poet had no design, like the other two, to deliver a System of these Gods, but only to apply the Theology of his Time as he found it. Homer, as the Abbé Fraguier judiciously remarks (1), is no more than a Poet: If he assumes the Theologue, as in effect he does, by bringing in his Gods, and using their Agency on all occasions, he is only so occasionally, and by no means as a Systematick. And what is this but to be a Poet? It is to act the Painter, the Imitator: The Object is none of his producing, he only copies the Likeness and draws the Picture. Whatever his own private Sentiments were about his Gods, as he speaks of them with a view to please and to be intelligible, he would not recede from the receiv'd Standard of his Time. Consequently Homer, born in the Heart of Paganism, could not represent the Gods in another manner than he has done. The Theology he follows was not of his Invention, he had it given him; but as Time, which destroys Errors, has rais'd the Credit of his Works, and as the masterly Poet has shewed his Skill in making the best Use he could of a false Religion, so he has been taken in later Times for the Father and Inventor of so many strange uncommon Things, whereof in truth he was but the Copier and Painter.

Cicero complains of Homer, for bringing down his Gods to the Level of Men, instead of exalting Men to the Perfection of Gods. This Charge is unjust; the greatest part of Homer's Gods had been Men, who procur'd divine Honours by their heroick Exploits or useful Inventions. But those Actions, however dazzling they appeared, were not always conform'd to the Rules of strict Virtue: Men had not always that pure Sense of Morality to which Pythagoras and Plato afterwards reduc'd it. Mere Strength, bodily Accomplishments and natural Endowments, have long supply'd the place of true Merit; and these great Men having been consecrated crated for possessing such Qualities, made these things be thought worthy of them after their Consecration.

(1) Diff. sur les Dieux d'Homere. Mem. de l'Acad. des Bell. Lett. T. 3. p. 1.

In a word, the Men whom they deify'd, had a share both of divine Perfection and human Weakness: Thus 'twas the Poet's business to represent them in both these Lights; and hence we find such a mixture in his Characters of Grandeur with Meanness, Strength with Weakness, Majesty with Abjectness, shining Virtues with scandalous Vices.

From what I have just been saying it appears, that the Greeks had several Theogonies, and that they had digested into a System the Theology they derived from the Eastern People. With the Romans the Case was quite otherwise: Content with the Religion of the Greeks, and other Nations whom they conquer'd, they borrowed their Divinities, Worship, Ceremonies, Sacrifices, Priests, Festivals, in a word, the whole Apparatus which Idolatry drew after it, without once having a Thought of reducing so fantastical a Religion into a System; and the most idolatrous City in the World was the least concerned about the History of its Gods. Cicero indeed, in his Treatise of the Nature of the Gods, gives some of their Genealogies; but since, for the most part, his Notions are borrowed from the Writings of the Greeks, and he only reasons upon the Subject like an Academick, this Piece of his is not to be looked upon as a System of Theology.

Here I might take occasion to consider the different Opinions of the Platonick Philosophers, with respect to their Gods, and to what the Ancients thought of them; but besides that this Question would carry me too far from my purpose, the Reflections I make upon that Article at the end of the Treatise of Idolatry, are sufficient to make it clear. After all, what else can we conclude from these different Hypotheses laid down by Celsus, Jamblichus, Porphyry and others; but that these Philosophers, in order to take off from the Absurdity and Grossness of reigning Idolatry, and at the same time get clear of the Objections in which the primitive Fathers of the Church triumph'd, endeavoured to al-

allegorize a monstrous System ; but these Allegories, which had no other Foundation but their own Fancy, were quite remote from the Thoughts of those who first spoke of the Gods and their Generations.

C H A P. VI.

The Cosmogony and Theogony of Ovid.

LAST of all, Ovid, that faithful Imitator of the Poets who went before him, has given us a Cosmogony at the beginning of his Metamorphoses.

“ Before the Formation, says he, of the Sea, the “ Earth and the all-surrounding Heavens, universal “ Nature had but one Appearance. That confused “ Mass, that insignificant useless Heap, wherein the “ Principles of all Beings were promiscuously blended “ together, is what was called Chaos. As yet there “ was no Sun to enlighten the World, no Moon to per“ form her various Changes ; the Earth self-balanced “ was not yet suspended in the Air ; the Sea had no “ bounding Shores ; Earth, Air and Water were jumbled “ together ; Earth without Solidity, Water not fluid, “ Air without Light : All was Darkness and Confusi“ on. No Body had its proper Form, and each of “ them was an Incumbrance to another ; Cold combat“ ing with Heat, Moist with Dry ; the hard Bodies en-“ counter’d those that made no resistance, and the “ Heavy and the Light jostled together. God, or “ Nature herself, parted the whole Strife, by separa“ ting the Heavens from the Earth, the Earth from the “ Waters, and the Æther, or purer Air, from the more “ gross. The Chaos being thus disentangled, every “ Body had its own proper Place allotted to it, God e“ stablish’d the Laws of their future Union. Fire, “ which is the lightest of the Elements, possess’d the “ highest Region ; the Air occupy’d a Place beneath
 “ the Fire, corresponding to its Lightness ; the Earth, “ unwieldy as it was, became pois’d and balanc’d, and
 “ the Water sunk down to the lowest Situation.

“ After

“ After this first Distribution, that God, whoever
 “ he was, form’d the Earth into a Globe, and spread “ the Seas over its Surface ; he gave the Winds per“ mission to agitate the Waters, without suffering the “ Waves however to pass the Bounds prescrib’d them.
 “ Then he form’d the Fountains, the Pools, the Lakes “ and Rivers, to water the Earth, confining them with-
 “ in their Banks.-----At his Command the Plains were “ extended, the Trees clothed with Leaves, the Moun“ tains lifted up their heads, and the Valleys sunk down“ ward.”

Ovid, after he has describ’d this orderly Disposition, speaks of the five Zones, two frigid, two temperate,
 and one scorched with Heat, which is the torrid Zone.
 He also takes notice of the Winds, and marks out the Places whence they blow. Then, having mention’d the Aerial Regions, where Hail, Thunder and Lightnings are form’d, he thus goes on :

“ So soon as the various Bodies of the Universe were “ confin’d within their respective Bounds, the Constel“ lations, till then shut up in the shapeless Mass of “ Chaos, began to shine. And, in fine, that every Re“ gion might be stored with animated Beings, the Stars,
 “ these Images of the Gods, were set in the Heavens ;
 “ the Fishes inhabited the Waters ; the four-footed “ Beasts got the Earth to dwell in, and the Air be“ came the Mansion of the Gods.

“ There was yet wanting in the World a Being of “ greater Perfection, one who might be endued with a “ more exalted Soul, and so qualify’d to maintain Do“ minion over the rest. Man was form’d : Whether “ the Author of Nature made him of that Divine “ Seed which is proper for him, or of that Celestial “ Principle, which the new-made Earth, but just dis-“ join’d from Heaven, still contain’d in its Bosom.
 “ Prometheus having mix’d some of that Earth with “ Water, moulded it into a Man after the Likeness of “ the Gods ; and whereas all the other Animals have “ their Heads groveling downwards, Man alone lifts
 “ his towards Heaven, and looks up to the Stars.

“ Thus a Bit of Earth, which was nothing at first but “ a shapeless Mass, became the Figure of a Being till “ then unknown in Nature.”

Reflections upon the different Theogonies of the Greeks.

SUCH are the different Cosmogonies and Theogonies of the Greeks, upon which I shall make the following Remarks.

As for the System of Orpheus, we are not able to judge from the little we know of it, what part he allow'd the Deity in the Formation of the World ; and if we have not sufficient Ground to believe his Sentiments to have been the same with those of the more enlighten'd Poets and Philosophers who came long after him, such as the Pythagoreans and Platonicks, as little have we reason to confound his Opinion with that of Sanhoniathon, far less with the System of Diodorus Siculus, who makes Men at first to have been propagated much after what the Egyptians falsely believe to be the manner of producing Insects after the Overflowings of the Nile.

Each of these Systems supposes, that Love united the different Principles the Chaos was made up of, and that all Beings sprung from this Union : But what else is this Love, but the natural Union of Homogeneous Bodies ? And tho' the Authors of these extravagant Opinions have made a Person of it, we plainly see it is only a figurative one that never existed out of their own Imagination. The Creation is a Mystery beyond the reach of Human Reason. The Generality of the Philosophers, who could never comprehend how Something could be made of Nothing, had adopted that Axiom, Ex nihilo nihil, et in nihilum nil posse reverti. Thus seeing the admirable Structure of the Universe, which they ascrib'd either to a Being superiour to Nature, or most frequently to Nature herself, they always supposed a pre-existent Matter, but lying in confusion, and without form, till it was disentangled ; and not knowing on whom to confer the Glory of having settled the Order that now reigns in the World, they contrived
 their

128 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book II.
their Love, which is nothing but the Union that results from the mere Motion of Bodies.

Ovid, who was not born till eight hundred Years after Hesiod, or thereabouts, ushers in, like him, his grand Work the Metamorphoses with a Chaos; but he imitates him in nothing else: For as to the Manner of unfolding this Chaos, he differs entirely from the Greek Poet. I don't find he makes Love have any concern in the Operation; but as an Agent was wanting, he is at a loss whom to pitch upon, and his Suspence appears in this Verse (1), Hanc Deus & melior litem Natura diremit.

And again (2),

Sic ubi dispositam, quisquis fuit ille Deorum, Congeriem secuit, &c.

Here then is the Chaos and the Erebus so much sung by the Poets, the first Notion of which seems to be taken from Sanchoiathon, who had himself no doubt borrow'd it either from these Words of Moses (3), Terra autem erat inanis et vacua, & Tenebræ erant super faciem Abissi; or rather from the Traditions dispersed through the Country where this Phenician Author had lived, and that were of greater Antiquity than the Writings of the sacred Jewish Legislator.

I am far from being able to find, with some learned Men, a great Conformity between this Tradition of the Creation of the World, and what Sanchoiathon, Hesiod and Ovid have wrote about it; but I am not so far prepossess'd, as not to believe they have form'd the Idea of their Chaos upon it. As to the rest, nothing can be more different. They are lively Genius's, who, from a single Hint, gave full scope to their Imagination, which no sooner abandon'd the guidance of Reason, than it lost itself in the unbounded Region of Fictions. But a short Comparison of the Beginning of Genesis with Hesiod's Theogony will shew the Reader wherein they either correspond or differ.

I say nothing of the Creation; it is what neither Hesiod nor any profane Author knew any thing of. Moses

(1) Met. L. 1. v. 21. (2) ib. v. 32. (3) Gen. c. 1. v. 2.

ses begins with telling us, that the Earth was void, and Darknefs was spread over the Face of the Abyss. Hesiod says, the Chaos was before all things; then the spacious Earth, the Mansion of the Immortal Beings, and Tartarus far remote from thence. Moses adds, And the Spirit moved upon the Waters; & Spiritus ferebatur super aquas. Hesiod, on the contrary, immediately after what I have taken out of him, speaks of Love, the most beauteous and amiable of the Immortals, who expels and drives away Cares from the Heart of Gods and Men. The next thing Moses tells us is, that God said, Fiat lux, & lux facta est; Let there be Light, and there was Light: Words which a profane Author (1) thinks so sublime. Hesiod says likewise, that from the Night sprung the Æther and the Day. The Jewish Legislator goes on to tell us, that God made the Firmament, & fecit Deus firmamentum; and that he divided the Waters that were above the Firmament from those that were under it. To which he immediately subjoins, that God commanded the Waters that were under the Heaven to be gathered together into one Place, and that he called this Collection of Waters the Sea, and that part of the Earth which by this means became dry was called Dry-land, & vocavit Deus aridam terram, congregationesque aquarum appellavit maria. The Author of the Theogony corresponds with him in this too pretty much: The Earth, says he, at first brought forth Heaven with the Stars, and by her Union with Heaven she had the Ocean. But in what follows the profane Author loses himself; and let one be ever so prejudiced in his favour, yet I hardly think it possible to trace any Resemblance between him and Moses.

Ovid displays the Formation of the World in another manner, and his Description bears no similitude to that of Hesiod, as has been observ'd. But there is one thing worth our remarking, namely, that he considers Man as the last Production of the Author of Nature; in which he comes nearer to Moses than any other Pagan Author. Another great Stroke of Resemblance is where

K

(1) Longinus.

where he says, Man was formed of Clay mix'd with Water; but who that Prometheus was, whom he makes the Author of so fine a Work, is not easy to conjecture. The Poet who thus far ascribes the Disposition of the Universe either to God or Nature, when he comes to the Formation of Man, makes a Prometheus appear, of whom he had not said one word before (a). Hesiod indeed mentions Prometheus, but he does not honour him as Ovid has done with the forming of Man. Besides, that Breath of Life, with which the Poets say Minerva animated Prometheus's Work, is plainly copied from the Words of Moses, who says, that God having form'd Man of the Clay, breath'd into him a Breath of Life (1), Inspiravit in faciem ejus spiraculum vite.

C H A P. VII.

The Theogony of the Chinese and Indians.

TH E Chinese began to improve Letters from the earliest times of their Monarchy, at least from the Reigns of Yao and Chum, who lived upwards of two thousand two hundred Years before Jesus Christ. 'Tis a common Opinion, and universally received by those who have gone farthest in investigating the Origin of a People of such unquestionable Antiquity, that the Sons of Noah were dispersed over the eastern parts of Asia, and that there were some of them who penetrated into China, a few ages after the Deluge, and there laid the first Foundations of the oldest Monarchy we know in the World. 'Tis a thing not to be denied, that these first Founders, instructed from a Tradition not very remote from its Source, in the Greatness and Power of the first Being, taught their Posterity to honour this sovereign Lord of the Universe, and to live agreeably to the Principles of that Law of Nature he had engraved on their Hearts. Their classical Books, some of them written even in the time of the two Emperors just named, leave no room to doubt of it. There are five

(a) For this Prometheus, we refer to what is to be said on the History of Jupiter, Vol. 2. (1) Gen. ii. ver. 7.

five of these Books among them, they call the Kink, for which they have an extreme Veneration. Tho' these Books contain only the fundamental Laws of the State, and don't directly meddle with Religion, their Author's Intention having been to secure the Peace and Tranquillity of the Empire; yet they are very proper to inform us what was the Religion of that ancient People, since we are told in every Page, that in order to compass that Peace and Tranquillity, two things were necessary to be observed, the Duties of Religion, and the Rules of a good Government. It appears thro' the whole, that the first Object of their Worship was one Being, the supreme Lord and Sovereign Principle of all things, whom they honoured under the name of Changti, that is, Supreme Emperor, or Tien, which in their Language is of the same import. Tien, say the Interpreters of these Books, is the Spirit who presides over Heaven. 'Tis true, the same Word often signifies among the Chinese, the material Heavens, and now since Atheism has been for some ages introduced among their Literati, it is restricted to that Sense; but in their ancient Books they understood by it, the Lord of Heaven, the Sovereign of the World. In them there is mention, upon all occasions, of the Providence of Tien, of the Chaſtisements he inflicts upon the bad Emperors, and of the Rewards he dispenses to the good. They likewise represent him as one, who is flexible to Vows and Prayers, appeased by Sacrifices, and who diverts Calamities that threaten the Empire, with a thousand other things which can agree to none but an intelligent Being. To convince us of this, we need but read the Extracts which Father Halde has taken from these ancient Books, in the second Volume of his large History of China, and what he farther says in the beginning of the third.

The fear of being tedious, and of wandering from my purpose, may justify me in not copying him; but one can't forbear concluding with him, after the long Detail he makes, that it appears from the Doctrine of the standard Chinese Books, that from the Foundation of the Empire by Fo-hi, and for a long tract of Ages, the Supreme Being, known among them under the Name of Changti, or of Tien, was the Object of publick Worship, and that they looked upon him to be the Soul, as it were, and the Primum Mobile of their National Government; that this first of Beings was feared, honoured, and revered; and that not only the Emperors. who at all times have been the Leaders and Priests of their Religion, but the Grandees of the Empire, and the Vulgar, knew they had a Lord and Judge above them, who knows how to reward those who obey him, and to punish Offenders.

It is certain, that if in these ancient Books. Proofs are to be found of the Knowledge the Chinese had of the supreme Being, and of the religious Worship they have paid him for a long series of Ages, it is no less certain that no footsteps are there to be seen of an idolatrous Worship. But this will appear less surprizing when we consider, 1. That Idolatry spread it self thro' the World but slowly, and step by step; and that having probably taken its rise in Assyria, as Eusebius alleges, where there was not even the appearance of an Idol till long after Belus, or according to others in Phenicia, or in Egypt, it could not have made its way so soon into China, a Nation that has ever been sequestered from others, and separated by the great Indies from the Center of Idolatry.

2. That there was always in China a supreme Court (1), to take care of the Affairs of Religion, which with the utmost exactness kept a watchful eye over their principal Object. Thus it was no easy matter to introduce new Laws and new Ceremonies among a People so much attached to their ancient Traditions. Besides, as the Chinese have always been accustomed to write their History with great care, and have Historians contemporary with all the Facts they relate, they would never have failed to take notice of what Innovations had happen'd in Religion, as they have done at great length, when the Idol Fo and his Worship were introduced.

Such

(1) The Court of Rites.

Such was the established Religion of China, in the first Ages of their Empire: I call it established Religion, because the Vulgar continued to acknowledge subaltern Spirits who watched over the Towns and Fields, and to them they used to pay a superstitious Worship, to pray to them for Health, Success in their Affairs, and plentiful Harvests. There were intermixed with this Worship several superstitious Usages, that had something of the nature of Magick, to which that People has always been strongly addicted: But this was not the Religion of the State, and the Usages of that kind have always been condemned by the Court of Rites, tho' frequently some of the Mandarins, of whom it was compos'd, were themselves tinctured with them.

Thus, to speak accurately, the Chinese have not what we call a Theogony or Cosmogony. Their Philosophers solely attach'd to Morality, Politicks, and History, have always neglected Natural Philosophy; and we don't find in their Writings, those I mean of the Ancients, the Systems so well known in Europe, in Egypt, and in some Parts of Asia, about the Formation of the World, and the Bodies it is made up of, or about the Gods, of whom we have so many Genealogies (a). I said their ancient Philosophers, because the modern ones, who attempted to give some kind of Cosmogony, have fallen into an Atheism resembling that of Strato and Spinoza.

We can as little find that they spoke clearly about the Soul, of which they don't appear to have had a distinct Idea. However, we can be in no doubt of their believing the Soul's Subsistence after Death, not only from the Stories of Apparitions, which are to be found in the Books of Confucius himself, the wisest and most knowing of their Philosophers, but from the Opinion of the Metempsychosis, which they have received many Ages ago.

However, as Man deprived of Revelation, and left to the byas of his own Heart, has always been a Prey

K 3

to

(a) You may read Father Halde's Abstracts of these ancient Books, especially of the Kink, which are of the greatest Antiquity, in the 2d Vol. of his History of China.

to Error, I am far from believing the Chinese have been exempted from it ; and we have a favourable enough Opinion of them, when we think they were perhaps somewhat later than other Nations in giving themselves up to practise Idolatry. Let us consider them, if you will, as the Philosophers the Apostle speaks of, who by the Light of Nature rose to the Knowledge of the Supreme Being ; are not these as guilty as those of having known him, without having glorify'd him ? At length the Sect of the Taoise appeared in China, near six hundred Years before Jesus Christ. Lao-Kiun is the Philosopher by whom it was founded. The Birth of this Man, if we may believe his Disciples, was one of the most extraordinary : Carried four and twenty Years in the Loins of his Mother, he opened himself a Passage thro' the left Side, and occasioned the Death of her who had conceived him.

The Morals of this Philosopher come very near to those of Epicurus, and he wrapped up his Physicks in impenetrable Obscurity : I take no more of them than what regards the Cosmogony. “ Tao, said he, or Reason, produced One, One produced Two, Two produced Three, and Three produced all things.” The whole Happiness of Man, according to this Philosopher, consisted in that state of Mind which the Greeks called Apathy, a state wherein Man divested of Fear, and all tormenting Passions, must be free from Disquietude of every kind ; and as it is exceeding hard for one to get rid of the uneasy Apprehensions of Death and Futurity, they who made profession of this Sect, were addicted to Magick and Chymistry, to find out the Secret whereby to become immortal ; presuming they should be able to find it at length by the assistance of the Spirits whom they invoked. There were some of them who flatter'd themselves with that Discovery, by means of certain Potions they made up ; and more than one Emperor has try'd the fruitless Experiment.

One, who is acquainted with the Temper of Mankind, can easily judge, that a Sect which raised such flattering Hopes, would very soon make Profelytes ; accordingly it it was embraced by several of the Mandarins, who gave their minds entirely to the Magick Art, which it prescribed. But it made yet greater advances among the Women, naturally curious, and extremely fond of Life. In fine, the Author of the Sect was himself rank'd among the Gods; a stately Temple was erected to him, and the Emperor Hium Tsong caused the Statue of this new God to be brought into his Palace. His Disciples got the name of Heavenly Teachers, and his Descendants are still honoured with the Dignity of Mandarins. These are they who have introduced that vast multitude of Spirits subordinate to the Supreme Being, whom they honour in Temples, and in particular Chappels, and to whom they sacrifice three sorts of Victims, a Hog, a Fish, and a piece of a Fowl. They have even carried Superstition the length of deifying several of their Emperors; whereby we see that the Chinese, a People otherwise very ingenious, are nothing short in point of Superstition and Idolatry, of the other Nations whom they have always taken a pride to contemn. This Sect has filled China with Diviners and Impostors, who impose upon the Vulgar, and sometimes upon the Great, by delusive Arts and Magick Rites, wherewith they are but too apt to be infatuated.

In fine, about the sixty-fifth Year after Jesus Christ, the Emperor Mingti, thro' a vain Curiosity, was the means of introducing a Sect still more dangerous; the History of it, which I am to give in a few Words, will take up the second part of this Chapter, upon the Theogony of the Indians.

This Emperor, struck with some Words which Confucius had often repeated, namely, that it was in the West they would find the Holy One, sent Ambassadors into the Indies in quest of him, and to learn the Law he taught. These Envoys believed they had at last found him out, among the Worshipers of an Idol named Fo or Foé. They transported into China the Idol, and together with the Fables of which the Indian Books were full, their Superstitions, Metempsychosis, and in fine, Atheism. They reported that in this part of In- dia which the Chinese call Chun-tien-cho, Moyé the King's Wife dream'd that she was swallowing an Elephant. When the time came that she was to be delivered, the Child tore her right Side, and no sooner had he come from the Womb of his Mother, than he stood up, made six steps, pointing with one hand to Heaven, and with the other to the Earth, and pronounced these Words: There is none but I in Heaven or upon Earth who deserves to be honoured: They gave him the Name of Che-Kia, or Cha-Ka. At the age of 19 Years he forsook his Wives, his Sons, and all his terrestrial Cares, retired into a solitary Life, and put himself under the Conduct of four Philosophers. At thirty Years he had a plenteous Infusion of the Divinity, and became Fo, or Pagode, as the Indians express themselves, and thought of nothing but propagating his Doctrine every where. His lying Miracles were surprizing to all, and procur'd him the Veneration of the whole Country, and a prodigious number of Disciples, who were his Instruments in infecting the East with his impious Tenets. The Chinese call these Disciples Ho-Chang; the Tartars, Lamas; the Siamese, Talapoins; and the Japonesse, Bonzes; for this Sect is diffused among all these People now mentioned.

In the mean time, Fo arriv'd at the age of 79 Years, conven'd some of his Disciples, and after having explain'd to them his Doctrine, died; and they vented a hundred Fables about this Death. As the Metempsychosis was the principal Article of this Doctrine, they gave it out that their Master was born eight thousand times, and that he had appeared in the World sometimes under the figure of an Ape, sometimes under that of a Dragon, then of an Elephant, &c. All this probably was to establish the Worship of this pretended Divinity, under the Symbol of these different Animals, which actually became Objects of the Indian Worship.

The Chinese having received this Idol, erected to him a world of Temples; and his Sect, tho' always outlaw'd by the Court of Rites, has made immense progress in the Country, under the direction of the Bonzes,
the

the most despicable of all Mortals, the most superstitious, and the most ignorant.

In fine, to abridge what is to be found at very great length, in the beginning of Father Du Halde's third Volume of the History of China, the Doctrine of Fo is divided into external and internal. The first, full as it is of gross Superstitions, is taught by the greater number of the Bonzes. The second is reserv'd for the more Learned, and it consists in saying, that Vacuity is the Principle and the End of all things; that from nothing our first Parents derived their Original, and to nothing they returned after their Death; that Vacuity is what constitutes our Being and our Substance, and that it is from this Nothing, and from the mixture of the Elements, that all Productions came, and thither they afterwards return: In fine, that all Beings only differ from one another by their Figures and Qualities; and in this manner they pretend, their Master, when dying, explain'd his Doctrine, that is to say, his Atheism, to his favourite Disciples.

I shall say but little of the Theogonies of the other Nations; because they seem hardly digested into a System. For example, the Brachmans in the East-Indies have a Tradition of their God Vichnou, metamorphosed into a Tortoise; and by way of explication they tell us, that by the fall of a Mountain the World began to stagger, and to sink down gradually towards the Abyss, where it had perished, if their beneficent God had not transformed himself into a Tortoise to bear it up.

The Chinese, of whom we were now speaking, have adopted this Tradition, and they apply it, as Father Kircher remarks (1), to their flying Dragon, who, they say, sprung from a Tortoise, and became the Prop of the Universe that rests upon him. The Troglodytes had probably the same Fable among them, since they had a high Veneration for the Tortoise, and had an Abhorrence of their Neighbours the Helinophagi, so called, because they fed upon the Flesh of the Tortoise.

(1) China Illust. p. 187.

C H A P. VIII.

Theogony of the Indian Brachmans.

I Ought not to forget the Theogony of those Indian Priests we call Bramins, or Brachmans (a). They got this Name from Brahma, who, according to the Indian Doctrine, is the first of the three Beings whom God created, and by whose means he afterwards formed the World. This Brahma, say their Brachmans, composed and left to the Indians the four Books which they call Beth, or Bed (1), in which all the Sciences and all the Ceremonies of Religion are comprized; and that is the reason why the Indians represent this God with four Heads.

The word Brahma, in the Indian Language, signifies, He who penetrates into all things. The Brachmans make up the first and the most respected Tribe of the Indians, and are solely set apart for the Worship of their God, and the Ceremonies of Religion. A famous Brachman, named Bebergir, communicated to the Mahometans, whose Religion he embraced, the Amberthkend, which contains the Doctrines of the Indians.

Father Kircher, who has given a Print of the God Brahma, has enlarged a good deal upon the Mythology of the Indians, in relation to him (2). The Gods of the Brachmans, says this learned Jesuit, are Brahma, Vesne or Vichnou, and Butzen, and they are the Chiefs of all the other Gods, whose number amounts to thirty-three Millions; but all Mankind are sprung from Brahma, and this God has produced as many Worlds as there are Parts in his Body. The first of these Worlds, which is above the Heavens, sprung from his Brain; the second, from his Eyes; the third, from his Mouth; the fourth, from the left Ear; the fifth, from the Palate and from the Tongue; the sixth, from the Heart; the

(a) They are the same with those whom the Greeks called Gymnosophists. Pythagoras studied their Doctrine and Manners. They were the Babylonian and Assyrian Philosophers, who went naked in the Woods, abstaining from all the Pleasures of human Life.

(1) See Hebr. Bibl. Or. p. 212. (2) China Illust.

the seventh, from the Belly ; the eighth, from the parts which Modesty forbids to name ; the ninth, from the left Thigh ; the tenth, from the Knees ; the eleventh, from the Heel ; the twelfth, from the Toes of the right Foot ; the thirteenth, from the Sole of the left Foot ; and lastly, the fourteenth, from the Air which encompassed him at the time of these Productions. If the Brachmans be ask'd the reasons of a Theology so ridiculous, they answer, that the different Qualities of Men gave rise to it. The Wise and Learned are meant by the World sprung from Brahma's Brain ; the Gluttons come from his Belly ; and so of the rest. Hence these Priests are so curious in observing Physiognomy and personal Qualities, pretending thereby to divine, to what World every one belongs.

When once Men are delivered up to Superstition, there is no Opinion so wild but they may fall into it. These same Brachmans have imagined seven Seas: One of Water, one of Milk, one of Curds, a fourth of Butter, a fifth of Salt, a sixth of Sugar, and in fine, a seventh of Wine ; and each of these Seas has its particular Paradises, some of them for the Wiser and more Refin'd, and the rest for the Sensual and Voluptuous ; with this difference, that the first of these Paradises, which unites us intimately with the Divinity, has no need of any other sort of Delights ; whereas the rest are stored with all imaginable Pleasures.

It appears, from what I have been now saying, that the Indians follow the ancient Doctrine of the Egyptians, which the Author just quoted names Θεομορφωσις, or divine Transformation (1).

As for the other wild Notions of the Indians about the Formation of the World, which they believe to be a Work spun by a Spider, and which shall be destroyed when the Work returns into the Bowels of that Insect ; I here wave these, because they regard the Cosmogony, rather than the Theogony, which was chiefly intended in this Chapter.

C H A P. IX.

Theogony of the Americans.

WE are not to imagine that the Savages of America, a wandering and unsettled Race, ever apply'd themselves to form a System of Religion. There are however, Traditions to be found among some of them, which may form a kind of Theogony. In this manner, according to Father Laffiteau (1), the Iroquois, one of the most considerable of these savage Nations, account for the Origin of the World. In the beginning, say they, there were six Men, (the People of Peru and of Brazil agree upon the same number;) as yet there being no Earth, these Men were carried in the Air at the mercy of the Winds. Having no Women, they foresaw that their Species would soon come to an end; but having got notice there was one in heaven, they resolved that one of them, named the Wolf, should transport himself thither. The Enterprize was difficult and dangerous; but the Birds wafted him up thither upon their Wings. Being arrived there, he waited till this Woman came out, as her way was, to draw water. So soon as she appeared, he offered her some Present, and seduced her. The Lord of Heaven, knowing what had happen'd, banished the Woman, and a Tortoise received her upon its Back. The Otter and the Fishes drawing up Mud from the bottom of the Water, formed of the Body of the Tortoise a small Island, which grew greater and greater by degrees; and such, according to these Savages, is the Original of our Earth.

This Woman at first had two Sons, of whom the one, who was arm'd with offensive Weapons, slew his Brother who had none. She was afterwards deliver'd of several Children; from whom the rest of Mankind are sprung.

This Tradition, if it be exactly reported, is undoubtedly a Remnant of the primitive History of the World,

(1) Mœurs des Sauvages, Tom. 1. p. 43 of the Edition in 4to.

World, of Eve banish'd from the terrestrial Paradise, and of the murder of Abel by Cain. For in short, it is possible that these Savages, descended from the same Stock with the rest of Mankind, may have preserved a Tradition, which they might well alter, tho' they could not totally erase out of their Memory.

Altho' we had no knowledge of the Traditions of the other American Nations, it is highly probable that their Notions were mostly the same with those of the Iroquois, since the People of Peru and Brasil in South-America, agree with them as to the number of Men there were at the beginning, as we have said. But 'tis not only by their Theogony that the Americans have equal'd the Greeks and other Nations of our Continent, in the whimsical System they invented concerning their Original; they resemble them too pretty often in their Fables. Thus, for instance, their way of accounting for the Production of Rain, was, that a young Girl was in the Clouds, sporting with her little Brother, and he broke her Pitcher full of Water. Is there not here a great Similitude to those Fountain-Nymphs, and River-Gods, who poured forth Water from their Urns? They too were persuaded, like the Greeks, that there were Gods who inhabited the Rivers and other Collections of Water, since at one of their Festivals, the People of Mexico had a solemn Practice of drowning a young Boy, to be Company for these Gods. According to the Traditions of Peru, the Inca Manco-Guina-Capac, Son of the Sun, found a way by his Eloquence to make the Inhabitants of the Country quit their Retirements in the Woods, where they lived after the manner of the Beasts, and brought them to live under reasonable Laws. Just so did Orpheus with the Greeks, and he too passed for the Son of the Sun. It is remarkable that both these People, so remote the one from the other, should have agreed to fancy that such as had extraordinary Accomplishments were the Offspring of the Sun. If the Greeks, and, in imitation of them, our ancient Gauls, had a religious Veneration for Trees, and believed them to be the Abode of Dryads and Hama- dryads,

dryads, the Abenauis, as Father Lafficaux reports (a), had a famous Tree, whereof they told several Wonders, and it was always loaded with Offerings ; nor did they doubt of its having something divine. We find they had likewise among them, consecrated Groves, much like all the rest of the Idolatrous World.

As for what relates to Sorceries, Conjurations, Diviners, Enchantments, these People of the new World resemble but too much those of the old. Their Belief was every where the same about the benevolent and malignant Genii, of whom the Universe was imagin'd to be full ; over whom presided, as Lord and Sovereign of the other Gods, the Manitou of the Algonquins Nations, the Chemien of the Caraibes, the Okki or the Ares-Koui of the Hurons. As for the Festivals and Mysteries, we shall find by reading the Author I just now quoted, that those of the Americans had a great affinity with the Orgies of the Greeks. As to the Immortality of the Soul, and its state after Death, the Savages thought much the same way as did the Greeks, even at the time when they were most civiliz'd. Did not the Americans believe that the Souls of the Wicked were condemned to dwell in certain Lakes, miry and loathsome, as the Greeks sent them to wander along the Banks of Styx and Acheron ? Was it not likewise their Opinion that the Souls of those, who had led a regular Life, had places of delightful Abode, which bore a considerable Resemblance to the Elysian Fields ? They have, like the old Romans, their Women hired to mourn at Funerals, and like them celebrate Feasts for the Dead ; and what is still more surprizing, they distinguish, like the Greeks, between the Soul and its Shade, or Phantom (1), and believe that while the Soul is in a happy Mansion, the Shade is hovering about the place of Interment.

The sacred Fire, preserved by almost every Nation of the World, as I shall shew in the Article of

(a) Mœurs des Sauvages, tom. 1. p. 149. As most of the Examples I make use of are taken from that Work, it may suffice to have cited it once for all. (1) See what is said upon this Head in the third Section of the sixth Book.

of Vesta, was also the Object of the superstitious Worship of the Americans. The Nations most adjoining to Asia, have Temples, where the sacred Fire is carefully preserved; and these Temples are mostly built in a round Form, as were those of Vesta. In Louisiana, the Natches have one of them, where a Guard watches continually for the preservation of the Fire, which is never suffered to go out. Every body knows how famous those Temples were under the Reign of the Incas; but what appear'd very surprizing, was those Companies of Virgins set apart for the Service of the Sun, whose Laws were even more severe than those of the Roman Vestals(1), and the Punishments, when they broke their Vows, precisely the same, since they were buried alive. They who had debauch'd them were punished with far more Rigour than at Rome, since the Punishment extended not only to the whole Family, but even to the Place where they were born; its whole Inhabitants were utterly extirpated, nor did they leave so much as one Stone in it upon another. The sacred Fire was equally revered in Mexico, and committed to the Care of Vestals, who led a very regular Life; and if the Savages of this vast Continent had not all of them Temples to maintain it there, the Halls of their Counsel, made much after the fashion of the Prytanea of the Greeks, were employ'd for this Use, chiefly among the Iroquois and the Hurons.

The Idols, often monstrous, as in our own Continent, either charg'd with Symbols like those we call Pantheas (a), or sometimes even resembling those of Priapus, prove, that the People I am speaking of were nothing short of the old Inhabitants of our Country, in the extravagance of their Idolatry and Fables.. Would it have been consistent with the Corruption of the human Heart, not to place upon the Altars every thing that sooth'd Vice and Irregularity of Manners?

The Custom of sacrificing upon high Places, a Custom so ancient, and whereof the Prophets so often accuse

(1) Garcilasso, L. c. 1.

(a) See Montfaucon's Antiquity, Vol. I. Part 2. B. 4. Ch. 8.

cuse the idolatrous Nations, was likewise known among the Americans. To be convinc'd of this, we need only read the Relation of the Sieur Rochefort (1), in the place where he speaks of the Mountain Olaïmi, upon which the Apalachites, a People of Florida, offer Sacrifices yearly to the Sun, in a Cavern which serves for a Temple to this Divinity. Their veneration for Idols, which are nothing but either mis-shapen Stones, or sometimes of a conical figure, is a farther proof, that their Idolatry resembled that of the Ancients, who, before the Art of Sculpture, paid Honours to such like Stones, or simple Pillars, as we shall see elsewhere.

The Sacrifices of these Savages were at first very simple, as they were among the primitive Idolaters of our World; and this Simplicity still remains among some of their Nations, where they content themselves with offering up to the Gods the Fruits of the Earth, or with making Libations to them of Water; others hang up on Trees or Pillars, the Skins of the Beasts they have slain in Hunting: There are of them who throw into the Fire some Leaves of Tobacco in honour to the Sun, and into the Rivers and Streams to appease the Genii that preside over them. Those of the Caribbee Islands offer up the Cassave and the Ouicou, that is, their Bread and their Drink, to the Gods who are the Guardians of these Plants, as the Greeks and the other Nations offered their Sacrifices to Bacchus and Ceres. What tho' the Names of those Gods are not the same in either Continent, the Ideas are still the same, and it is precisely the same kind of Idolatry.

But in America, as amongst ourselves, these ancient Manners not having always subsisted in that primitive Simplicity, which is the Characteristick of the first Ages in every Nation of the World; they whom we are speaking of, like the Pagans in our own Continent, carry'd Superstition to their Gods to the length of sacrificing to them human Victims. The Sacrifices of this sort were in use especially in Mexico; and tho' they were less known among the other Savages, yet there were
of

(1) Hist. Mer. des Isles Antilles.

of 'em however, who, at a certain Season of the Year, offer'd their Children to the Gods who watch'd over the Fruits of the Earth. The Relation of the Sieur le Moyne, informs us, that in that part of Florida, which is nigh to Virginia, the People of that Country, who look upon the Sun as the Father of their Chiefs, offer up to that Luminary, their great Divinity, their Children in Sacrifice; as the Canaanites sacrificed them to their Moloch, who was likewise the Sun; only with this difference, that the latter burn'd them in a Furnace which was contrived within their Idol, as I shall shew in speaking of that God, whereas the former knock'd them on the head in the midst of an Assembly of the People, and in presence of the Chief, who himself represented the God who was believ'd to be his Father.

The Sacrifices in the new World, as in the old, were accompany'd with Instruments, with Dances, and with all the marks of publick Rejoicing; but I won't carry this Parallel any farther, which would oblige me to copy the Work which I have cited, where the learned Author descends to a very particular Detail. What I have said is sufficient to shew, that the Mind of Man, left merely to its own Light, is carried out to nothing but Error and Delusion; and that, in spite of the Refinement of the best-regulated Nations, their Sentiments have been pretty much the same all the World over, where they wanted the knowledge of the true Religion.

In fine, there are few Countries, where much the same Fables have not been found: Every where Ideas of things not in Nature, an extraordinary Race of Men, who called themselves the Sons of Heaven, or of the Stars, or of the Rivers, &c. every where Cheats, who wanted to carry on Imposture, by the Story of a singular and extraordinary Birth. The Egyptians, the Phenicians, from whom the Greeks and Romans derived their Fables, are not the only People who have invented them: There are some that bear a Resemblance to theirs, to be found among Nations that can't be suspected of having learn'd 'em from them. Kaisouven boasted, that he was born of a River-God, the more easily to delude the People of Corea by the dazzling Idea of this imaginary Birth. The Coreans must needs have attributed Divinity to the Rivers and Mountains, like the Greeks and Romans, since upon their becoming tributary to China, the Emperor confirmed their King in the Privilege he enjoy'd of sacrificing alone to the Mountains and Rivers.

The Origin of one Nation of the eastern Tartars, named Kao-Kiuli, of the Race of the Fou-Ya, bears a considerable Resemblance, in respect of the Fables with which it is intermix'd, to our Fictions in the western World; and the Roman History, notwithstanding its being so grave and serious, presents us with Notions near a kin to what I am going to relate of these People. The Prince of the Kao-Kiuli had in his Dominions a Daughter of the God Hobang-Ho, whom he kept shut up in a Prison. One day as she was struck with the Reflection of the Sun-beams, she conceiv'd; and she brought forth an Egg, which they broke, and in it they found a Male-Child. When he was grown up, they gave him the Name of Tchu-Mong, which imports a good Pilot. The King of the Country, who took a liking to him, on a day carried him out to hunt, and seeing his Address, became jealous of him; which Tchu-Mong perceiving, fled from him; and being ready to fall into the hands of those who pursued him, at the passage of a River, he address'd his prayer to the Sun his Father: Then the Fishes of the River rising up to the Surface of the Water, supply'd him with a Bridge, on which he cross'd over. What is there in this more extravagant, than in the Fables of Perseus's Birth, and that of Leda's Children (a)?

If we know Nations that sacrificed their Children to their false Deities, and if the Greeks offer'd up Iphigenia to procure a favourable Wind, are we not told by F. Halde of most ancient Histories, where we may read of Islanders in the eastern Sea, who, during the seventh Moon of every Year, use solemnly to drown a young Virgin?

If

(a) See the 4th Vol. of F. Halde's History of China, p. 343.

If the Romans fabled that their Janus had two, nay four Faces, as is to be seen upon ancient Monuments, have not the Indians their Idol Menipus, who has many Heads of different shapes? Does it not pass current among the same Indians, that there is a Country where Men have two Visages, that withal they are extremely wild and untractable, that they speak no Language, and suffer themselves to die for Hunger when they are taken: They add, that they had taken one of them clad in Linen, who rose out of the Sea; a Story not much unlike to that of Oannes, which we have mentioned above.

If the Egyptians, and after them Pythagoras, taught the Metempsychosis, is not the same Doctrine spread over all the Indies, and is it not the Foundation of the Idolatry of Foé? Which is so far true, that the great Lama, who calls himself a living Fo, gives it out, that he has been born several times, and that he shall be born again; insomuch that when he dies, they make diligent Search for the Child whose figure he reassumes, that they may substitute him in his room: And tho' it is easy to see, that this is a Child he has artfully provided to succeed him, the Mystery whereof is well known to the other Lamas his Confidants, yet this Farce has been acted for several Ages, without being in the least suspected by the People.

We remark'd, when we were upon the Origin of the Fables, that Numbers of them had been introduced by means of a gross kind of Philosophy. Perhaps there never was one in Greece of so extraordinary a nature as was that of the Chinese Philosophers, with relation to the Ebbing and Flowing of the Sea. A Princess, said they, had an hundred Children; fifty of them dwelt along the Sea-shore, and the other fifty in the Mountains: Hence came two great Nations, who are often at war together; when the Inhabitants of the Shores get the better of those in the Mountains, and put them to flight, the Sea flows; when they are repuls'd by them, and fly from the Mountains towards the Shores, it ebbs. This manner of Philosophizing,

148 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES . Book II.
says M. Fontenelle, from whom I have borrow'd this Passage, is not unlike the Metamorphoses of Ovid. So true it is, that the same Ignorance has produced the same effects in every Nation.

Such are the Cosmogonies and Theogonies of the most ancient Nations. Others, whose Religion and Fables are consider'd in the Sequel of this Work, tho' sunk in an Abyss of the grossest Idolatry, yet had not a Genius philosophical enough to form any Conceptions about the Formation of the World, or the Origin of the Gods, whom they contented themselves to worship according to the Tradition of their Country.

C H A P. X.

Of the Pagan Theology, and that of the Poets in particular.

HAVING represented the different Theogonies of the Ancients, that is, the Theology peculiar to every Nation; it may be of use to shew more particularly the general Theology of the Pagan World, especially that of the Greeks and of their Poets. My design is not to lay open all its Abominations: This method would now be useless. The primitive Fathers of the Church, and the Defenders of the Christian Religion, as they found themselves necessarily engaged in that Task, in order to sap the Foundations of Paganism, which was the predominant Religion of their times, so they acquitted themselves in it with so much Learning and Strength of Argument, that they at last obliged the most knowing Philosophers, to explain by Allegories, oftentimes ingenious, a System, the bare Representation whereof was shocking. To this Dilemma they were reduced by Justin, Arnobius, Athenagoras, Lactantius, Clemens Alexandrinus, Minutius Felix, but above all by Tertullian in his Apologeticks, one of the most excellent Performances Antiquity has left us, and by S. Augustin in his Book of the City of God, a Work which, abstracting from the other views of the Author, may be consider'd as a Treasure of profane Literature.

To

To speak accurately, the Philosophers did not wait for the time of those great Men I have been naming, to perceive the Absurdity of their Theology. Allegory had been introduced to help out the monstrous Fables that were intermix'd with Religion, upwards of 400 Years before the Christian Æra. Plato had brought it in fashion, and his Disciples improv'd it: Nay Pythagoras, long before Plato's days, had represented the establish'd Religion of his time in such a light, as made its Absurdity partly to disappear. But my meaning was, that this way of allegorizing was never more in vogue than in the time of Jamblichus and Porphry, who lived both of them in the first Ages of Christianity. I shall examine, in the Reflections which I shall make upon Idolatry, the little Success which attended the allegorical manner of explaining the Fables and Mysteries of Religion; and I shall shew, that notwithstanding the Subtilties of the Philosophers who used it, that same Religion, and the Fables upon which it was founded, still continued, even to the entire destruction of Paganism. We now come to the Subject.

Varro distinguished Theology into three Parts, the fabulous, μυθική, the natural, φυσική, and the political, πολιτική, which S. Augustine renders, fabularis, naturalis vel philosophica, civilis: The first was the Theology of the Poets; the second that of the Philosophers; and the third that of the Ministers of Religion. Varro endeavour'd to promote this Distinction, whereof Q. Scævola the High-Priest is thought to have been the Founder, the same who was slain by one of those Assassins employ'd by Marius.

The Theology of the Poets was rejected by the wiser Pagans. Varro, as we have it from S. Augustine (1), acknowledg'd that it imputed to their Gods Actions, which one would have blush'd to ascribe to the vilest of Men: Denique, in hac omnia Diis attribuuntur, quæ non modo in hominem, sed etiam in contemptissimum hominem cadere non possunt. Varro did not condemn the second kind of Theology, that of the Philosophers; but he was of opinion, it ought to be confined to the Schools, because it reason'd with freedom upon the Nature of the Gods, which, according to him, had a dangerous Tendency.

(1) De civ. Dei.

The third kind of Theology made up the System of Religion, and was the Foundation of the Worship paid to the Gods; and if it was not the most esteemed by the abler Judges, it was at least the most venerable, and the only one that was follow'd in practice. The poetical Theology therefore was exploded, as we have seen; but yet it has found Partisans in these last Ages. Several modern Authors, charm'd with the fine Strokes that occur in the Works of the Poets, concerning the most sublime Truths, have spoke of them in such high Strains of Encomium, that it would seem they consider them as most excellent Divines. Father Thomasin, Priest of the Oratory, has been at great pains to collect (1) whatever they have said upon Divinity and upon Morality, and he thinks he has discover'd in them several Passages conformable to Holy Writ, and to the Light of Nature. The Author of the Book, entitled, Homer Hebraizing, has not contented himself with considering the Poets as great Divines; he has undertaken to prove, that Homer, in both his Poems, had in several places copied Moses and the Prophets. A celebrated English Author (2), after he has cry'd up the Theology of the Poets, that of Orpheus especially, recites the finest of their Sentiments upon the Divinity. In fine, a modern Author, whose Works have occasioned his being more than once disgraced, has gone farther than any I have yet named, since in his Remarks upon Virgil, he makes no scruple of preferring that Poet to most of our Divines; alledging that, with respect to Providence and the Deity, his Sentiments are most orthodox. He has even had the presumption to compare the Conduct of Jupiter with relation to Æneas, to that of God with respect to David.

For any thing we can learn from these Authors, almost all the most essential Truths are to be found in the Works of the Poets. Piety, and the Worship of the true

(1) Lect. des Poet.

(2) Cudw. Intel. Syst.

true God, are there taught in a sublime manner, tho' veil'd under sensible Images. Thus, to single out some of these Truths, the Unity of a God, his Omnipotence, his infinite Goodness, his Immensity, his Eternity. The Council of the Gods, which Homer speaks of, where Jupiter always presides, is, according to them, an Imitation of those mysterious Councils, which God, in the Book of Job, holds with the Angels. When they tell us, that all Goods and Evils came from the hand of God, by the ministration of subaltern Deities, this is a Copy of what the Scripture says of the Angels, who are his Ministers. When they give Jupiter such a peculiar Pre-eminence, it is evident, that under this Name they understood the true God, and not Jupiter the Son of Saturn, and King of Crete. In fine, when Aratus says, all is full of God, the Earth, the Sea, the Fields, and Man himself, or, as S. Paul expresses himself, in the precise Words of this Poet, Sumus genus Dei, in ipso vivimus, movemur, & sumus (1), is it not evident, that he must needs be speaking of the Immensity of God?

To these speculative Truths, the Authors I mention join others which are practical; and think the Poets have settled, not only what Duties we owe to God, but those of Men to one another, as well as the other purely moral Precepts. Their infernal Regions, and their Elysian Fields, are proper Restraints from Lust, and Incentives to the practice of Virtue. Those Judges, who examine with so much Severity the Actions of Men; and the Furies, who chastise the Guilty with such rigour; could all this have been contriv'd without a deep Insight into Morality? In fine, to represent the Sentiment of these Authors in a few Words, it suffices to say, that upon all occasions they rack their Invention to draw parallels between the Truths they find in the Poets, and those in the sacred Writings.

I own, for my part, the reading of the Poets has given me a quite other Idea of their Theology. 'Tis true, they sometimes speak of the Divinity in a sublime manner, but they are by no means consistent with themselves upon this Subject; and after they have given their Gods the magnificent Epithets of Immortal, Omnipotent, &c. they represent them with Imperfections, which, as has been said, belong only to the worst and most corrupt of Men. Insomuch that I am astonish'd, how learned Men can so highly extol their Theology, while Plato, for this same Theology, which to him appear'd so monstrous, banish'd them from his Commonwealth. Cicero had not such favourable Thoughts of the Poets as the Authors I am speaking of; on the contrary, he censures them for setting before us the Debaucheries of the Gods, their Quarrels, their Battels, their Dissensions. Nec multo absurdiora sunt ea quæ poetarum vocibus fusa, ipsa suavitate nocuerunt, qui & ira inflammatos, & libidine furentes induxerunt Deos, feceruntque ut eorum bella, pugnas, prælia, vulnera videremus, odia præterea, dissidia, discordias, ortus, interitus, querelas, &c. (1). This Author says elsewhere, that these same Poets had describ'd the Debaucheries of the Gods, their Adulteries, &c.

(1) Acts xvii. 28.

It is true, that they stile those fabulous Gods of theirs Immortal, but at the same time there is not one of 'em or whose Genealogy they have not inform'd us; they name their Fathers, their Mothers, the place of their Birth, and all the Circumstances of their Life from their Infancy. 'Tis from them we learn that Jupiter, the greatest of Gods, was the Son of Saturn, and that Saturn was the Son of Uranus; and so of the rest. Sometimes they speak of their Sepulchres too. In Homæ, the greatest of their Poets, we see the Gods squabbling together, falling foul of one another, wounded by Mortals, pouring forth shrieks and lamentations at seeing their Blood shed: They are every now and then giving gross abusive Language; Jupiter and Juno are there represented eternally at odds, a thing scandalous between Husband and Wife. Euripides, willing to excuse Phædra, who had conceived a violent Passion for the Son of her Husband, throws the blame upon Venus, who wanted to revenge upon Hippolytus the

Con-

(1) De Nat. Deor. l. 1.

Contempt he had thrown upon her Worship and Votaries. Another Tradition which Racine has followed (1), no less dishonourable for Venus, intimated that she was thus taking her revenge upon the Sun, Phædra's great Grand-father, for having discover'd her Intrigue with the God Mars; and it is from the same motive of resentment, that this Goddess had inspired Pasiphaë Phædra's Mother with that infamous Passion which made so much noise.

In the same Play, Euripides brings in Diana; and this Goddess, to comfort Hippolytus in his dying moments, tells him that she could not indeed reverse the order of Destiny, but to give him revenge, she would kill one of Venus's Gallants with her own hand. These then are their powerful Gods, subjected to Fate, and not being able to accomplish all the Mischief they would, perpetrate that which they can. What thoughts can one have of a Theology, whose end being to exalt Man to the Gods, has depress'd these same Gods, I say, not only to the Condition of Men, but even to their greatest Frailties?

Can any thing be conceived more fantastical, than the Idea which the Poets give of their Gods? What shall we say of that mixture of Power and Weakness, of Eternity and Death, of Happiness and Misery, of Tranquillity and Disturbance? What shall we think of the Railleries which Aristophanes throws out against the Gods in some of his Comedies, and of the Blasphemies which Æschylus pours forth against them in his Prometheus?

But, 'tis said, the Poets speak often of the Providence of the Gods, and of the Care they exercise over Men. What Providence! Let us single out one of the Subjects of Fable where it is most conspicuous, a Subject described by the greatest Poets with peculiar Care; I mean the War of Troy. This War destroy'd multitudes of People, and ruin'd a flourishing Kingdom; it was attended with Miseries without number, with Seditions, Broils, and all the other

Com-

(1) Tragedy of Phædra.

Companions of sweeping Desolation. All the Gods took part in it; Heaven was divided into two Factions: There was no Plot, no Stratagem, nor sly Artifice, but every one of the Gods put in practice. To be sure they can't be accused of being idle during the Course of this War; their Providence was sufficiently employ'd. Homer describes all their Motions in the fullest manner; the other Poets have follow'd his Example. Here then is a proper point of view, whence we may clearly discern their theological Sentiments about Providence: Let us see then what was the Motive of this War; let us trace it back to its Source.

Was the chastising an impious Nation the thing in question; was it to avenge oppress'd Innocence, or the Indignities offer'd to the Gods themselves; or to give the World a signal Example of Justice and Equity? Nothing like it; But to glut the Resentment of a Goddess, for the Slight put upon her Beauty, was all the Affair.

At the Marriage of Thetis and Peleus, Discord throws in an Apple for the fairest of the Company. The Gods not daring to make themselves Umpires in the Difference that arises upon this Occasion between three Goddesses, send them to Phrygia, to get the Decision of a young Shepherd who was renown'd for Equity. The Shepherd, whom each of the three Goddesses would fain corrupt by magnificent Promises, decides in favour of Venus; she was actually the greatest Beauty, so that nothing could be said against this Sentence: Yet here was enough to exasperate the other two. Juno, the wife Juno, from that moment resolves upon the destruction, not of Paris only, tho' even that had been a very unjust piece of Revenge, but of the whole Empire of Priam his Father, and of all Phrygia. The Rape of Helen, who had been betrothed to Paris, became the Signal of a bloody War: All Greece rises in Arms, while Juno leaves no Stone unturn'd to engage all the Powers above in her Interest; she makes use of a thousand Stratagems to bring over the other Gods, and gives them the most insinuating Promises; she runs over

over all the Cities of Greece to animate them to the War. The City Troy is besieged, and for a Course of ten Years the Queen of the Gods plays the Game of a Woman quite frantick, and tries to lay her Husband asleep, that he may not see the Overthrow of the Trojans, and so forth. Minerva has the contrivance of the wooden Horse: Juno appears in Arms, and herself throws open the Gates of the City, rousing the Greeks, too cool for her Vengeance:

—————Hic Juno Scæas sævissima portas
Prima tenet, sociumque furens a navibus agmen
Ferro accincta vocat (1).

While Neptune her Ally beats down the Walls with his Trident. The Greeks enter the Town, a thousand Disorders are there committed, which 'tis not necessary to describe: But we must not forget, that Virgil is at great pains to let us see, they are to be attributed to the Wrath and Revenge of the Gods:

-----Verum inclementia divûm
Has evertit opes sternitque a culmine Trojam (2).

Troy then is reduc'd to ashes; Paris, Priam and his other Children massacred or made Slaves: Thus it was full time for the Wrath of Juno to be appeased.

But, with the Poets, a Goddess, whose Beauty has been injured, is not so easily attoned. They represent her pursuing the Remains of the fugitive Trojans with implacable rage; she will needs cut them off from that retreat in Italy, which was promis'd them by the Fates.

Troas reliquias Danaum-----arcebat longè
Latio, &c (3).

Here she meanly supplicates Æolus, a subaltern Divinity, to move him to raise a Storm, contrary to the orders of Neptune, who had changed sides, and whose Providence was then interested for the Trojans. Sometimes she endeavours to detain Æneas in Africk by the Charms of Pleasure: There she makes Iris appear under the figure of Beroë, to oblige the Trojan Matrons to burn their Fleet. No sooner has Æneas arrived in Italy, than she dispatches the Furies to Turnus and Amata,

(1) Æne. L. 2. v. 612.

(2) Ibid. v. 602.

(3) Id. ibid.

mata, to excite them to expel him their Country, and kindles a bloody War; and not being able absolutely to hinder the execution of the orders of Destiny, she strives at least to retard it by all sorts of means. As the decree of Destiny intimated, that Lavinia was to be married to the Trojan Hero, she will needs cause him to pay her Dowry in the Blood of an infinite number of his own Countrymen.

Non dabitur regnis, esto, prohibere Latinis;

At trahere, atque moras tantis licet addere rebus:

At licet amborum populos exscindere regum.

Hac gener atque socer cœant mercede suorum.

Sanguine Trojano & Rutulo dotabere, virgo (1).

Every body knows what this Goddess did to support Turnus's Party, and all the game Virgil makes her play in the course of this War. In fine, finding Destiny too powerful for her, as the last effort of her vengeance, she tries if Jupiter will grant, that the Latins shall not assume the name of the Trojans their Conquerors, that Troy and its memory might the more easily be abolish'd.

Ne vetus indigenas nomen mutare Latinos,

Neu Troas fieri jubeas, Teucrosque vocari.

Occidit, occideritque suas cum nomine Troja (2).

Is it possible to conceive a more compleat Revenge? Was ever Resentment carry'd farther? or was it ever rais'd on a more frivolous foundation?

————— Manet altâ mente repositum

Judicium Paridis, spreteque injuria formæ.

————— Et rapti Ganymedis honores (3).

Cry up after this the Theology of the Poets, as to the Providence of their Gods, and the Care which they take of the most notable Events, These, according to them, are the motives whence they act. Alas! what could they teach more impious? What a fine Pattern of Resentment and Revenge were they able to give, especially to the Ladies, who idolize their Beauty?

Were I at liberty to run over the other Examples, of which the Poets are full, we should see that the spring of

(1) Æne. L. 7. v. 313. (2) Ib. L. 12. v. 823. (3) Ib. L. 1. v. 30.

of all the Actions of the Gods is either Revenge, Love, or some other Passion: That the true motive of Jupiter's Travels up and down the Earth, was nothing else but to debauch some Mistress; that while the reparation of the Disasters done by the Deluge, or by the Conflagration of Phaeton, were made the pretext, Calisto and Europa were the real occasions of his pilgrimages: That if Diana sends a Boar to lay waste the Calydonian Plains, it is owing to Oeneus's having neglected her in a sacrifice;

-----Oeneos spreta per agros

Misit aprum (1).

In fine, that Venus for the same reason turn'd the Daughters of Tyndarus into madness (2). If Niobe's fourteen Children are kill'd before her eyes by invisible darts, it is for her having presumed to compare herself to Latona. If Cadmus sees his House fill'd with Disorder and Blood-shed, Aëteon his Grand-son devoured by his Dogs, Pentheus torn in pieces by the Bacchanals, and himself transform'd to a Serpent, the reason is, that he had a Sister and a Daughter, whose Beauty had charm'd Jupiter, and excited the Jealousy of Juno. Ino for having nursed Bacchus, is turn'd to Madness, with her Husband Athamas; the latter dashes his own Son against a Rock, and this unfortunate Queen of Thebes throws herself headlong into the Sea with Melicertes. If Andromeda sees herself exposed to the Fury of a Sea-monster, it is because her Mother had compared her Beauty to that of the Nereids (3). Venus, to be avenged of Diomedes, who had wounded her at the Siege of Troy, made his Wife become a Prostitute.

However much recourse may be had to Allegory, yet what can we think, when we see Cybele the great Mother of the Gods, Læta Deum partu, centum complexa nepotes, running after the youthful Atys, making so many advances to captivate his Heart, and punishing him so severely for his Indifference?

Such,

(1) Ov. Met. l. 8. v. 281.
Oréf.

(3) Met. l. 4.

(2) Stesich. apud Schol. Eurip. in Such, according to the Poets, are the motives of Revenge in the Gods, and for the most part, it is not upon the Guilty they inflict such dreadful Punishments; or if that is sometimes the case, it is not in order to reclaim them, but to render them more criminal. Clio upbraids Venus for being so excessively fond of Adonis; instead of improving so wholesome an Admonition, the Goddess resents it by wounding her with Love to a young Man, by whom she had Hyacinth. Cyanippus forgets Bacchus in a Sacrifice, he makes him drunk, in consequence of which, he commits an Incest. The Daughters of Prætus prefer their Beauty to that of Juno; the Goddess turns them frantic, and makes them become Prostitutes. One of the Daughters of Danaus having gone to draw Water for a Sacrifice, was attack'd by a Satyr, who offer'd violence to her; she invoc'd Neptune to her assistance; who having rescued her from the Attacks of the Satyr, made the same assault upon her which she had just now declin'd: Miserable Relief!

This now is what the Poets teach us, in relation to the Providence of their Gods, and their cruel Resentments: A Providence, anxious and disturb'd; Resentments dreadful for exceeding slight Provocations: Chastisements, not for the punishment of Vice and the support of Virtue, which would be good Divinity; but inflicted intentionally, to avenge some personal Affront; not upon the Guilty, but upon the Innocent; or if the Guilty too are involved therein, 'tis only to make them more wicked and abandoned. You won't see those Gods forward to chastise Impiety or Injustice; they vent their spight upon none but those who forget them in Sacrifice, or who compare their Hair or Complexion to that of some Goddess: Like those petty Lords, who have very little concern that their Vassals be profligate and licentious, so they do but forbear hunting upon their Grounds, and give presents from time to time to their Wives. Was any thing more apt to excite Ambition and the most unjust Designs, than the History of Saturn, who had used his Father ther Uranus so ill, and that of Jupiter who had treated his in like manner, and dethron'd him?

This would be the proper Place to explain the Theology of the Poets, with respect to the Morals of their Gods; but I should be afraid of putting the Reader to the blush, by reciting their infamous Characters. What sort of God is that Jupiter of theirs! No Chastity on earth was proof against his Assaults; no beastly Figure he had not assum'd to insnare sometimes virtuous Princesses, sometimes innocent Shepherdesses. All the other Gods were stain'd with the like Crimes. Arnobius, Lactantius, and the other Fathers, bring a thousand Stories of those Gods, from the Writings of the Poets, which are shocking to Modesty (a). No Crime, Disorder, or Lewdness they were not guilty of; and the Poets, those pretended sublime Divines, are they who have been at most pains to perpetuate their Memory. Homer, and after him Ovid, tell us how the Sun surprized Mars and Venus in Adultery; the last subjoins very loose Reflections. In a word, all the Metamorphoses he speaks of, are rather Monuments of the Imperfection of the Gods, and of their Debaucheries, than of their Providence and Power. These Considerations should be a seasonable Warning to every reasonable Person to be upon his guard against that Value, which so many People have for the Divinity of the Poets; and shew those who want to defend them, that, excepting a few vague Expressions that have dropped from them about the immortal Essence of their Gods, their Vigilance, that universal Spirit which animates all things, a strain to which they by no means keep up in the rest of their Works, their whole System consists in representing to us Gods inconstant and self-interested in their Providence, turbulent and outrageous in their Resentment, debauched and infamous in their moral Character.

After all these Preliminaries, which I thought proper to handle at some length, 'tis time to enter upon the History of Idolatry, the Origin and Progress whereof, I am now to examine.

BOOK

(a) They made this use of them, to confound the Partisans of Idolatry.

B O O K III.

Which treats of Idolatry.

A Preliminary Remark.

THO', properly speaking, this whole Mythology, at least what makes up the first Volumes, respects Idolatry, since therein we speak of nothing but the Gods and their Worship; yet I thought proper in this Book, to trace its Origin and Progress; to examine what the first Gods of the Pagan World were; to name the most of them, to divide them into different Classes, and speak of their Nature and the Ranks they held in the Theology of the several Nations by whom they were worshipped; for they were far from being all upon a level, and from having Functions ascribed to them of equal dignity. In fine, to comprehend in it whatever relates to Idolatry in general, Temples, Altars, Victims, Sacrifices, Festivals, Supplications, Priests, Instruments of Sacrifice, Vows, Oracles, &c. reserving the particular History of the Gods, and of the Worship paid them, for the following Books.

Before we enter upon the Subject, it is necessary to give the true Notion of the words Idolatry and Idols. Idolatry is a Greek Word, compounded of two others, signifying Worship and Representation, whether by way of Statue, or any other manner. The term εἰδωλον, as Tertullian has well observ'd (1), is a Diminutive from εἶδος, which imports Image: Ad hoc necessaria est vocabuli interpretatio, εἶδος Græce formam sonat; ab eo per diminutionem εἰδωλον deductum, atque apud nos formulam

(1) Lib. de Idol. c. 3.

mulam fecit ; igitur omnis formula, vel forma, Idolum se dici ex poscit. The learned Dr. Rainold however (1), won't agree to this Etymology, and maintains that the word Εἶδωλον, is not a Diminutive from εἶδος, but signifies Forms and Figures of all sorts, even the greatest ; and in this, every body will be of his mind : but he has not taken notice that the word εἶδος signifies the essential, internal, and true Form of a thing ; whereas that of Idol denotes the external Form or Representation of the thing, be it small or great. In a word, the Form and real Extension of the human Body, consisting in the Assemblage of its Flesh, Bones, and Skin, is called εἶδος ; but the Representation of that same Body, whether painted, or in Relievo, was called εἶδωλον, small Form, false and merely apparent Form.

Some of the Learned derive the Etymology of the name Idol from two Greek Words, the one of them signifying Image, the other Anguish, conformably to the Hebrew word Hatsabbim, which imports the same thing ; thereby giving us to understand, that Idols are the Source of Anguish and Chastisements, wherewith God punished such as revolted from himself to their Worship.

This being laid down, by the word Idolatry we are to understand the Worship, which was paid to the Statues and other Representations of the Gods ; and by that of Idols, whatever represented them.

C H A P. I.

Of the Origin and Progress of Idolatry.

SOME perhaps may be persuaded, that what I have said of the Theogony of the several Nations, might suffice for our understanding the Origin of Idolatry ; and to be sure it is included therein. But there are so many other things to be said upon the Subject, that I judged it required to be treated separately.

S. Epiphanius distinguishes the ancient Religions into four (2). Barbarism, which continued from Adam to Noah ;

(1) Traët. de Idol.

(2) Adv. Har. V. 1 1.

Noab ; Scy:bism, from Noab to Serug ; Hellenism ; and Judaism, which commenc'd under Abraham. Other Authors divide the Religions of those early Times, only into Sabism and Hellenism : Epiphanius's Division is juster, and is favoured by the History of the World ; and indeed, from Adam to Noab, all is quite dark, except what Accounts of that Period we have from Moses ; thus Epiphanius might well call that time, Barbarism. The Scythian Nations had a peculiar Religion, distinct from that of the Greeks and others ; besides, the Dispersion of those People is very ancient. There is reason therefore for placing their Religion before Hellenism, since a part of the Greeks, and their Religion came from Phenicia : Hellenism too is justly put before Judaism, since that holy Religion which had Abraham for its Father and Founder, is the Reformation of the rest, and the strongest Bulwark against Idolatry, which overspread the Earth in the time of this holy Patriarch.

Epiphanius's Division has not however been received by all the Learned. F. Petavius says, it has not any Foundation ; and the truth is, it is imperfect, since it takes no notice of Sabism, the Religion of the old Persians, who worshipped the Fire, as we may see in the learned Performance of Dr. Thomas Hyde (1), and in Owen (2) ; nor does it include the whole of Egyptianism, which the Scripture speaks of.

Whether Idolatry took its rise before the Deluge.

At the beginning, Men knew and serv'd only one God, the Creator, Omnipotent, Eternal. Adam, immediately come out of the hands of God, preserved the purest Idea of him in his own Family, and there need be no doubt of its having continued in the Branch of Seth until the Deluge. God had given our first Parents too many Manifestations of himself, for them to be unacquainted with him. He thought it not enough to draw his Image on the Works of Nature, and to enlighten their Mind by the Illumination of his Grace ; he conversed with them, and instructed them either immediately, or by the Mediation of his Angels ; thus they had had the clearest and soundest Idea of the supreme Being, which it is possible for Man to have; and consequently the Worship they paid to God, and which he himself had prescribed, was pure and undefiled. We can't have the same thoughts of Cain's Family: His Posterity not only fell into Idolatry, but into all the other Crimes which brought on the Deluge; whereof, to be sure, Idolatry, which the Scripture frequently terms either Fornication or Adultery, was one of the principal Causes. The Sons of Men, that is, according to Interpreters, the Offspring of Cain, were abandoned to the most infamous Passions; the pure Idea of an all-perfect Being begun insensibly to wear out, and among carnal Men it became connected with Sense: Thus they very soon affixed it to sensible Objects; and that which appeared most beneficial and perfect to their eyes, was worshipped as their greatest God.

(1) De Relig. vet. Pers.

(2) De Ortu & Progr. Idol. p. 193.

The learned Maimonides, in his Treatise upon the Origin of Idolatry, which is translated into Latin in a Piece of Assius upon the same Subject, thus expresses himself. “The first Origin of Idolatry must be referred to the time of Enos, when Men began to study the Motion of the Stars and of the heavenly Bodies, and reckon'd them created by God to govern the World. They imagined God had set them in the Heavens to make them partake of his own Glory, and serve him as Ministers; whence they concluded, it was their Duty to give them Honour. Upon this Foundation they began to build Temples to the Stars, to offer Sacrifices to them, and to prostrate themselves before them, in order to obtain Favours from him who had created them, and this was the first Origin of Idolatry. Not as if they believed there was no other God besides the Stars; but they were persuaded, that in adoring them, they fulfilled the Will of the Creator. In time, certain false Prophets arose, pretending to be sent from God, and that they had Revelations for appointing such and such a Star to be worshipped, nay, for appointing Sacrifices to be offered to the whole Host of Heaven; and they made Figures of “ them, which they exposed to be publickly worshipped.

M 2

“ them,

 “ Thereupon they began to set up their Representa“ tions in Temples, under Trees, and upon the tops
 “ of Mountains. They flock’d together for their Ado“ ration, and the Prosperity they enjoy’d was attributed “ to the Worship they paid to them. Hence it came a“ bout, concludes Maimonides, that the Name of God “ was intirely banished from the Mouths and Hearts of “ Men.”

Tertullian, not to mention others, who likewise believed Idolatry had commenced before the Deluge (1), supported his Opinion by the Book of Enoch; but we have made it appear that this Piece, tho’ of very great Antiquity, carried all the Marks of an Apocryphal Book.

This is likewise the Sentiment of the Generality of the most learned Rabbins (2); they found it upon a Passage in Genesis (3), where it is said of Enos, Iste cepit invocare nomen Domini; which is thus expressed in another Version: Tunc profanatum est in invocando nomine Domini; and this Difference arises from the word cha- lal, which equally imports, to begin, and to profane.
 The Idea we have of the ancient Giants from the sacred Books, as well as from profane Authors, where they are represented as Men of an unbounded Insolence, and infinitely corrupt, is a good Confirmation of the Opinion of these Rabbi’s. The Enterprize of these presumptuous Men against Heaven, does it not intimate their Intention to dispute his Sovereignty? But we are not to dwell longer upon the Period which preceded the Deluge; a Period, about which Moses has said little, and from what he says of it, we can draw no Conclusion with respect to Idolatry. For in short, the Passage they solely rely upon, is very hard to be understood, and would require the discussing of some Questions that would lead me too far from my Subject.
 You may consult the learned Dissertation of Father Souciety, and the Reflections of M. Fourmont, who, altho’
 he

(1) De Idol. c. 3.

(2) See Maimon. de Idolo. R. Jarsy, &c.

(3) C 4. v. ult.

he agrees that nothing can be concluded from it for Idolatry before the Deluge, believes nevertheless, that it was introduced in that Period, and he assigns five Causes of it, which equally subsisted after Noah. Admiration; hence the Worship of the Stars, especially of the Sun and Moon, Objects so striking, so useful, and consequently so proper to attract the Worship of Men. Natural Affection; a Mother has an only Son whom she doats upon, of him she is bereaved, causes a Statue to be erected to him, and this Image becomes the tutelar Deity of the Family; as we see in the Book of Wisdom. This Example recorded in Scripture is not the only one which might be quoted. Fear; all the world knows that ancient Verse, and none was ever better acquainted with this human Weakness, than our Missionaries to America, who were told upon all occasions, if God be good, he has no need of our Service. 'Tis the Demons alone, or the mischievous Genii we ought to worship, to keep them from doing us harm. From the same Source, no doubt, came the Gods among the Romans, called Averrunci, that is, the Averters of Evil; hence too the Goddess Angerona; the Fever, the deify'd Diseases, and Fear it self, which became one of their Divinities. Hope; to this it is we owe the Origin of the salutary Gods, such as Apollo, Esculapius, and the rest, on whose Aid they founded their Hope of being cured. Lastly, Flattery; and it is needless to quote examples of the Gods who owe their Original to this.

Primus in orbe Deos fecit timor;

To these five Causes, a sixth may be added, the Corruption of the Heart: A corrupt Heart adores its own Defects and Excesses; its Crimes are its first Divinities.

A modern Author, from a persuasion that Idolatry did not take its rise till after the Deluge, gives a very singular Account of its Origin: according to him, Atheism had spread itself over the World. "This disposition of Mind towards God, says he, is the capital Crime; for Atheists are much more odious to the “ Divinity than Idolaters. Besides, this Principle is “ more capable of leading Men to that excessive Cor“ ruption the World fell into before the Deluge. The “ Knowledge of a God, continues he, of whatever “ Nature he is conceiv’d, and the Worship of the Deity, “ is apt of it self to be a Restraint upon Men ; so that “ Idolatry was of some use to bear down the Corrup“ tion of the World. ’Tis therefore probable, that the “ horrid Vices Men were fallen into before the Deluge, “ proceeded only from their not knowing nor serving “ God. I am even of opinion, that Idolatry and “ Polytheism, after the Deluge, derived their Origin

 “ from the Impiety and Atheism that reigned before it.
 “ Such is the Temper of Men ; when they have been “ severely punished for any Crime, they run into an“ other Extreme. This was actually, says he, the “ Case of the Jews : As they were very sharply chas“ tised for having abandon’d themselves to Idolatry,
 “ and neglected the Celebration of the Sabbath, upon “ their return from the Babylonish Captivity, they con“ ceived such a Detestation of Idols, that they were “ inclined more than once to revolt, rather than suffer
 “ their Governors to bear Ensigns, on which the Ro- “ man Eagles were painted ; and allowed themselves to “ be defeated on different occasions, because they would “ not break the Sabbath. I conjecture, concludes the “ same Author, that something like this was the Case “ with Men after the Deluge : As they reckon’d that “ this terrible Judgment, which carried such evident “ Indications of the divine Wrath, was sent for the “ Punishment of Atheism, they run into the opposite “ Extreme ; they adored whatever seemed to deserve “ their Worship”. We readily agree with this Author, that the greatest of all Crimes is Atheism, and that Idolatry, notwithstanding all that M. Bayle has said to destroy this Assertion, is capable of furnishing a Curb against the Irregularity of Manners, which Atheism has not in its power : But who told him that Men before the Deluge had been arrived at that excess of Impiety ?
 He ought at least to have excepted the chosen Race, the Posterity of Seth. 'Tis very true, Moses says (a), that from the Commerce of the Sons of God, that is, of the Successors of Seth, with the Daughters of Men, by whom we are to understand, those who descended of Cain, were born the Nephelim, who fell into the grossest Enormities, as their very Name imports; but he says not a word about their having become Atheists. Now what more can we know about those first Men, than what this sacred Historian has related?

However it be as to the beginnings of Idolatry, certain it is, that the Knowledge and Worship of the true God were again united in the Family of Noah, which remained alone upon the Earth after the Deluge. That holy Patriarch, in gratitude to God for his Preservation, offered him a solemn Sacrifice of every clean Animal that came out of the Ark, and no doubt he would be sure to recommend it to his Children and Grand-children, to preserve with Veneration the Worship prescribed to him by God himself. Thus, before the division of Tongues, and while the Children and Grand-children of that Patriarch made up but one Family and People, there is the highest probability that this Worship was not altered in its Purity. Noah was still alive, he was the Head of that People. Sem, Ham, and Japhet, Witnesses themselves of the Vengeance of God upon their Contemporaries, living in the midst of their Families, would they have allowed their Children to abandon that same Worship? Nothing we read of in Antiquity can incline us to this Belief. In all likelihood therefore, it was not till after the Dispersion of that People, that Idolatry arose. And while the true Religion was for a longer time preserv'd in some Families, especially in that from which Abraham sprung, others abandoned it for the Service of vain Idols, which their Ignorance, or rather the Corruption of their Hearts had formed.

In the mean time, Noah survived the Introduction of this abuse, nor was he able wholly to correct Man's

M 4 fatal

(a) See what has been said on this Subject in the preceding Book, p. 122, and following.

fatal Byass to seek after sensible Objects of Worship; and even in his life-time (for he died not till about the time of the Birth of Abraham) Idolatry was widely diffused over the Earth.

It is not easy to tell precisely, either by whom, at what Period, or with what Object it begun; the Scripture speaks of it only occasionally and by the by. The first time it is mentioned, is in speaking of the Son of Zilpah, Leah's Handmaid. As soon as this Child was born, Leah pronounced these two Words, Bagad, and she gave him the Name Gad. Selden says (1), the Hebrews explained this Word to mean, Propitious-Star (2), and that Gad in Arabick signifies good Fortune. S. Augustine contends, that Leah on this occasion spoke after the manner of Idolaters, and that she invoked the Propitious Star at the Birth of her Son. “Certe aut Leah propterea locuta est, quod adhuc Gentilitatis consuetudinem retinebat (3).” The same term Gad, occurs in Ishaiab; the Vulgate translates it, Fortune: Qui ponitis Fortune mensam (4), and the Septuagint, Demca, δαιμόνιον, which may denote all the Gods in general.

The second time Idolatry is mentioned in Genesis, is when Jacob left Laban's House, and Rachel secretly stole away the Teraphim of her Father. The Vulgate renders that word, Idols: Rachel furata est Idola patris sui (5): And this Translation is justified from Laban's Expostulation with Jacob: Why have you stolen away my Gods? Cur furatus es Deos meos (6)? These Passages, 'tis true, plainly intimate that Idolatry prevailed in the time of Jacob, which cannot be controverted; it was even much earlier than he, since Ur of the Chaldees, where his Ancestors dwelt, was an Idolatrous City, which Abraham his Father abandoned, but they do not inform us of the Date of its Establishment in the World.

The Author of the Book of Wisdom offers two or three Sources of Idolatry. First, the affectionate Concern of a Father for the loss of his Son, snatch'd away before

(1) De Diis Syriis. (2) Mazal-Tob. (3) In Gen. Q. 91.
(4) Is. 65. 11. (5) Gen. 31. (6) Ibid.

before his time. To solace himself for his Death, he provides an Image of this Son, and performs divine Honours to him in his Family. From his Family the Worship is propagated to the City, and this private God soon becomes a publick Divinity (a). The second, was the Beauty of the Work of a Sculptor; the Divinity was thought to inhabit in Statues so finely wrought (1). The third, which returns to the same, is when a Potter formed a well-proportion'd Statue, and consecrated it as a Deity: Et cum Labore vano Deum fugit de eodem Luto, &c. Calvin (2), as an Argument for his rejecting the Book of Wisdom, alledges that the Author was grossly mistaken about the Origin of Idolatry; but it was owing to his being unwilling to see that he who composed this Book, never designed to handle dogmatically the Origin of Idolatrous Worship, and that all he had in view was to give a few Examples, transiently, of that Species of Idolatry, which led the Ancients to worship Statues, and to confer divine Honours upon dead Men.

It is not therefore from the sacred Books we can learn the true date of the Establishment of Idolatry, nor have we any Author in Antiquity, worthy our following on this Subject. What we ought to think of it is this.

The Patriarchs had too many Manifestations from God, as was hinted already, either to be unacquainted with him themselves, or to leave their Posterity ignorant of him. Thus Noah's immediate Descendants preserv'd the Purity of Worship, the Laws of which they had from God's own mouth. This Worship was perpetuated not only in Abraham's Line, but sometimes even in Countries the most addicted to Idolatry, Men were found who worshipped God in Spirit and in Truth. Melchizedek King of Salem, Jethro, Moses's Father-in-law, and Job, are not perhaps the only Persons who retained the Knowledge of the true God.

This

(a) Acerbo enim lectu dolens pater, cito sibi rapti filii fecit imaginem, & illum qui tunc quasi homo mortuus fuerat, nunc tanquam Deum colere cœpit. Deinde interveniente tempore . . . hic error tanquam Lex custoditus est, &c. Sap. 15. v. 15, and 16.

(1) Id. c. 15. v. 8. (2) Calv. Inst. l. 1. c. 1.

This Religion, pure in its beginnings, suffered great Alterations afterwards, but 'tis impossible to point out the true Date of the Changes it underwent. Only in general we know, that Ignorance, and the Passions still more, introduced a Mixture into it which corrupted all. From that time the Idea of God became obscure: They brought his Works into a competition with himself; and by a Perversion, strange indeed, but too true, the Beauty of the Creatures, which ought to have raised Man to the Knowledge of the Creator, made him be forgotten who had raised them from nothing, and the Worship of his Works substituted in room of that which was due to himself.

One thing well worthy remarking, is, that whatever Alteration was made in the primitive Worship, the Substance thereof has been always the same. Take a survey of all the Religions in the World, and almost every where you shall find the same Ministers at the Altars, the same Character of Sacrifices, the same legal Observations, as we shall see when we come to the Priesthood and Victims: Insomuch that methinks we may say of Worship in general, what Procopius of Gaza says of Purifications in particular, when he compares those that were prescribed by the Law of Moses, with those that were practised in the Pagan World. For the sole difference he finds between them is, that the Jewish Purifications were more perfect, and without any Mixture of Superstition, while those of the Pagans were infected therewith.

The dependance of the Soul of Man upon the Senses and Imagination, not allowing him to see God any other way but thro' a Glass darkly, as St. Paul speaks (1), renders us incapable of being made acquainted with him, but under sensible Images; which Images were so many Emblems capable of raising us up to him, so far at least as the present State will bear, as the Portrait sets before us him whose Picture it is. Those Emblems were multiplied in process of time to infinity, and cast an impenetrable Obscurity upon Religion.

The

(1) 1 Cor. xiii. 12.

The Egyptians carried this Symbolical and Hieroglyphical Science, farther than the other Nations; tho' we dare not assert that they were the Inventers of it. This much at least is certain, that in all the Religions we know in the East and West-Indies, there is not one of them whose Theology is not full of the like Emblems. If we take Diodorus Siculus's Testimony (1), the Cre- tans, who vaunted that most of the Gods had been born amongst them, boasted at the same time that they had been the first who founded for them a Worship, Sacrifices, Mysteries, which from them had been propagated to every other Nation.

Be that as it will, the Philosophers, especially the Platonists, attempted to establish a particular System, with relation to the Origin of Idolatry, which, if it were well proved, would be very capable to lessen its Absurdity. They maintain'd that the Idea which the wise Men of Antiquity had formed to themselves of God, was that of a Being superiour to whatever exists; of a Spirit present in all the bounds of the Universe, who animates all, who is the Principle of all Generation, and communicates Fertility to every Being; of a Flame lively, pure, and always active; of an Intelligence infinitely wise, whose Providence continually watches over all, and extends over all; in a word, an Idea of a Being to whom they had given different Names, answering to his superiour Excellence; but such as always bore the stamp of that supreme Right of Possession, which is only inherent in the absolute Lord, and in him from whom all things flow.

Porphry, after Theophrastus, even strain'd his utmost efforts to prove, that Religion, in its beginnings, was founded upon Usages of great purity, and upon Ideas very different from what prevail'd in his time. He alledges, that in the beginning, no sensible Image was worshipped, no bloody Sacrifice offer'd, and that the Names and Genealogies of that multiplicity of Gods known in his time, were not then so much as invented.

Sentiments of the Pagans about the Origin of Idolatry.

Pure

(1) L. 2,

Pure Acts of Homage, said he, were paid to the first Principle of all Things, Herbs and Fruits were presented to him, and Libations of Liquors perform'd, in acknowledgment of his sovereign Dominion.

Such, according to him, was Paganism, and the Religion of the Learned ; that which was combated with so much success, was only the Religion of the ignorant Populace. Thus that expert Philosopher pretended, by a refined System, to excuse Idolatry : But those he had to do with were not to be thus imposed upon. It was urged against him, that no where, except among the Patriarchs and the Jews, had such a Religion as he described been found ; and that the grossest Idolatry was the established System. To direct us in tracing out the Origin of Idolatry, we must have surer Guides than the Pagan Philosophers.

The Fathers consider'd the thing in a moral light, and alledged, with a good deal of reason, that Idolatry came into the World only thro' the corruption of the Heart of Man. Pride, Love of Independence, Propensity to sensual Pleasures, are the true causes of its establishment ; and 'tis too evident to be denied.

C H A P. II.

At what period Idolatry began.

BUT when was this Disorder introduc'd, and by what degrees did it arrive at that height of Abomination, which will always put Humanity to the blush ? Epiphanius is of opinion (1), that Serug the Grand-father of Terah Abraham's Father was the Founder of it ; but the Scripture barely insinuates (2), that the Forefathers of that Patriarch were engaged in the worship of Idols, without saying they were the Inventors thereof. Josephus (3) advances, that this evil was even then so general, that Abraham was the first who durst assert that there was but one God, and that the whole Universe was the Work of his hands : And there are Fathers who have not even scrupled to say, that that this Patriarch himself had been an Idolater. Altho' I agree with Josephus, and with the more learned Rabbi's, who deny it (a), it is certain however, that Idolatry was spread in his Life-time, and that God preserv'd him from this Contagion, or at least put him beyond its reach, by bringing him out of Chaldea, where he dwelt.

(1) B. i. de Hæres. (2) Jos. xxiv. v. 2. (3) Ant. L. i. ch. 9.

It ought therefore to have been traced higher. Nimrod is he to whom the Origin of Idolatry is commonly ascrib'd. 'Tis alledg'd, that it was he who introduc'd the Worship of Fire, which has been of so long duration (1).

The City Ur was so called, because there the Fire was worship'd, and this is what had given rise to the Fable, which says, that the King who reign'd in the time of Abraham, had caused him to be thrown into the Fire, because he set himself in opposition to that Superstition, and that God rescu'd him from it in a miraculous manner; a Rabbinical Fable, founded upon what is said in Scripture, that this Patriarch came forth from Ur of the Chaldees (b). But whatever Idea the Scripture gives us of the Insolence of Nimrod, who was Projector of the Tower of Babel, a project which one may look upon as a kind of Insurrection against Heaven, yet it gives no insinuation of his having induced the Chaldeans to worship sensible Beings.

There is as little Foundation for saying, that Ninus was the first Author of Idolatry: It is of an earlier date than his time, since he lived only about the time of the first Judges, as Usher undeniably demonstrates (c), whereas the Scripture taxes Terah and Nabor with Idolatry a long time before. We can only allow, not to recede far from the opinion of Jerom and Cyril, that this Founder of the Assyrian Empire, was one of the first who introduced that species of Idolatry, which had

(a) Rabbi Maimonides however is of opinion, that he was an Idolater until the age of forty-eight years.

(1) Hugo Victor in Gen. c. x.

(b) See Jerom's Hebraick Questions upon Genesis.

(c) This Author places the Reign of Belus in the Year of the World 2682, and that of Ninus in 2687.

had for its Object the Worship of great Men, having built a Temple to the honour of his Father Belus. But there was an Idolatry of a much greater Antiquity, as we shall shew immediately.

ARTICLE I.

That it was in Egypt and Phenicia it had its Rise.

'TIS, no doubt, in the Family of Ham we are to seek for the true Origin of Idolatry. The unfortunate Children of an accursed Father were the first who forgot the wise Counsels of Noah; and following the Propensity of their own heart, and abandoning themselves to their passions, sought out sensible Objects, to whom they might offer a superstitious Worship. As the two Sons of Ham, Canaan and Mizraim, settled the one in Phenicia and the other in Egypt, these are the two Kingdoms whence Idolatry took its rise. I believe it began much later in Countries peopled by the Descendants of Sheim and Japhet.

Egypt and Phenicia then were the first Nurseries of Idolatry: This is the opinion of Eusebius (1), who had not a little examined into this Subject; of Lactantius (2), and of Cassian (3), the former of whom ascribes its Original to Canaan, and the latter to Ham his Father. This is what several Rabbi's have thought upon the Subject, who even reckon that those two Patriarchs had been Idolaters before the Deluge. Vossius (a) says, it is beyond doubt, that Idolatry had its rise in the Family of Ham, and by consequence in Egypt: This Author adds, that it is agreed to by all the Ancients. And without mentioning Diodorus, and several others, it suffices to quote Lucian (3), who says in so many words, that the Egyptians are the first who honoured the Gods and paid them a solemn Worship. Herodotus, in the beginning of his History (4), is not so positive on the head as Lucian, but what he says is much the same; The Egyptians, according to this learn'd Historian, are the

(1) Præpar. Evan. c. 6, & 9. (2) De fals. Rel. B 2. (3) Col-lat 8. c. 21.

(a) Remarks upon Maimonides's Treatise concerning Idolatry.

(3) De Dea Syria. (4) Ch. 4.

the first who knew the Names of the twelve great Gods, and from them it is that the Greeks learn'd them. This Author asserts the same thing in several places, and particularly in the fifth Chapter of the second Book, as we shall see afterwards.

Egypt has always been consider'd as the center of Idolatry ; so it is represented in several places in Scripture: There prevail'd Magick, Divination, Auguries, the Interpretation of Dreams, the unhappy Fruits of a superstitious Worship. Even from the time of Moses, Idolatry was there at its highest pitch, which supposes a great Antiquity ; for, in short, it is a considerable time before a compleat System of Religion comes to be establish'd. Moses even seems to have given the Jews such a multitude of Precepts, only to oppose them in every thing to the Egyptian Ceremonies: What concerns the Sacrifices, the use of Meats, and Polity, these were establish'd merely to keep them at a distance from the practices of that idolatrous People.

This, without doubt, is the Country where Idolatry commenc'd ; from thence it pass'd into Phenicia, if it did not even begin there at the same time (a) ; and from Phenicia it was propagated to the East, into the places inhabited by the Posterity of Sem, into Chaldea, Mesopotamia, and the places adjacent, and in the West, where the Posterity of Japhet fix'd their residence, that is to say, in Asia minor, in Greece, and in the Isles: This is the course it is made to take by Eusebius and other ancient Fathers ; and we are not to hearken to the Greeks, when they tell us, that Idolatry took its rise, either in the Island of Crete under the reign of Melissus, or at Athens under Cecrops, or in Phrygia, since they were not acquainted with the true Antiquities, and we are sure they had their Religion and Ceremonies from Egypt and Phenicia, with the Colonies that (a) Several learned Men maintain, that Idolatry had its rise in Phenicia, and from thence spread itself into Egypt. It is very difficult to debate upon a Fact of such Antiquity. All will be reconciled by saying, as I have done, that it began perhaps at one and the same time in both these Countries, both peopled by the same Family.

that came to them from these ancient Kingdoms, as all the Learned are agreed, and as Herodatus expressly declares.

We conclude then, that Egypt and Phenicia are the two Countries where Idolatry took its rise. Whether it began while Hem himself was alive, is what I am not able to determine; but this at least is certain, that it was widely diffused under the reign of his Son Mizraim.

ARTICLE II.

What was the first Object of Idolatry.

IF, after having found out the most probable Æra of Idolatry, and discover'd the Places where it began, we want now to know what was its first Object; we are to observe the same method, and give the different Opinions of the Learned. If we believe the famous Vossius (1), the most ancient Idolatry was that of two Principles. Men seeing a World full of Good and Evil, and not being able to conceive, that a Being of essential Goodness could be the Author of Evil, invented two Divinities equal in Power, and eternal; they believ'd all Good came from the good Principle, and that the bad did all the evil he possibly could; that the latter seeing the good Principle design'd to create a World, had thwarted his purpose as far as he was able; that upon this ensued a sharp War between these two Beings, which was the thing that retarded this Creation, until the moment that the good Principle got the better; that the other in revenge, had scattered up and down in it all sorts of evils and miseries. This learned Author adds, there is no possibility of determining the precise date of this Error, or who was its original Author, but he looks upon it, with reason, to be very ancient.

Plutarch (2) gives a long Enumeration of those who taught it, not only among the Greeks, but the Barbarians too; and to be sure the Persians, continues Vossius, must have had this Opinion very early, since the famous Zoroaster found it establish'd there: For altho'
'tis

(1) L. 1. de Orig. Idol. (2) De Iside.

'tis not known who this Zoroaster was, nor in what time he lived, yet we know well that he is very ancient, and there is some appearance that it is Mizraim himself, the Son of Ham, who was called after his death Zoroaster, as you would say Living-Star, because he had led the Egyptians to pay a religious Worship to the Stars.

Here we may remark by the by, that a learned English Author (1), who was better acquainted than Vossius with the Religion of the ancient Persians, has given great light to the History of Zoroaster: He was called Zeratucht or Zerducht, and lived in the time of Darius Son of Hystaspes. This great Man, far from having introduced Idolatry among that ancient People, exerted his utmost endeavours to destroy it, and reclaim'd the more reasonable to the Knowledge of one sole Principle, the Creator of Heaven and Earth, as they had been taught by Sem and Abraham their primitive Patriarchs: But because Sabism (a), that is, the Worship of the Stars and Planets, was the predominant Religion, he was obliged to strike a medium; and lest they should have been obstinately untractable, he prescrib'd a sort of subordinate Worship to be given to the Sun and to the Fire, which is the Principle of Fertility, with some Ceremonies purely of a civil nature, such as are still practis'd at this day in the Indies, and especially in the Neighbourhood of Surat, by the Magi descended of those ancient Persians, who, according to this Author, are by no means Idolaters, whatever may be said of them by the Mahometans, who would fain draw them over to their Religion; since 'tis true, as he asserts, that they worship but one sole God, the first Principle of all Beings, and offer up to him nothing but their Vows and Prayers; and if they adore the Fire and the Sun, it is because they look upon him as the purest Image of the Creator, and the Temple where he has establish'd his Throne (b).

N

But

(1) Thomas Hyde, Religion of the ancient Persians.

(a) This Word imports Copia, and Sabaite, Copiarus; as much as to say, one who worships an Host. See Hyde, loc. cit.

(b) See the History of the Worship of Mithras, l. 7. c. 11. p. 600.

But to return to the Idolatry of the two Principles; Vossius maintains, that it spread itself in a little time over all Egypt, except Thebais, where the Worship of the true God was preserv'd; and he alledges, that all that the Egyptians fable about Osiris and Typhon, and the persecutions of the latter against his Brother, ought to be understood of these two Principles, and their eternal War: And this, without doubt, is what that ancient People, whose whole Theology was full of Symbols, intended to teach us by the mysterious Fable, which intimated, that Osiris had shut up in an Egg twelve white pyramidical figures, to denote the infinite Blessings he was design'd to multiply upon Mankind; but that his Brother Typhon having found a way to open this Egg, had secretly convey'd thither twelve other Pyramids that were black, by which means Evil came to be always blended with Good (a).

We may add, that whatever the Philosophers have said concerning this good and bad Principle; whatever the Persians have given out of their two two Divinities Oromasdes and Arimanius; the Chaldeans of their benign or noxious Planets; the Greeks of their salutary or pernicious Genii; all these, I say, derive their Origin from that ancient Egyptian Theology, veil'd under the Fables of Osiris and Typhon. This Opinion, if we will trace it back to its true Source, was owing to Mens having been always puzzled how to account for the introduction of Evil into a World, which was the Work of a God infinitely good and beneficent. As for the other Fables that were there intermix'd, they took their Origin, no doubt, from the Tradition of the Combat between the good and bad Angels.

Be that as it will, this Opinion made vast progress. Pythagoras fetch'd it from Egypt, and then propagated it thro' all Italy. The famous Manes, not to mention what other progress this Error made, spread it thro' the Christian World in the fourteenth Century, where he had several Disciples. S. Augustin himself went into it for some time, but having discover'd its absurdity, he

(a) See the History of Osiris, L. 6. c. 1. art. 1.

he afterwards combated it with so much success, that it was from that time look'd upon as a cause quite desperate; till M. Bayle (a) resolv'd to revive it, and to set up for the Advocate of the Manicheans, whether, as is highly probable, to cut out work for the Divines of all Parties, or to shew that the most desperate Cause, by falling into able hands, may be so managed as to puzzle the greatest Genius's, or for some other reason which we shall not dive into; and seeing himself attack'd on all hands by illustrious Adversaries (b), he has employ'd all the Artifice of a curious refin'd Wit, to give some credit to so bad a Cause. Vossius is of opinion, that this Error had its rise among the Chaldeans, from whom it was communicated to the Persians and Indians, and to almost all the People of the Earth; which holds true, provided we don't mean Manicheism such as Manes taught it, but consider it under the different Forms it had.

From the Idolatry of two Principles, Vossius proceeds to that of Spirits; and he examines the Causes that influenced Men to worship them. He finds two; the Knowledge they had of the Excellency of their Nature, and the surprizing Effects believed to be produced by them; and doubtless Oracles, Apparitions and magical Operations contributed not a little to make their Power and Sovereignty be acknowledg'd. Their Worship was almost every where establish'd, especially towards the bad Angels; and this to be sure is the sense of the Scripture-language, which calls all the Gods of the Gentiles Demons (1). This sort of Idolatry is still to be found in all the Countries where the Gospel has not been embraced, as the Relations of all our Missionaries attest. But here we must apply the judicious Remark of M. le Clerc (2), that it is a mistake to believe, that those Idolaters who worship two Beings, the one beneficent and the other malicious, understand thereby the good and bad Angels, as if they knew the

N 2

System

(a) See in his Dictionary the Articles of the Manicheans and Paulicians.

(b) Messieurs Bing, Le Clerc, Bernard and Jaquelot.

(1) Dii Gentium Dæmonia. (2) Art. crit.

System of the Fall of the one, and of the Fidelity of the others; whereas by Genii they mean certain Powers dispersed thro' the World, who produce in it good and evil.

To the Worship of Genii, Vossius joins that of Souls departed, which was establish'd in several Countries, if we credit Mela, Herodotus and Tertullian, especially in Africk, where those of great Men were held in high veneration: But as this is the species of Idolatry that has made greatest progress in the World, since, as we shall shew, most of the Pagan Gods were none other than the great Men who distinguish'd themselves among them, let us enlarge upon this Point, and propose the Conjectures of a person of great ability (a), about the Origin of this species of Idolatry.

Two things, he reckons, introduced it into the World, Gratitude and Fear, or the veneration they bore to the illustrious Dead, and apprehension of the Evils to which we are obnoxious. The regard they had for their Ancestors, brought in the Custom of funeral Solemnities; their ambition to please the Living, made them run out extravagantly in praising the actions of the Dead; Panegyricks were sung at their Funerals, their Names cry'd up to the skies; and as, before the introduction of the poetical Hell and Elysian Fields, it was the opinion, that the Souls wander'd in Houses and places they had frequented during their union with the Body, they erected in the most venerable part of the House a sort of Altar, where their Pourtraits were preserv'd with respect, and there they burn'd Incense and sweet Odours. They had one constituted to have the Over-sight of the Worship they paid them; and hither they repaired upon pressing Exigencies, to implore their Assistance. A desire of continuing a lucrative service, made those Priests invent Stories, where they intermixed Miracles and many things supernatural, sometimes to alarm the incredulous, sometimes to animate the devout. These Ministers framed Romances too upon the Lives of those great Men, which they conceal'd ceal'd for a long time, and pass'd them upon the World afterwards for true Histories: And however their Contemporaries might be proof against the Cheat, those who came a long time after, had no opportunity of learning the History of those great Men but from the mouth of their Priests; and every thing they saw carrying an air of Divinity, and publick Temples having come in the room of private Chapels (a), it became the fashion in good earnest to honour those first Men as Gods. It was even dangerous to be prying into the Original of establish'd Worship: It was like to have cost Æschylus his Life, that in one of his Plays he was thought to have reveal'd somewhat of the Mysteries of Ceres. Accordingly in the Temples, those especially of Osiris, was to be seen a Statue of Harpocrates holding a finger on his Mouth, to denote, as Varro has it, that the Mystery of his Life and Death was prohibited to be reveal'd; and this was likewise the signification of the Sphinxes in the same Country, placed at the entrance of Temples, as the Emblems of Silence.

(a) F. Tournemine: See the Journal of Trevoux, Anno 1702.

The second Cause of Idolatry, according to the same Author, is the Fear of Evils to which we are liable: They had a notion, for example, that many Evils were occasion'd by the influences of the Stars; these were thought to be animated and immortal, because they saw them without any alteration. Thus, the most effectual way, they thought, to obtain their favour, was to appease them whenever they believed them incensed; and from that time they began to prostrate themselves before the Sun and Moon, and all the Host of Heaven, as the Prophets so often upbraid the Nations.

Thus, in short, religious Worship was regulated according to human Exigence; the Exigences of Society introduced the Worship of illustrious Men, those of Nature that of things inanimate.

N 3

Mon-

(a) Or rather the Tombs they had erected to them were so stately, that they were afterwards looked upon as Temples, as Clemens Alexandrinus remarks, Superstitio templa condere persuasit, quæ, cum prius hominum sepulchra fuerunt magnificentius condita, templorum appellatione vocata sunt, &c. And this undoubtedly was one of the principal Sources of Idolatry.

Monfieur le Clerc (a) alledges the moft ancient fpecies of Idolatry to be that of giving a religious Worſhip to Angels. The Opinion that prevail'd about their mediation between God and Men, procured them certain regards out of Gratitude and Fear, in proportion to the Bleffings that were thought to be deriv'd from them ; then they came to pay them a Worſhip ſubordinate to that of the firſt Being ; at laſt they gave them Adoration, and they neither ſpared Incenſe nor Sacrifices in order to appeaſe them when they were thought to be out of humour: Sacrificarunt Dæmoniis, & non Deo (1). From the Worſhip of Angels, according to this Author, they proceeded to that of the Souls of illuſtrious Men: Then taking into their heads to ſay, that thoſe Souls ſeparate from Bodies, were united to certain Stars, which they animated, they came at laſt to worſhip thoſe Stars themſelves.

Without entering into a critical Examination of theſe different Opinions, which want not probability, I explain in the following Chapter, what is my own Sentiment on a Subject of ſo great Obſcurity.

C H A P. III.

Where we prove that Idolatry commenc'd with the Worſhip of the Stars.

I Am perſuaded, that Idolatry began by the Worſhip of the Heavenly Bodies, and eſpecially of the Sun. As Men could have no other reaſon for abandoning the true God, but that the Idea of a Being purely ſpiritual was defaced upon their carnal Minds (b), it is not probable they would chooſe Men like themſelves to be the firſt Objects of their Adoration ; 'tis more likely they they would cast about for such sensible Objects as bore the Character of the Divinity, whose Idea they had not entirely lost, and which might be a more significant Symbol of him. Now nothing was more capable of seducing them than the Heavenly Bodies, and the Sun especially: His Beauty, the bright Splendor of his Beams, the Rapidity of his Course, exultavit ut Gigas ad currendam viam (1); his Regularity in enlightening the whole Earth by turns, and in diffusing Light and Fertility all around, essential Characters of the Divinity, who is himself the light and source of every thing that exists; all these were but too capable of impressing the gross Minds of Men with a Belief, that there was no other God but the Sun, and that this splendid Luminary was the Throne of the Divinity, in Sole posuit tabernaculum suum (2). God had fix'd his Habitation in the Heavens; Cælum Cæli Domino (3); and they saw nothing that bore more marks of Divinity than the Sun.

(a) Index Philol. ad Hiſtor. Philoſop. Orient. in voce Angelus.

(1) Deut. c. xxxii.

(b) Homines imbecillis intellectus non valentes corporalia tranſcendere, non crediderunt aliquid eſſe ultra naturam ſenſibilem, & ideo inter corporalia poſuerunt præminere & diſponere mundum quæ pulchriora & digniora eo videbantur, & eis impendebant divinum cultum, & ejusmodi ſunt corpora cœleſtia, ſcilicet Sol & Luna & Stellæ. Divus Thomas, Opus. de Symbolo Apoſtol.

We can't therefore question the Antiquity of the Worship of the Sun and other Luminaries: And if there was occasion for adding Authority to so natural Arguments, I should have upon my side not only several great Men who have been of the same mind, but also almost all the Rabbins, and especially the learned Maimonides, who, in his Treatise upon the Origin of Idolatry, thinks it began in this manner, and that before the Deluge.

Considering what Ignorance Men were in as to the Nature of the true God, says that learned Rabbi, nothing must needs have struck them more than the sight of the Sun and Stars. Men never lost this Principle, that the Divinity essentially comprehends supreme Beauty; and not having sufficient Lights to rise to the Idea of an immaterial and invisible Substance, they found nothing more admirable in Nature than the Sun and Stars. Gratitude, natural enough to Men when they receive a Benefit, fortify'd them still more in the same

N 4

(1) Ps. xix. 5. (2) Ib. ver. 4. (3) Hesiod says much the same thing word for word. ὅς ὑπέρτατα δώματα καίει, Qui supremas habitat domos. & Arist L. 1. de Cælo, ch. 3. says, all Nations are agreed that the Gods dwell in Heaven.

same persuasion: They could not doubt of the Sun's being the Source of Fertility, that it was to his heat they ought to ascribe the Fruitfulness of the Earth, which, without the warming influences of his Beams, would be but a barren Lump, without Trees and without Fruits. The Revolutions and regular Motions of the Celestial Spheres, soon persuaded them that the Stars were animated: And this Error has found but too many Partisans. Even learned Men and Philosophers came to espouse this Opinion, especially the Platonicks, and Plato their Master. It was from that Philosophy, Pbilo the Jew deriv'd this Doctrine, That the Stars are so many Souls incorruptible and immortal (1). It was upon the Principles of this same Doctrine, that Origen labour'd to establish the same Opinion (2). Augustin seems to waver in his sentiments about this matter; but he afterwards retracts (3). There is a good deal of probability that it was likewise Aristotle's Sentiment; for however some of his Commentators say, he only gives the Stars Intelligences to direct them, yet there are others of them who hold, that he look'd upon these Intelligences as the internal and essential Forms of the Stars.

Eusebius (4) delivers his thoughts more clearly upon this Article: "That Men, says he, in the first and " earliest Times, never dream'd either of erecting " Temples, or Idols, having neither Painting at that " time, nor the Potter's Art, nor Sculpture, nor Ma" sonry, nor Architecture, is, I suppose, what eve" ry thinking Man evidently sees: But that over and " above all these, they had not so much as heard of " those Gods and Heroes so renown'd since; and that " they had then neither Jupiter, Saturn, Neptune,
 " Juno, Minerva, Bacchus, nor any other God male " or female, such as have been found in latter Times
 " by thousands both among Greeks and Barbarians.
 " Farther, that there was no Demon, whether good or " bad, whom Men revered; but that they adored the " Stars only, call'd Sol, from Sol to run, as we are " told

(1) Lib. de Somniis. (2) In his Books entitled, περὶ Ἀρχαίων.
 (3) Retract. C. 7. (4) Fræp. Evang. L. 2. c. 9.

“ told by the Greeks themselves: In fine, that the Stars
 “ were not honour'd as they are now by Animal Sacri“ fices, nor by Rites of Worship since invented, is a “ Fact that depends not upon our single Testimony,
 “ but is attested by the Pagans themselves.”

I might subjoin the Authority of profane Authors, who have been of the same opinion ; but I content myself with two Testimonies ; one from Diodorus Siculus (1), who says, “ Men in earlier times, struck with the Beauty of “ the Universe, with the Splendor and Regularity “ which every where shine forth, made no doubt but “ there was some Divinity who therein presided, and “ they ador'd the Sun and Moon under the Names of “ Osiris and Isis.”

Whereby this learned Author gives us to understand, that the Worship of the Stars was the first Object of Idolatry, and that Egypt was the place where it began.

The other is that of Plato, if indeed he be the Author of the Dialogue, intitled Epinomis, where we have these Words: The first Inhabitants of Greece, as I conjecture, acknowledg'd no other Gods but those which are at this very day the Gods of the Barbarians, namely, the Sun, the Moon, the Earth, the Stars and the Heavens.

I may add, it is likewise the Sentiment of Sanchoinathon, as we have seen in the Fragment of him I cited.

But nothing proves so much the Antiquity of this kind of Idolatry, as the care Moses took to prohibit it :
 “ Take heed, says he to the Israelites, lest when you “ lift up your eyes to Heaven, and see the Sun, the “ Moon and all the Stars, you be seduced and drawn a“ way to pay Worship and Adoration to the Creatures, “ which the Lord your God has made for the Service
 “ of all the Nations under Heaven:” Ne forté eleves
oculos tuos in Cælos, & videns Solem, & Lunam, & Stellas, ----- & impulsus adores atque colas ea (2).
 On which R. Levi Ben Gerson remarks, that Moses men-mentions the Sun before the other Stars, because his Beauty and Usefulness are more apt to seduce, than that of the Moon and Stars.

As it was after the departure out of Egypt, and when the Jews were in the Desert, that God indited to them this Precept of the Law, there is the highest ground to believe, that it was to make them forget the Egyptian Superstitions of this nature, and to guard them against being drawn into those of the other Nations they were very soon to be among ; for this Worship was at that time spread over all, as we shall shew presently, and this is the reason why Job, to testify his Innocence, says :
 “ If I beheld the Sun when he shined, or the Moon walk“ ing in her Brightness ; if my Heart has been tickled “ with a secret Joy, and I have put my Hand to my “ Mouth to kiss it ; which is the height of Iniquity, “ even a Renunciation of the most high God.” Si vidi Solem cum fulgeret, & Lunam incedentem clare, & letatum est in abscondito cor meum, quæ est iniquitas maxima, & negatio contra Deum altissimum (1).

Upon which Passage, we have four Remarks to make. First, this was therefore the Idolatry of his Age, and the only one too ; for to be sure if there had been other kinds of it, he would have equally clear'd himself of them.

Secondly, that to adore the Sun, implied an absolute acknowledging him for the supreme Deity, and no other, Abnegassem Deum desuper ; or, as the Vulgate has it, Negatio contra Deum altissimum.

Thirdly, that we learn from this Passage, not only the Antiquity of the Worship of the Sun, since Job lived before Moses (a), but also that they acknowledged the Divinity of this Luminary, by putting the Hand to the Mouth ; and this Custom was likewise used towards other Gods, as we learn from several Authors. Minutius Felix ridicules Cecilius, who kissed his Hand as he passed by the Statue of Serapis : Cæcilius Simulachro Serapidis

(1) Job xxxi. v. 26, 27, &c.

(a) This is the Sentiment of Beda. See the Interpreters upon it ; for it is needless here to enter into the Debate.

Serapidis denotato, ut Vulgus superstitiosus solet, manum ori admovens, Osculum Labiis impressit (1). Apuleius, on the contrary, upbraids an impious Person, that he had no respect to the Gods, and that he passed by their Temples without putting his Hand to his Mouth to salute them: Nulli Deo ad hoc ævi supplicavit, nullum Templum frequentavit, si fanum aliquod prætereat, nefas habet, adorandi gratia, manum Labiis admovere (2).

In the last place we observe, it was with a view to acknowledge the Divinity of the Sun, that the Pagans in Prayer, turned towards the East, and had all their Temples directed to that quarter; whereas the Jews, that they might not imitate them, had always their Sanctuary towards the West. The primitive Christians likewise used to turn their Churches towards the rising Sun, not to adore that Luminary, but to pay their Devotion to the Sun of Righteousness, who diffuses Light over the Mind (a), and warms the Hearts of those who worship him, by the Influences of his Grace.

Authors are not agreed as to the Place where the Worship of the Sun was introduced; some hold it was in Chaldea, because that ancient People were always addicted to Astronomy, and were the first who observed the Motion of the Stars; as if it required astronomical Observations to be capable of admiring the Sun, and knowing his Influences, when indeed we need but open our Eyes, to be struck with his Glory and his Beauty. It is much more probable, that Egypt, which I but just now proved to have been the Nursery of Idolatry, was the Place where the Sun began to be worshipped under the Name of Osiris.

From Egypt, this Idolatry was spread thro' the neighbouring Countries, or rather thro' the World, since this Luminary has been the Divinity of every Nation, even those that are most barbarous. I am not now to enter upon a particular proof of a Truth so well known; any thing I could say may be seen in Vossius, in Father Thomassin, who

(1) Dial. intit. Octavius. (2) Apul. l. 1.

(a) See Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom. 70. contra Valent. Chap. 3. &c.

who has only copied him, and in several others. I shall only remark, that the Ammonites worshipped him under the Name of Moloch, to whom they sacrificed their Children; the Chaldeans, under the Names of Belus, Baal, or Baal-Semen, which imports the Lord of Heaven; the Arabians their Neighbours, who, as Strabo (1) and Stephanus relate (2), made a daily Offering to him of Incense and other Perfumes, called him Adoneus; the Moabites, Baal-Phegor; the Persians, Mithras. He was named Asabinus by the Ethiopians; Liber, or Dionysius, by the Indians; Apollo, or Phæbus, by the Greeks and Romans (3). In fine, others called him Hercules, Belenus, &c. In a word, there was no Nation but paid a superstitious Worship to this Luminary. Cæsar tells us in particular, it was so with the Germans, who, according to this Author, own'd no other Gods but those from whom they received some Benefit, as the Sun, the Moon, and the Fire: Deorum numero eos solum ducunt, quorum opibus aperte juvantur, Solem, Vulcanum, & Lunam. Herodotus says as much for the Massagete, who, according to this Historian, sacrificed Horses to him, to signify by the fleetness of this Animal, the rapid Motion of the Sun (4). In fine, all the Travellers, even the most modern, give the same account of almost all the Nations, of whom they have left us any History, especially of the Peruvians and Mexicans. If we credit an Author who has publish'd a learned Work upon the Manners of the Savages (5), there is not in the vast Continent of America, any known People, but worship the Sun. Even the Incas of Peru, and their Descendants at this day, as well as the Natches of Louisiana, like the ancient Kings or Heroes, who pretended to be the Sons of Jupiter or Hercules, call themselves the Offspring of the Sun, as we have already remark'd in speaking of their Theogony. The Jews themselves were sometimes carried away by this Superstition, since the Scripture teaches us, that Josias flew ſlew the Horſes and burned the Chariots that had been conſecrated to the Sun: Et abolevit equos quos dederant Reges Juda . . . Et currus Solis combuſſit igni (1).

(1) L. 10. (2) L. 9. (3) See upon all these, Vossius de Idol. l. 2. (4) Herod. liv. 1. c. 226. (5) P. Laffiteau Mœurs des Sauvages, Tom. 1. p. 131.

In the Obeliſk which Sixtus V. cauſed to be ſet up hard by S. John de Latran, (the ſame whereof Hermæpion had tranſlated into Greek the Egyptian Characters that were repreſented upon it, and of which we have ſome Fragment preſerv'd by Ammianus-Marcëllinus) the Sun is called the Lord of Heaven, the Creator of the World, Mars, the God of War. The Ethiopians not only owned the ſame Luminary for their Divinity, as has been already ſaid, but their Princes too made their boaſt of being deſcended from him, ſince Heliodorus (2) makes Charicleus thus ſpeak; O Sun, the Founder of the Origin of my Anceſtors. Rhameſes, King of Egypt, takes the ſame Deſignation in the Obeliſk I have mentioned. Semiramis bears it likewise, upon ſome Monuments mentioned by the Ancients. Adad and Ben-Adad, the firſt of them ſignifying the Sun, and the ſecond, the Son of the Sun, were Names common to the Kings of Syria, as Marſham obſerves. The Kings of Persia took ſuch-like Titles, as did ſeveral other Eaſtern Princes. Æetes King of Colchis, valued himſelf upon being deſcended from the ſame Luminary, as well as Medea, Pafiſphæ, and ſeveral others, of whom I have no deſign to give a compleat Liſt, nor to ſpeak of all the Towns that bore his Name, or were conſecrated to him. I have ſaid enough to ſhew the Univerſality of his Worſhip.

We may even affirm in general, that there is no People whoſe Religion is known to us, neither in our own Continent, nor in that of America, that has not paid him a religious Worſhip, if we except ſome Inhabitants of the torrid Zone, who are continually curſing the Sun for ſcorching them with his Beams.

Every body knows that Macrobius (3) undertakes to prove, that all the Gods of Paganism may be reduced to the Sun. This Author allows the Poets the honour
of

(1) 2 Kings xxiii. 11.
i. i. c. 17, &c.

(2) Hiſt. of Ethiop.

(3) Sat.

190 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book III.
of having followed the Sentiments of the Philosophers, especially in reuniting all the Divinities in the Sun, who being the Ruler of the other Orbs, whose Influences act upon this lower World, must of consequence be the Author of the Universe. He enters next upon a detail of all the Gods that may be reduced to the Sun, and there he finds not only all those whom we have named, but Cælus too, Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Apollo, Mercury, Ammon, Bacchus, Serapis, Adonis, Esculapius, Hercules, Atys, Pan, and several others.

This same Author, and after him Vossius, reduce almost all the Divinities of the feminine Sex to the Moon; as Ceres, Diana, Lucina, Venus, Urania, the Goddess of Syria, Cybele, Isis, Vesta, Astarte, Juno, Minerva, Libitina, Proserpina, Hecate, and several others, who were only formed from the Egyptian Goddess Isis, whose Name imports Ancient, and who was among that People, the Symbol of the Moon; and here, without doubt, we have the first Objects of Idolatry, and the Foundation of the whole Pagan Theology (1).

From the Adoration of the Sun and Moon, they went to that of the other Stars, especially of the Planets, whose Influences were more sensible; in a word, they worshipped the whole Host of Heaven.

This sort of Idolatry which has the Stars and Planets for the Objects of its Worship, goes under the name of Sabism. As to what may have given rise to this Denomination, the Learned are not agreed among themselves; the thing at bottom is of no great consequence: but what is more essential to be known, is, that this Sect is the most ancient of all, as cannot be doubted: It was the most general, and continues at this very day, chiefly in Asia, among those whom they call Pharisis, Mendaians, or the Christians of St. John. They who are of opinion that the Origin of this sort of Idolatry is to be referr'd to Zoroaster, are certainly mistaken; for whether this Man, so celebrated in the Writings of the Ancients, lived only in the time of Darius, Son of Hystaspes, as is proved by Thomas Hyde (2) and Prideaux deaux (1), or whether he was much more ancient, as Moyle seems to demonstrate (a); he cannot be looked upon as the Author of this Sect, much more ancient than himself, since it was subsisting in the time of Abraham, and since the City Charan, whither this Patriarch repaired, after leaving Ur or Our of Chaldea, has been always looked upon as the Metropolis of Sabism. I should even be inclined to think, that it was not so much Sabism which Zoroaster established, as Magism, another very ancient Sect, whose principal Doctrine was the Adoration of Fire. This last derived likewise its Origin from Chaldea, and reigned chiefly in Ur, where Abraham's Ancestors had dwelt, and which he himself afterwards abandon'd. This Sect, which we are carefully to distinguish from Sabism, altho' both of them had partly the same Tenets (2), still continues at this day, if we give credit to Thomas Hyde, among the Gauri, or Guebri, who inhabit the Extremities of Persia to the South, near the Frontiers of the Mogul.

(1) See Vossius loc. cit.

(2) De Rel. Vet. Perf.

There are learned Men of opinion, that the ancient Philosophers, those especially of Chaldea, had given a handle for Sabism. It is true indeed, that they reason a great deal about the Stars, about their Influences, and their Beauty, perhaps too they believed them to be eternal Beings, and consequently so many Divinities, or at least that there were Gods who resided in them, and regulated their Courses and Influences. They even gave out, and it is a very ancient Opinion, that the Body of the Star was no more than its Vehicle, or a sort of Machine, that serv'd to carry the Gods who conducted them; but what occasion was there for such refined Reasoning, to influence gross and carnal Men to address their first Prayers to those luminous and resplendent Bodies? Was it not enough for them to turn their Eyes towards the Sun, to behold how he both enlightens the World, and communicates to it Heat and Fertility, in order to judge that he was as the Parent of Nature,

(1) Connections of, vol. 2.

(a) See Letters upon this Subject, in the 6th Vol. of Prideaux's History.

(2) See Prideaux in the Place quoted above.

Nature; that by him it was vivify'd, and without him would be nothing but a lifeless Expanse, without Light and without any Production, as we noted before? All the Nations that worshipped the Sun, the Mexicans, the Peruvians, and other Savages of America, did they wait for the Decisions of Philosophers to teach them to prefer their Vows and Prayers to this Luminary? But be that as it will, Sabism is to be looked on as the most ancient Sect in the Pagan World. It arose not long after the Deluge, since it was known to Abraham's Ancestors, to Terah and Serug, and perhaps before them too. This is the Sect which has made the greatest progress; I have mentioned the different Nations that adopted it; and if we believe the most learned Rabbi's, and the eastern Authors, almost the whole World has been infected by it. In fine, of all the Sects, this has been of longest duration, since there are still numbers of Idolaters who adhere to it.

C H A P. IV.

Of the Progress of Idolatry.

THE first Race of Men, some time after their Dispersion, were extremely rude; even the Greeks, who became afterwards so polite, were no better at first, if we credit Diodorus Siculus, than those whom they were wont to call Barbarians. We are not therefore to imagine that Idolatry, in its first setting out, was a study'd System; that Theology was then encumber'd with that Apparatus of Ceremonies they added to it in after-times. Nothing could be more simple, nor at the same time more gross, than the Religion of the primitive Idolaters. They were at little or no charge either to represent the Gods, or pay them a religious Worship. We learn from Pausanias, that the Athenians, in the time of Cecrops, made Offerings to Jupiter Cælestis, of nothing but simple Cakes; and these being called Bous, made People take up a groundless Notion that they sacrificed to him Oxen. The Scythians, according to Clemens

Clemens Alexandrinus (1), in ancient times adored a Scymitar; the Arabians, a rough unhewn Stone; and among other Nations, they contented themselves with erecting a Trunk of a Tree, or some Pillar without Ornament. These Pillars they called Zoara, because they were peeled when of Timber, and a little smoothed when they were of Stone. In the Orkneys, the Image of Diana was a Log of Wood unwrought; and at Cytheron, the Juno Thespia was nothing but a Trunk of a Tree cut off; that at Samos, but a simple Plank; and so of others.

What began to enlarge the Sphere of Idolatry, and consequently is to be reckon'd one of the main Causes of its Propagation, was the Invention of Arts, especially of Painting and Sculpture. Fine Statues commanded higher Veneration, and People were more easily induced to believe, that the Gods whom they represented resided in them. Statues even frequently augmented the number of the Gods, as St. Augustine observes with respect to the Muses, who originally were but three, as shall be shewn in their History; but having been represented by three different Statuaries, their Statues appeared so fine, that they consecrated all the nine; and thus enlarged the number of these Goddesses.

From the Worship of the Stars, whom we shew'd in the former Chapter to have been the first Gods of Paganism, they proceeded to that of other material Objects; the Heavens especially, the Elements, the Rivers and the Mountains; last of all to the Worship of Men, whom they raised to the rank of Gods.

I have told the Reasons that induced Men to adore some of their own Species. Gratitude, the Affection of a Wife to her beloved Spouse, or of a Mother to her darling Son; the Beauty of the Work of a Statuary, illustrious Atchievements, the Invention of necessary Arts; all these made them honour the Memory of some great Men, were Obligations upon them to preserve their Pictures, distinguish their Sepulchres, which at last

O

(1) Orat ad Gentes.

last became publick Temples, as is prov'd by Eusebius (1) and Clemens Alexandrinus: Such were the Tombs of Acrisius, of Cecrops, Erichthonius, Ismarus, Cleomachus, Cinyras, and several others. We shall shew at greater length, in a separate Article, from the Authority of the Fathers and profane Authors, that most of the Pagan Gods had been Men.

I am aware that the order, which I have followed in tracing the Progress of Idolatry, disagrees with Sancho-niathon, who places the Apotheosis of Men in the first Ages; but it is more probable that they did not run out at first to that excess of Folly, but directed their Adoration to the Stars, and the different parts of the Universe, before they made Gods of Men like themselves.

In fine, if the Progress of Idolatry was not precisely in the manner I have described it, there is at least a strong Probability that it was so; for, tho' the Author just now mentioned tells us, that Cælus or Uranus, one of the first Men he speaks of, was deify'd after his Death, he intimates however, that there had been an Idolatry of another sort before this. “The Phenicians, says he, “and the Egyptians, are the most ancient of the Barbarians, and from them every other People derived the Custom of ranking among the Great Gods all the Inventers of things useful in Life, and to this use they apply'd the Temples that were built before.”

But be that as it will, it is plain from this Author, that it was still in Phenicia and Egypt that this sort of Idolatry began; and in the latter, probably not long after the Death of Osiris and Isis. They two having distinguished themselves by their shining Merit (2), the People whom they had taught Agriculture, and several necessary Arts, thought they could no otherwise acquit themselves of the infinite Obligations they had laid them under, but by honouring them as Divinities. But because it might have appeared shocking to see divine Honours paid to Persons but newly dead, it was probably given out, that their Souls were reunited with the Orbs, from

(1) Præp. Evang. l. 2. c. 6.

(2) See the History of Osiris.

from whence they had formerly come to animate their Bodies. From that time, they were taken for the Sun and Moon, and their Worship was confounded with that of these two Luminaries, as has been said already.

This Custom of deifying Men, was propagated from Egypt to the other Nations, and we find that the Chaldeans, much about the same time, raised their Belus to the Order of the Gods. The Syrians, Phenicians, Greeks and Romans, all of them imitated the Egyptians and Chaldeans; and Heaven, as Cicero observes, was soon peopled with deify'd Mortals: Which was likewise true in another sense, since upon their Deification, they gave out that their Souls were united to certain Stars which they chose for their Habitation. Thus, Andromeda, Cepheus, Perseus and Cassiopeia, made up the Constellations that bear their Names; Hippolytus, the Sign of the Charioteer; Esculapius, the Serpents; Ganymede, Aquarius; Phaeton, the Chariot; Castor and Pollux, Gemini or the Twins; Erigone and Astrea, Virgo; Atergatis, or rather Venus and Cupid, Pisces, or the Fishes; and so of others. This Custom passed to almost every Country, and penetrated even into Ghina, where the Astronomers called the twenty-eight Constellations, which in their System comprehend the whole Stars, by the Names of as many of their Heroes, whom they affirm to have been transformed into Stars. The Egyptians only gave the Names of Animals to the Constellations, and this was the Foundation of that Worship afterwards paid to them (a).

Such is the Progress of Idolatry, which was carry'd at length to that excess, which I am to describe.

They worshipped at first, as we have said, only the Sun, Moon, and Stars; next, they looked upon Nature herself, or the World, as a Divinity. This is what the Assyrians adored under the Name of Belus; the Phenicians, under that of Moloch; the Egyptians, of Hammon; the Arcadians, of Pan; the Romans, of Jupiter: And as if the World had been too great to be governed by one sole Deity, they assign'd every part of it to a particular ticular God, that he might have the more leisure and less trouble in governing it; or, to speak more properly, 'twas Nature in her various Scenes they intended to adore, and over each of her parts a Divinity was made to preside. They worshipped the Earth, under the Names of Rhea, Tellus, Ops, Cybele, Proserpina, Maia, Flora, Faunus, Pales, and Vertumnus; the Fire, under those of Vulcan and Vesta; the Water of the Sea and Rivers, under those of Oceanus, Neptune, Nereus, the Nereids, Nymphs and Naiads; the Air and Winds, under the Names of Jupiter and Æolus; the Sun, under those of Apollo, Titan, Osiris, &c. the Moon, under those of Diana, Isis, &c. Bacchus was the God of Wine; Ceres, the Goddess of Corn; every River and Fountain had its tutelar Deity; Hell, its Pluto; the Sea, Neptune and Tethys; the Woods and Mountains, their Nymphs and Satyrs.

The Colonies from Egypt and Phenicia which settled in Greece, brought thither their religious Worship, and this Worship spread itself by degrees thro' the different Provinces of which Greece was composed. This was even one of the highest marks of Esteem, that a City could give its Neighbours, to adopt their religious Worship and Ceremonies; for each of them had their own Priests, and other Ministers, who regulated divine things, added to or retrenched from the primitive Worship. Of all these, a confused Medley was made up, whereby the Religion of the Greeks became, of all others, the most monstrous and superstitious. Read Pausanias's Travels, you shall find all along, Temples, Altars, Statues of Gods, of different Metals, of different Forms, and with particular Names, which they had got either from the Place, from some pretended Prodigy, or some publick Vow.

The Passions too and Affections had Divinities assign'd to them: Venus and Priapus presided over Generation; Morpheus over Sleep; Hebe and Horta over Youth; Juturna among the Latins, and Hygieia among the Greeks, were the Goddesses of Health; and

Isis of Sickneſs (a). They eſtabliſhed a Bellona for War, a Pomus for the Gardens, Furies for the infernal Regions. All theſe Divinities had Temples, Altars, and Sacrifices; and as the Paſſions never forget themſelves, there was no Crime but had a Patron God. The Adulterers own'd Jupiter; the Ladies of Gallantry, Venus; Jealous Wives, Juno; and the Pick-pockets, Mercury and the Goddeſs Laverna. This is not all; there were Deſtinies to over-rule every Action in life. Over Marriage preſided Juno, Hymeneus, Thalaffius, Lucina, Jugatinus, Domiducus, and ſeveral others, whoſe infamous Occupations are enough to put every virtuous Perſon to the bluſh (1). Big-bellied Women, or in Child-bed, invoked the Bona Dea, Juno, Lucina, Hecate, Sospita, Mena, the Nixii Dei, Intercidona, Mater Matuta, Deverra, Egeria, Fluonia, Pertunda, Prorſa, Postverta, Rumilia, Divinities whoſe Names, as well as thoſe of the other Gods who preſided over every Action in life, denoted their Functions. For Children, they invoked the Goddeſs Nascio or Natio, Opis, Rumina, Potina, Cunina, Levana, Parentia, Carnea, Eduſa, Oſilago, Statilinus, *Vegitanus, Fabulinus, Juventa, Nondina, Orbona; and this laſt Goddeſs was for Orphans, or to comfort Fathers and Mothers for the loſs of their Children. When the Child was laid down on the ground, they recommended him to the Gods Pilumnus and Picumnus; For fear too that the God Silvanus ſhould do him harm, there were three other Deities who watched at the Gates, Intercido, Pilumnus, and Deverra. For we muſt know, that at the Nativity of a Child, they knocked at the Gate firſt with an Ax, then with a Mallet, and laſt of all, they ſwept the Porch, believing that Sylvanus ſeeing theſe three Signs, durſt not attempt to harm the Children, whom he thus judged to be under the protection of thoſe three Divinities. Statilinus preſided over Children's Education; Fabulinus taught them to ſpeak; Parentia kept away from

O 3

them

(a) At preſent we only name all theſe Gods. In the third Vol. they make up a part of the History of the Roman Divinities.

(1) S. Aug. de Civ. Dei.

* Commonly called Vaticanus.

them frightful terrifying Objects ; Nondina * presided over the Names given them ; Cunina had the charge of the Cradle ; in fine, Rumia preserv'd the Milk to their Mothers. The Epidotes were Gods that presided over the growth of Children, as their Name declares (a).

Tho' Gods who watched over the Birth and Preservation of Children were thus numerous, yet there were at least as many for the Fruits and Harvests. S. Augustine, who in his Book of the City of God, has preserv'd to us the Names of several Gods, whom it would be in vain to search for elsewhere, enumerates sixteen of 'em who watched over the sown Corn and over the Crop. A Seia for the Grain new sown : Segetia, when it began to spring up : Tutilina, to preserve it in the Granary ; Proserpina, while the Stalk was forming ; Pateлина, when it was ready to put forth the Ear ; Nodotus, when it began to knot ; Patilena, Flora, Hostilina, Lacturtia, Matuta, Rumina, and Robigus, and several others, to whom they offered Sacrifices in the different Seasons of the Year. They had besides a Venus Libitina, to preside at Death ; Plutus and Ops, for Riches ; Janus, Forculus, Cardea, and Limentina, to take care of the Gates ; Clusius and Patuleius were the Gods they invoked at opening or shutting them (b) ; Laterculus and the Penates, for the Hearths ; Jupiter Erceus †, for the Walls ; the Goddesses Flora, Pomona, and the Gods Vertumnus and Priapus, were Guardians of Orchards, Flowers, and Fruits, as Deverrona watched over the Crop. The God Terminus took care of the Fields and Marches. They had likewise a Hippona for Horses, Bubona for Oxen, Mellona for Bees. Murcia was the Goddess

* The Males were purify'd and got a Name on the ninth day after their Birth, and the Females on the eighth day. See Macrob. Sat. l. i. c. 16.

(a) Ἐπίδα, superaddo, augeo, to augment.

(b) Forculus quasi a Foribus ; Cardea, a cardinibus ; Limentina, a Limine. All the other Gods had Names conformable to their Offices, both among Greeks and Romans. See S. Augustine de Civitate Dei, l. 4, 5, and 6. Lactantius after Pausanias, Pliny, &c.

† Or Herceus, from ἑρκεος Septum ; to him Altars were consecrated by private Persons, within the Aula or Court of the House. Scidas in voce ἑρκεος Ζευς, & Arnob. l. 7.

Goddess of Sloth ; Ossilago was invoked when they were about to rectify strain'd or broken Bones. Agénoria was for inspiring Courage. Hebe presided over Youth, Senuius over Old-age ; Momus, for Raillery ; for Jollity, Vetula ; for Pleasures, Volopta ; for Poverty, Pénia. The great Talkers invoked Aius Locutius ; Harpocrates and Sigalion were the Gods of Silence. Pellonia was established to free them from whatever was annoying ; Populonia, to divert all sorts of Devastation. They had made a Divinity of Life under the Name of *Vitula, and the Fever too had its Altars. They had a God of Ordure, named Stercutius ; one for other Conveniencies, Crepitus ; a Goddess for the Common-sewers, Cloacina.

Over Justice presided Astrea, Themis, and Dicé. Over the coining of Brass Money, Æs, Æsculanus, and Æres ; over Specie of all sorts, Juno-Moneta, or simply, Moneta. Aristæus and Mellonia were the Gods of Bees ; Sclecia, the Goddess of Tempests ; Æolus the God of the Winds. Vallonia and Epunda took care of things exposed to the Air. Myagrus, Muyodes, and Achor, were the Gods of Flies. Pavor, Timor, Pallor, were those whose Invention was owing to Terror, Fear, and Paleness which accompanies them. Imprudence itself had its tutelar Divinity, whom they named Coalemus : Catius made Persons smart and witty, and Comus the God of Revels, gay and contented. In fine, there was nothing which had not a friendly Divinity. The Romans had two of 'em for Love ; the one for mutual Flames, the other to avenge slighted Lovers (a) ; and this Passion was the Divinity of greatest Antiquity, and most universally ador'd. The same People had likewise two Temples of Modesty, one dedicated to the Chastity of the Nobles, and the other to that of the Populace : In fine, there were of them every where to be seen erected to Peace, Victory, Poverty, Faith, Clemency, Piety, Justice, Liberty, Concord, Fortune, Discord, Ambition. Men were

O 4

* Vid. Macro. Sat. l. 3. c. 2.

(a) Ovid calls him a Love of Forgetfulness ; Lethæus Amor, l. 2. de Remed. Amoris.

were apprehensive of Evil, desirous of Good, wanted to gratify their Inclinations without remorse ; and this was the Original of all those Divinities, natural and metaphorical, whose Names correspond to their Employments, who were looked upon as so many Genii dispersed thro' the World, whose Motions they thought were regulated by them, and believing them to be of a malevolent Disposition, they courted their Favour by Prayers and Sacrifices. The Poets invoked Apollo, Minerva, and the Muses ; the Orators, Suada and Pitbo ; the Physicians, Esculapius, Meditrina, Consus, Hygieia, and Telesphorus ; the Servants and Maids, the Gods named Anculi, and Anculae ; Shepherds, the God Pan ; Cow-herds, the Goddess Bubona ; Horsemen, Castor and Hippona.

As each Profession had its Gods, so had every Action in Life : Thus over different Actions presided, Volumnus, Volupia, Libentia, Horfa, Horfilia, Stimula, Strenua, Stata, Adeona, Ageronia, Agonis, Abeona, Fesloria, Fugia, Pellonia, Catius, Fidius or Sanctus-Fidius, Sanctus or Dius, Murcia, Nonia, Numerica, Vacuna, Vertumnus, Victus, Vestitus, Vibilia (a). They likewise invented Gods for every part of the Body ; the Sun presided over the Heart, Jupiter over the Head and Liver, Mars over the Entrails, Minerva over the Eyes and Fingers, Juno over the Eyebrows, Pluto over the Back, Venus over the Reins, Saturn over the Spleen, Mercury over the Tongue, Tethys over the Feet, the Moon over the Stomach, the Genius and Modesty over the Forehead, Memory over the Ears, Faith or Bona Fides over the right Hand, Compassion over the Knees.

They deify'd every Virtue, as we said before ; Clemency, Concord, Justice, Mercy, Piety, Modesty, Prudence, Wisdom, Honour, Truth, Peace, Liberty, and many others.

It

(a) We have quoted no Authorities for all this ; they who want them need but read the Greek and Roman Histories, especially Pausanias, Strabo, Livy, &c. and S. Augustine.

It is not to be expected that I should give a larger Account of these subaltern Divinities; their Names sufficiently point out their Offices, and the bare naming them is enough to give one a notion of them, when they occur in the Poets and Mythologists. I shall only remark, 1. That almost the whole of these Divinities were of Roman Invention, as their Names sufficiently discover; whereby we see how many Gods, known to none but the Romans themselves, had been introduced by those Lords of the World, tho' they had besides adopted almost all the Gods of every Nation which they subdued. 2. That the greater part of these Divinities were the Invention of Sculptors and Painters. 3. That some of them were peculiar to certain Families, and sometimes even to single Persons. 4. That all these deify'd Virtues were nothing but Symbols that represented them, either upon Medals, where numbers of them are to be found, or upon other Monuments, and in Inscriptions. 5. That their Worship was neither in so great Reputation nor Extent, as that of the great Gods; and yet a great many of 'em had their Altars and Chapels, and were invoked at certain times; as before Harvest, at the Vintages, when they gather'd the Fruits, in Diseases upon Men or Beasts, &c.

Besides these Gods, whose number is already exorbitant, every Nation had some peculiar to itself; as others were affected by certain Towns; and this particularly among the Greeks and Romans; whether they were believ'd to have been born in those Towns, or to afford them a particular Protection. In a word, the whole world almost was divided among several Divinities, and excepting the great Gods who were acknowledged universally, tho' honoured more particularly in certain Places, the rest were worshipped only among some Nations, and in certain Countries. Hence those Gods were called Topick, or Popular, and have mostly derived their Names, as we shall see in their History, from the different Places where they were honoured.

Thus Jupiter was peculiarly honoured in Crete, where he was believed to have been brought up, at Diète,

Diæe, on Mount Ida, on Mount Olympus, at Pirea in Epirus, at Dodona. Juno at Argos, at Mycenæ, at Phalifca, at Samos, at Carthage. Ceres in Sicily, and at Eleusis. Vesta or Cybele, throughout all Phrygia, above all at Berecynthus, and Pessinus. Minerva at Alalcomene, Athens and Argos. Apollo at Chrysa, a City in Phrygia, at Delphos, at Cylla, at Claros one of the Cyclades, at Cynthus a Mountain in Delos, at Grynium, at Lesbos, at Miletos, Patara, Phaselis a Mountain in Lycia, at Smyntus, Rhodes, Tenedos, Cyrrha, among the Hyperboreans, and elsewhere. Diana at Ephesus, Delos, Mycenæ, at Brauron in Attica, at Magnesia, upon Mount Menala, at Segesta, &c. Venus at Amathus in Cyprus, at Cythera, Gnidus, Paphos, Idalia, upon Mount Eryx in Sicily, upon Ida in Phrygia. Mars at Rome, among the Getes, and other northern People, as the Scythians and Thracians. Vulcan in the Æolian Islands, at Lemnos, near Mount Ætna; and in earlier times in Egypt, whose first Divinity he was, according to the best Authors. Mercury, upon Helicon, and the Cyllenian Mountains, at Nonacria, and generally thro' all Arcadia. Neptune, in the Isthmus of Corinth, at Tænarus, and upon all the Seas. Nereus, upon the Sea-Coasts, and by Seamen. Saturn, in several Places of Italy. Pluto, in all the Sacrifices offered to the Dead. Bacchus, at Thebes, Nysa, Naxos, &c. Esculapius, at Epidaurus, at Rome, and elsewhere. Pan, upon Mount Menalus in Arcadia. &c. Fortune, at Antium; Æolus, in the Isles that bore his Name. These were the principal Places in Greece, in Asia minor, and in Italy, where the Gods were honoured with a particular Worship.

Lastly, to compleat the Absurdity, they worshipped the brute Animals and Reptiles: Nor was it only particular Persons that offer'd them Incense and Sacrifices, but whole Cities where their Worship was established; thus Memphis and Heliopolis ador'd the Ox, Sais and Thebes the Sheep, Cynopolis the Dogs, Mendes the Goats, the Assyrians the Pigeons (a). In some Towns they

worship'd

(a) We shall explain in the 6th Book, what we are to think of the Worship paid to mere Animals.

worship'd the Monkeys, in others the Crocodiles and Lizards, the Ravens, the Storks, the Eagle, the Lion; and these Towns even frequently bore the Name of the Animals that were the Objects of their Worship, as Cynopolis, Leontopolis, Mendes, &c. The Fishes too became the Object of a superstitious Worship, not only among the Syrians, who durst not so much as eat of them, but also in several Towns in Egypt, Lydia and other Countries. Some placed upon their Altars Eels, others Tortoises, and others Pikes (b).

They did not stop here: The Insects, the very Serpents were worship'd in Egypt, and in several other Countries. Epidaurus and Rome had Temples erected to the Adder, which they believ'd represented Esculapius. There was nothing, even to the smallest Insects, but became the Object of this foolish Superstition: The Thessalians honour'd the Pismires, to whom they thought they ow'd their Original; the Acar-nanians the Flies; and if the Inhabitants of Accaron did not worship them, they at least offer'd Incense to the Genius who drove them away, and Beelzebub was their great Divinity. In fine, the very Stones were the Objects of publick Worship; as that which Saturn had swallow'd instead of Jupiter, and that which among the Phrygians represented the Mother of the Gods, and the God Terminus, who was a sort of March-stone or piece of a Rock.

Were we now to speak of the Heroes and Demi-Gods, what a prodigious Number of them shall we find? Their Temples were diffused over all the Earth, and their Worship, tho' less solemn than that of the Gods, made a considerable part of the Pagan Religion. Æneas, surnam'd Jupiter-Indigetes had a Chapel erected to his honour upon the banks of the River Numicus; Janus, Faunus, Picus, Evander, Fatua or Carmenta, Acca-Laurentia or Flora, Matuta, Portumnus, Mania, Anna-Perrenna, Vertumnus, Romulus, and several others, were honoured in the Latin Country.

Her-

(b) For all these, consult Vossius de Idol. who treats of them at great length.

Hercules (a), Theseus, Castor and Pollux, Helen, Agamemnon, and most of the Heroes of the Golden Fleece, or of the Siege of Troy, had Temples and Altars in most of the Cities of Greece. Laconia honour'd Hyacinthus, and Timomarchus who fought for the Lacedemonians against the People of Amyclæ; not to mention Agamemnon, Menelaus, Paris and Deiphobus. The Messenians offer'd Incense and Sacrifices to Polycaon, to his Wife Messena, to their Son Triopas, and to the celebrated Machaon Son of Esculapius. The Arcadians granted divine Honours to Calisto, to his Son Arcas, to Aristeus who had quitted the Island of Cos where he was born, for Arcadia where he taught that People the Art of training up Bees. The People of Argos honour'd Perseus, Lynceus, Hypermnestra, Io, Apis. The Acarnanians rever'd Amphilochus, and consulted his Oracles. The People of Athens had fill'd that famous City with the Temples of Cecrops, of his Daughters Aglauros, Herse and Pandrosos, of Celeus and Triptolemus his Son, of Erechtheus and his Daughters: There also were to be seen the Temples of Ægeus, Theseus, Dedalus, of Perdix his Nephew, of Androgeos, Alcmena, Æacus, of Iolaus the famous Companion of Hercules in his Labours, of Codrus, and an Infinity of others. At Delphos was to be seen that of Neoptolemus; at Megara that of Alcathous; among the Oropians that of Amphiaræus. Thebes was famous, not only for the Worship of Bacchus, Semele, Cadmus, Hermione, but also of that whole illustrious Family: Thus Ino and Melicerta had their Temples and their Altars there, as well as Hercules, Iolaus, and Amphiaræus. In Elis, the Women sacrificed once a year to Hippodamia, the Daughter of Pelops. Telesphorus was honour'd at Pergamus; Damia or Lamia, at Epidaurus; Nemesis at Rhamnus; Sanctus or Sangus, among the Sabines; Adramus and Pelicus, in Sicily; Coronis at Sicyon; Theagenes

(a) There is none of the Gods Indiges, whose Worship was more extensive than that of Hercules. Greece, Italy, Gaul, Spain, Africk, Libya, Egypt and Phenicia had Temples and Altars erected to him.

agenes among the Thebians; Boreas in Thrace; Pater-Curis among the Volscans; Tellenus at Aquileia; Tanais in Armenia; Ferentina at Ferentum; Tages in Etruria, the modern Tuscany; Feronia in several Places of Italy; Marica at Minturnæ; the Graces at Orcho-menos; the Muses in Pieria, and at Lesbos; and Amphilochus at Gropos. Thessaly sacrificed to Peleus, to Chiron, to Achilles. The Island of Tenedos to Tenes; that of Chios to Aristeus and Drimachus; Samos to Lysander; Naxos to Ariadne; the Æginetæ to Æacus; the People of Salamis to the famous Ajax, Son of Telamon; the Island of Crete to Europa, Idomeneus, Molon and Minos. In Africk were to be seen the Temples of several Kings. The Moors honour'd Juba; the Cyrenians Battus; the Carthaginians Dido, Amilcar, &c. The Thracians Orpheus, and their Legislator Zamolxis.

There would be no end of it, were we to run over all the other Places celebrated for the Worship of some particular Divinity, since the whole Earth was full of Temples and Altars, raised not only to the great Gods, but also to the Indigetes (a); and, generally speaking, every People and City advanced their Founders and Conquerors to a Place among the Gods. If Proofs should be thought necessary for all that I have said upon this last Article, we need but read Strabo, Pausanias, who mentions Temples consecrated to all those Heroes; and among the Moderns, Meursius in his excellent Treatise of the Festivals of Greece; the first Book of Vossius, and Rosinus (1).

In fine, if to all these Gods we add the Genii and the Junones, who were as guardian Angels to every Man and Woman, we shall have no difficulty in believing what Pliny says, that the number of the Gods surpassed that of Men (b); far less what Varro reports, who makes the number amount to thirty thousand.

I

(a) For all these Indigetes and their Worship, consult Pausanias and Strabo; and, among the Moderns, Meursius's Græcia Feriata, and Vossius de Idol. Lib. 1. (1) L. 2, & 3.

(b) Major cœlitum populus etiam quam hominum intelligi potest, cum singuli quoque ex semetipsis totidem Deos faciant, Junones, Geniosque adaptando sibi. Plin, L. 2.

I am far from denying there were some in every Age; thro' almost every Country of the World, who sincerely rejected those ridiculous Deities, at least the most of them. I know God reserved to himself some Servants among the most idolatrous Nations; that Salem had its Melchisedeck, the Idumeans their Job, the Chaldeans their Abraham: But excepting these, we may believe that the whole Earth was overspread with the Darkness of Idolatry; that there were none but the Jewish People in a Corner of the World, who retained the Idea and Worship of the true God; nay, that same People, who are but too justly charged with Ingratitude, and always immers'd in Sensuality, notwithstanding the conspicuous Favours they received from their God, and the continual Prohibitions of the Prophets, suffered themselves but too often to be drawn away by the fatal Propensity which they had to Idolatry.

It may be objected against what I have been now saying of the Progress of Idolatry, that all the false Divinities of the Pagans were but different Attributes of the true God; that they adored his Justice, for example, in Themis, his Sovereign Power in Jupiter, his Eloquence in Mercury, his Wisdom in Pallas, and so of the rest; but this would not make them the more excusable, having thus distributed and parcel'd out among the several Gods, the Perfections of a Being who is one in Essence. We may judge the same way of the Poets and Philosophers, who believed God to be the Soul of this vast Universe, that gave it Life and Motion.

*Spiritus intus alit, totamque infusa per artus
Mens agitai molem, & magno se corpore miscet:*

. Deum namque ire per omnes

Terrasque, tractusque maris, cælumque profundum (1).

This was the favourite Opinion of the Stoicks, as Cicero tells us (2): Every one gave to this universal Soul of the World, the Name of some Divinity. Strabo said it was Jupiter; according to Dionysius Halicarnassensis, it was Saturn; Macrobius would have it to be the Sun;

Apu-

(1) Æn. 1. 6.

(2) Quæst. Acad. 1. 4.

leius the Moon: Others Pan, or Juno, or Minerva; or rather, according to the Opinion of Zeno (1), it was one and the same Soul of the World, that took all these different Names, according to the different Relations of its Power: That it was called Dios, because by it all things are made; Athena, because its Empire is in the Heavens; Hera, or Juno, because it presides over the Air; Poseidon or Neptune, because it resides in the Water; Vulcan, because it dwells in the Fire (2). To acknowledge and adore as a Divinity, this universal Soul, which is a portion of the World, extended like the Body it animates, this is indeed a more refined sort of Idolatry than that of the Vulgar; but still 'tis to pay that Homage to a material Object, which is due to God alone; or rather it was an Atheism like that of Strato, Pliny, Spinoza, and the greatest part of the Chinese Literati.

But having proved that Idolatry arrived only by degrees at that pitch of Absurdity we have seen, it remains to shew in a few words, in what manner the Worship paid to false Gods, arose to the very height of Abomination.

As in the first Ages, most Nations knew neither Towns nor Houses, and dwelt only in Huts, or under moveable Tents, wandering about to different Places in quest of fix'd Settlements, it was neither easy nor convenient for them to build Temples and set up Idols; and this is what obliged them at first to choose for the Exercise of their Religion, Caverns, Groves, and Mountains, the Priests and Legislators having considered those retired Places, as exceeding proper to give a more venerable Aspect to the Mysteries of Religion. Pliny expresses himself clearly upon this Subject. The Trees, says he, and Fields were in old times the Temples of the Gods. Arbores fuere Numinum Tempia, priscoque ritu simplicia rura. This is what gave rise to the Consecration of Groves, a Custom that lasted as long as Idolatry itself.

We

(1) See Diog. Laert. (2) This was likewise the Sentiment of Varro. See S. Augustine de Civ. Dei, l. 27. c. 23.

We are to observe, in the first place, that when they came to build Temples, the sacred Groves still continued to be in use, and oft-times they inclosed them with a Plantation. Secondly, that those first Temples had no Idols. 'Twas not till the Invention of Architecture that the Art of making Figures came to be known. Herodotus (1) and Lucian (2) let us know this much of the Egyptians and Scythians. If we may believe Plutarch after Varro (3), the Romans were 170 Years without Statues or Idols, and even Numa Pompilius prohibited them by a Law equally wise and judicious: Accordingly, when they found the Books of that Prince, which had been a long time lost, they caused them to be burned, probably because they condemned a Custom then become too universal to be abolished, unless we will say they burned them as doubtful or spurious Books. In like manner, Silius Italicus tells us, that the Temple of Jupiter Annon was without any Idol, and that the eternal Fire they preserved there, represented the Divinity of the Place. In fine, not to be tedious by too many Quotations, Tertullian lets us know, that even in his time there were several Temples that had no Statues; and this is the meaning of the Author of the Book of Wisdom, when speaking about Idols: Neque enim erant ab initio, neque erunt in perpetuum.

We are to remark in the third place, that before Statuary was invented, they paid a religious Worship to shapeless Stones, to Pillars, and other things of that nature; this is what we learn from several Authors. Sanctioniathon says, the most ancient Statues were nothing but unhew'd Stones, which he calls Bætilia; which Word probably comes from Bethel, the Name which Jacob gave to the Stone he set up for an Altar, after his wrestling with the Angel (4). Pausanias speaks of the Statues of Hercules and of Cupid, that were nothing but two Masses of Stone. The same Author adds, that there were seen even in one Place, thirty square

(1) Lib. 1.
Dei, l. 4. c. 31.

(2) De Dea Syria.

(4) Gen. 28.

(3) See S. Augustine de Civ.

square Stones, which had the Names of so many Divinities. The Scythians, according to Herodotus (1), worshipped a Sword which represented the God Mars. Other Nations, as Justin has it, directed their Worship to a Spear; and hence came the Custom of giving Spears to the Statues of the Gods, Ab Origine rerum pro Diis immortalibus hastas coluerunt: Ob cujus religionis memoriam, adhuc Deorum Simulachris hastæ adduntur.

l. 43. The famous Scepter of Agamemnon which Homer speaks of, was worshipped by the People of Chæronea, as a Symbol of Jupiter. In fine, we learn from Arnobius, that the Persians worshipped the Fire and the Rivers; the Arabians, a shapeless Stone; the Thespians, a Bough of a Tree; the Carians, Wood; the People of Pessinus, a Flint Stone; the Romans, Romulus's Spear; and the Samians, a Well. Videtis temporibus priscis Persas fluvios coluisse, memoralia ut indicant scripta; informem Arabas Lapidem, Acinacem Scythiæ nationes, Ramum pro Cynthia Thespios; Lignum Cariis pro Diana colebatur; Pessinuntios silicem pro Deum matre, pro Marte Romanos hastam, Puteum Samios pro Junone (2). When the Art of making Statues (the Honour of which is ascrib'd to Prometheus) was invented, and Dedalus had brought it to perfection, all these Divinities without Form were rejected, and from that time Idolatry began to make considerable progress. They carry'd Superstition so far, as even to believe that the Deities themselves resided in the Statues that represented them; and so universally was this Opinion received, that Stilpo the Philosopher having undertaken to prove that the Minerva of Phidias was not a God, was arraigned before the Areopagus, where he was obliged in his own defence, to have recourse to a pitiful Evasion, and to say he had asserted, the Statue was not a God, because it was a Goddess; which however did not hinder him from being banished.

As all Religion necessarily requires a Worship, after having treated of the Rise and Progress of Idolatry,

P

and

(1) L. 4.

(2) Arnobius adv. Gentes, l. 6.

and of the Gods it introduced, it is necessary to consider the Worship they paid to those different Divinities; the Altars, Temples, Priests, Sacrifices, Victims, Instruments of Sacrifice, Oracles, Festivals, &c. which shall be the Subject of so many Chapters.

C H A P. V.

Of the Temples of the Pagans, of their Form, Antiquity, &c.

TH E Antiquity of Temples is a thing as unquestionable, as the Time when they began to be used is uncertain. As 'twas in Phenicia and Egypt that Idolatry took its rise, not long after the Deluge, these are the two Countries, to be sure, where we are to seek for the Origin of whatever concerns the Worship of false Gods, and the Use of Temples, which they introduced. Herodotus and Lucian expressly tell us so of the Egyptians; but we are to observe at the same time, that the System of that false Religion was not established all at once, and that its Ceremonies were only introduced by piece-meal. At first, the Gods were honoured after a gross manner; simple Altars of rough Stone, or Turf, set up in the open Fields, were all the Apparatus of the Sacrifices they offered them. Chapels, that is, close Places, and at last Temples, were only introduced in later times; and accordingly, we do not find that the Egyptians had any in Moses's time, otherwise he had mentioned them, as he had frequent occasion to do. Thus, I am confident that the Tabernacle he made in the Desert, which was a portable Temple, is the first of the kind that is known, and perhaps the Model of all the rest. The Tabernacle had a Place more sacred than the rest, the Sancta Sanctorum, which answers to the holy and more sacred Places in the Pagan Temples, which they called Adyta. This Temple, exposed to the view of Nations, bordering upon the Places which the Israelites passed thro' for forty Years, might give occasion to those Idolaters to build others like to it, it, tho' not portable ; at least it is certain, they had of 'em before the building of the Temple of Jerusalem. The first made mention of in Scripture, is that of Dagon among the Philistines. But be that as it will, the Custom of building Temples in honour of the Gods, was derived from Egypt to the other Nations. Lucian (1) says, it was propagated from that Country to the Assyrians, under which Name he must needs comprehend the adjacent Countries, Phenicia, Syria, and others. From Egypt and Phenicia, it passed to Greece with the Colonies, and from Greece to Rome ; this is the Course of Fables and Idolatry, as we observe so frequently in this Work ; and this Opinion is grounded upon Herodotus, and upon all the Evidence Antiquity can afford. Deucalion has the glory ascrib'd to him of having built the first Temples in Greece, and Janus in Italy. As for Italy, others will have it that the Honour thereof belongs to Faunus, from whom was derived the Name Fanum, which among the Latins signifies a Temple ; but all these Inquiries are equally frivolous and uncertain. What we are better warranted to say, is, that the small Chapels, mostly rear'd up by private Persons, in the open Fields, were very soon succeeded by regular Buildings, and at last by Master-pieces of Architecture. We may see in Herodotus, and other Authors, what was the Magnificence of the Temple of Vulcan in Egypt, which so many Kings had much ado to finish : A Prince gained no small Honour, if, in the course of a long Reign, he was able to build one Portico of it. In Pausanias you have the Description of the Temple of Jupiter Olympius (2), which I shall give at the end of this Chapter, with that of other Temples I here mention. That of Delphi, as famous for its Oracles, as for the immense Presents with which it was enrich'd, deserves to be known. That of Diana at Ephesus, that Master-piece of Art, and so renown'd, that a mad Fool (3) thought to immortalize his Name by burning it, was as rich as magnificent. The Pantheon, a Specimen of the Magni-

(1) De Dea Syria.

(2) In Elia.

(3) Erostratus.

cence of Agrippa, Augustus's Son-in-law, is still subsisting, and is dedicated to all the Saints, as it was formerly to all the Gods. In fine, the Temple of Belus, or rather that grand and magnificent Tower, composed of seven Stories, whereof the highest contained the Statue of that God, with the other things Herodotus speaks of, as it was the ancientest of all those I have named, so it was the most singular, and the most magnificent.

These are the most stately of the Pagan Temples, whereof the Memory is preserved to us in History. The others of less Distinction are so numerous, that it would require whole Volumes to describe them, nor would it be a thing of any use. In Rome alone, there are reckoned to have been upwards of a thousand, great and small together. The Antiquaries have given us the Plan and Elevation of some of those Temples, especially F. Montfaucon (1), who may be consulted.

As the Latins use a variety of Words for a Temple, Templum, Fanum, Ædes, Sacrarium, Delubrum, &c. the Grammarians and Commentators have search'd into the Etymology of each of these Denominations; but when all is well examined, it appears that these Names signify'd Places consecrated to the Gods, distinguished from one another more by their Size than Form, altho' very good Authors make other Distinctions between them. Fanum in early times seems to have denoted the Place designed for a Temple, and to have been the Word appropriated afterwards, to signify a little Temple, as likewise the word Sacrarium. Accordingly, Cicero (2) twice makes use of these two Words, to describe a small Temple which Ceres had at Catana in Sicily. That Orator elsewhere uses the word Sacrarium, for the private Chapels every one had in his own House; but these Chapels were more frequently express'd by the word Lararium. Ædes, if we believe Varro, whose Testimony is quoted by Aulus Gellius (3), imply'd that the Temple was constituted by the Augurs; whence he concludes, that every thing they

(1) Ant. expl. Vol. 2. B. 2. (2) In his fourth against Verrus
 (3) Noct. Att. l. 14. c. 7.

they called Ædes, was not a Temple; but this Distinction is without foundation, for Authors use both Expressions promiscuously for Buildings consecrated to the Gods. The Case was otherwise as to the word Delubrum, which, according to Asconius, properly signify'd a Temple consecrated to several Divinities, and which had in it several Chapels, as the Pantheon was a Temple consecrated to all the Gods. The word Templum did not even always denote a Building, since the Augurs apply'd it to the Plots of Ground inclosed with Pallisadoes or Nets, which they mark'd out with the Augural Staff, in order to take the Auguries*.

The Temples of the Ancients were divided into several Parts, which it is proper to distinguish, for understanding the Descriptions they give of them. The first was the Porch, where was the Pool, whence the Priests, Æditi, drew the Holy-Water for the Expiation of such as were to enter into the Temples; the Nave ναὸς; and the holy Place called Penetræle, Sacrarium, Adytum, into which private Persons were not permitted to enter; and last of all, the back Temple, ἐπισθόδιον; but this last Division was not in every one. The Temples had often Porticoes, and always Steps of ascent. There were some of them too with Galleries carry'd quite round; these Galleries were composed of a Range of Pillars, set at a certain distance from the Wall, cover'd with large Stones: Temples of this sort were called Peripteres, that is to say, wing'd all around; and Dipteres, when the Gallery had two Rows of Pillars; Prostyles, when the Pillars form'd the Portico without a Gallery; and lastly, Hypethres, when they had two Rows of Pillars on the Outside, and as many on the Inside, the Middle being wholly uncovered, much after the form of our Cloysters. Vitruvius takes notice of some other Particularities, that may be seen in his Work.

* Or to those Spaces in the Heavens, which the Augur circumscrib'd with his Eye. Hence Varro derives the Word a Templando, i. e. Contemplando.

The inner part of the Temple was often very much adorned ; for besides the Statues of the Gods, which were sometimes of Gold, Ivory, Ebony, or of some other precious Materials, and those of the great Men (a) which were sometimes very numerous, it was ordinary to see there Paintings, Gildings, and other Embellishments, among which we must not forget the Offerings, or the Ex voto ; that is to say, Prows of Ships, dedicated upon their being saved from Shipwreck, by the assistance, as they thought, of some God ; Tablets, Tabellas, for the cure of a Disease ; Arms won from the Enemy, Colours, Tripods, and votive Bucklers, like those two which are in the King of France's Cabinet of Medals, the History whereof is in the ninth Volume of the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles-Lettres (b). There were especially in the Temple of Delphos, and in several Temples at Rome, immense Riches of this kind. Besides these sorts of Ornaments, they were not wanting on Holidays to deck the Temples with Branches of Laurel, Olive, and Ivy.

When they were to build a Temple, the Aruspices were employed to choose the Place where, and Time when they were to begin the Work. This Place was purify'd with great Care ; they even encircled it with Fillets and Garlands (1). The Vestals, accompanied with young Boys and Girls, washed this Spot of Ground with Water, pure and clean, and the Priest expiated it by a solemn Sacrifice. Then he touched the Stone that was to be first laid in the Foundation, and which was bound with a Fillet ; and the People, animated with a mighty Zeal, threw it in thither with some Pieces of Money, or Metal which had never yet passed thro' the Furnace. When the Edifice was finish'd, there was also a Consecration of it, with grand Ceremonies, wherein the Priest, or, in his absence, some of his College presided.

Tacitus

(a) See the Description of the most celebrated Temples, at the end of this Chapter.

(b) See the Treatise de Donariis, by Thomasinus.

(1) See Tacitus Hist. l. 4. c. 53.

Tacitus (1) speaking of the Restoration of the Capitol, has transmitted to us the Form, and other Ceremonies in consecrating Ground, set apart for building a Temple. Vespasian, says he, having committed to L. Vestinus the Care of restoring the Capitol, that Roman Knight consulted the Aruspices, who informed him, that he was first to transport the Remains of the old Temple into the Marshes, and build a new one upon the same Foundations. On the 21st day of June, the Sky being clear and serene, the whole space of Ground designed for the Edifice, was enclosed with Fillets and Garlands. Such of the Soldiers as had auspicious Names, enter'd this Inclosure with Boughs in their hands; the Vestal Virgins succeeded, accompany'd by Boys and Girls, whose Fathers and Mothers were still alive, who besprinkled the whole Ground with Water from Fountain, Lake, or River. Then Helvidius Priscus the Prætor, preceded by Plautus Ælianus the Pontif, compleatly expiated the Inclosure, by sacrificing a Cow and some Bulls, as an Offering to Jupiter, Juno, Minerva, and the Tutelar Deities of the Empire, praying them to bring to a happy Issue this Building, which the Piety of Men had begun for their Habitation. The other Magistrates who assisted at this Ceremony, the Priests, the Senate, the Knights and People, full of Ardour and Joy, exerted themselves to remove a Stone of an enormous Bulk, in order to drag it to its proper Place. Lastly, they threw into the Foundation, several small Gold Coins, and other pieces of Metal, as we have said.

Of those Temples, some were not to be built within the Precincts of Cities, but without the Walls; as those of Mars, Vulcan, and Venus, for the Reasons given by Vitruvius (2). “When Temples are to be built to the “ Gods, says that Author, especially to those of them
“ who are Patrons of the City, if it be to Jupiter, Juno, “ or Minerva, they must be set on Places of the great“ est Eminence, whence one may have a view of the “ bulk of the Town-walls. If it is to Mercury, they P 4 “ must

(1) Hist. ibid. (2) L. 2. c. 2.

“ must be set in the Forum or Market-place, as is ob“ served in those of Isis and Serapis. Those of Apollo “ and Bacchus must be near the Theatre. Those of “ Hercules, when there is neither Gymnasium nor “ Amphitheatre, should be placed near the Circus.
 “ Those of Mars without the City, in the Fields; as “ those of Venus at the City-Gates. We find, con“ tinues he, in the Writings of the Tuscan Soothsayers, “ that they have a custom of placing the Temples of “ Venus, Vulcan, and Mars, without the Walls, lest
 “ if Venus was within the City itself, it might be a “ means of debauching young People, and Matrons “ too. Vulcan was also to be without, that Houses “ might not be in danger of taking fire. While Mars
 “ is without the Walls, there will be no Dissension “ among the People; nay more, he will be in the “ place of a Rampart, to secure the Walls of the “ City from the Hazards of War. The Temples of “ Ceres were likewise without the Cities, in Places not “ much frequented, unless to offer Sacrifices to her,
 “ that their Purity might not be defiled.” These Distinctions however were not always strictly observed.

The Idolaters had all possible Veneration for their Temples. If we may believe Arrian, it was forbid to blow one's nose, or spit there; and Dion adds, that sometimes they clamber'd up to them upon their knees.
 They were a Sanctuary for Criminals and Debtors, as we observe in the following Chapter. In fine, in times of publick Calamity, the Women prostrated themselves in the sacred Places, and swept the Pavements of them with their Hair. Sometimes, however, it happened, that when publick Disasters obstinately continued, the People lost all due Reverence for the Temples, and were so outrageous, as to fall a pelting the Walls with stones; an Instance whereof we find in Suetonius (1).

Tho' commonly both Men and Women enter'd into the Temples, yet there were some where the Men were forbid to enter; for instance, that of Diana at Rome, in the Street called the Vicus Patricius, as we learn

(1) In Calig.

learn from Plutarch, altho' they might enter into the other Temples of that Goddess. The Reason of this Prohibition is thought to have been, that a Woman, as she was praying in that Temple, had received a most cruel Insult.

Having taken a cursory View of the Pagan Temples, I judge it will not be from the purpose to give a particular Description of some of the most famous ones. By this we may judge to what a pitch Magnificence and Profusion had been carried.

The Temple of Belus.

As this Temple is allowed to be the most ancient of any in the Pagan World, as cannot be doubted ; so likewise was its Structure the most curious. Berosus, as Josephus relates (1), ascribes the building of it to Belus, who was himself worshipped there after his Death. But certain it is, if the Belus of that Historian be the same with Nimrod, as is very probable, his Design was not to build a Temple, but to erect a Tower, in order to shelter himself and his People from Inundations, if such a one as the Deluge should again happen. We know in what manner God put a stop to that mad Design. The Work continued in the same State it was in at the Confusion of Tongues, and was afterwards set apart for a Temple to Belus, who was deify'd after his death. This famous Tower, commonly called the Tower of Babel, formed a Square in its Base, each side containing a Stadium in length (a), which made a half Mile in circumference. The whole Work consisted of eight Towers, raised the one above the other, and diminishing gradually, from the lowest to the highest. Some Authors, as Prideaux remarks (2), being misled by the Latin Version of Herodotus, alledge, that each of these Towers was a Furlong in height, which would make the whole a Mile high ; but the Greek Text says no such thing, nor is any mention made of the height of the Edifice (b). Strabo,

(1) Antiq. L. 10. (2) Connec. Vol. 1.

(a) The Stadium, or Furlong, was a Space of 120 Toises.

(b) Herodotus only says, the Building was one Furlong in length, 120 Toises in breadth.

bo, who has also describ'd this Temple, allows no more than a Furlong for its height ; and as much for each side. The learned Publisher of the Edition of Pri-deaux at Trevoux, says, that according to the Measure of the Stadia used in the Time of Herodotus, the only ancient Author, who describes the Edifice from having seen it, it could not be more than sixty-nine Toises or thereabout in height ; that is but a little more than twice the height of the Towers of the Church of Paris ; which is not very extraordinary, considering the Magnificence of some Buildings in Europe. The same Editor farther remarks, that as this Work was framed only of Bricks, which Men carried upon their Backs, as we learn from the Ancients (1), and as Scripture tells us, concerning the Tower of Babel, its Construction has nothing in it surprizing ; and tho' it was higher than the great Pyramid, by a hundred and nineteen Feet, yet as the latter was built, or at least faced with Stones of an excessive length, which were to be hoisted up to so prodigious a height, the building of it must needs have been infinitely more difficult. But be that as it will, we learn from Herodotus, that they went up to the top of this Building by a winding Stair, which was on the outside. These eight Towers composed as it were so many Stories, each of which was seventy-five feet high, and in them they had disposed several great Chambers supported by Pillars, and other lesser ones, where People might rest themselves in going up. The highest was the most richly adorned, and that for which they had the greatest Veneration. In this Chamber, according to Herodotus, there was a stately Bed, and a Table of massy Gold, but no Statue.

Until the Time of Nebuchadnezzar, this Temple contained nothing but the Tower, and Chambers now mentioned, which were so many private Chapels. But that Monarch, as Berosus relates (2), enlarged it a great deal by the Edifices he built all around it, with a Wall that surrounded them, and brazen Gates ; in framing

(1) Herod. L. 1. Strabo, Lib. 16. Diod. Sic. L. 2. Arri. L. 7.

(2) Apud Joseph. Ant. L. 10.

framing whereof, the Sea of Brass, and the other Utensils of the Temple of Jerusalem, had been employed. This Temple was still subsisting in the time of Xerxes (1), who, as he returned from his unfortunate Expedition into Greece, order'd it to be demolished; having first pillaged its immense Riches, among which were Statues of massy Gold; one of them, as Diodorus Siculus has it (2), being forty feet high, and which was probably the same that Nebuchadnezzar had consecrated in the Plain of Dura. The Scripture, indeed, gives this Colossus ninety feet in height; but this is to be understood of the Statue and Pedestal taken both together.

There were likewise in the same Temple several Idols of solid Gold, and a great number of sacred Vases of the same Metal; whose Weight, according to the same Author, came to 5030 Talents; which, added to the Statue, amounted to immense Sums. In fine, it was from the Temple enlarged by Nebuchadnezzar, that Herodotus, who had seen it, took the Description in his first Book; and his Authority ought to be more regarded than that of Diodorus Siculus, who spoke of it only as he had heard from others. 'Tis true, Herodotus says, that in a low Chapel of this Temple, was a large golden Statue of Jupiter, that is of Belus; but he gives neither its Weight nor Dimensions, contenting himself with saying, that the Statue, with a golden Table, a Throne, and a Foot-stool, were all together estimated by the Babylonians at 800 Talents. The same Author adds, that without this Chapel was likewise an Altar of Gold, and a larger one, on which they sacrificed Animals full-grown, because it was not permitted to offer any such upon the Golden Altar, but those only that were not yet weaned; and that they burned yearly upon the great Altar Incense to the weight of an hundred thousand Talents. Lastly, he mentions another Statue of massy Gold, which he had not seen; but was told it amounted to twelve Cubits, or eighteen Feet in height. 'Tis, no doubt, the same that Diq-

(1) Herod. Lib. 1. App. L. 7. (2) Lib. 2.

Diodorus speaks of, tho' he gives it forty Feet in height ; which Account is the more credible of the two, if it was that of Nebuchadnezzar, as we have great reason to think.

But whatever be in that, I have observed from Herodotus, that in the highest Tower there was a magnificent Bed ; and this Author subjoins, that none was allowed to lie there, except a Woman of the City, whom the Priest of Belus chose every day, making her believe, that she was honoured there with the Presence of the God.

The Temple of Vulcan at Memphis.

The Egyptians, according to Herodotus, were the first People in the World who built Temples in honour of the Gods. I have no design to speak of all those that were in that Country ; but that of Vulcan, and some others, deserve a particular Consideration upon account of their Antiquity.

Altho' we have not any very full Description of the Temple of Vulcan, we may judge from what Herodotus says of it in several places of his History (1), that it must have been of surpassing Magnificence. First, as to its Antiquity, it seems to be unquestionable, since that Historian tells us it was built by Menes, the first who reigned in Egypt after the Gods and Demi-Gods. Probably 'twas not that Prince who gave all that Beauty to the Work, for which it was afterwards admired ; altho' Herodotus says, that even then it was grand and highly celebrated, since the primitive Buildings spoke nothing but a noble Simplicity. But the Successors of Menes ambitiously vied with one another in embellishing the Work of the Founder of their Monarchy, and in adorning it with the Statues we are going to mention ; for, according to the best Historians, there were no Statues in the ancient Temples of Egypt. Mæris, a powerful Prince, and extreamly rich, added to this first Temple the stately Porch, that was on the North side. Rhamfisinitus, Proteus's Successor, raised, according to the same Author, that which fronted to the West,

(1) Lib. 2. C. 99.

West, and placed over-against the Porch two Colossal Statues, each twenty-five Cubits, that is thirty-seven or thirty-eight Feet in height. The one, which the Egyptians worship'd, was called by them Summer, because it faced to the North : the other, for which they had no regard, was stiled Winter, and look'd to the South. In fine, Amasis set up before the same Temple an inverted Statue, seventy-five Feet high ; and upon this Colossus, which served for a Foundation, or rather Pedestal, he erected two other Statues, each twenty Feet in height, and of the same Marble with the great one.

It is easy judging, from Herodotus's Account, of the Magnificence and Extent of this Temple. In the meantime the inner Part of the Edifice, so far from inviting the Admiration of those who entered into it, only provoked the Contempt and Raillery of Cambyses, who broke out into an immoderate Fit of Laughter, at seeing the Statues of Vulcan, and the other Gods, like Pygmies (1) ; which, in truth, must needs have made a very ridiculous Contrast with the Colossus's in the Porches of which we have spoke. This perhaps was the same Temple which Menes had built : for the Works of the Egyptians were made to last an immense time.

Egypt had besides a great number of Temples every one of them richer than another ; such as that of Jupiter at Thebes or Diospolis ; and that of Andera at Hermunthis ; that of Proteus at Memphis, mentioned by Herodotus ; and that of Minerva at Sais, which, as the same Author tells us, Amasis had taken great pains to embellish with a Porch, which far surpassed in Grandeur and Magnificence, all the Monuments which the Kings his Predecessors had left. That same Prince added to it Statues of a prodigious size ; for the Egyptians loved Colossal Figures, not to mention Stones, that were hardly to be measured for their enormous Bigness, which came most of them from Elephantina, a Town at the distance of twenty days sailing from Sais.

(1) See the Article of the Cabiri, in the 6th Book.

Sais. The Particularities necessary to be entered into, in order to give a tolerable Notion of so many fine Works, would be too great a Digression ; but I can't forbear to take notice of a sort of Temple, the only one in its kind, I mean that Chapel of a single Stone, which the same Amasis had caused to be cut out of the Quarries in the upper Egypt, and be transported with incredible Labour and Pains, as far as Sais, where it was to be set up in the Temple of Minerva. Here is the Account given of it by Herodotus. “ But what I “ admire more than all the other Works done by Amasis's Orders, says that Author, he caused to be “ brought from Elephantina a House made of one “ single Stone ; which two thousand Men, all of them “ Pilots and Sailors, were not able to transport in less “ than three Years. The Front of this House was “ twenty-one Cubits (1), by fourteen in breadth, and “ eight in height ; and within the Walls five Cubits “ high, and eighteen in length.”

This House never entered the Temple of Minerva, but was left at the Gate, whether Amasis was provoked to see the Architect, who conducted it, complain heavily of the Labour this Work had cost him, or because one of them, who had been assisting to convey it along the Nile, was crush'd to death, as the same Historian relates.

The Temple of Diana at Ephesus.

This Temple, which has passed for one of the seven Wonders of the World, was of very great antiquity ; but at first it was not so magnificent as it became afterwards, since, according to Pliny (2), all Asia conspired for two hundred and twenty, or as he says elsewhere, for four hundred Years, to adorn and embellish it. Pindar, in one of his Odes, says, it was built by the Amazons, when they were going to make war upon the Athenians and Theseus ; but Pausanias (3) assures us, that this great Poet was ignorant of the Antiquity of that Temple ; since those very Amazons had come from the

(1) Thirty-one Feet and a half.

(2) Lib. 36. C. 14.

(3) Lib. 7. ad Init. where the same Author tells us, that one Crejus and Ephesus, who built the City, were the Founders of it.

the Banks of Thermodon, to sacrifice to Diana of the Ephesians in her Temple, with which they were acquainted, because some time before, being defeated by Hercules, and antecedently to him by Bacchus, they had fled thither for Refuge as into a Sanctuary.

Dionysius, the Geographer, informs us, there was one yet more ancient, built by the same Amazons, which remarkably declared the Simplicity of the first Ages, since it only consisted in a Niche, hollow'd out of an Elm, where was probably the Statue of Diana. That which I am going to speak of, was not so ancient; but how magnificent it was, the following Description by Pliny will shew. It was built, says he, in a marshy Ground, to secure it from Earthquakes, and Openings of the Earth that sometimes happen there; and that the Foundations of such a weighty Building might stand solid upon this soft and fenny Ground, they strew'd over it a quantity of beaten Coals, and laid over them Sheep-skins with their Wool. This Temple, continues the same Author, was four hundred and twenty-five Feet long, and two hundred Feet broad. The hundred and twenty-seven Columns, which supported the Edifice, were placed there by so many Kings, and were each of them sixty Feet high. Of these Pillars, there were thirty-six beautifully carved, and one of 'em by the famous Scopas. The Architect, who carried on this great Work, was Chersiphron, or Ctesiphon; and 'tis a wonder how he could place Architraves of so prodigious a weight. The Artifice which this skilful Workman made use of for his purpose is singular; he laid great Bags full of Sand upon the top of the Columns, then letting the Sand gently run out, the Architraves came insensibly to their proper Seat. Chersiphron found still more difficulty in placing a Stone of a much greater weight, above the Temple-Gate. Here it might be expected that Pliny, if he was not inform'd of the thing, should at least have thought upon a way how this immense Stone might have been placed; but instead of that, he coldly relates a Vision of the Architect, to whom Diana appeared, exhorting him to take courage;

courage; and the next Morning, says he, the Stone was seen to descend of its own accord; and settle in the intended Situation. Atque ita postridie apparuit Lapis; pondereque ipso correctus videbatur. 'Tis credible enough, that the Roof of the Temple was made of Cedar-planks, as the same Author tells us; but I don't know if we are to credit what he says of the Stair by which they went to the very top, that was made of a single Vine-stock. Neither Chersipbron, nor his Son Metagenes, finished this so grand and magnificent a Work: other Architects wrought at it; and it was not entirely compleated till after a Period of 220 Years.

The Riches of this Temple must have been immense, since so many Kings contributed to embellish it; and since nothing was more famous in all Asia than this Fabrick, either for Devotion, or the infinite Concourse of People that resorted to Ephesus. The Account given by St. Paul (1) of the Sedition hatch'd by the Goldsmiths of that City, who earn'd their living by making small silver Statues of Diana, shews us effectually how celebrated the Worship of that Goddess was.

'Tis further probable, that the Description given by Pliny, respects the Temple which was burnt by Erostratus, in the manner every body knows. For that which subsisted in his time, had been raised by Cbeiro-mocrates, the same who built the Town of Alexandria, and who proposed to cut Mount Athos into a Statue of Alexander. This last Temple, which Strabo had seen, was not inferiour in Beauty and Riches to the former; and there were to be seen the Works of the ablest Statuaries in Greece. The Altar was almost wholly of Praxiteles's Workmanship. Xenophon speaks of a Statue of massy Gold, whereof Herodotus, who had visited this Temple, says nothing. Strabo assures us likewise, that the Ephesians, in gratitude, had erected in the same place a Statue of Gold, in honour of Artemidorus. Vitruvius tells us, that this Temple, of the Ionick Order, was Dipterick, that is, that there went quite round it two Ranges of Pillars, in form of a double double Portico ; that it was seventy-one Toises in length, with more than thirty-six in breadth, and that there were reckoned in it 127 Pillars of sixty Feet high.

(1) Acts 19. 24.

This Temple was one of the most celebrated Asylums, which, according to the Author last quoted, extended to 125 Feet of the adjacent Ground. Mithridates had confined it to the space of a Bow-shot. Marc Anthony doubled that Extent ; but Tiberius, to correct the Abuses that were occasioned by those sorts of Privileges, abolished this Asylum.

Nothing is remaining at this day of so stately a Fabric but some Ruins ; an Account of which may be seen in Spon's Voyage. We often see this Temple represented upon Medals, with the Figure of Diana ; but the Frontispiece, because of the small room left in those sorts of Monuments, is never to be seen there charged with more than eight Pillars ; sometimes with six, with four, or only with two.

The Temple of Jupiter Olympius.

Greece had so great a number of Temples, Chapels, and Altars, that they occur'd every where, in Cities, Villages, and in the open Fields. To be convinced of this, one needs but read the Ancients, and especially Pausanias, who has apply'd himself particularly to describe them, and speaks of them in almost every Page of his Travels through Greece.

Of all these Temples, there were four which Vitruvius especially admired ; they were built of Marble, and enriched with such fine Ornaments, that they drew the Admiration of the ablest Judges, and were become the Standard and Model for Buildings in the three Orders of Architecture, the Dorick, the Ionick, and the Corinthian. The first of these fine Works was the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, of which we have given the Description. The second, that of Apollo in the City of Miletus ; both these of the Ionick Order. This celebrated Architect placed in the third Rank the Temple of Eleusis, built in Honour of Ceres and Proserpina, which Ictinus made of the Dorick Order, of so wide Extent, that it was capable of containing thirty thousand thousand Souls ; for there were at least so many, and oftentimes more, at the Celebration of the Mysteries of those two Goddesses (1). At first, Vitruvius remarks, this Temple had no Columns on the outside, to leave the more room and scope for the religious Ceremonies that were performed at the Sacrifices ; but Philo afterwards added to it a magnificent Portico. The fourth was the Temple of Jupiter Olympius at Athens, of the Corinthian Order. It had at first been begun by Pisistratus ; but the Broils that followed upon his Death, left the Work unfinished for near three hundred Years, till at last Antiochus Epiphanes, King of Syria, undertook the Expence necessary for finishing the Nave, which was very large, and the Columns of the Portico. Cassutius, a Roman Citizen, and skilful Architect, was chosen for the Execution of this great Work ; and he succeeded in it so well, that there were few Edifices equal to it in Grandeur and Magnificence.

In pursuance of my Design, I single out two of these Temples, that of Jupiter Olympius, and that of Apollo at Delphos, which were the two most magnificent. The former, according to Pausanias (2), and the admirable Statue of Jupiter which was there, were the Product of the Spoils, which the Eleans had won from the Pisans and their Allies, when they sacked the City Pisa. This Temple, whereof Libo, a Native of the Country, was the Architect, was of the Dorick Order, and on the outside was surrounded with Columns, insomuch that the Place where it was built, formed a stately Peristyle. In this Fabrick, they made use of the Stones of the Country, which however were of a singular nature and exquisite beauty. The Height of the Temple, from the Area to the Roof, was sixty-eight Feet, its Breadth ninety-five, and its Length two hundred and thirty. The Roof was not of Tiles, but of a fine pentelick Marble, cut in the form of Tiles. From the middle of the Roof hung a gilded Victory, and under this Statue, a golden Shield, on which

(1) See Herod. L. 8. c. 65. & Strabo, L. 9. p. 365. (2) In Eliac. p. 303; & seq. Edit. Wechel. 1613.

which was represented Medusa's Head; and at each Extremity of the same Roof hung two gilded Kettles. On the Outside above the Columns, a Rope went round the Temple, to which were fastened twenty-one gilt Bucklers, consecrated to Jupiter by Mummius, after the sacking of Corinth. Upon the Pediment, in the Front, was represented with exquisite Art the Chariot-Race between Pelops and Oenomaus, and Jupiter in the middle. Oenomaus and his Wife Sterope, one of the Daughters of Atlas, the Chariot with four Horses, and Myrtilus the Charioteer of Oenomaus, were upon the right hand of the God: Pelops, Hippodamia, and the Charioteer with his Horses, were on the left. All these Figures were done by Pæonius, a Native of Thrace. The back Pediment, the Work of Alcamenes, the best Statuary in his time next to Phidias, represented the Battle of the *Centaur*s with the Lapithæ, at the Marriage of Pirithous. A great part of Hercules's Labours were represented upon the Inside of this Fabrick; and upon the Gates, which were all of Brass, were to be seen among other things, the Hunting of the Boar of Erymanthus, and the Exploits of the same Hercules against Diomedes King of Thrace, Geryon, &c. In fine, for we can't particularize every thing, there were two Ranges of Columns, supporting two Galleries raised exceeding high, under which was the Way that led to Jupiter's Throne.

This Throne and the Statue of the God were Phidias's Master-piece; and Antiquity produced nothing so magnificent nor so finish'd. The Statue, of an immense height, was of Gold and Ivory, so artificially blended, that it could not be beheld but with astonishment. The God wore upon his Head a Crown, which resembled the Olive-Leaf to perfection; in his right hand he held a Victory, likewise of Gold and Ivory, and in his left a Scepter of exquisite Taste, refulgent with all sorts of Metals, and supporting an Eagle. The Shoes and Mantle of the God were of Gold; and upon the Mantle were all sorts of Animals and Flowers engrav'd. The Throne was all sparkling with Gold and precious Stones. The Ivory and Ebony, the Animals there represented, and several other Ornaments by their Assemblage formed a delightful Variety. At the four Corners of the Throne were as many Victories, that seem'd to be joining hands for a Dance, besides two others that were at Jupiter's Feet. The Feet of the Throne, on the fore-side, were adorn'd with Sphinxes, who were plucking the tender Infants from the Bosom of the Theban Mothers; and underneath were to be seen Apollo and Diana, wounding Niobe's Children to death with their Arrows. Four Cross-bars that were at the Feet of the Throne, and went from one end to the other, were adorned with a great number of Figures extremely beautiful; upon one were represented seven Conquerors at the Olympick Games; upon another appeared Hercules, ready to engage with the Amazons, and the number of Combatants on either side was twenty-nine. Besides the Feet of the Throne, there were likewise Pillars to support it. In fine, a great Ballustrade painted and adorned with Figures, rail'd in the whole Work. Panæus, an able Painter of that time, had represented there, with inimitable Art, Atlas bearing the Heavens upon his Shoulders, and Hercules in an Attitude stooping to ease him of the Load: Theseus and Pirithæus, the Combat of Hercules with the Lion of Nemea, Ajax offering violence to Cassandra, Hippodamia with her Mother, Prometheus in Chains, and a thousand other Subjects of fabulous History. In the most elevated Place of the Throne, above the Head of the God, were the Graces and Hours, of each three in number. The Pedestal which supported this Pile, was equally adorned with the rest. There Phidias had engraved upon Gold, on the one side, the Sun guiding his Chariot; on the other, Jupiter and Juno, the Graces, Mercury, and Vesta.

There Venus appeared rising out of the bosom of the Sea, and Cupid receiving her; while Pitho, or the Goddess of Persuasion, was presenting her with a Crown. There also appeared Apollo and Diana, Minerva and Hercules. At the bottom of the Pedestal, you

you might have seen Amphitrité and Neptune; and Diana or the Moon, who appeared mounted on horse-back. In fine, a woollen Veil, of a purple Dye and magnificently embroider'd, the Present of King Antiochus, hung from top to bottom. I say nothing of the other Ornaments of this noble Structure, nor of the Pavement which was of the finest Marble, nor of the Presents consecrated to the God by several Princes, nor of the prodigious number of Statues that were in the Temple, as well as in the Neighbourhood of it. For all these, Pausanias may be consulted, from whom I have taken this Description. I only add, that in order to judge of the Greatness of Jupiter's Statue, about which the Ancients are not agreed, it is sufficient to observe, that the Throne and Statue reached from the Pavement to the Roof, whose Elevation I have marked. It will readily be granted, that a Work of such a nature, of so prodigious an Extent, of so considerable an Height, where Gold blended with Ebony and Ivory, cast a dazzling Splendour, where so many Figures, Bas-reliefs, and Paintings were to be seen, the whole done by the greatest Masters, could not fail to have a very delightful Effect upon those who entered into the Temple. We must not forget that this Edifice was of the Dorick Order, the most ancient of all the Orders in Architecture, and at the same time the most suitable to Works of Grandeur.

The Temple of Apollo at Delphi.

If the Temple of Apollo at Delphi was not so magnificent in its Structure as that I have been describing, it was a great deal richer in immense Presents that were sent to it from every Quarter: I say richer, if it be possible to estimate the Master-piece of Phidias. At first the Temple of Delphi was of very little consideration. A Cavern, whence issued certain Exhalations, that infus'd Vivacity and a sort of Enthusiasm into those who approached it, having made People believe there was something in it divine, an Oracle was founded in this place, as I shall explain at greater length, length, in speaking of the Oracles (1). The Concourse which this pretended Miracle drew, obliged the neighbouring Inhabitants to consecrate the place ; and they first built there a Chapel, or rather a Hut made of Laurel-Boughs. They gave out, adds Pausanias (2), that the Bees raised a second Chapel there, which was of Wax ; and that Apollo sent it to the Hyperboreans. It is easy to see that this is a mere Fable, which I shall explain in the Chapter of Oracles, and Pausanias judges of it the same way. The third Temple of Delphi was built of Brass ; which needs not seem very surprising, as the Author remarks, whom I have now quoted, and whom I transcribe almost word for word ; since Acrisius King of Argos caused an Apartment to be made of Brass, to shut up in it his Daughter Danaë ; and in his (Pausanias's) time was still extant at Sparta the Temple of Minerva Chalcæcos, so called because it was wholly of Brass. But that this Temple had been built by Vulcan, is what Pausanias says he did not believe ; nor that there were upon the Cielings golden Virgins, who sung charmingly, as Pindar had imagined, in imitation, no doubt, of the Sirens in Homer. The Ancients were not agreed about the manner how this Temple was destroyed : some said, the Earth had opened and swallowed it up ; others, that it having taken fire, the Brass whereof it was made melted down. Be that as it will, the Temple was built a fourth time of Stone, and had for its Architects Agamedes and Trophonius. This Edifice was burnt down to the ground, the first Year of the fifty-eighth Olympiad. The last, in fine, which was subsisting in Pausanias's time, and which excelled the rest in Grandeur and Riches, was built by the direction of the * Amphictyones, with the Money which the People had consecrated for that use.

Altho' we have not a particular Description of this last Temple, it is easy to judge of its Extent, and of the immense Riches it contained, from that Concern which so many Kings and whole Nations had to send Presents

to

(1) See B. 4. c. 1.

(2) In Phocæ.

* The General Council of Greece.

to it. Few or none came to consult the Oracle of Apollo, (and who was there but either came or sent to it?) without bringing some Offering to the God : And of these Offerings there must needs have been an infinite number ; since altho' this Temple had been pillag'd several times, as may be seen in the Author whom I am copying, Nero carried off from it five hundred Statues all of Brass, partly of the Gods, and partly of illustrious Men.

The Pantheon at Rome.

Rome and Italy abounded with Temples as much as Greece. They were to be met with every where ; and several of them remarkable either for their Singularity or Magnificence. Among the most elegant, we are to reckon that of Jupiter Capitolinus, and that of Peace ; which, according to Pliny, were two of the finest Ornaments of Rome. But as I know none of 'em more noble, nor more solidly built than the great Pantheon, commonly called the Rotunda, since it subsists at this day entire, under the name of the Church of All Saints, to whom it is consecrated, as in Paganism, it was to all the Gods ; I chuse to give the Description of it in preference to others. The Draught of it may be seen in the second Volume of Montfaucon's Antiquities, who has taken the Plan of it from Serlio, and the Profil from Lafreri.

The most common opinion is, that it was built by the Direction, and at the Expence of Agrippa, Augustus's Son in Law ; tho' there are Authors who maintain, that it was before his time, and that he only repair'd it, and made an addition to it of that fine Portico, which is there still to be seen. Be that as it will, this grand Fabrick, which receives Light only from a hole in the middle of the Dome, so ingeniously contrived, that the whole is sufficiently lighted by it, is of a round figure ; the Architect, it seems, designing to imitate the Figure of the World, as is to be remark'd of a great number of other Temples of the earliest Antiquity. This at least is Pliny's Opinion : Quod form a

232 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book III,
cjus convexa. fastigiatam Cæli similitudinem ostenderet.

The Portico, the Work of Agrippa, more beautiful and more surprizing than the Temple itself, is composed of sixteen Columns of granate Marble, each of one single Stone. These Columns are five Feet in diameter, and above seven and thirty Feet high, without including the Base and Chapter. Of these sixteen Columns, there are eight in the Front, and as many behind them, all of the Corinthian Order. As in the time of Pope Eugenius, there was found near this Edifice, a Part of Agrippa's Head in Brass, a Horse's Foot, and a Piece of a Wheel of the same Metal; it would seem that this great Man had himself been represented in Brass upon this Portico, riding in a Chariot with four Horses.

When I said that this Temple is subsisting entire at this day, I would be understood to mean the Body of the Work, raised on so solid Foundations, that nothing has been able to move it. And no wonder; for, according to a Roman Architect. whose Manuscript is in F. Montfaucon's hands, these Foundations were a Mass not only extending itself under the whole Edifice, but also a great way beyond its Walls. As for the magnificent Works, the Statues, and other precious things, of which it was full, these are all gone to wreck. The Plates of gilt Brass, that covered the whole Roof, were carried off by the Emperor Constantius the Third. Pope Urban the Eighth made free with the Beams of the same Metal, to form the Canopy of St. Peter, and the great Pieces of Artillery, which are in the Castle of St. Angelo. The Statues of the Gods which were in the Niches, that are still to be seen within the Temple, have either been pillaged, or buried under ground; nor is it very long ago, since in digging near this Edifice, they found first a Lion of Basalt, which is a fine Egyptian Marble; and then another, which served for Ornaments to the Fountain of Sixtus V. not to mention a large beautiful Vase of Porphyry, that was placed by the Portico. In general, this Edifice was exceeding ceedingly magnificent, perfectly well built, in just Proportions, and it still makes one of the fairest Ornaments of Rome.

CHAP. VI.

Of Altars.

AFTER this summary Account of the Temples, it is necessary to speak of the Altars. But as we all along follow the same Method, in saying nothing upon each Subject but what is most material, referring those who would see things more fully handled, to better Treatises; we would premise this Intimation, that F. Bertbold of the Oratory has composed one upon Altars, in which there are few things of moment omitted (1); of this, we are going to give an Abstract, referring to Antiquaries for the Figures.

Without insisting upon the Etymology of the Word Altare, a Name which we commonly reckon to have been given to Altars, because they are high built, we say with Servius, that the Ancients made some distinction between Altare and Ara; for altho' the last was equally used, either in speaking of the Celestial or Infernal Gods, yet the word Altare was peculiarly set apart to denote the Altars of the former: Novimus, inquit, aras Diis esse superis & inferis consecratas, altaria vero esse superiorum tantum Deorum (2). This was Servius's Distinction, tho' some Authors add another, and say, that to the Celestial Gods, Sacrifices were offered upon Altars; to the terrestrial Gods, upon the Earth itself; and to the infernal ones, in Holes: F. Bertbold subjoins, that to the Nymphs, Victims were offered in Dens and Caverns.

The Antiquity of Altars is not to be called in question: No doubt it was prior, as we have hinted already, to the building of Temples, not only among the Patriarchs, but among the Pagans too. And as the superstitious Pagan Worship commenc'd in Egypt,

as

(1) Traſſatus Singularis de Ara, printed at Nantes, An. 1636, in 12mo. (2) Servius upon the 5th Ecl. of Virg.

as has been said, this is probably the Country where the first Altars were erected. Accordingly, this is the Opinion of Herodotus, and of Cælius Rhodiginus, who has copied him (1). Simplicity having always been a Concomitant of Usages newly invented, 'tis plain that the first Altars were nothing but simple heaps of Earth or Turf, which were called Aræ cespitiæ, or gramineæ; or of rough Stones, &c. and Idolaters at first imitated that simple manner of raising Altars, which was used by Noah and the other primitive Patriarchs; but in later times, Altars came to be quite changed, both in Matter and Form. Accordingly, Paganism had of them of several Forms; four-square, long-square, round, triangular; as of different Materials, of Stone, Marble, Brass, and of Gold itself, at least Herodotus (2) says so of the Table that was in the Temple of Belus, at Babylon. Pausanias observes, that some of them were of Wood, but that it was rare to find any of that sort. That of Jupiter Olympius was nothing but a heap of Ashes; others were but a mere Collection of Horns of different Animals: Innumeris structam de cornibus Aram, as Ovid speaks. Eustatbius, who mentions this Altar (3), says it was at Ephesus, and that Apollo had built it of the Bulls Horns which Diana had kill'd in hunting. Moses speaks often of the Horns of the Altars, but in another sense, meaning thereby nothing but their Corners.

Altars were no less distinguished in proportion to their Height, than by their Matter and Form. Some reached no higher than to the Knee, others came up to the Waist; some were yet higher, especially those of Jupiter, and the other celestial Gods (4), while those of Vesta, and the other terrestrial Divinities, were the lowest. Among those Altars, some were solid, others were hollow at the top, to receive the Libations and Blood of the Victims; others, in fine, were portable, to be used in travelling, and upon other occasions. Altars were not all in Temples; there were some of 'em in the the sacred Groves, and exposed in the open Fields; as those of the Gods Terminus, Sylvanus, Pan, Vertumnus, and those which Epimenides caused the Albanians, in the time of a Plague, to set up in places where the Victims, left to their own liberty, happen'd to stop. These are the same St. Paul speaks of, which were dedicated to unknown Gods. But it was still more common to set up Altars upon the Mountains, where frequently too, they had sacred Groves; and this Custom of going to sacrifice upon high Places, was so ancient and universal, that the Scripture incessantly reproaches the Israelites with it (1), and even blames the better Kings for not having abolished it: Attamen excelsa non tulit.

(1) Var. Lec. l. 16. (2) L. 1. (3) Upon the 8th Book of the Iliad. (4) Vitruv. l. 1. c. 7.

As the Greeks called an Altar Βωμὸς, they used the term Τριβωμὸς for a triple Altar. There was one of this sort in the Temple of Esculapius at Rome, according to an Inscription quoted by the Antiquaries. Another Inscription, which is in Fabretti, proves, according to that ingenious Author, that the Tribomos was to be met with in several other Temples; and these, as it would seem, were three Altars, placed so as to be very near one another, being allotted to three Divinities. Herodotus says (2), that in Egypt, in a great Temple of Apollo, there were Βωμοὶ τριφάσιοι, these three Altars were for Latona, Apollo, and Diana.

Among the Altars which Time has preserved to us, and whereof the Representations are to be found in the Antiquaries, some are simple and without any Figure; others, upon which are several Divinities, Genii, Players on Flutes, and other Figures done in Bas-relief. Most of 'em at the four Corners, have Heads of Animals, of Oxen, Rams, &c. In fine, every private Person had in his own Lararium, that is, in the Place appropriated to the honour of the Gods Lares, or of the Gods Penates, Genii, and Junones, who were the Genii of the Women, with small Altars on which he sacrificed to them.

They

(1) In the Books of Kings.

(2) In Euter.

They were at great pains, before they offered Sacrifice, to deck the Altars, and for that purpose they were sure to employ such things as were judged agreeable to each Divinity. As we shall have occasion in the subsequent Chapter to speak of the Plants and Trees, that were thought peculiarly sacred to each Divinity, we shall only say here, that it was with the Branches of those Trees they adorned the Altars.

It would require a Volume to describe all the Altars mentioned by the Ancients; their number was beyond reckoning. Athens and Rome, as every other Pagan City, were full of 'em. Virgil takes notice, that Hiarbas had erected an hundred Altars, and as many Temples, to Jupiter alone (1). They were to be met with every where, in the Fields, upon the Mountains, in the Cross-Streets of the Cities, and in High-ways; in the Circi, in the Hippodromes, in the Stadia for the Olympick Games, and in a thousand other places: In a word, they had of them erected not only to all the Gods, but to the very Cities, and Men while yet alive. Thus, not to mention other Emperors, Augustus had his Altars in several Places. For all these Particulars, F. Berthold may be consulted, whom I have cited at the beginning of this Article: but as some of these Altars were more curious than others, it is proper that we say somewhat of them.

We find two Altars in Antiquity, to which they gave the Name of Ara Maxima: The first in Greece, was set up in honour of Jupiter Olympius, as we learn from Pausanias; the second, in Italy, had been built for Hercules, after the defeat of Cacus, as is elegantly describ'd in Virgil (2), where he makes Evander speak in this manner:

*Ex illo celebratur bonos, lætique Minores Servavere diem; primusque Potitius Auctor, Et domus Herculi custos Pinaria sacri,
Hanc Aram luco statuit, quæ maxima semper
Dicetur nobis, & erit quæ maxima semper.*

This

(1) Æneid. l. 4. (2) Æn. l. 8. Sil. Ital. l. 7. Ov. Fast. l. 1. Tacit. l. 15. calls it only Ara Magna.

This Altar erected in the Fields, in that very Place where the City of Rome was since built, stood in the Cow-Market, near by the Porta Carmentalis; the Potitii and Pinarii alone could sacrifice at it. After the extinction of these two Families, the charge of this Altar was given to the Slaves, as we learn from Titus Livius (1); and from Valerius Maximus (2), who tells us, this Change had been brought about by Appius Claudius the Cenfor. The Women were not permitted to approach this Altar, nor to be present at the Sacrifices offered upon it, according to Alexander ab Alexandro, who tells us, they took care to keep at a distance from it, all Slaves, or such as were not free-born, the Dogs and Flies, &c (3).

There was another Altar yet more extraordinary: I mean that which was in the Heavens, under the Name of the Constellation the Altar. Hyginus says, this was the Altar on which the Gods, ready to engage the Giants, had sacrificed and sworn a League offensive and defensive, against those formidable Enemies.

As the Pagans believ'd the Gods dwelt in Temples, in their Statues, and in the Altars, we are not to be surprized at the high respect they bore to all those things; but because their Resentment broke forth, as they imagined, more remarkably in some Places than in others, their Veneration increased proportionally for those Places. Thus, nothing was more awful nor more dreaded, than the Altars of the Gods Palici, where the Perjured were punish'd by these two Divinities, and plung'd headlong into the Lake, near which they had sworn, as we shall take notice in their History. Such was also the famous Altar of Lyons, so formidable to Orators.

This great Veneration for Altars, introduced the Custom of having recourse to 'em upon every occasion. There they struck up Alliances, Treaties of Peace, Reconciliations, Marriages, &c. Virgil, so knowing in the

(1) Dec. 1. l. 9.
C. 24.

(2) L. 1. c. 2.

(3) Gen. Dier. l. 2.

238 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book III.
the Customs of his Country, shall be our first Author, for what concerns the Treaties of Peace.

Post iidem, inter se posito certamine, Reges Armati Jovis ante aras, paterasque tenentes, Stabant, & cæsa firmabant fœdera porca (1).

The same Author represents Æneas thus complaining of the Infringement of the Peace by the Rutuli :

Multa Jovem, & læsi testatur fœderis aras.

Silius Italicus taxing the Carthaginians with their Treachery, in the Treaties they had made with the Romans, speaks of the same Custom:

Sed pacis faciem, & pollutas fœderis Aras, &c.

Upon this occasion, when they took an Oath of Peace, they embraced the Altar, or only touched it; which Virgil has well explained, in the Treaty made between Æneas and Latinus.

*Tango Aras, mediosque ignes, & numina testor, Nulla dies pacem hanc Italis, nec fœdera rumpet,
Quo res cunque cadent* (2).

And Juvenal :

Atque adeo intrepidi quæcunque altaria tangunt (3).

As Men have always been too ready to play fast and loose with one another, not thinking themselves secure enough by Treaties of Peace and Alliance, made in face of the Altars, they added to them the sacred tye of an Oath, which was taken by the Party, laying his Hand upon the Altar (4), as we at this day, on like occasions, make use of the Holy Gospel. Magistrates, before they enter'd upon Offices of Judicature, likewise took an Oath at the Altar of Themis. St. Ambrose informs us of this Custom (5), in that fine Epistle where he exhorts Valentinian the Emperor, not to give orders for repairing one of the Altars of that Goddess, which was ruinous.

As for the Marriages that were solemnized in face of the Altars, especially of Juno or Lucina, F. Berthold may be consulted, who brings many Authorities for the proof of it, and some Examples to confirm it.

Lastly,

(1) Æn. l. 8. (2) Æn. l. 12. (3) Sat. 13. (4) See Lucian in Jove Tragædo. Tit. Liv. l. 21. Polyb. l. 3. (5) Ep. 3.

Lastly, it was nigh the Altars that they kept publick Entertainments; as may be seen in several Places of Virgil (1), and in other Authors.

C H A P. VII.

Of the sacred Groves.

BEfides the Temples, Chapels, Lararies, Altars, Paganism had also other Places devoted to the Service of the Gods. These were the consecrated Groves, the Institution of which is so ancient, that it is even thought to have been antecedent to that of Temples and Altars. As the Romans called these Groves Luci, Servius thinks they got that Name, because they kindled fire to let the Mysteries be seen that were there celebrated. Luci a Lucendo, for whether (as was probably their way at first) they chose for the purpose natural Woods, with which every place was anciently furnished; or planted them on purpose, as was done in later times; they were always the thickest Groves of their kind, Places dark and gloomy, impenetrable even to the Sun-beams.

'Twas in these dark Retreats, apt to overcast the mind with I know not what Horrour, that the first Mysteries of Paganism were celebrated. Here it was our ancient Druids assembled, who got their very Names from the Oaks which they frequented.

It appears however, to have been the opinion of the Ancients, that these Groves, at first consecrated to Lucina, who was the same with Diana and Hecate, had been so called from the Name of that Goddess (a).

Be that as it will, the use of sacred Groves for the Celebration of Mysteries, is of very great antiquity, and perhaps of all others the most universal. At first, there were in these Groves neither Temples nor Altars: They were simple Retreats, to which there was no access

(1) Geor. l. 4. Æn. l. 8, &c.

(a) See the Scholiast on the fourth Book of the Thebaid of Statius. Horace's Art of Poetry, Virgil's Æneid, B. 6. and Servius his Commentator.

cess for the Profane ; that is, such as were not devoted to the service of the Gods. Afterwards, they built Chapels and Temples in them ; and even to preserve so ancient a Custom, they took care, whenever it was in their power, to plant Groves round the Temples and Altars, to inclose them with Walls, Hedges, or Ditches ; and these Groves were not only consecrated to the Gods, in honour of whom the Temples in the Centers of them had been built, but they were themselves a place of Sanctuary for Criminals, who fled thither for refuge.

Moses, to hinder the Hebrews, too prone to imitate the idolatrous Practices of the People about them, from following this pernicious Custom, forbids them to plant Groves about the Altars of the true God : Ne conserito tibi lucum ullis arboribus secundum altare Jehovæ Dei tui, quod feceris tibi (1). Nay, every time this sacred Legislator commands the Jews to destroy Idols, he orders them at the same time to cut down the hallowed Groves : Aras eorum destrue, & confringe Statuas, Lucosque succide (2) : And in another place ; Lucos igne comburite (3). The same Orders were renewed to Gideon, and the Prophets always speak with indignation of the Kings of Judah and Israel, who had a Custom of sacrificing in the consecrated Groves. The Jews were so prone to imitate the idolatrous Nations in this, that one of their Kings carried the Impiety so far as to plant at Jerusalem one of these Groves, which Josias cut down, and burned in the Valley of Cedron (4). The Rabbins add, that the Jews were not permitted to enter these Groves, to cut a Tree of them for their use, to rest under their Shade, to eat the Eggs or the little Birds that nested there, nor to take the dead Wood, nay, nor to eat Bread that had been baked with that Wood ; upon which, the Curious may consult Selden (5).

The

(1) Deut. xvi. 21. (2) Ex. xxxiv. and in other places.
 (3) Deut. xii. (4) 2 Kings xxiii. 6. (5) De Jure Nat. & Gent. l. 2. c. 6.

The sacred Groves, in after-ages, became extremely frequented: There they assembled on Holidays, and after the Celebration of the Mysteries, they kept publick Entertainments there, accompany'd with Dancings and all other demonstrations of the most vigorous Mirth. Tibullus describes these Festivals and Entertainments, with a good deal of Humour.

*Rusticus e lucoque vehit, male sobrius ipse,
Uxorem plaustro, Progeniemque domum* (1).

They were at pains to deck these Groves with Flowers, Chaplets, Garlands, and Nofegays; and hung them about with Donations and Offerings, so lavishly, that tho' they had been less bushy and condensed, they would have been quite darkned thereby, and shut out the very Light of Day; which makes Statius say:

*. Hic arcus & fessa reponere tela,
Armaque curva suum & vacuorum terga Leonum
Figere, & ingentes æquantia cornua Sylvas.
Vix ramis Locus, &c* (2).

And Ovid says:

*. Equidem pendentia vidi
Serta super ramos* (3)

To cut down the sacred Groves, or to waste them, was a piece of Sacrilege, and perhaps that which they thought the most unpardonable. Lucan, speaking of the Trees which Cæsar caused to be felled near Marreille, to make warlike Engines of them, well describes the Consternation of the Soldiers, who refused to be instrumental in this Work, till that great General taking an Ax, fell'd one of 'em himself. Struck with a religious Awe for the Sanctity of the Grove, they were full of the Belief, that if they had presumptuously attempted to cut down any of its Trees, the Ax would have recoiled upon themselves:

*Sed fortes tepuere manus, motique verenda
Majestate Loci, si robora sacra ferirent,
In sua credebant redituras membra Lituras.*

16

(1) L. 1. El. 11. v. 51. (2) Theb. 1 9. v. 588.
(3) Met. 1. 8. v. 722.

It was lawful however to prune them, to clear them, and to cut down the Trees which they thought attracted the Thunder. We have the History of some of these sacred Groves, handed down to us by the Ancients, such as of those of Lucina, of the Goddess Feronia, of Augustus, and some others. They all resembled one another, and were in equal Veneration.

C H A P. VIII.

Of Sanctuaries, or Asyla.

THE Temples, Altars, and sacred Groves, having been among the Pagans Places of Refuge for Criminals, we must explain wherein this Right of Asylum consisted, what were the Privileges belonging to it, and whence the Origin of the thing was derived.

From the time that Men began to devote Places to the Worship of the Gods (1), there to acknowledge them in an authentic and solemn manner as their Lords, and sovereign Disposers of their Destiny, and to conceive hope of being aided by them, they believed them to be there present in a peculiar manner; and hence, that they might not seem inexorable towards others, while they were supplicating the Gods to be propitious to themselves, it is highly credible that they looked upon those sacred Places, whither the Guilty had repair'd, as Sanctuaries inviolable.

The Tabernacle and Temple of Jerusalem, were places of Refuge (2), and doubtless the first Altars raised by the Patriarchs were so too, since Moses excludes Murderers, who fled for Refuge to those he himself set up. The Cities of Refuge appointed by Moses and Jeshua, were likewise Asyles (3). Paganism, which imitated many of the Customs of God's People, from them, no doubt, had likewise taken this of appropriating Asyla; thus, could we know the Date of the Foundation of their first Temples and Altars, this would lead us

(1) See an Extract of the Dissert. of M. Simon upon the Asyles, Mém. de l'Acad. des Bel. Let. Tom. 3. p. 37.

(2) Mac. i. 2. c. 40. (3) Num. xxxv. Deut. iv. Jos. xx.

us to the Original of this Privilege. We can only affirm, that it is very ancient, without being able to determine the precise time when it commenc'd. We know from Pausanias (1), that Cadmus granted it to the City or Citadel, which he built in Bæotia; and it is probable, as M. Simon remarks, that this Prince, a Native of Phœnicia, and in the Neighbourhood of Palestine, having learn'd how much the Confluence of Criminals and Debtors into the Jewish Cities of Refuge had been of use to that People, had used the same means, to draw Inhabitants into his. Theseus for Athens, and Romulus for his new City (a), had recourse to the same piece of Policy, if we believe Plutarch (2). Diodorus Siculus (3) assures us, that Cybele founded an Asyle in Samothracia. The Egyptian Hercules passed for the Author of that of Canopus: That of Diana Stratonica at Smyrna, and that of Tenean Neptune, owed their Institution to Oracular Responses. But as this Privilege granted to Criminals, not only in the Temples and near the Altars, but even in the Cities that claimed it, and actually enjoyed it time immemorial, was capable of producing very bad Consequences, and of authorising Crimes in hopes of Impunity, the Asylum was restrained to involuntary Offences. This, according to Thucydides (4), was the way how the Athenians repelled the Charge of the Bæotians, by letting them know that their Altars were only Sanctuaries for Crimes of this sort. We learn from Titus Livius (5), that the Murderer of King Eumenes was obliged to quit the Temple of Samothracia, where he had taken sanctuary.

Thus the Asyles were properly for involuntary Delinquencies, for those who were oppressed by an unjust Power, for Slaves ill used by cruel Masters, and for Debtors who were injuriously dealt with. But as the wisest Institutions are liable to be abused, even Criminals condemned to Death, found a secure Sanctuary in

R 2 the

(1) In Bæot.

(a) This Sanctuary of Romulus was between two sacred Groves, and named from thence, inter duos Lucos.

(2) In his Life of Theseus. (3) In Rom. l. 3. (4) Hist. l. 4.

(5) Dec. 5. l. 9.

the Temple of Pallas at Lacedemon ; Bankrupts, in that of the Goddess Hebe at Pblius, and in that of Diana at Ephesus (1).

It was not only Cities and Temples that serv'd for Sanctuaries ; the sacred Groves, the Altars, wherever they were, the Statues of the Gods, those of the Emperors, and the Tombs of Heroes, had the same Privilege ; and it was enough for a Criminal to be within the compass of those Groves, or to have embraced an Altar, or the Statue of some God, to be in perfect Safety. Being once within the Protection of an Asyle, the Criminal remained at the feet of the Altar or Statue, and had his Victuals brought to him, till he found the opportunity of making his escape, or of satisfying the offended Party.

The Asyle was not always inviolable ; either the Offender was sometimes forcibly torn from it, or left to die there for Hunger, by cutting off his Provisions, or walling about the place of Refuge, as the Ephori did to Pausanias, as we learn from Cornelius Nepos (2). The Sanctity of the Asyles would no doubt have been oftner violated than it was, had it not been for the Punishments appointed by Gods and Men, against the Profaners ; I say the Gods, because the Calamities that sometimes ensued upon the Profanation of those Places, were construed to be the Effect of divine Vengeance. This accordingly was the Judgment pronounced upon the desolating Plagues that beset Epirus, after the Murder of Laodamia, who was slain in the Temple of Diana. The History is thus related by Justin. There were none remaining in all Epirus, of the Blood Royal, but Nereis and Laodamia her Sister. The former married the Son of Gelo King of Sicily ; and Laodamia, who had fled for Refuge to the Temple of Diana, was assassinated there by the People : But the Gods revenged this Sacrilege by Plagues and Calamities, which proved the Ruin of almost the whole Nation. To Barrenness, Famine, and Civil War, succeeded other Wars, which brought all to the greatest Extremity ; and Milo, he who had given that

(1) Sol. 1 4. Paus. in Cor. Cicer. 6. in Verrem.

(2) In Paus.

that unfortunate Princess her mortal Wound, was seized with Madness to such a pitch, as to tear out his own Bowels, and died in extreme Agony on the twelfth day after the Murder (1).

They pronounc'd the same Judgment upon the infamous Disease that finish'd the days of Sylla, who had violated the Right of the Asyles. The Oracles consulted after such kind of Profanations, prescrib'd, not only for the Offenders, but for whole Cities, solemn Expiations, or publick Reparations to be made; and thus the Lacedemonians were obliged to erect two Statues of Brass to the unhappy Pausanias, in the very Place where he died.

Though M. Simon, of whose Dissertation I have given an Abstract, seems to think that all the Temples, sacred Groves and Altars, &c. were Asyles, there is however, a great deal of probability, that all these Places did not enjoy that Privilege; and what I take to be a convincing Proof of it is, the Exceptions which the Ancients make, in ascribing it to certain Places, without taking notice of others. Thus, according to Servius, the Temple of Compassion was an Asylum, at Athens, and probably at Rome too, where one was built to the same Divinity. In like manner, the Temple of Diana at Ephesus enjoyed the same Privilege, according to Cicero (2); as well as that which was built at Epirus in honour of the same Goddess, as we learn from Justin (3).

Be that as it will, the Asyla occasioned more harm, by the Impunity they gave to Offenders, than they did good by protecting some that were innocent; and Tiberius, as has been said, was obliged to abolish them.

(1) Just. l. 28. cap. 3. (2) In Verrem. (3) L. 28.

C H A P. IX.

Of the Statues of the Gods, and of the Manner of representing them.

AFTER having spoke of the Temples and Altars, something is necessary to be said of the Statues of the Gods, of the Places where they were set up, and of the Manner how those Gods were represented. To reduce within bounds a Subject in itself so extensive, I shall first examine what the Figures of the Gods were, before Sculpture was invented. 2. What they were, when this Art was but rude and imperfect. 3. The pitch of Perfection to which Statuary was afterwards carried. 4. The Materials they used for the Statues of the Gods. 5. The extreme Greatness or Smallness of some of those Figures. 6. The Places where they were most ordinarily set up. 7. Lastly, by what Symbols the Gods were therein distinguished.

For the first Article, it suffices to recollect what we have said in the fourth Chapter, upon the rude manner in which they represented the Gods, before the Invention of Sculpture. It is equally impossible and useless, to find out when and by whom that Art was invented. Its Origin is lost in the most remote Antiquity. It is enough that we know, the Egyptians had it in Moses's Time, and perhaps, long before the Statues of their Gods, spoken of in the Books of that sacred Legislator; the Statues of their God Apis, too faithfully imitated by the Israelites, who worshipped him in the Wilderness, under the form of an Ox or Calf, prove it beyond contradiction; and I make no doubt, but in the very time when the yet rough and barbarous Nations worshipped either shapeless Masses, or simple Trunks of Trees, Sculpture was then known, not only in Egypt, but also in Syria, and the adjacent Countries. For the Arts sprung originally from the Countries I have named, were but gradually propagated to the West.

At

At first Sculpture itself was extremely rude, and rose but slowly to that height of Perfection when it became admired, especially in Greece, for the Master-pieces it form'd. Consequently we may suppose, that the first Statues of the Gods, tho' modelled by this new Art, were still exceeding coarse. The Legs and the Arms were not separated, but joined to the rest of the Matter which they made use of to the Formation of the Figure. They had the Eyes shut, and at most the Arms hanging down, and as it were glued to the Body, and the Feet joined ; neither Expression, nor Attitude, nor Gesture. They were mostly square, and like mis-shapen Figures, that ended like those Figures called *Termes.

The Cabinets of the Curious furnish several Models of these Statues ; they are dug up yet every day, especially in Egypt, and the most uncontroverted Mark of their Antiquity, is when they are such as I have described them.

They continued in this State, at least in the West, until Dedalus, that is, until the time of Minos the Second, and of Theseus. This is not the proper place to speak of that celebrated Artist, the Article about him will be found in its proper place ; but I shall only say, that he had the art of giving to his Statues, Eyes, Feet, and Hands. In some measure he put Soul and Life into them, and so surprizing was this Change, as to give rise to a common Report of his having animated them, made them walk, &c. The Statues of the Gods improv'd by this, it was to bring them to perfection that the most skilful Artists mainly apply'd themselves ; and time at length produced the Master-pieces of a Phidias, Praxiteles, Myron, which were the principal Ornaments of Greece, and drew the just Admiration of Persons of Taste, as at this very day do those of them that are yet remaining. Such, among others, are the Venus of Medicis, the Antinous, the Hercules, and the fine Jupiter still to be seen at Versailles.

R 4

How-

* Vide Montfaucon's Antiquity, V. 1. B. 3. c. 9. where those Figures are represented.

However, from I know not what Veneration for Antiquity, they still kept up the old Taste, in those Statues they called Hermes's.

That was the Name they gave to those Statues of Mercury, that were of a square Figure, ordinarily without Feet, and which were placed in the cross Streets, upon the High-ways, before Temples, and before Houses. Cicero remarks on this Occasion, it was unlawful to place them upon Sepulchral Monuments, but he gives no Reason for it. It would seem, on the contrary, that these were the Places with which they suited best, since that God had the Charge of Souls, and it was he who conducted them into the infernal Regions, and brought them back from thence.

Tho' the Hermes's ought to have stood only for the Statues of Mercury, since they bear his Name, yet it was given to all those which imitated their Form. Thus, when it was Apollo they represented, they named them Hermapollos. If it was a Bust of Minerva, in Greek Athene, they were stiled Hermathenæ; and Hermeros, those that represented the Bust of Cupid, whose Greek Name is Eros; and so of others. In fine, this antique manner was still preserved in the Statues of the God Terminus, which were nothing but mis-shapen Stones.

The Cities of Greece, notwithstanding the Advancement of Sculpture, were full of those sorts of Statues; and from Thucydides we learn, that in one night the Heads of all those that were at Athens, were cut off. Alcibiades, we know, was suspected to have been the Author of this Impiety, and was banished for the same. As to the manner in which the Statues of the Gods were to be made, no Rule was laid down.

Sculpture being an Art which imitates Nature, both in the Design and Solidity of its Materials, it has for its Subject, Timber, Stone, Marble, Ivory, different Metals, as Gold, Silver, Brass, precious Stones, &c. As it comprehends also Founding, which is subdivided into the Art of moulding Figures in Wax, and that of casting all sorts of Metals; the Statuaries were at liberty to use all these Materials, and all these Forms for the Statues of the Gods. History informs us, there were some of 'em of each sort ; some made of Wood, the most precious of its kind and least liable to Corruption. That of Jupiter at Sicyon, was of Box-wood ; and at Ephesus, that of Diana was of Cedar. Elsewhere, they were to be met with of Citron-wood, of Palm-tree, of Olive-wood, of Ebony, and of Cypress. We have already spoke of those golden ones that were in the Temple of Belus at Babylon, and of Apollo at Delphos. We have given a Description of that of Jupiter Olympius, where Gold was artfully blended with Ivory, Ebony, and precious Stones ; a Master-piece, which, as Pliny tells us, no body durst imitate : Præter Jovem Olympium quem nemo æmulatur (1). It would be to no purpose to dwell upon those of Marble, or of Stone, whose number was immensely great. I have named the principal Artists, who of those different Materials had composed Master-pieces of Skill. One who has the Curiosity to find Statues of Gods, of all the Forms and Materials I have mentioned, needs but read Pausanias, who describes of 'em of all sorts.

Generally speaking, the Statues of the Gods, after the Invention of Sculpture, were nothing but of moulded Earth, and brittle like simple Vases. This Art of moulding Earth or Clay, is called fiætilis, and the Works it produces, fiætilia. The sacred Writers, especially the Prophets, are continually reproaching the Pagans for worshipping these sorts of Idols. In later times, those Statues were laid over with different Colours, and at last they were gilt. The Romans, whose Religion for a long time declared the Simplicity of their Manners, were very late in beginning to have these gilded Statues ; till then they had only the Colour of the Earth of which they were made. Pliny praises this primitive Roman Simplicity. Men, says he, who sincerely honoured such Gods, give us no reason to be asham'd of 'em. Hæ tum effigies Deorum erant laudatissimæ, nec pœnitent nos illorum qui tales Deos colere. To them,

con-

(1) Plin. l. 34. c. 8.

continues he, Gold was of no consideration, either for themselves or for their Gods. Juvenal speaking of the earthen Statue, which Tarquin the elder set up in the Temple of Jupiter, calls it the earthen Jupiter, whom Gold had not tarnish'd nor defiled, Fictilis, et nullo violatus Jupiter auro.

Titus Livius has inform'd us at what Period gilt Statues were first introduced; it was, according to him, under the Consulship of P. Cornelius Cethegus, A.U. C. 571, or 572.

As there was no fixed Rule as to the matter of the Statues of the Gods, there was as little for their size, and it depended upon the Caprice of the Workmen, or the Will of those by whom they were employ'd, either to make them great or small. Accordingly while the Egyptians valued themselves upon those Colossal Statues that were to be seen in the Porches of their Temples, frequently nothing was to be found within those Edifices but some pitiful Monkeys or Pygmies, which provoked the Contempt and Ridicule of Spectators; witness Cambyses, when he was introduced into the Temple of Vulcan at Memphis, as we said above.

Greece chose sometimes to imitate the Egyptian Manner in those Colossus's, and had several Statues of her Gods of an enormous bigness. That of Jupiter Olympius, whereof we have given a Description; and several others besides were much larger than the Life; but the most extraordinary one, was the Colossus at Rhodes, representing Apollo, which was looked upon as one of the seven Wonders of the World. This Statue, done by Chares, was twelve Years in finishing, and its height was seventy Cubits, being so placed, that its two Feet stood upon the two Moles, which formed the Harbour of Rhodes, Ships at full sail passed through between its Legs. We may judge of what an enormous Size this Colossus must have been, when few Persons were able to embrace one of its Thumbs. Notwithstanding the weight of this prodigious Mass; notwithstanding the dangers of the Sea, and for how long time it was exposed, yet it continued standing for the space

space of 1360 Years ; and its Fall at last was only owing to an Earthquake. A Jewish Merchant bought it from the Saracens ; and having taken it to pieces, loaded nine hundred Camels with it.

Nor was it only the Egyptians and Greeks who had those Colossal Figures, the Romans would needs imitate their Example ; and at Rome there were no fewer than five of them, two of Apollo, two of Jupiter, and one of the Sun, (for the Sun was often distinguished from Apollo;) not to mention two others, one of them representing Domitian, the other Nero : But as if Statues of this sort had of right belong'd to none but Gods, they caused an Apollo's Head to be set on the latter.

These Works were Curiosities of their kind ; but for the most part the Statues of the Gods imitated beautiful Nature, especially when they were to be planted within the easy reach of the Eye. Thus, those of the Gods were a Degree larger and more robust than those of the Goddesses, with respect to whom the expert Artists made it their business chiefly to imitate the Softness and Delicacy of the Sex.

There were however Gods, whose Statues were ordinarily little, and perhaps there was a Necessity for them to be so. Those of the Pataici or Patæci, which they set upon the Sterns of Ships, were of this kind, if we credit Herodotus (1), as also those of the Lares, the Cabiri, and some others. There were others, whose Statues were monstrous, representing the Heads of a Dog, a Cat, a Goat, a Monkey, a Lion, &c. as we shall shew when we come to the Gods of Egypt.

The number of Statues of the Gods was immense, not only in Greece and Italy, but likewise in the eastern Countries ; and nothing sets it forth to us more strongly, than that Scripture-Expression, which stiles Chaldea a Land of Idols. Accordingly they occur'd every where, in Temples, where they were upon Pedestals, or set in Niches ; in publick Places, at the Gates of Houses ; and without the Cities, in the Highways and Fields. Their Veneration for them was carried as high
as

(1) L. 2.

as possible : they would not pass by them without prostrating themselves, or putting their Hand to the Mouth, as a Mark of Adoration. On them their whole Confidence depended ; to them Vows were made, Sacrifices offer'd, Prayers address'd. From them they expected Health and other Blessings, as well as Deliverance from Evils, and from publick Calamities. This Veneration and Confidence were owing not only to their being Representations of the Gods, but also to their Belief, that in them the Gods themselves resided, and consequently were listening to their Vows and Prayers. On the Holidays of each of those Gods, care was taken to deck their Statues with all the Embellishments they could devise; Ribbons, Fillets, Boughs, were all apply'd to that use. They were anointed with Oil, or besmear'd with Wax, to give them a greater Lustre ; and this Custom was especially practis'd towards their Dii Lares and Penates. Tho' the manner of representing the Gods was not uniform, there were however certain Usages generally observed. Thus to Jupiter was given a noble and majestick Air, which spoke the Sovereign of the World ; and he appeared always with a Beard. Apollo, who is painted like a young Man, wears none. Bacchus sometimes has one, and then he is called Barbatus ; but most frequently he has it not. Juno appears with an Air becoming the Consort of Jupiter, and Queen of the Gods. Minerva has a masculine Beauty but sweet, such as is befitting the wisest and chastest of Goddesses. Venus, on the contrary, exhibits I know not what Softness and Effeminacy, which speaks forth the Mother of Love. Mars has a warlike Mien ; Neptune has a stern awful Look, &c.

The Gods, generally, wore upon their Statues the Symbols consecrated to them. Thus Jupiter appears with his Thunder ; Apollo with his Lyre ; Neptune with his Trident ; Pluto with the same Scepter, but only two-forked ; Bacchus holds in his hand Clusters of Grapes ; Ceres Ears of Corn ; Hercules his Club ; and Diana her Arrows and Quiver. The Dog appears in the Statues of Mercury ; the Owl in those of Minerva ;

Minerva ; and the Serpent wreath'd about a Pillar in those of Esculapius. The Chariot of Neptune is drawn by Sea-horses ; that of Venus by Doves ; that of Juno by Peacocks ; and that of Cybele by Lions. Sometimes those Symbols are single, sometimes multiplied ; and when it appears, they are proper to several Gods, the Statues that bear them get the Name of Pantheons, such as are for the most part those of Harpocrates, and some others. The Egyptian Statues were more charged with Symbols than those of the Greeks and Romans, as maybe seen in the Antiquaries. The Symbols were taken either from Trees or Plants, or such Animals as, for some particular Reasons, were dearer to the Gods than others, as shall be shewn in speaking of the Sacrifices, Offerings, and Victims, which were commonly taken from things wherein they were thought to take delight.

The reasons of this Preference given by the Gods were sometimes mysterious, and the Ancients durst not reveal them ; but then it is frequently an easy matter to see thro' them. Thus, to give but a few Examples, the Laurel was belov'd by Apollo for the sake of Daphne ; the Pine by Cybele, upon account of Atys ; and the Poplar by Hercules, because he had fetch'd one from the Country of the Hyperboreans, &c.

For the most part, the Statues of the Gods were simple, and presented but one single Figure ; sometimes they were group'd, and contain'd several Figures together. The Philosopher Albricus, who has left us a small Latin Treatise upon the manner of representing the Gods, seems to have particularly considered these last Figures ; as one may be easily convinced by reading that small Piece, and by the Example of Saturn, which I am going to quote.

Saturn, says he, the first of the Gods, was pictured under the Figure of an old Man, with grey Hairs and a long Beard, stooping with Years, his Mien sad and dejected, his Head veiled, and his Complexion pale and wither'd ; in his left hand he holds a Scythe, and a Serpent biting its own Tail ; and in the right a young Child, Child, which he is just going to devour. He has by him Jupiter, Neptune, Pluto, Juno, and Ops his Wife, one of whose Hands is extended, to denote her Readiness to relieve all the World; while, with the other, she is presenting Bread to those who might have need of it.

When we come to the particular History of every God, we shall describe the Manner in which he was wont to be represented.

C H A P. X.

Of the Sacrifices and Victims.

SACRIFICE is an Act of Religion, whereby Man acknowledges the Divinity of him to whom he offers it up, professes to honour him in the most solemn manner, to thank him for Blessings received, and to supplicate him for new ones. In the first times of Paganism, the Worship paid to the Gods was exceeding simple. The Egyptians, if we believe Theophrastus, cited by Porphyry (1), made an Offering in ancient times to their Gods, not of Incense and Perfumes, but of the green Herbs, which they gathered, and presented to them as the first Productions of Nature. Ovid paints very well the Simplicity of those primitive Sacrifices: No Incense, says he, as yet was brought from the Banks of Euphrates, nor the fragrant Costus from the Extremity of India. They were strangers then to the blushing Saffron, and the richest Offerings with which the Altars were crown'd, were Herbs or Bay-Leaves.

Thura nec Euphrates, nec miserat India costum, Nec fuerant rubri cognita fila croci.

.....
.....

*Ara dabat fumos herbis contenta Sabinis
Et non exiguo Laurus adusta foco* (2).

The

(1) Lib. de Abst. apud Euf. Præp. Evang. L. 1. c. 9.
ib. 1.

(2) Fast.

The same Theophrastus adds, that they join'd Libation to those first Sacrifices ; and doubtless it was Water they poured out in honour of the Gods : for the Egyptians, of whom he speaks, made use of no other Liquor, as we shall see afterwards. Pliny, Macrobius, Plutarch, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and Thucydides, make frequent mention of the Simplicity of the Festivals and Sacrifices of the ancient Egyptians, and of the Greeks and Romans, as may be seen in Vossius, who has cited them in proof of this Truth (1).

This primitive Simplicity lasted a very long time, and there were Places where it always subsisted. Pausanias (2) speaking of an Altar at Athens, consecrated to Jupiter the Most High, tells us, that no living Thing was offered there, but that they made only simple Offerings, without so much as using Wine in the Libations. This Custom was derived from Cecrops, who, in regulating the Worship of the Gods, and the Ceremonies he had brought from Egypt into Greece, ordain'd that nothing which had Life should be given in Sacrifice, but that they should only offer simple Cakes, as we learn from the same Author (3).

As they offer'd in Sacrifice the same things they fed upon, when Bread came to be substituted in the room of Herbs, they apply'd to that use a sort of Flower and Cakes baked with Salt. To this custom Horace alludes :

*Non sumptuosa blandior hostia Mollibit aversos Penates,
Farre pio, et saliente mica* (4).

To these Sacrifices they joined the Productions of the Earth, Honey, Oil, and Wine ; and when they came afterwards to feed upon the Flesh of Animals, they began also to make Offerings thereof in honour of the Gods : For there always was a remarkable Connection between the Food of Mankind and the Matter of the Sacrifices, since the Law ordained, that one part of 'em should

(1) De Orig. & Progr. Idol.
p. 47. Hanov. 1613.

(2) In Att.

(3) In Att.

(4) L. 3. Od 23.

should be eaten, and they were always accompanied with feasting, as we shall see in the Sequel.

It would be hard to determine at what Period of time the use of bloody Sacrifices was introduced among the Pagans. No great stress will be laid on the Authority of Ovid, who alledges, that the Sow was the first animated Victim which was offered to Ceres, upon account of the Ravages which that Animal makes in the Fields.

Prima Ceres avidæ gavisa est sanguine porcæ

Ultra suas meritæ cæde nocentis opes (1).

Homer at least will tell us, that the use of this sort of Sacrifices was common in the time of the Trojan War; and I don't believe we have more early Examples. I know that Pausanias speaks of the human Sacrifice Lycaon offered up to Jupiter Lycæus (2); that the Authors of the Argonauticks tell us, the Heroes of the Golden Fleece stow'd a Hecatomb in their Ship, as an Offering to Apollo; that they mention a Sacrifice of the Deer taken in hunting, which those Heroes sacrificed instead of the other Animals; but these Authorities are to be less regarded than Homer, the most ancient of Poets, and consequently nearer to the Events he described.

Be that as it will, there can be no doubt but the use of bloody Sacrifices in the Pagan World is of very great antiquity, if what is advanced by some of the Fathers of the Church be true, that God accepted those sorts of Sacrifice, and Moses enjoin'd them to the Israelites, only to prevent their offering them to the Gods, as was done by the neighbouring Nations. But this Account is by no means just; and it is certain, that in the true Religion those Sacrifices were as old as the World, since Cain offered to God the Fruits of the Earth, and Abel sacrificed to him Victims taken from his Flocks, Factum est autem—ut offerret Cain de fructibus terræ munera Domino. Abel quoque obtulit de primogenitis gregis sui, et de adipibus eorum (3). Noah

at

(1) Fast. L. 1. (2) See Pausanias in Arc. (3) Gen. iv. v. 3, & 4.

at his coming out of the Ark, offered a Sacrifice to God of all the clean Animals : Et tollens de cunctis pecoribus et volantibus mundis obtulit Holocaustum super altare (1). Now as Idolatry is but a Corruption of the true Religion, there is no doubt of its having borrow'd its Rites from thence, and in particular, the use of bloody Sacrifices, and that from the earliest Ages. It is however as true, that there were Countries where this Practice was not received till very late, and with reluctance too, as the Fact I am going to relate testifies sufficiently. Among the Athenians, the Sacrificer, after having struck the Animal that was to be offer'd up, was obliged to fly with all his might. He was pursued, and to prevent his being arrested, he threw away the Axe he had made use of, as being alone guilty of the Death of the Victim. The Pursuers seized the Axe, and entered an Action against it. He, who spoke in defence of the Axe, alledg'd it was less guilty than the Grinder, who had sharpen'd it ; the Grinder being question'd, laid the blame upon the sharpening Stone he had used, and thus it became an endless Process : A Ceremony ridiculous indeed, but which proves the Aversion the Athenians had to bloody Sacrifices.

But it is fit to observe, that at the very time they were accusom'd to offer up Victims which had Life, they did not forget the ancient Form of Sacrifices, which consisted only in Herbs, Salt, and Meal ; and to this they still had recourse, as the most proper way to appease the Gods ; which makes Horace say,

Te nihil attinet

Tentare multa cæde bidentium (2).

Thus, according to Festus and Servius, they always threw Meal and Salt upon the Victims, upon the Fire, and upon the sacrificing Knives. Sal et far, quod dicitur mola salsa qua & frons Victimæ, foci, et cultri asperguntur (3). Numa Pompilius, as Pliny has it, even laid the Romans under a Prohibition not to use bloody

S

Victims,

(1) Gen. viii. 20.
2 Æn.

(2) L. 3. Od. 25.

(3) Servius in

Victims, or any other Sacrifice, but those in which they employ'd Fruits, Salt, and Corn (1). Dionysius of Halicarnassus (2) seems to ascribe to Romulus what we have been saying of Numa; and he adds, that this Usage was still subsisting in his time, altho' they had superadded to it that of bloody Sacrifices. Plutarch observes there were Gods among the Romans, among others, the God Terminus, towards whom they kept up the ancient way of offering up to them nothing that had Life.

At last, they came to such a pitch of Superstition, as to offer up human Victims. Who was the first Author of these barbarous Sacrifices is not known; but be it Chronos or Saturn, as it is in the Fragment of Sancho-niathon, or Lycæon, as Pausanias seems to insinuate, or some other, still it is certain, that this barbarous Custom was propagated to almost every known Nation. Fathers themselves, acted by a blind Fury, sacrificed their Children, and burned them instead of Incense. These horrid Sacrifices, prescrib'd even by the Oracles of the Gods, were known in Moses's days, and constituted a Part of those Abominations with which that holy Legislator reproaches the Amorites. The Mobites sacrificed their Children to Moloch, and burned them in the Cavity of the Statue of that God (3). According to Dionysius of Halicarnassus (4), they offered Men in sacrifice to Saturn, not only at Tyre and Carthage, but even in Greece and Italy. The Gauls, if we may believe Diodorus Siculus (5), sacrificed to their Gods their Prisoners of War; those of Tauris, all the Strangers who landed upon their Coasts; the Inhabitants of Pella sacrificed a Man to Peleus. Those of Temessa, as Pausanias has it *, offered every Year a young

(1) Plin. l. 18. c. 7.

(2) Lib. 2.

(3) Lev. ch. xx

(4) Lib. 5.

(5) Lib. 3.

* I shall give this Story from Pausanias. Ulysses, says he, having in the course of his Voyages landed at Temessa, there one of his Associates ravish'd a Virgin; for which he was stoned to death by the Inhabitants. They were so infested by the Person's Ghost that they had Thoughts of leaving their Country: But the Oracle of Apollo directed them to offer an Attonement to the Ghost or Demon young Virgin to the Genius of one of Ulysses's Associates, whom they had stoned; and Aristomenes * the Messenian, sacrificed three hundred Men at one time. Strabo (1) mentions those abominable Sacrifices offered by the ancient Germans. Athanasius gives the same Account of the Phenicians and Cretans; and Tertullian of the Scythians and Africans. In the Iliad of Homer we see twelve Trojans sacrificed by Achilles to the Manes of Patroclus. In fine, Porphyry gives a long detail of all the Places, where, in old times, they offer'd up human Sacrifices; among which he enumerates Rhodes, the Island of Cyprus, Arabia, Athens, &c.

From all these Testimonies put together, and from several others, which 'tis needless to quote, it follows, that the Phenicians, the Egyptians, Arabians, Canaanites, the Inhabitants of Tyre and Carthage, those of Athens and Lacedemon, the Ionians, all Greece, the Romans and Scythians, the Albanians, the Allemands, the mon, by consecrating to him a Temple, and there δίδοναι κατ' ἔτος αὐτῷ γυναῖκα πῶν ἐν Τεμεσσῇ παρθένων τὴν καλλίστην, give him yearly one of their most beautiful Virgins. They obey'd the Oracle, and were no more molested by the Demon. Some time after Euthymus came to Temessa, at the return of this annual Solemnity, and hearing how it was, desired Access to the Temple; where the sight of the young Lady thus barbarously devoted first moved his Compassion, and then his Love. He resolv'd to save her if possible, and accordingly waited the Arrival of the Demon, fought and vanquish'd him in his own Temple; upon which the Demon left the Country, sunk in the Sea, and was seen no more. In Eliac. Poster. p. 335. Hanov. I leave the intelligent Reader to judge, who this amorous dastardly Devil must have been.

S 2

Angles,

* I am sorry to find that my Author has taken this Story upon trust, as Montfaucon and many others had done before him. The Fact is this, Aristomenes offered to Jupiter at three different times the Hecatombonia, a Sacrifice which none had a right to offer but one who had killed a hundred of his Country's Enemies. This, Clemens Alexandrinus, and after him Eusebius, improved into that of his sacrificing three hundred Men, and among the rest Theopompus. For not to insist on the Inconsistency of this Action, with the generous and heroick Character of Aristomenes, we learn from Pausanias, that Theopompus was Great Grandfather to that King of Sparta, who was Contemporary with Aristomenes, and consequently that Theopompus must have been dead a considerable time before Aristomenes was born. Vid. Pausan. in Messen. p. 244. & Rowe's Lives in Aristom.

(1) Geo. L. 1.

Angles, the Spaniards, and the Gauls were equally guilty of this horrid Superstition.

The late Abbé de Boissi, in a Dissertation he read to the Academy of Belles Lettres, a Copy whereof is printed (1), ascribes the Origin of that barbarous Custom of sacrificing Men, to an imperfect Knowledge of Abraham's Sacrifice. The Canaanites, says he, the Amerites, and the other People in the Neighbourhood of those Places, where that holy Patriarch had lived, no doubt would hear honourable mention made of the Zeal and Steadiness of that holy Man, who stifled all the Impressions of natural Affection to an only Son; they probably knew something of the Rewards God promis'd to his Faith; but being ignorant that the Sacrifice was not accomplished, they understood the thing in the literal Meaning. and thought by imitating so heroick an Action, to obtain the same Benedictions from Heaven. And indeed, according to Poets and Historians, it was Saturn who introduced the detestable Custom of sacrificing Men. Now Saturn, in the judgment of the best Authors, is the same with Abraham. The Proofs of it are clear; but I must refer them till we come to the Article of that God.

The Ancients came at last to see those inhuman Sacrifices in a true light; and the Facts which I am going to relate, were the occasion at last of their ceasing by degrees. An Oracle, says Plutarch, having ordered the Lacedemonians, in time of a Plague, to sacrifice a Virgin; and the Lot having fallen upon a young Maid named Helena, an Eagle carried off the sacrificing Knife, and laid it on the Head of a Heifer, which was sacrificed in her stead. The same Author tells us, that Pelopidas the Athenian General, having, the Night before the Battle, been directed in a Dream to sacrifice a fair Virgin to the Manes of the Daughters of Scedafus, who had been ravish'd and assassinated in the same place; he under great Terroure, deliberated about the Inhumanity of such a Sacrifice, which he believed to be odious to the Gods; and seeing a red Mare, he sacrificed ficed it by the advice of Theocritus the Soothsayer, and gained the Victory. In Egypt, Amasis made a Law, that only the Figures of Men should be offer'd up instead of themselves. In the Island of Cyprus, Diphi-lus, in the room of human Sacrifices, substituted Sacrifices of Oxen; as Hercules did in Italy waxen Heads named Oscillæ, instead of real Men.

(1) Mem. de l'Acad. des Bel. Let. T. 1. p. 47.

Anciently the Head of the Family was equally King and Priest, and he was the Person by whom Sacrifices were offered; but in later times, every State had Priests and other Ministers, ordain'd to this Function, as we shall shew in the following Chapter. But yet at that very time when there were Priests instituted, the Head of the Family still retain'd the same right. Thus we may distinguish two sorts of Sacrifices; the private ones, which every Man might offer in his own House, to his Lares or Penates (a); and the publick Sacrifices, established by the Laws, for which there were Ministers authorised, and a Priest who presided over them. These sorts of Sacrifices were offer'd at Rome and in Greece, according to certain Rules they were obliged strictly to observe. To this purpose Cicero: “ Our Ancestors, “ says he, have laid down Rules for divine things; “ so that for Ceremonies instituted at high Solemnities, “ we have recourse to the Priests, who are well in- “ structed in them; and for managing the Affairs of “ the Common-wealth, we consult the Augurs,” &c.

The principal Business of these Ministers consisted in making a right Choice of Victims; for, in order to be acceptable to the Gods, they were to have certain Qualities, of which I shall speak immediately. They had likewise several Names given them. Such as were offered up the Day before the Solemnity, were called Præcidaneæ Hostiæ; as the Sow, sacrificed to Ceres before Harvest, was called Præcidanea Porca. Again, they gave the name of Succedaneæ Hostiæ to such

(a) See Virg. Æn. Lib. 4. where mention is made of the Sacrifice Æneas offered in the Morning to his household Gods, who had appeared to him in a Dream.

Sacrifices as they offered up, when the former ones had been neglected ; and thus it was they attoned for the Omission. There were others named Eximiae Hostiae ; meaning not that these Victims had any peculiar Excellence, as the word properly signifies, but that they were separated from the Flock in order to be sacrificed, *eximebantur * grege*. The Ewes that had two Lambs, which they sacrificed with the Mother, were termed Ambiguae † Oves, and the Victims whose Entrails were adherent, Harungæ ‖ or Harugæ (1) ; such as were consumed, Prodigiæ ; and such as had two Teeth higher than the rest, Bidentes (2).

Of whatever nature the Victims were, great care was to be taken in the choice of them ; and the same Blemishes, that excluded them from Sacrifices among the Jews (3) render'd them also imperfect among the Pagans ; whence it would seem that they borrowed several Rites from the Hebrews. Vossius, in his learned Treatise of Idolatry, has upon this Subject entered into philological Dissertations extremely curious, to which I refer the learned Reader. I shall only say here with Jul. Pollux (4) that the Victim ought to be clean, not maim'd, without blemish, without defect, sound, neither lame, nor deform'd ; white, and of an odd number, for the celestial Gods ; black, and of an even number, for the infernal Gods. In fine, chosen from among Animals, Plants, or Fruits, that were agreeable to the Gods, to whom they offered ; for all sorts of Victims were not offered indifferently to every Divinity. It was commonly a Sow, big with young, that they offer'd to Cybele and to the Goddess Tellus ; the Bull to Jupiter ; to Juno, Heifers, Ewe-lambs, Sheep, and at Corinth they sacrificed to her a She-goat. To Neptune a Bull and Lambs, as appears from Homer.
To

* Macrobius however tells us from Varonius, that one reason of their being call'd Eximiae was, quod eximia specie quasi offerenda numinibus eligantur.

† Or Ambegnae, or Ambiegnæ.

‖ Or Harviga, or Aringæ ; for the manner of writing some of those words is uncertain.

(1) Festus. (2) Hyginus. (3) See Levit. (4) Lib. i. c. 29.

To Pluto, likewise a Bull; and to Proserpine a Cow, both of them black; and when that Goddess was taken for Hecate, they sacrificed to her a Dog, an Animal whose Barking they thought drove away the Apparitions sent by that Goddess. The most acceptable Victim to Ceres, was the Boar and the Sow. They made her likewise an Offering of Honey and of Milk. To Venus the Dove, the He-goat, the Heifer, a white She-goat, &c. To Bacchus a He-goat. They sacrificed the Cow and the Bull to Hermione, as we learn from Eliau (1), who adds, that in these Sacrifices, a Bull, which ten Men had much ado to master, of his own accord followed an old Priestess to the Altar. To the Sun sometimes Honey; but the Armenians and Massagetes sacrificed to him Horses. To Apollo, for frequently he was distinguished from the Sun, they offer'd the Ram, the She-goat, the Ewe, and the He-goat; and when they confounded him with the Sun, a young Bullock, with gilded Horns, as an Emblem of his Beams: they offer'd to him likewise a Raven. To Mars, the Horse, the Bull, the Boar, and the Ram. The Lusitanians sacrificed to him He-goats, She-goats, and sometimes their Enemies. The Scythians offer'd to him Asses; and the Carians Dogs. We learn from Homer, that the Victims most grateful to Minerva, were the Bull and the Lamb; or, according to Fulgentius Planciades, Oxen, which had never known the Yoke. To Diana, Stags, She-goats, more especially among the Athenians; and, in some Places, Cows. To the Dii Lares, a Bullock, or an Ew-lamb, according to the Ability of those who offer'd. To them they also sacrificed Cocks and Swallows, and the Hog, whence they got the name of Grundiles.

In fine, every God had his favourite Animal, Tree, or Plant. Among the Animal kind, the Lion was consecrated to Vulcan; the Wolf to Apollo and Mars; the Dog to the Lares and to Mars; the Dragon to Bacchus and Minerva; the Griffins to Apollo; the Serpents to Esculapius; the Stag to Hercules; the

(1) De Anim.

Lamb to Juno; the Horse to Mars; the Heifer to Isis. Among the Birds, the Eagle was sacred to Jupiter: the Peacock to Juno; the Owl to Minerva; the Vultur and the Wood-pecker to Mars; the Cock likewise to Mars, to Esculapius, Apollo, and Minerva; the Dove and Sparrow to Venus; the King's-Fisher to Tetbys; the Phœnix to the Sun, and the Cicada, a sort of Flying Insect, to Apollo. Among the Fishes, which belong'd all to Neptune, the Concha Marina, and the small Fish named Apua, which Festus says is produc'd by the Rain, were acceptable to Venus, and the Barbel to Diana. Among the Trees and Plants, the Pine was consecrated to Cybele, for the sake of Atys; the Beech to Jupiter; the Oak, and its different Species, to Rhea; the Olive to Minerva; the Laurel to Apollo, from his Amour with Daphne; and the Reed to Pan, from the Story of Syrinx; the Lotus, and the Myrtle were likewise consecrated to Apollo and Venus; the Cypress to Pluto; the Narcissus and the Maiden-hair, termed likewise Capilli Veneris, to Proserpine; the Ash-tree and Dog's-grass to Mars; Purslane to Mercury; the Myrtle and the Poppy to Ceres; the Vine, and its Leaves, to Bacchus; the Poplar to Hercules; Dittany and the Poppy to Lucina; Garlick to the Dii Penates; the Alder-Tree, the Cedar, the Narcissus and the Juniper-Tree, to the Furies; the Palm to the Muses; the Plane-Tree to the Genii; the Alder to the God Sylvanus; the Pine to Pan, &c.

If you except some symbolical Reasons, which have been transiently mentioned, for these sorts of Consecrations, there is no possibility of divining what the rest may be: 'Tis probable, since those distinctions of Victims, or of Beings specially consecrated to some Divinity, exclusive of others, were not known to the earliest Ages of Idolatry, that all this Refinement was invented by the Priests, who proposed thereby to imprint upon the minds of the People, a higher Veneration for the Gods.

The Victim being chosen in the manner we have said, it was deck'd with Ribbons and Fillets; they gilded its its Horns, laid upon its Head the Salt-Cake, Fruit, and Male-Frankincense (1); this is what they called the Immolation, Immolatio. Then came the Libation; it was of Wine, which the Priest first tasted himself, and then gave to the By-standers to do the same. After this litabatur; that is, the Priest took some Hairs between the Horns of the Victim, threw them into the Fire, and then turning his Face towards the East, ordered the Sacrificer to slay the Victim. Hardly was it dead, when the Priest plunged the sacrificing Knife into its Entrails, to see if the Sacrifice was auspicious, an perlitatum foret; and then they were explored by the Haruspex, in order to draw from them a favourable Omen. The next thing was to cut the Victim in pieces, Part whereof they roasted, and a Part they distributed for the Feast. The Sacrificers were term'd Victimarii, Popæ, Cultrarii. The Priest, besides the Vestments appointed for his Functions, was sure to be crown'd with a Chaplet of the Branches or Leaves of the Tree, peculiarly sacred to the God for whom the Sacrifice was; as of Oak for Jupiter, Laurel for Apollo, white Poplar for Hercules, of the Vine for Bacchus, the Cypress for Pluto; and so of the rest.

But as there were different sorts of Sacrifices, the Holocaust, the expiatory Sacrifice, the Sacrifice of Thanksgiving, and several others, their way of managing the Victim was accordingly different. In the Holocaust, it was wholly consumed by Fire. Sometimes they only sprinkled the Blood around the Altar; burnt upon it the Fat that inclosed the Entrails, and the Remainder was carry'd off, or eaten up near the same Place where the Immolation was perform'd. There were portions which the Priests only had a right to touch, others were distributed, or carry'd off. It would seem also, that among the Gentiles, whatever was design'd for ordinary Food, especially the Flesh of Animals, was first offer'd up by way of Sacrifice; and hence the primitive Christians, while living in the midst of Pagans, were so much upon their guard against eating Meats

(1) All these were not general for every Sacrifice.

Meats that had been offer'd to Idols. If this Account, which has been likewise followed by some Authors, and which appears to be ground'd upon Antiquity, is not strictly just, this much at least is true, that all the publick Feasts were usher'd in with Sacrifices, upon the Flesh whereof they feasted, as Atheneus (1) expressly says: To be satisfied of this, we need only read Homer, Virgil, and other Ancients.

From what has been now said, we may conclude, that there must needs have been in the Temples, and wherever else they sacrificed, different Apartments mark'd out; some for preparing the Victim, others for killing it, others for dressing the Flesh, others, in fine, for celebrating the Feast; which last, tho' an Act of Religion, was exceeding gay, and always accompanied with Dancing, Musick, and Hymns sung in honour of the Gods. The Diviners among the Greeks, as Calchas, Mopsus, Amphiaraus, and many others; and the Haruspices among the Romans, assisted at the Sacrifices, to consult the Entrails of the Victim, and give their Opinion of them. It belong'd to them to order the Time, the Form, and the Matter of the Sacrifices, especially upon important Occasions; and they were not wanting then to consult them, and follow their Decisions.

It was not always necessary to bring a living Victim to the Altar, since, for want of other Animals, they went and slew some in hunting, to be offered in Sacrifice, as was already said. Nor was the whole Animal offered to the Gods; the Thighs were the portion which was allotted to them, as Pausanias (2) remarks in general, with respect to the Sacrifices of the Greeks; and this part of the Victim they burn'd upon a clear Fire, made of Chips of Wood. Apollonius Rhodius (3) gives the same Account: They slay, says he, two Oxen, cut them into Quarters, and then into Pieces, setting the votive Thighs apart by themselves; and after having covered

(1) Lib. 5. p. 192. (2) In Att. p. 42, and in Arc. p. 518.
Harrov. 1613. (3) Lib. 1. v. 432.

vered them with the Fat, or with the Omentum which is Fat, they roast them upon Chips of Wood.

The Sacrifices were always accompany'd with Libations: This was a Liquor they pour'd out in honour of the God to whom the Sacrifice was offered, and oft-times the Sacrifice itself was no more than a simple Libation. In ancient times, it was only an Effusion of Water, while the use of Wine was not introduc'd, or was so but in some Places; and what will appear surprising, several Nations that celebrated the Orgies, or Bacchanalia, knew not, or at least made no use of Wine. The Persians, according to Herodotus (1), drank nothing but Water. The same may be said of the Nations of Pontus, the Cappadocians and Scythians. How could the Arcadians, who of old lived upon nothing but Acorns, or rather upon a sort of wild Chestnuts; the Troglodytes, the Ichthyophagi, and numbers of vagrant People, who lived in the midst of Woods or in Caves, have any notion of the use of Wine? And yet they had a Religion, Sacrifices, and Libations. Nations even more civilized, who knew its Use, such as the Egyptians, durst not, if Plutarch says true (2), bring any of it into the Temples. And indeed, before Psammeticus, the Egyptians made no use of Wine at all, nor offered any to their Gods, believing it not to be agreeable to them, since they looked upon it as the Blood of the Titans, which mixing with the Earth, after Jupiter had thunder-struck them, produced the Vine-tree.

Altho' for private Sacrifices there was no time specified, yet in publick Sacrifices, they were very religiously exact in chusing the Morning for the celestial Gods, and the Evening or the Night-time, for the terrestrial or infernal ones. The Sacrifices made in honour of the last, required peculiar Ceremonies. They sacrificed to them no Victims but such as were black; for receiving whose Blood, a Hole was prepared, and into it was the Wine of the Libation thrown. The whole Victim was burnt, as in the Holocausts, without reserving any thing for the Feast; for it was not lawful to eat the

Meat

(1) Lib. 1. (2) De Isid. & Osir.

Meat that had been offered to the infernal Gods, and to the Manes (1).

In fine, we may remark with Lucian (2), that the Sacrifices differ'd according to the quality of the Persons. The Husbandman, says he, offers up an Ox; the Shepherd, a Lamb; the Goat-herd, a Goat: There are some who make only a simple Offering of Cakes or Incense; and he that has nothing, makes his Sacrifice by kissing his right Hand.

We may further remark, that Sacrifices were become so common, as to be offer'd upon almost every Occasion in life; since, besides those prescrib'd by the Rituals, they were offer'd by Generals before Battel, as we may see in ancient Authors, particularly in Pausanias (3): By those who were to found a City, as appears from the same Author (4): When they were to enter upon a Journey: In the common Affairs of Life. Under any Ailment, after a Dream; in short, they enter'd upon no Enterprize of any importance, till they had first implor'd the Assistance of the Gods, by this Act of Religion. Eusebius cites (5) a Passage from Porphyry, concerning an Oracle of Apollo, which prescrib'd the Form of Sacrifices. “There are, said Porphyry, (after the Oracle,) Gods of the Earth, and Gods of Hell. To them, Victims are to be offered of Quadrupeds, of a black Colour; but with this difference, that for the terrestrial Gods, the Victims must be presented upon Altars, and for the Infernal, in Ditches and Holes. To the aerial Gods, the Sacrifice is to be of Birds, whose whole Body is to be burn'd by way of Holocaust, and their Blood pour'd out around the Altar. Fowls are likewise to be offered up to the Sea-Gods, but the Libation must be pour'd upon the Waves, and the Fowls are to be of a black Colour.” Whence we may conclude, that the Birds they offer'd to the celestial Gods were white, as I observed already of the Victims. But we are farther to observe, 1. That at Rome, when the Victim had any Spots, they whiten'd it

(1) See Iliad.

(2) De Sacr.

(3) In Mess.

(4) Ibid.

(5) Præp. Evan. Lib. 3.

it over with Chalk, and this is what they called Bos cretatus. 2. That they offer'd up to the terrestrial Gods, four-footed Beasts, provided they were black; thus it was with the Hog they sacrificed to Ceres, because, as the same Porphyry remarks, the Colour of the Earth is dark. Lastly, that as the Fillets, wherewith they adorn'd the Heads of the Victims offer'd to the celestial Gods were to be white, so, those with which they dress'd the Animals to be sacrificed to the terrestrial or infernal Deities, were to be black (a).

Sacrifices, as has been remark'd, did not always consist in offering up Animals: Oft-times they presented nothing to the Gods but Fruits and Plants, as, to Pomona, and other Divinities; oft-times Flower, or Cakes of Corn or Barley-meal. Of these, the Greeks made an Oblation in all their Sacrifices, of whatever nature they were. Homer calls these Cakes ὄλαχίτας; others were called Popana, and Prothymata, and these were mainly offered to Esculapius. Another sort of Cake was term'd Bous, the Ox, because Horns were figured upon it, and this was appropriated to Jupiter Cælestis, to Apollo, Diana, Hecate, and the Moon. Others were named *Melyta, because they were kneaded with Honey; these again were offered to Trophonius. In fine, to conclude, there was another sort of Cakes called Arixa, and another Hygieia, which they offer'd up to the Goddess of Health.

At Rome, these Cakes were made of Meal and Salt, they called them Ador, and the Sacrifices made of them Adorea Sacrificia. According to Romulus's Law, these Cakes were to be baked in an Oven; for which purpose he instituted the Festival called Fornacalia; whence came afterwards, the Goddess Fornax.

After the Victim was slain, there were Ministers who held Vessels ready to receive the Blood, others with Instruments in their Hands, either to flay or cut it (a) The Latin Word cæruleus, made use of to express the Colour of those Fillets, is frequently taken by the best Authors, to denote Black, tho' it is commonly understood of a deep Blue.

* Or Melithyta.

it into several pieces. It was observed, that the Haruspex, the Flamen, or the Priest, examined the Entrails of the Victim, Extā, from thence to draw auspicious Omens. We add here, 1. That the Heart, the Liver, the Lungs, and the Spleen, were the principal Subject of their Attention. 2. That from inspecting the Entrails, came the manner of Divination, called Extispicium. 3. That they made Observations also upon the Motion of the Tail, when the Victim was just expiring. If it was twisted, that signify'd a difficult Enterprize: When it was turned downward, it presaged an Overthrow; but if it was lifted up, it betoken'd a compleat Triumph. 4. That they drew also Presages from the manner in which the Incense sparkled as it burn'd, as well as from the Smoak, and its different Motions or Contorsions.

When the Sacrifice was ended, if the Omens were favourable, it was then a perfect Sacrifice, which was express'd by the single Word Litare; for, that they were not all acceptable to the Deity to whom they were made, Martial tells us (1),

Non quacunque manu victima cæsa litat.

So Plautus (2),

Si Hercule istuc unquam factum est, tum me Jupiter faciat, ut semper sacrificem, nunquam litem.

If I am guilty of what you lay to my charge, may Jupiter never accept a Sacrifice I shall offer.

Thus there was no true Sacrifice without the Litation, if one may be allowed to adopt the Word.

All the By-standers were oblig'd to keep silence, while they were killing the Victim, and burning it on the Altar; in the interval between the two, they might converse with one another; whence came the Proverb, Inter cæsa & porrecta.

When the Priest was going to sacrifice, a Herald cry'd before him, Hoc age, give your sole Attention to what you are going about. And in Greece, when he approach'd the Altar, he ask'd, Who is here? And the Spectators answer'd, Many good People *. Then
the

(1) L. 10. Ep. 73.

(2) In Pœn.

* πολλοί καγαθοί.

the Priest pronounc'd this Form, Be gone all ye Profane, which the Romans thus express'd, Procul este Profani. They were especially careful to debar from thence, Robbers, Murderers, and all People of bad Lives: But this was not for all Sacrifices in general, at least in Greece.

The Priest who sacrificed, had commonly his Head veil'd; I say commonly, because there were Sacrifices where they were to have the Head uncovered. As to this distinction, Parties are not well agreed; Fabretti (1) however, is of opinion, that they veil'd the Head, to sacrifice to the twelve great Gods, and that to the rest, they sacrificed uncover'd. Plutarch seems to insinuate, that the Priest never had his Head cover'd but when he sacrificed to the celestial Gods, since he says, that he who offer'd Sacrifice to Saturn, had his Head bare, because he was one of the infernal Gods. The antique Bas-reliefs representing Sacrifices, such as are to be seen in Montfaucon (2) and elsewhere, give no great countenance to those Distinctions. Only this we know, that in Greece the Sacrificer was always bare-headed.

The Priest, before sacrificing, was to prepare himself for it, especially by Continence, during the preceding Night, and by Ablution; and for that purpose, there was ordinarily at the entry into the Temple, Water where he purify'd himself. In ancient times, it would seem that they bath'd themselves in some River; at least Virgil (3) makes Æneas say, when he is ready to offer a Sacrifice, that he will not enter upon that Action till he has purify'd himself in Running-Water.

. Donec me flumine vivo Abluero.

But it is to be observ'd, that this Ablution was only requisite in Sacrifices offer'd to the celestial Gods; sprinkling being sufficient for the terrestrial and infernal Gods. At Rome they never offer'd Sacrifice, till they had usher'd it in with a Prayer to Janus, for the Reason given by Ovid, that he kept the Gate which led to the other Gods. This Prayer ended, a second was address'd dress'd to Jupiter, then a third to Juno, or, according to others, to Vesta. After this, the Priest encompassed the Altar several times, lifting his Hand to his Mouth; then he poured Wine upon the Altar, from the Patera: Lastly, he ordered the Sacrificer to strike the Victim; which he did either with the Knife called Secespita, or he knocked it on the head with a Mallet.

Montfaucon (1) explains most of the Sacrifices that are still to be found represented upon Marbles, and upon Bas-Reliefs; so that there is little occasion for me to speak of them here, and the rather, that his Explications suppose the Figures which one ought to have before his eyes: but as in that Multitude of Sacrifices, some were more solemn than others, such as the Hecatomb, the Taurobolium, and Criobolium, and some others, I suppose it is incumbent upon me to give a short detail of 'em here.

Hecatombs. In great Victories, or in time of some publick Calamity, they sometimes offer'd in the same Sacrifice, no less than an hundred Oxen, or other Animals; this is what they called a Hecatomb: Sometimes it amounted to a thousand, tho' very rarely, and then it got the Name of a Chiliomb.

Capitolinus (2), speaking of the Hecatomb which was offer'd by Balbinus, after Maximinus's Defeat, informs us at the same time, in what manner this sort of Sacrifice was offer'd. “ They set up in a place appointed, an hundred Altars of Turf, and sacrifice an hundred Sheep, and as many Hogs; if the Sacrifice is Imperial, they offer up an hundred Lions, an hundred Eagles, and as many other Animals. The Greeks, says this Author, did the same thing when they were infested with the Plague.” Athenæus adds, that they took the same course after signal Victories, for which he cites the Example of Conon the Lacedemonian Captain; who offer'd, says he, a true Hecatomb. By this Phrase, true Hecatomb, the Author gives us to understand, that the General actually offer'd up an hundred Oxen, for sometimes that Name, (viz.

(1) Loc. cit.

(2) In Balbino.

(viz. Hecatomb) was given to Sacrifices, where the hundred Animals were of another Species. From the Passage in Capitolinus, we may refute the Error of those who maintain, that the Hecatomb was so called, upon account of an hundred Oxen or Bulls which were therein sacrificed. Hesychius, and several other Authors, confirm what Capitolinus says, that in Hecatombs they sacrificed other Animals as well as Oxen. To conclude, this kind of Sacrifice was of very great antiquity, since there is mention of it in Homer (1), who says, Neptune went into Æthiopia to receive the Sacrifice of the Hecatombs, of Bulls and Lambs. 'Tis a noted Story, that Pythagoras offer'd an Hecatomb for having found out the Demonstration of the forty-seventh Proposition in the first Book of Euclid.

We must not omit the Sacrifice of Agroteræ, where they sacrificed five hundred Goats every Year at Athens, in honour of Diana, surnamed Agrotera, whether from the City Agros in Attica, or from a Surname given to that Goddess, according to Rhodiginus, because she was always in the Fields. Xenophon refers the Institution of this Sacrifice, to a Vow made by the Athenians, of sacrificing to that Goddess as many Goats as they should kill of Persians; but the Slaughter they made of them was so great, that it was impossible for them literally to accomplish their Vow, which obliged them to make a Decree, binding themselves to offer up every Year five hundred Goats in honour of her, which was still kept up in the time of that Historian.

The Taurobolium was a Sacrifice offered to the Mother of the Gods. This Sacrifice does not appear to have been known in the first Ages of Paganism; since the oldest Inscription that mentions it, which was found at Lions, An. 1704, in the Mountain Fourviere, informs us, that this Taurobolium was offer'd under the Reign of Antoninus, A. D. 160. But then it was very late before it was laid aside; the last Inscription of it that we know, is in the Reign of Valentinian the Third.

T

As

As none has given a better Account of the Ceremonies of the Taurobolium than M. de Bosc, in his Dissertation on the Inscription at Lions (1), I refer the Curious to it, and shall only observe, in order to give some Idea of the thing, that we have hardly any way of knowing this sort of Sacrifice, but from Inscriptions; the Ancients, at least such of them as are extant, being quite silent upon this Article; except Julius Firmicus, a Christian Author, Prudentius, and perhaps Lampri-dius, who speaking of Heliogabalus, says, he was so devoted to Cybele, that he received the Blood of the Bulls that were offer'd up to that Goddess. This Sacrifice was offer'd to Cybele for the Consecration of the High-Priest, for the Expiation of Sins, or for the Health of the Prince, or of those who offer'd it. It was a sort of Baptism of Blood, which they thought convey'd a spiritual Regeneration, and whose Rites and Ceremonies were different from other Sacrifices. But, as the Poet Prudentius has left us a particular Description of the Taurobolium, I shall, for the Satisfaction of the Reader, give a Translation of his Verses.

“ In order, says he, to consecrate the High-Priest, “ that is, to initiate him into the Taurobolium, a great “ Hole was made, into which he enter'd, dress'd in an “ extraordinary Garb, wearing a Crown of Gold, with “ a Toga of Silk, tuck'd up after the Sabine Fashion.
 “ Above the Hole was a sort of Floor, the Boards of “ which, not being close joined, left several Chinks,
 “ and besides, they bored several Holes therein
 “ Then they led up a Bull, crown'd with Festoons, “ upon his Shoulders Fillets cover'd with Flowers, and “ having his Forehead gilt. Here the Victim's Throat
 “ was cut, so as the reeking Blood came streaming “ down upon the Floor, which being made like a Sieve, “ let fall into the Hole as it were a Shower of Blood, “ which the Priest received upon his Head, upon his “ Body, and Clothes. Not content with this, he even “ held back his Head to receive the Blood upon his “ Face, he let it fall upon both Cheeks, upon his Ears, “ Lips,

(1) Mem. de l'Acad. des Bel. Let. T. 3.

“ Lips, and Nostrils; nay, he open'd his Mouth, to “ bedew his Tongue with it, and some of it he swal“ lowed. When all the Blood was drain'd, the Vic“ tim was removed, and the High-Priest came out of “ the Hole. It was a horrible Spectacle to see him in “ this plight, his Head cover'd over with Blood, clot-“ ted Drops sticking to his Beard, and all his Garments “ distain'd. And yet, as soon as he appear'd, he was “ received with a general Congratulation, and not da“ ring to approach his Person, they adored him at a di“ stance, looking upon him now as a Man quite pure
 “ and sanctify'd.”

They who had thus received the Blood of the Taurobole, wore their stained Clothes as long as possible, as a sensible Sign of their Regeneration.

2. It was not always for private Persons the Taurobole was made: This Ceremony was perform'd for the whole Body of Citizens, for entire Provinces, for the Prosperity of the Emperor, &c. Sometimes these Regenerations were for twenty Years; sometimes, in fine, the Archigallus, or the High-Priest of Cybele, appointed it for certain Occasions (a).

3. This Sacrifice of Regeneration did not always require the sacrificing a Bull: Sometimes the Victim was a Ram, and then it was called Criobolium. Sometimes a She-Goat, and then it got the Name of Egibolium, or Ægobolium. Several of the Learned are not agreed that this last Victim was used in the Tauroboles, but only the Bull, and sometimes the Ram, when they would do honour to Atys, Cybele's Favourite, to whom the Taurobole was solely consecrated; altho' Du Choul, Gambden, Selden, and some others, are of opinion that it was likewise offered in honour of Diana.

We shall end this Chapter with some general Observations, in relation to the Forms of Prayer used upon this occasion. As they believ'd the Gods themselves had indited those Forms, they were considered as a thing so essential, that if he to whom the pronouncing

T 2

of

(a) The whole of this is drawn from Inscriptions, and from the Dissertation of M. de Bosc.

of them belong'd, did but forget or transpose a single Word, they were persuaded the Sacrifice would have no effect. Thus, when Decius the Consul devoted himself to the infernal Gods, and with himself the Enemy's Troops, he caution'd the Pontif Valerius Maximus, to be exact in pronouncing the Form prescrib'd upon that Occasion. There were even Overseers appointed to take care that nothing of the Formulary was forgot ; and that they might hear every Syllable which the Speaker pronounc'd, the Spectators were peremptorily enjoin'd Silence. Most of those Forms, if Jamblicus may be believ'd (1), like that of Theurgy, (a sort of Magick to be explain'd afterwards) were composed at first in the Egyptian or Chaldean Language. The Greeks and Romans, in translating them, kept in many of the original Words of those foreign Languages, so that they frequently became a sort of barbarous and unintelligible Jargon ; but still the more barbarous and unintelligible, the more sacred and revered.

C H A P. XI.

Of the Instruments they made use of in Sacrifice, and other Ceremonies of Religion.

AFTER having treated of Sacrifices and Victims, I am to speak of the sacred Instruments ; but as it is hard to make my Readers understand the Description of them without Figures, they will have recourse to the Antiquaries who have given Prints of them.

What they called Acerra, was a little Chest where the Incense was put, much the same with those we have in our Churches ; for those of the Ancients, that now remain, and that are to be seen in the Cabinets of the Curious, were not made after the same Model, nor of the same Metal. This Chest or Box of Perfumes, is frequently to be seen upon ancient Monuments, in the Hands of the Camilli, or sometimes of the Vestals.

The

(1) De Myst.

The Censer, or Thuribulum, was known to the Ancients, but there is now no Representation of it to be seen in Monuments. The Greeks called this Instrument Thymiaterion, and it is easy to see what was the use of it *.

The Præferriculum was a Vase that contained the Liquor made use of in Libations. The Discus, a Bason whereon the Flesh of the Victim was laid. The Aspergillum or Aspersorium, which was much like our own, made of Horse-hair, or that of some other Animal, with an Handle, serv'd for sprinkling the Holy-Water, which was contained in a Vase, whereof we have some Representation preserv'd in Monuments.

The Patera, was an Instrument ordinarily round, somewhat hollow, and with a Handle. The use of it was to receive the Liquor that was pour'd into it from the Vase, and to sprinkle it upon the Victim; which Virgil explains very distinctly:

Ipsa tenens dextrâ Pateram pulcherrima Dido

Candentis Vaccæ media inter cornua fudit (1).

The beauteous Dido, holding the Patera in her right Hand, pours the Wine between the Horns of the white Heifer.

This Instrument, made of different Metals, with some variety in Form, is that which has suffer'd least from the Injury of Time, and there are few Antiquaries but have several of them.

The Simpulum, in form pretty much resembling the Patera, was a sort of Spoon, which, according to Festus, they used in Sacrifices for making the Libations of Wine. Pliny (2) calls this Instrument Simpuvium, and says some of them were of baked Earth.

The Augural Staff, which they called Litus, like a sort of Trumpet, was somewhat crooked at the end, and the Augur held it in his Hand when he was to examine the Flight of Birds, in taking the Omens: It is commonly to be found upon Monuments and Medals.

The Mallet, Malleus, was for knocking down the Victim, as also the Ax; for both these sorts of Instruments

T 3

* For burning the Incense in time of the Sacrifice,

(1) Æn. l. 4. v. 60. (2) L. 35. c. 12.

ments are to be seen upon Bas-Reliefs indifferently, in the Hands of the Sacrificers.

The Secespita was a sort of Hanger, which serv'd to cut the Throat of the Victim: They were of different Forms, and even some of them in a Case. Festus gives a just Description of it. It was, says he, an Iron Knife, with an oblong Blade, and round Haft made of solid Ivory, fasten'd to the Blade with Gold and Silver, and studded with Nails of Cyprian Brass, which the Flamens, Flaminick Virgins, and Pontifs made use of in Sacrifice*.

The Ligula, or Lingula, was a sort of Spatula the Haruspices used, for exploring the Entrails of the Victim.

The Candelabrum was a branching Candlestick, on which they set the Torches that burn'd in the time of the Sacrifice.

The Dolabra, a great Knife which served for dismembering the Victim (a).

The Enclabris†, mention'd by Misson, in his Travels thro' Italy, was the Table upon which the Victim was laid, for the convenience of examining the Entrails, and drawing Omens from them.

The Olla was the Pot in which the Priests boil'd the portion of the Victim that was allotted to them.

The Trumpet was a sort of Horn or Clarion which they sounded at the Ceremony of the Hecatombs; but at every Sacrifice there was a Player on the Flute, who accompany'd the Victim, while they were conducting it to the Place where it was to be offer'd, and play'd upon a double Flute during the Sacrifice, as we see in all the Monuments that we have remaining upon the Subject.

The Urceolus was a small Vase of Brass, Silver, Earth, or some other Material, which had a strait Neck, and wide

* Caltrum ferreum oblongum, manubrio rotundo, eburneo, solido, vincto ad capulum auro argenteoque, fixum clavis æneis, ære Cyprio, quo Flamines, Flaminicæ Virgines, Pontificesque ad Sacrificia utebantur.

(a) There is a Representation of it in the fifth Vol. of the Academy of Belles Lettres.

† Or Anclabris.

wide Mouth, much after the Fashion of our Burettes ‡ which the inferiour Ministers carry'd for washing the Priests Hands. They are often to be found upon antique Monuments, in the Hands of these sort of Ministers.

Altho' we are not to reckon Tripods in the number of Utensils used at Sacrifices, yet, in regard they had them frequently in the Temples, in those especially of Apollo, and sometimes used them for supporting the sacred Vases, it is necessary to say something of 'em here. Without insisting upon the Distinction of Athenæus, who admits only two sorts of them, that are reduced to great and small Tripods, I divide them into three kinds. Under the first I include, those used by the Pythia, when she deliver'd the Oracles of Apollo in the Temple of Delphos. As the Exhalation, to which she owed her prophetick Inspiration, issued out of a Cave, as shall be said in the History of Oracles, and as one who approach'd too near was in danger of falling into it, as sometimes happen'd, they contrived a three-footed Machine, which they set upon the Rock, and there the Priestess sat, for the convenience of catching the Exhalations without any Danger. 'Tis of this sort of Tripods we read so much in ancient History. The second kind comprehends whatever stood upon three-feet; Vases, Tables, or whatever else it was; and of these there was a vast Quantity. In the third, I reckon the votive Tripods, which Princes or private Persons dedicated in the Temples of Apollo. Herodotus (1) speaks of a golden Tripod, which the Greeks, upon their Victory over the Persians, sent to Delphos: In the division they made of the Spoils of the Enemy, says that Author, they set the Silver by it self, took a tenth of it for the God who was worshipped at Delphos; and of this portion they made a golden Tripod, which they dedicated to him, and which is still to be seen upon a brazen three-headed Serpent. From these last Words it appears, that this golden

T 4

‡ Crystal Bottles wherein they put the Wine and Water, used in the Sacrifice of the Mass.

(1) Lib. 9.

280 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book III.
golden Tripod was supported by one of another kind, represented by three Heads of a Serpent; which is confirmed by Pausanias, who tells us (1), that the golden Tripod given by the Greeks, after the Battel of Plataea, was supported by a Serpent of Brass.

It will not be expected, I should include under any of these kinds of Tripods, those of Homer, which walk'd upon their own Legs to the Assembly of the Gods: A poetical Fiction, to give us the higher Notion of the Excellence of Vulcan's Works.

Nothing is more common in the Cabinets of the Curious, and in the Works of Antiquaries, than the Tripods; there they are to be found of all sorts of figures, and some even pretty singular. The most of 'em are of Brass, or of Bronze.

C H A P. XII.

Of the Priests, and other Ministers of the Sacrifices.

AFTER the Sacrifices, Victims, and Instruments which were used in offering them up, something must be said of the Priests and Ministers. As there is no Nation, be it ever so savage, but has some Religion, neither is there any without Ministers to preside over it; but in this Chapter we shall hardly take notice of any, except those of the Greeks and Romans. The general Name given by the former to their Priests, was that of ἱερεὺς, tho' they were distinguish'd from one another by particular Names and Functions. To speak of them with some order, we shall take for our Guide the illustrious Potter, who has given us an excellent Treatise upon the Greek Antiquities.

First then, I am of opinion, as I hinted before, that in earlier times, the Priesthood belong'd to the Head of the Family; at least that he had the Privilege of sacrificing, altho' there were Priests by Office. Thus at the Siege of Troy, notwithstanding Chryses and others were Priests, yet we see in Homer, the Kings, the Princes, ces, and Captains of the Army offering Sacrifices upon occasion.

(1) In Phœc. p. 633.

When they were to chuse a Priest, an Examination was made into his Life, his Manners, and even the Qualities of his Body, and he was to be free from all unseemly Defects ; much the same as we see in the sacred Writings, those who had but one Eye, the Lame, the Hump-back'd, &c. were excluded from the Priesthood. The Athenians even required that their Ministers of Religion should be pure and chaste in their Lives, and their Hierophantæ, we know, made use of some cold Herbs, such as Hemlock, as a means to obtain the Gift of Continence. The Priests were generally allowed to marry ; they were frequently indeed forbid second Marriages, altho' History informs us that this Rule was not always observed.

The Greeks and Romans had a Hierarchy, Priests of the High-Priests, Priests, and subaltern Mini- Greeks. sters, who serv'd them in their Functions ; but as the Greeks were divided into several States independent upon one another, this Hierarchy was not every where uniform. There were even Cities, such as Argos, and some others, where Women presided in Religion. Nothing is more celebrated than those Priestesses of Argos, since their Priesthood serv'd for the Date of publick Events. The Names of most of those Priestesses were lost, till M. Fourmont the younger, in his Travels thro' Greece, found a very large Inscription, containing a full List of them, whereof he is preparing to give the History. Minerva Polias the Patroness of Athens, had a Priestess to preside over her Worship ; and Plutarch in his Morals, names one Lyfimache, who exercised that Function. The Pedasians, according to Herodotus (1), had also a Priestess for their Minerva. There was likewise one for Ceres at Catana, for Pallas at Clazomenæ, &c.

At Delphi there were five Princes of the Priests, and with them Prophets, who pronounc'd the Oracles. The Opuntians had only two High-Priests, of whom, the one

(1) In Clio.

282 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book III.
one presided over the Worship of the celestial Gods, whom they named Ouranius; the other over that of the terrestrial and infernal, and was stiled Catachthonian.

The Priesthood of Syracuse, which, according to Cicero (1), was in very great esteem, lasted but one Year. The Hierophantæ were very celebrated Priests at Athens; their Name comes from two Greek words, ἱερός, sacred, and φαίνω, to shew. According to Apollodorus, he was the Person appointed to shew the Mysteries and sacred Things to those who were to be initiated; for which reason, besides that of Hierophanta, he had likewise the name of Prophet given him. This Minister had other Officers under him, to be his Assistants in this and other Functions; these were called Exegetæ, and sometimes Prophets. He likewise adorn'd the Statues of the Gods, and carried them in the publick Ceremonies. Their Wives too had a share in Divine Service, and were named Hierophantidæ. This Priest besides overlook'd the Worship and Mysteries of Ceres. For all these Articles, Salmasius's Notes upon Solinus may be consulted.

As the Hierophantæ and their Wives were set apart for the Worship of the Goddesses Hecate and Ceres, the Orgiophantæ, and the Women named Orgiastæ, presided over the Orgies, or sacred Rites of Bacchus; and the Daduchus or Lampadophorus, over the Festivals named Daduchia, of which we shall speak in the Article of the Festivals of the Greeks.

If we may give credit to Pollux (2), there were sixteen sorts of Ministers of the Temples; the Priests; the Temple-Keepers, or Æditui; those who had the Charge of the holy Things; the Prophets; the Hypoprophets, or Under-prophets, who published the Oracle; the Sacrificers; those who performed the Rites of Initiation; the Administrators of holy Things; the Purifiers; the Diviners, or Inspired; the Sortilegi; the Fortune-Tellers; the Cresimothetæ, or those who gave forth the Lots to be drawn; the Saints or Devotees; votees ; the Thuriferi, or Incense-Bearers ; the Hyparetæ ; and the Servitors (a), or Camilli*.

(1) In Verr. 4.

(2) Ch. i. Art. 16.

The same Author next remarks (1), that the same Names were given to different Orders of Priestesses, in places where the Women ministred in the Temples ; and that the Priests of Apollo at Delphi, had the name of Pythia, by way of eminence. He might have added further, that at Clazomenæ the Priests of Pallas was named Hesychia, and that of Bacchus, Tbyas ; and in Crete, that of Cybele, Melissa. He might likewise have remark'd, that among the Athenians the subaltern Ministers were stiled Parasiti ; that not being then a Name of reproach, as it is at present. The Acceptation of this word, in the Sense I understand it, is taken from an Inscription at Athens, where it is said, that of two Bulls offered in Sacrifice, one part should be reserved for the Games, the other distributed among the Priests and the Parasites. The principal Function of those Parasites, who had a Place among the chief Magistrates, was to chuse the Wheat allotted for the Sacrifices.

There was likewise another sort of People set apart for Service in the Sacrifices. These were the Ceryces, or the Cryers, whose Office was to make publick Proclamation of things, whether civil or sacred. Thus, according to Athenæus, two of them were to be chosen ; and accordingly we find the Ceryces are two in number in that fine Athenian Inscription, explained in the Paleography (2) ; one for Areopagus, the other for the Archon. They were to be taken from the Athenian Family ;

(a) This List is not compleat, as we shall see in the Sequel of this Chapter.

* The Names which Pollux gives to those Ministers are, ἱερεῖς, νεωκέραι, Ζάκροισι, Περγήται, ὑποφῆται, Θῦται, Τελεταί, ἱερουργοί, καθάρται, μάντις, Θεοράντες, Χρησμοῖσι, Χρησμολόγοι, Χρησμοδοταί, Παναγείς, Πυρρόροι, ὑπηρέται, Θέοργοι, I have given my Author's Translation of them ; possibly the Χρησμοδοταί may signify the Ministers who delivered the Oracle ; Χρησμοῖσι, they who turned it into Verse ; and Χρησμολόγοι, they who gave the Interpretation of it.

(1) Ch. i. Art. 17.

(2) p. 148.

mily ; which, according to Isocrates, bore the name of Ceryce, from one Ceryx, the Son of Mercury, and Pandrosos, Daughter of Cecrops.

Upon which we shall make a transient Remark, that there were sacerdotal Families, out of which the Priests were to be taken ; as at Athens, those of the Eumolpidae, for the Worship of Ceres and the Eleusinian Mysteries ; and at Rome, those of the Pinarii and Potitii, for that of Hercules.

At Athens, the Archon thought himself honoured by the Title of Priest : such among others was Xenon, who was Archon under the Consulship of Drusus, in the second Year of Tiberius, and who bears the Title of Priest in the Inscription, which we now mentioned ; and if Spon is good Authority, the same Drusus was at once Consul, Archon and Priest. The Origin of the Priesthood of the Archons, according to Demosthenes (1), was owing to this, that anciently the Kings and Queens of Athens were the High Priests. The Royalty being abolished, they continued to chuse a King and a Queen, to preside over sacred things, which Office was afterwards transfer'd to the Archons, and their Wives. The Epimeletæ served the King in sacred Matters, and Women named Gereræ, assisted the Queen to the number of fourteen. The Ceryx served her likewise in the most secret Mysteries of Religion. There was likewise independent upon all these Ministers a Pontiff, or rather a Chief Priest, Ἀρχιερεὺς, who presided in sacred things. Sometimes he was only for one City ; sometimes for a whole Province. Oftentimes too he was vested with this Dignity for Life ; sometimes for only five Years. As there were Chief Priests, so we find Chief Priestesses ; for among the Greeks, Women as often as Men were admitted to minister in sacred things. These Chief Priestesses were the Superintendents of the Priestesses, and were chosen from the best Families. But of all the Pagan Priestesses, the most celebrated was the Pythia, of whom we shall have occasion to speak elsewhere.

The

(1) Oratio ad Neæram.

The Neocori had Offices corresponding to those of our Sacristans, or Vestry-Keepers : accordingly it was their business to adorn the Temples, and to keep in order the Vases and Utensils that were used in the Ceremonies of Religion. Theodoret (2), is the only one who mentions two other Functions of the Neocori : The one, to stand at the Gate of the Temples to sprinkle Holy Water for purification of those who were entering into them ; the other, to throw some of the same Water upon the Meat served up at the Emperor's Table. Julian the Apostate, says this Author, went into the Temple of publick Genius in the City of Antioch ; and the Neocori, standing at the two sides of the Temple-gate, sprinkled Holy Water upon those who were entering, pretending thereby to give them Absolution.

As to the second Function above-mentioned, we are informed of it by the same Author, in the Story I am going to relate : It is with respect to a young Neocorus, who became instructed in the Christian Religion, but could not decline attendance upon the same Emperor in a Feast, where he was to officiate in blessing the Provisions with the Holy Water. Upon which Theodoret remarks, that altho' the Entertainment in the Suburbs of Daphne, given by Julian to the Inhabitants of Antioch, lasted several Days, yet the young Neocorus, who was standing by the Emperor, after having sprinkled the Dishes with Holy Water, secretly withdrew, and appeared no more on the following Feast-days. This Office became very considerable ; for the Neocori, who at first were employed only in servile Duties, were afterwards raised to the superiour Station of Ministers and High Priests, who sacrificed for the Life of the Emperor. We find on Medals, where the name of Neocorus often occurs, that of Prytanis, which was sometimes granted to them, with that of Agonothetes, or Dispenser of the Prizes at the publick Games. Even Cities, and Ephesus among the first, according to Van-Dale, took the name of Neocorus ; upon which you may consult Vaillant and the other Antiquaries.

Before

(2) L. 3. c. 16.

Before we come to the Roman Priesthood, I must say something of three sorts of Priests, who were common to them with the Greeks. The first are those of Cybele: The second those of Mythras: The third those of the Orgies, or Mysteries of Bacchus.

Nothing in Antiquity is more famous, nor at the same time more contemptible than the Priests of Cybele, who were called Galli or Archigalli, from a River in *Phrygia, named Gallus. Van-Dale considers these Galli, and justly too, as so many Strollers, Vagrants, and Quacks, who went strolling about from Town to Town, playing upon Cymbals and Crotala †, wearing on their Breasts small Images of the Mother of the Gods, in order to raise charitable Contributions; the very Dregs of the People, according to Apuleius; a Sect of furious Fanatics, and infamously debauched. We agree with that learned Author in the Character which he draws of those Ministers; but we cannot be of his mind, when he says, that notwithstanding their being consecrated to the Service of Cybele, yet they were not in the quality of Priests, since their Priesthood is a thing undeniable. Pliny, Apuleius, and Suidas expressly say they were Priests, and give them that Title; and Lucian (1), who describes the Ceremony of their Initiation, leaves no room to doubt of it.

We shall not be surprised to find how those wretched Priests are represented by Clemens of Alexandria, Lactantius, Cbrysoptom, and St. Augustin, since profane Authors have had an equal Contempt of them. The Law however had provided for their Subsistence, since, according to Cicero (2), it mark'd out the days when they had permission to ask Alms, and in which none else were allowed to go a begging: Præter Idææ Matris famulos, eosque justis diebus, nequis stipem cogito. This Begging, authorised by Law, probably came about every Month, since those Priests got the name of Menagyrtae and Metragyrtae; because it was for the Mother of the Gods they collected those Alms. To

* Where they first began. † A sort of Drums.

(1) De Dea Syria.

(2) Lib. 2. de Leg.

To these Names, they added, by way of derision, that of Agyrtæ, which imports Jugglers and Dealers in Legerdemain for Money. Clemens of Alexandria adds to the Qualifications of those Galli, that of a Fortune-teller and Sooth-sayer; because, in reality, they pretended to Prediction. They had always old Women in their Retinue, who passed for Sorceresses. Plutarch (1), who speaks of the Verses which they sung, says, they had brought the Poetry of Oracles into such contempt, that by their means the true Oracles of the Tripos, that is to say, of Delphi, were quite neglected. The same Author adds, that they deliver'd their Oracles Extempore, or drew them by lot from certain Books they carried with them, and sold their wretched Predictions to silly Women, who were charmed with the Cadence of their Verses.

To this Description of the Galli, we may add what Lucian (2) informs us of the great Festival that was celebrated in Syria, and of the Madness into which the Initiation of those pitiful Ministers threw them. To this Solemnity, says he, numbers of Galli repair, to celebrate their Mysteries. They slash their Elbows, and scourge one another's Backs with Whips. The Gang about them play upon the Flute and Dulcimer; while others, seiz'd with a divine Enthusiasm, sing Songs, which they compose extempore. 'Tis on that day, adds Lucian, that Galli are initiated. As the Sound of the Flute infuses into the By-standers a sort of Madness, the young Man, who is to be initiated, throws off his Clothes, and raising loud Shrieks, comes into the midst of the Gang, that is without the Temple, draws his Sword, and makes a Eunuch of himself; then running thro' the City, holding in his hand the Marks of his Castration, throws them into a House where he takes on a Woman's dress. This Mutilation was perform'd in other Places, according to Pliny, with the Shreds of a Pot of Samian Earth; and consequently the Operation was both more lingering and more painful.

'Tis

(1) In his Morals 407.

(2) Lib. 2. loc. cit.

'Tis well known, that it was in honour of Atys, Cybele's Favourite, that this Barbarity was practised, whereof he himself had given the precedent. But let us draw the Curtain over this infamous Scene, and say only a word or two of the High Priest of this worthless Crew. This Head of theirs was named Archigallus, and was ordinarily of a considerable Family; at least we read in Gruter an Inscription of the Archigallus Camerius Crescens, who had in his Retinue a great number of Bond-men and enfranchised Slaves. We find, in the first Volume of Montfaucon's Antiquities, the Figure of an Archigallus, with a long Tunick, which reaches down to the ground, and over it a great Cloak tuck'd up, with a Collar, which comes down upon his Breast; upon which are represented, in two large Medals, two Heads of Atys, without a Beard, with the Phrygian Bonnet. Lower down, you see the Frontispiece of a Temple, at the Entrance of which appears the Goddess Cybele, knowable by the Turrets and Battlements she bears upon her Head. Jupiter and Mercury, who are by her side, denote, that she was Mother of the Gods. This Figure, to which the Head is wanting, formerly belonged to M. Baudelot, and is now I believe in England.

Besides those Galli and Archigalli, Cybele had other Priests who were not castrated, and Priestesses, whose Names are to be met with in Gruter. Among those Priestesses, we find a Lady named Laberia Falicla, who was High Priestess to the Mother of the Gods; that is, who presided over the rest, as the Archigallus did over the Galli.

We may remark, that all the Priests and Priestesses of the Mother of the Gods, at first instituted in Phrygia, were afterwards propagated thro' Greece, and thro' the Roman Empire, in the very time of the Republick.

As for the Priests of Mithras, whose Worship was brought to Rome, if we believe Plutarch, in the time of Pompey, and later, according to Van-Dale, I shall say but little, because I am to give the History of that God

God at full length (a). I shall only observe at present, that Mitbras had a Minister who was named the Father of the sacred Mysteries, Pater Sacrorum; and Priestesses who were stiled Mâtres Sacrorum; that those Priests were surnamed Lions, and the Priestesses Hæne, according to Porphyry. Hence the Mysteries of Mitbras were termed Leontica and Patrica, because of the Patres that presided there; that other Ministers of that God were named Coraces, Ravens, or Hierocoraces, sacred Ravens; or Heliaci, from the Sun, whom Mitbras represented. In fine, that those who were to be initiated in the Mysteries of that God, were obliged to submit to Expiations equally lingering and painful, as we shall shew in its proper place.

Lastly, as the Greeks and Romans equally celebrated the high Mysteries of Bacchus, or the Orgies, I may rank in this common Class, the Priests and Priestesses who presided therein; but as there will be occasion to consider them in the History of those Mysteries, I shall only say here, that those Ministers bore different Names, since we find in the Ancients, that the Bacchanals were called Bacchæ, Mænades, Bassarides, Thyades, Mimalonides, Edonides, Elyades, Eleides; all of them Names derived either from their manner of Yelling, or from their Fury and Madness. But 'tis time to speak of the Roman Priests.

Rome, at first, being nothing but an Assemblage of Renegados and Fugitives, whom Romulus had drawn together, that Prince had but little Thought about Religion, and having borrowed it, such as it was, from the Albans, and other neighbouring People, it was, in those first Ages, exceeding plain and simple. Temples and Chapels, that had neither Ornaments nor Statues; for, according to Plutarch, there passed 171 Years before any of them were there to be seen; Sacrifices offer'd without Apparatus, constituted the whole Ceremonial of that infant City. Yet we find in Dionysius of Halicarnassus, that Romulus having divided Rome into thirty

U

(a) See the Article of the Divinities of the Persians.

thirty Curiae, instituted two Priests for each, which made sixty in all.

Numa Pompilius, who was more taken up about Religion than warlike Affairs, made several Alterations in the Roman Hierarchy, and so did some of his Successors, as we may see in Titus Livius, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and in Dion. I shall deliver what I think myself best warranted to say upon the Head. The Priests of Romulus's Institution, were to be at least 50 Years of Age, Men of distinguished Morals and Birth, capable of maintaining themselves with Honour, and free from all corporeal Blemishes: So true it is, that even in the grossest Religions, care has always been taken to admit none for Ministers, and to offer up nothing in Sacrifice, but what was most perfect, and most adapted to the Honour of the Divinity. As in the Ministry of those Priests there were some things that could only be performed by Women, and others, wherein their Assistance was necessary, the Wives and Daughters of the Priests were employ'd in those Pieces of Service. The Priesthood at first was engrossed by the Patricians; but the People disliking that preference, prevailed to have the Priesthood divided between the Senate and themselves; and not only so, but, under the Tribuneship of Cn. Domitius, got into their own hands the Privilege of choosing the Priests, which was formerly reserv'd for the College of Patricians; which was again brought under a new Regulation, that the College should be the Electors, and the People confirm that Election. In fine, after some other Alterations, which it would be needless to relate, the Emperors arrogated the Right of choosing the Priests, and became themselves the High Priests; which began in Julius Cæsar. When the Election of the Priest, made by the College to whom that Privilege belong'd, was confirm'd by the People, they proceeded to the Inauguration, which, like our Induction, was perform'd with Ceremony, and concluded with an Entertainment given by the new Priests. From that moment, they assumed the Gown, called the Toga Prætexta, and the Ornament for the Head, term'd term'd Apex, Galerus, Albo-Galerus, which consisted in a sort of white Bonnet, and had frequently the Addition of a Crown above.

The Priests in Rome enjoy'd several Privileges, and they might assist in the Senate; but this Privilege was afterwards taken from them (1). They were exempt from burthensome Offices in the State, and were dispensed with from going to War. They had ordinarily a Torch and a Branch of Laurel carried before them; and they were allowed to ride up to the Capitol in a Chariot, called Carpentum. There were Priests whose Priesthood was for Life; others, who had it taken from them; but the Augurs could not be deposed upon any account whatsoever. Every Order of Priests had its particular College, and Revenues for the Sacrifices. As in Provinces, the Priests were obliged to defray the Expences of the publick Games, which made the Office frequently chargeable, no body was compelled to accept of it.

In the Order of the Roman Hierarchy, the Pontiffs were the first. Of them, there were but four at first; but that number being afterwards augmented, they distinguished them into Pontiffs Major, and Pontiffs Minor; both of them subject to the Pontifex Maximus, or High Priest; whose Authority was so great, that the Emperors did not think the Office unworthy of them, as has been said. The High Priest being Master of all the Ceremonies of Religion, and a Member of the first College, was extremely revered. His Chariot, named Thensa, was distinguished from that of the other Priests, as well as his Garb, and the rest of his Equipage. He was not allowed to go out of Italy; as it was a sort of Profanation for him to see a dead Body, when he assisted at Funerals, they put a Veil between him and the Funeral-Bed. This Particular we have from Seneca, better informed therein than Dion, who, speaking of Agrippa's Funeral Obsequies, at which Augustus the High Priest was present, says, he can give no reason why they put a Veil between the Emperor and the Funeral-Bed ; and that it is an Error to believe the High Priest was not permitted to look upon a dead Body.

(1) Tit. Liv. Dec. 3. L. 7.

Perhaps it will be objected to me, that Cæsar, when High Priest, went and made war in Gaul ; whence I should seem to be mistaken, in alledging that it was not permitted to one in that Office to go out of Italy. But we may answer, 1. That there are Occasions when the Laws, which cannot foresee every thing, are not observ'd. 2. That Cæsar's Example proves nothing, since he regarded Laws no farther than they struck in with his Ambition.

Next to the Pontifex Maximus were the Flamines, who were at first but three in number, instituted, according to Plutarch, by Romulus, or rather, according to Livy, by Numa Pompilius ; the Flamen Dialis, or of Jupiter, the Martialis of Mars, and the Quirinalis of Quirinus. They were chosen by the People, and the High Priest confirmed their Election. As those three Flamines were in high esteem, and enjoy'd several Privileges, tho' they were not of the Order of Pontiffs, yet they took place among them in Affairs of consequence. This Order was afterwards augmented to the number of fifteen ; three of whom were taken from the Senatorian Order, and were called Flamines Majores, or the superiour Flamens, and the other twelve named Flamines Minores, or the inferiour Flamens, were chosen from among the Plebeians. Every Flamen was destin'd to the particular Service of one Divinity, and his Priesthood during Life ; altho' for weighty reasons he might be deposed, which was expressed by these words, Flaminio abire, To lay down the Flamenship.

As Jupiter, among the Romans, was the greatest of Gods, his Priest was also of highest Consideration ; but at the same time he was tied down to some burdensome enough Regulations. Aulus Gellius (1) testifies, that he was not allowed to travel on horseback, to view an Army out of the City, in Battle-array ; to take an Oath ; and he could only wear one sort of Ring perforated

(1) Noct. Att. L. 10. c. 15.

forated in a certain way *. None were allowed to carry Fire out of his House, but the sacred Fire †; and he could employ none but a Freeman to cut his Hair. The highest Seat was his at Feasts, which he yielded to none but him who was stiled Rex Sacrorum. He was prohibited to divorce his Wife, to go out without his Mitre, to enter into a House where there was a dead Body, much more to touch a Corpse, &c. Varro adds, that the Flamen Dialis alone had the Privilege of wearing the white Hat, the Albo-Galerus, mentioned above. The Privileges of the other two higher Flamens were likewise very extensive, tho' not quite so many; and it was especially required, that they should be of a Patri-cian Family.

The inferiour Flamens, taken from the Plebeians, were less regarded, nor was the number of them always restrained to twelve. The bare naming them is enough to let us know their Functions. The Flamen Cermen-talis was the Priest of the Goddess Carmenta. The Falacus *, was so called, from an ancient God of that Name. Floralis from the Goddess Flora; Furinalis from Furina, mentioned by Varro. Laurentalis from Acca Laurentia; Lucinalis from Lucina; Palatinalis from the Goddess Palatina, the Protectress of the Pa-latium; Pomonalis from Pomona; Virbialis from Vir-bius or Hippolytus; Volcanalis from Vulcan; Volturnalis from the God of the River Vulturnus. The deify'd Emperors had likewise their Flamens. Thus we find in Inscriptions, a Priest of Augustus, Flamen Augustalis; a Priest of Cæsar, Flamen Cæsaris; and Marc-Antony would needs assume that Dignity out of Flattery; a Priest of the Emperor Claudius, Flamen Claudii; and one of Hadrian, Flamen Hadrianalis. In fine, there was a Flamen who seems to have been concern'd in the Service of all the Gods, and was named Flamen Divo-rum omnium, the Priest of all the Gods, which how-ever,

U 3

* Item annulo uti nisi pervio cascoque fas non est. By casco seems to be meant plain or without Ornaments.

† Others read Nisi in sacrum, unless for sacred Use.

* Or Falacer.

ever, was contrary to the old Constitutions (a). Festus will have it, that the Wives of the Flamines Diales were Priestesses, and had the Name of Flaminicæ, and according to Aulus Gellius, they enjoy'd the same Privileges with their Husbands, and were under the same Restrictions (b).

The King-Priest, or Rex Sacrificulus, was instituted after the Expulsion of the Kings of Rome, to perpetuate the Memory, says Dionysius Halicarnassæus (1), of the great Services some of their Kings had done to Rome. A Law was made, that the Pontifs and Augurs should choose out one of the oldest, to have the charge of divine Worship; but for fear that the Name of King should again create Jealousy, it was appointed at the same time, that the Rex Sacrificulus should be subject to the High-Priest. He had likewise the Name of Rex Sacrorum, and his Wife that of Regina Sacrorum. Macrobius (2), who calls him the Pontifex minor, says he sacrificed to Juno in the Curia Calabria, as also his Wife who offer'd up to that Goddess, a Sow or an Ewe Lamb.

I told you, there were at Rome as well as in Greece, sacerdotal Families: Such in that City were the Families of the Potitii and Pinarii, for the Worship of Hercules, and that Priesthood continued there a long time. Their Origin is traced back to the time of Evander, and the History of it is this. Hercules being at the Court of that Prince, originally an Arcadian, but settled in Italy, prescrib'd to him in what manner he would be worshipped, and left it in charge to two old Men, the one of them named Potitius, and the other Pinarius. In the first Sacrifice, which was offer'd to him in the Evening (Dionysius of Halicarnassus says it happen'd at the Morning Sacrifice) Potitius arriv'd first, and Pinarius came not till the Ceremony was almost finish'd; which obliged

(a) All these Names are taken from Festus and several other Ancients, or from Inscriptions, mostly to be found in Gruterus.

(b) Eadem ferme Ceremoniæ sunt, quas Flaminicas Diales seorsim observitare. Aul. Gel. ubi supra.

(1) L. 1.

(2) Satur. l. 1. c. 15.

liged Hercules to punish his Remissness, by ordering, that for the future the Pinarii should only be Ministers to the Potitii: Which was exactly observed till the Year of Rome 461, when this Priesthood was abolish'd.

It is easy to see that this Fable has no other Foundation, but that upon the Introduction of Hercules's Worship into Italy by Evander, the Potitii and Pinarii were instituted to have the charge of it, with the Dependence we just now mentioned.

To all these Ministers we may add, the Epulones, who likewise exercised the Priest's Office among the Romans. The Pontifs not having leisure to attend upon all the Sacrifices perform'd at Rome, upon account of the infinite number of Gods who were honour'd there, instituted three Ministers whom they called Epulones, Triumviri Epulorum; because their Business was to prepare the sacred Banquets at the solemn Games, as we learn from Festus (a), and to set up the Couches on which they lay at Table. These Feasts, which were for none but the Gods, and especially for Jupiter, went by the Name of Leſtisternia, as we shall observe in the Article of the Festivals (1). The Epulones had the privilege of wearing the Robe bordered with Purple, like the Pontifs, as Livy tells us. The number of those Ministers was augmented first by two, then by two more, and at last, in the time of Julius Cæsar's Pontificate, they were increased to ten. Hence the Triumviri, the Quintumviri, the Septemviri, and the Decemviri Epulorum, we find mention'd in the Roman History.

Among other Privileges granted to the Epulones, the most considerable was, that they were not obliged to give their Daughters to be Vestals, and this they had in common with the other Ministers, as we learn from Aulus Gellius (2). This Author, speaking of the Roman Virgins who were exempt from being Vestals, says:

U 4

(a) Epulones dicebant antiqui, quos nunc Epulones dicimus, datum autem est his nomen, quod epulas indicendi Jovi, cæterisque Diis potestatem haberent.

(1) C. 13. (2) Lib. 1. c. 12.

says: Sed eam, cujus Soror ad id Sacrificium lecta sit, excusationem mereri aiunt. Item cujus Pater Flamen, aut Augur, aut Quindecimvir sacris faciendis, aut qui Septemvir Epulonum, &c.

From Titus Livius we learn the Date of the first Institution of the Epulones, it was in the Year of Rome 558, under the Consulship of L. Furius Purpureo, and of M. Claudius Marcellus (a); so that it is surprizing how Pomponius Lætus should say, that the date of this early Institution cannot be discover'd (b).

At present I shall say but little of the Priests instituted for keeping the Sibylline Books, reserving a fuller Account of them for the Article of the Sibyls. Tarquin the Proud, having bought these Books, instituted two Ministers to keep them carefully: In the Year of the City 388, they created eight others; and last of all there was an addition of five more, in the time of Sylla, which made fifteen in all. This Ministry, highly respected at Rome, lasted till the time of Theodosius, to the 388th Year of the Christian Æra.

The Romans besides had other Orders of Priests and Priestesses; such as the Vestals, of whom we shall speak at full length, in the History of the Goddesses from whom they got their Name: The Sibyls, for whom we shall make an Article by itself: The Salii, Priests of Mars, who shall be consider'd in the History of that God: The Priests Arvales, who sacrificed for the Fertility of the Corn-Fields Arva: The Feciales, to whom it belong'd to determine Peace or War: The Phæbades, who overlook'd the Worship of Apollo; as the Bassarides did that of Bacchus: The Luperci, for the God Pan, and some others besides, who were set apart for the Worship of some particular Divinities; not to mention several subaltern Ministers, who serv'd the Priests in their Functions; as the Camilli, so called from a Name

(a) Romæ eo primum anno Triumviri Epulones facti, Caius Licinius Lucullus, T. Romuleius, qui Legem de creandis his tulerat, & P. Porcius Lecca.

(b) See Vigener upon the first Book of Titus Livius, p. 810, and 811.

Name given to Mercury, because that God was the Minister, or rather the Servant of Jupiter (a).

Independent on these Ministers, both Greeks and Romans had others, who were also devoted to the Service of the Gods, such as the Augures and Aruspices, of whom I shall discourse in the Article of Divination.

As for what concerns the Vestments of the different Priests, and other Ministers we have mentioned in this Chapter, I refer to the Antiquaries who have given Draughts of them as they are upon Monuments. The bare inspection of Figures supplies the room of long and frequently unintelligible Explications.

Before we finish this Article, let us take notice, that every Order of Priests, consecrated to some Divinity, had a particular College, which was, as it were, the Community it held of, and in which the Elections were made. Those Colleges had the same Name with their respective Priests: Hence the College of the Arvales, for the Gods of the Fields; of Sylvanus, for those of that God; of the Salii, for those of Mars; that of the Feciales; of the Luperci, and the rest, whose Names are often to be found in History, and upon ancient Inscriptions.

C H A P. XIII.

Of the Festivals of the Greeks and Romans.

THE Greeks and Romans, not to mention the Egyptians and other Nations, had such a vast number of Festivals, that it would be no easy matter to give an exact detail of them; and as we have several Treatises upon that Subject, we shall begin with taking notice of them. Meursius has composed one upon the Festivals of the Greeks (1), containing six Books: Fasuldu and Castellanus (2) have labour'd on the same Subject, as likewise the celebrated Potter, in his Archæologia Græcæ, Beger and others. Ovid in his Fastes, and Rosinus in his Roman Antiquities, give us sufficient insight into the Festivals of the Romans, and such as want to study this Subject to the bottom, may consult them.

(a) See the History of Mercury, in the third Volume.

(1) Græc. Fer. (2) De Festis Græcis.

them. In the mean time, not to leave my Mythology incompleat, and for the satisfaction of those who either have not these Works, or who want time to consult them, I shall give a cursory View of most of those Solemnities. The highest of all, were the Mysteries; but of them I shall discourse elsewhere.

The Romans borrowed several of their Festivals from the Greeks, as these had done from the Egyptians and Phenicians. They had likewise some peculiar to themselves; this is what we shall be careful to remark: Let us descend to Particulars. I hope my explaining some Passages in History, which gave rise to those Festivals, will atone for the dryness of this Calendar.

The Festivals of the Greeks were exceeding numerous; 'tis the principal ones we mention. There was first, the Acbillæa, in honour of Achilles. Pausanias, who tells us (1) they were celebrated at Brasias, where that Hero had a Temple, gives us no particular account of them. The Ætia, which they celebrated in honour of Apollo, took their Name from the Promontory of Ætium, where there was a Temple to that God. There was Dancing during the Celebration of this Festival, and they slew an Ox for the Flies, which being glutted with his Blood, flew away and returned no more.

The Agrania or Agriania, were a Festival instituted at Argos, in favour of one of the Daughters of Prætus. The Agraulia, were so called, because they owed their Institution to the Agrauli, a People of Attica, of the Tribe Erechtheis, which had taken its Name from Aglauros Daughter of Cecrops, Priestess of Minerva, in honour of whom, the Festival was celebrated.

The Agricnia are thus described by Plutarch (2). There, says he, the Women make search for Bacchus; and not finding him, they give over their Pursuit, saying, he is retired to the Muses. They sup together, and after Supper they propose Riddles to one another; a Mystery, signifying that Mirth and good Cheer should always be seasoned with Learning and the Muses; and that if a Man happens to have drunk too much, his Rage

(1) Lacon.

(2) In Symp. Lib. 8. Quæ. 1.

Rage is hid by the Muses, and by them kindly restrain'd and kept within bounds.

We shall say nothing here of the Agrotera, a Festival of Diana, where they sacrificed five hundred Goats, because we have spoke enough of this in the Chapter of Sacrifices.

In the Æmaturia, celebrated in honour of Pelops, Boys whip'd themselves till the Blood came.

The Aianteia, a Festival in Salamis, were celebrated in honour of Ajax the Son of Telamon. The Eoria, a Festival at Athens, in honour of Erigone the Daughter of Icarus; for the Institution of which, this Reason is given, that Erigone being driven by extremity of Grief to hang herself, had prayed the Gods, as she was dying, that unless the Athenians avenged her Father's Death, their Daughters might all perish in the same manner. Accordingly several of them hang'd themselves. Upon which, Apollo being consulted, ordered the Institution of a Festival, to appease the Manes of Erigone.

I shall only name the Aleaia, celebrated in Arcadia, in honour of Minerva Alæa: The Alotia, solemnized by the same People, for having taken many of the Lacedemonians Prisoners; the Alia, a Festival of Apollo, or the Sun: The Alcatboia, in honour of Alcatbous Son of Pelops: The Aloa, or the Festival of the Barn-floors, at which they offer'd the First-fruits of Harvest to Bacchus and Ceres: The Ambrosia, celebrated in the time of Vintage, in honour of the same God: The Amphiarai, a Festival of the Diviner Amphiaraus: The Anaceia, in honour of Castor and Pollux, named Anaëtes or Anaces, that is, Princes, Sovereigns, &c. The Anagogia, celebrated at Eryx in Sicily, in honour of Venus: The Androgeonia, which Minos instituted at Athens, where his Son Androgeos had been assassinated(a): The Anthesphorea, in honour of Proserpine, a Festival so called, because Pluto had committed a Rape upon her as she was gathering Flowers: The Apobomia, which got got the Name from their sacrificing at this Solemnity, not upon an Altar, but on the Ground.

(a) See the History of Minos.

The Anthisteria, so term'd from the Month Anthisterion, partly answering to our November, had this peculiarity, that the Masters serv'd their Slaves at Table, during the three days of that Festival, which the Romans imitated in their Saturnalia. At the end of the Festival, they turn'd those Slaves out of doors, and as they were almost all of Caria, hence came the Proverb; Be gone ye Carians, the Anthisteria are ended.

The Apaturia, a Festival of the Athenians, so called from ἀπάτη, Deceit, owed their Institution to the following piece of History. The Bæotians having declar'd War against the Athenians, upon occasion of a Contest between them about the Territory of Celæne or Once, which they both claim'd, Xanthus, Captain of the Bæotians, offer'd to decide the Quarrel in a Duel. Thymætes King of Athens, having declin'd the Challenge, was deposed, and Melanthius who accepted it, was put in his place. He, seeing his Enemy coming up, told him, it was not like a brave Man to bring a Second with him to the Duel. Xanthus turn'd about to see if any follow'd him, and in the mean time, Melanthius thrust him through*. This Festival lasted three days: On the first, they kept a Feast; they sacrificed on the second, and on the third they inrolled into each Tribe, the Youth that were to be admitted.

The Apollonia were instituted by the People of Ægialca, on this occasion. Apollo, after the Defeat of Python, repaired to Ægialca with his Sister Diana: But being driven thence, he was obliged to seek a Retreat in Crete. In the mean time, the Plague raging in the City which this God had left, the Ægialii came to consult the Oracle, and were told, they must depute seven young Men, and as many young Virgins, to go in search of Apollo and Diana, and bring them back to their City. This Deputation pleased the offended Deities, and they returned to Ægialca, where the People dedicated a Temple to Pyibo, the Goddess of Persuasion;

* See another Account of its Institution in Petter's Antiquities.

sualion; and in memory of this Event, they sent out yearly the same number of Youths of both Sexes, as it were to go in quest of Apollo and Diana.

The Aphrodisia, were celebrated in honour of Venus, at Cyprus, and in several other Places. Here, they who would be initiated, gave a Piece of Money to Venus, as to a Prostitute, and received Presents from her, worthy of that Goddess*.

A number of other Festivals follows, the bare naming of which will be enough. The Arateia, Plutarch speaks of (1), were celebrated in honour of Aratus. The Ariadneia, in honour of Ariadne Daughter of Minos. The Artemisia were celebrated in several Places of Asia minor and Greece, in honour of Diana, who was denominated Artemis: Particularly at Delphi, where they sacrificed to that Goddess, a Fish called the Mullet. The Asclepeia, for Esculapius, were celebrated thro' all Greece, especially at Epidaurus, where they were called Megalascelepeia, the great Festival of Esculapius.

The Boedromia, a Festival at Athens, during which, they run about, bauling with all their might, took their Name from Boé, a Cry, and Dromos, running. They were celebrated in the Month of August; whence the Athenian Month answering to it, was named Boedromion. This Festival, according to Plutarch, was instituted when the Amazons made themselves Mistresses of Athens. The Boreasmi were likewise celebrated at Athens, to appease the Wind Boreas. The Buphonia, another Athenian Festival, took their Name from the Ox they then sacrificed to Jupiter Polianus: In old times, the Athenians likewise celebrated the Festival called Diipoleia, in honour of the same Jupiter.

The Cabiria, were instituted in the Island of Samothrace, in honour of the Cabiri, and were celebrated besides in some other Places of Greece. The Callistia, so named, because there the Women contended for the Prize of Beauty, were peculiar to the Island of Iesbos. The Carneia, mentioned by Herodotus (2) and Thucydides

* Some Salt and a Phallus.

(1) Life of Aratus.

(2) Lib. 7.

des (1), were celebrated especially by the Lacedemonians, in honour of Apollo Carneus; and the Carya, in honour of Diana, surnamed Caryatis. The Charisia, were a Festival in honour of the Graces. The Cissotomia, so called, from the Ivy they wore at this Festival, in honour of Hebe the Goddess of Youth. The Coreia, were the Festival of Proserpine, named Coré. The Corybantica, were celebrated in Crete, in honour of the Corybantes, of whom we shall speak in the proper place. The Chronia, celebrated at Athens, in honour of Saturn, were much the same with the Roman Saturnalia. Cynophontis, was a Festival celebrated at Argos, on the Dog-days, during which they slew all the Dogs; whence this Solemnity had its Name.

Dades, a Festival taking its Name from the Torches (2) they burned at it, lasted three Days: The first was in memory of the Pains of Latona, when she was bringing forth Apollo; the second was in honour of the Birth of Glycon, and the Gods; and the third in commemoration of the Marriage of Podalirius and the Mother of Alexander. The Dædala, describ'd at large by Pausanias (3), were of two kinds; the Lesser, celebrated by the Platæans every Year; and the Greater, which were kept but once in sixty Years, in memory of the Exile of the Platæans, which lasted that number of Years. The Argives had a Festival named Daulis, to commemorate the Combat of Prætus with Acrisius. At Ægina they had the Festival named Delphinia, in honour of Apollo of Delphos. The Delia owed their Original to Theseus, when upon his Return from Crete, he placed in a Temple the Statue of Venus, given him by Ariadne.

The Ephestia were the Festivals of Vulcan, where three Youths bearing lighted Torches, run with all their Might for a Prize, which was given to him who first reach'd the Goal without extinguishing his Torch. The Ephestria, celebrated at Thebes, had something pretty singular. They first dress'd the Soothsayer Tiresias like a Woman, then undress'd him, and gave him another Habit,

(1) Lib. 5. (2) Δαδεις. (3) In Bæot.

Habit, to denote that he had changed his Sex, as shall be said in his History ; and Ephestris signifying a sort of Coat, like a Surtout, gave the Name to this Festival. It often happen'd too that the Festivals of the Greeks deriv'd their Name from the Place where they were celebrated. The Gereſtia, in honour of Neptune, were so called from Geræſtus, a Town of Eubœa. The Itbomea, in honour of Jupiter, during which, the Musicians had a Trial of Skill on various Instruments, took their Name from a Place called Itbome. The Geronthraea, an Anniversary in honour of the God Mars, from the Place named Geronthrae, and so of many others.

Sometimes they got their Name from the Matter of the Offering. Thus the Hecatombæa, were so called, because the Sacrifice consisted of an hundred Oxen. The Galaxia, a Festival in honour of Apollo, because therein they offered to that God, a sort of Furmety of Barley and Milk. The Hecatompbonia among the *Lacedemonians, intimated that the Offerer had killed an hundred of his Country's Enemies. The Elaphobolia, observ'd at Athens, wherein a Sacrifice of Stags was made to Diana, who had therefore this Name given her, to denote her killing those Animals in Hunting.

But more frequently they got their Names from the Gods or Heroes, in honour of whom they were instituted ; thus, without dwelling upon the Subject, 'tis easy to see that the Heracleia were Festivals in honour of Hercules ; the Hermaia in honour of Hermes or Mercury ; the Hyacinthia, an Anniversary Mourning, solemnized by the Lacedemonians in honour of Hyacinthus. The Eumenidia, Festivals of the Furies ; the Erotidia, those of Love or Cupid ; which last were celebrated by the Theſpians : The Iolaia, sacred to Iolaus, Hercules's Companion : The Iſeia, to Isis : The Leonideia, to Leonidas : The Inoa, to Ino. The Limnatidia, the Festival of Diana surnamed Limnatis : The Linia, of Linus : The Lycurgia in honour of Lycurgus : The Musæa, of the Muses ; the Pelopia were the Festivals of Pelops ; the Pausania, those those of Pausanias King of Sparta: The Prometheia, those of Prometheus: The Protesilaia, those of Protesilaus, who was killed upon the Trojan Coast: The Poseidonia, those of Neptune, furnam'd by the Greeks Poseidon. The Titania those of Titan; the Trophonia, of Trophonius. The Theseia, of Theseus; the Diocleia, of the Hero Diocles, omitting an infinity of others.

* 'Tis more commonly ascrib'd to the Messenians.

Lastly, they took their Denomination from the Surnames of the Gods; as the Eleutheria from Jupiter Eleutherius, or the Assertor of Liberty; the Dietynnia from Diana Dietyнна, and several others.

I come now to two Festivals that require a more particular Consideration. The first is, the Daphnephoria, that were celebrated every ninth Year. Here a Globe of Brass was set upon a Branch of Olive, from which hung several other small Globes: The first represented the Sun or Apollo; the second, a degree less, represented the Moon; and the rest, the Stars. Crowns which encircled those Globes, pointed out the Days of the Year. This Branch, with all its Ornaments, was carry'd about in Procession by a young Man, who held likewise in his Hand a Laurel-bough, and from thence had the Name Daphnephoros. This Youth, chosen out of the best Families, was to be well made, vigorous and robust, as we learn from Pausanias (1). The second was the Festival of Scourging, named Diamastigosis by the Greeks. Tertullian, who speaks of it, says, that at Lacedemon, where this Festival was solemnized, the Youth of the first Quality stood before the Altar, where, in presence of their Parents, they were lash'd so unmercifully, as sometimes to die upon the spot, and that without complaining, or shewing the least sign of Impatience: Such as were Victims to this Barbarity, were crown'd before they were bury'd. They contented themselves afterwards with whipping these Youths till the Blood came. During the Ceremony, the Priest held in his Hand a Statue of Diana, exceeding light, but which grew heavy, he said, whenever any respite was allowed in this Operation.

The

(1) In Boeot.

The Dionysia were likewise renowned Festivals, not only at Athens, but also over all Greece; their Name sufficiently points out, that they were instituted in honour of Bacchus, named Dionysius. They were divided into Greater and Lesser, Ancient and Modern; each had its own distinguishing Singularities: In all of them reign'd Licentiousness and Debauchery. The same God had several other Festivals, as the Trieterica, so called from their being celebrated every third Year; at Rome they went by the Name of Triennalia for the same Reason.

The Day of the Dedication of every Temple was celebrated by a particular Festival, called the Encænia. The four Seasons of the Year had also their Festivals, which were term'd Horaia, from the Greek Name for the Seasons, ὥραι; and in each of these Festivals they kept a solemn Entertainment, upon the Fruits of the Earth. At every new Moon they had the Festivals known by the Name of Neomenia. The Solemnities for the Dead were called Nemeseia, because they imagined the Goddess Nemesis presided over them. In the Month of January was the Festival of the Nuptials, celebrated in honour of Juno Gamelia, who presided over Marriages. From this Solemnity, the Month in which it was celebrated derived its Name Gamelion.

The Festival of Lamps was solemnized thrice a year. The first was called Athenaia, the second Hephaisteia or Vulcania; and the third Prōmetheia. The Ceremony chiefly consisted in burning Lamps the whole Night. That which they celebrated at Peliene in honour of Bacchus, at which they likewise kept Lamps burning, went by the Name of Lampteria. The Egyptians in the time of the Ptolemys, had a Festival which they named Œnophoria, because they who were to assist at the Feast they had at that time, carried Bottles of Wine in their Hands. The Peloria, celebrated by the Thessalians, and instituted by Pelorus; had a considerable affinity with the Saturnalia: There the Masters serv'd while their Servants sat at Table, as in the Chronia celebrated at Athens in honour of Chronos; or Saturn. The Sabazia were nocturnal Festivals in honour of Jupiter Sabazius, or of Bacchus, who had the same Surname; we shall examine the Signification of that Word in the History of the Mysteries of Mythras. The Thargelia, a Festival which gave its Name to the Month Thargelion, answering to our Month of April, were distinguished from others by the Sacrifice of two Men, or of a Man and a Woman, whom they took care to fatten beforehand. The Plynteria were the Holidays of Minerva, which they reckon'd unlucky, at which time, according to Xenophon, they shut up the Temples of that Goddess. It was expressly forbid to pursue any Work whatsoever, on the day of this Festival, even in cases of Necessity. It was then allowable by the Law of Solon, to swear by the three Names of Jupiter, Propitious, Expiator, and Defender.

These were the principal Festivals of the Greeks: Those I have not mentioned are reserv'd for the History of the Gods or Heroes, of whom I shall discourse afterwards. Thus you will find the Description of the Pan-Athenaia, and of the Pan-Hellenia, in the History of Minerva; the Olympia, in the Description of those Games; the Leontica, in the Mysteries of Mythras, whereof they made a part; the Eleusinia and Thesmophoria in the History of Ceres; the Egyptian Festivals immediately after the History of Osiris, &c.

Festivals of the Romans. The Roman Calendar contain'd a yet greater number of Festivals than that of the Greeks (a); since, besides those they had borrow'd from them, they instituted several unknown to the rest of the World. Let us begin with those they had taken from the Greeks.

As these celebrated the Cbronia in honour of Saturn, so the Romans had their Saturnalia, which were solemnized for the first time, in the Month of December, the Year of Rome 157. At which time, if we may believe Accius, cited by Macrobius, who has given a very large Description of this Festival (1), there was no

(a) See for this Article, Ovid, Resnais, Beger, and Dempsterus.

(1) Sat. c. 7.

no Meeting of the Senate, and the publick Schools were shut up. It was common for all to wear the Cap named Pileus, as a Badge of Liberty, and dress peculiar to this Festival. There was nothing but regaling and sending Presents to one another; the Slaves sat at Table, while their Masters serv'd, and entertained them sumptuously: In fine, every thing breath'd a Spirit of Liberty, and called to mind the Golden Age, when Saturn reign'd, and all things were common. According to Macrobius just now quoted, this Festival anciently began the 14th Day before the Kalends of January; but upon Cæsar's adding two Days to that Month, it was removed to the 16th *.

The Festival named Jovialia was the same with what the Greeks called Diefia, and it was celebrated in honour of Jupiter. The Megalesia, common to both of them, was instituted in honour of Cybele, or of the Great Mother. The Romans who celebrated this Solemnity on Mount Palatine, near the Temple of that Goddess, added to it two Days called Megalesian Days.

The Festival Herea, instituted by the Greeks in honour of Juno, was known at Rome by the Name of Junonia, and was the same. The Cerealia and Ambarvalia of the Romans corresponded to the Demetria and Thesmophoria of the Greeks, both of them Festivals of Ceres; as the Mangelia of the one did to the Panathenaia of the other, in honour of Minerva; the Mercurialia of the former to the Hermaia of the latter. Both of them had the Orgies, the Trietoria, the Nysceleia, and the Bacchanalia, all Festivals of Bacchus. But because in these last the Romans made some Alterations, it is proper to take notice of them. At first, they celebrated their Bacchanalia only three times a year; afterwards they solemnized them every Month. I shall give you from Livy (1) a Declaration thereupon, given by Hispala Fecenia the Freed-Woman, to the Consul Posthumius.

“ In earlier times, says she to him, the Bacchanalia “ were celebrated by none but Women, no Man being

X 2

“ allow'd

* The 17th of December.

(1) Fourth Dec. 19.

“ allowed to join them. Three Days in the Year were “ chosen for initiating into these Mysteries, and the “ Ceremonial was performed by Day. The Priestesses “ who were to preside there, were left to the choice of “ the Matrons.

“ A total Innovation was made by Paculla Minia ;
 “ she initiated her two Sons, caused the Ceremony to “ be performed in the Night-time, and instead of three “ Days, she instituted five in each Month. This pro“ miscuous Meeting of Men and Women introduc’d “ horrid Irregularities ; whereof if any of the Company “ shew’d a Detestation, they offer’d him up as a Victim “ acceptable to their God, or took care to be rid of him
 “ by some piece of Machinery, and then gave out “ that he was carry’d up to Heaven.

“ During this Festival, continues she, the Men
 “ counterfeiting Madness, and exhibiting various Con“ tortions of their Bodies, began to prophesy ; while “ the Women in their Bacchanal Drefs, and all dis-“ shevel’d, run towards the Tiber, with burning “ Torches in their Hands, which they plunge into the “ River, where they remain unextinguish’d, as being “ made of Sulphur and Lime.” The Senate, to rectify this Disorder, pass’d a Decree, suppressing the Celebration of these infamous Mysteries in Rome, and through all Italy ; but the Liberalia, another Festival of Bacchus, surname’d Liber Pater, which they solemnized on the 17th of March, were still continued, as not being quite so licentious. Here they offer’d up a Liquor composed of Honey, which they threw into the fire.

The Lupercalia were equally celebrated in Greece; and at Rome, in honour of Pan ; whose Ceremony, as we are told by Livy (1), Plutarch (2), and Justin (3), was brought by Evander from Arcadia into Italy.
 The Youth, during this Festival, run about quite naked, with Whips in their Hands, lashing all who came in their way without distinction. The Women, even those of Quality, believing there was a Virtue in those

(1) Lib. 1. 5. (2) In Rom. (3) Lib. 4

those Whips to make them fruitful, or to bring them to a happy Delivery in case they were pregnant, offer'd themselves to receive them. Valerius Maximus (1) will have it, that this Festival was only introduced in the time of Romulus, at the persuasion of the Shepherd Faustulus. At the first Celebration, they offer'd up Goats to the God Pan. The Shepherds who were invited to it, being heated with Drink at the Feast, divided into two Bands, and run about in a frolicksome way, clad in the Skins of the Victims they had now offer'd. To render this Festival more solemn, the Romans founded two Colleges of Luperci, named the Fabii and Quintilii; afterwards they created a third in honour of Cæsar, even in his Life-time.

The Æsculapia of the Romans, the Musæa, the Ana-cia, and some others, were Festivals borrow'd from the Greeks, which both the one and the other celebrated in honour of Æsculapius, the Dioscuri (or Castor and Pollux) and the Muses. Let us now speak of such as were of Roman Institution.

The Agonalia or Agonia, instituted by Numa Pompilius, were celebrated thrice a year, on the 11th of January, the 21st of May, and the 13th of December. Janus is generally reckon'd to have been the Object of this Festival, but yet Festus says it was the God Agonius *. We learn from Varro (2) that they sacrificed there a Ram. The Etymology of the Name of this Festival is controverted. Some think it was deriv'd from the Form pronounc'd by the Priest before the Sacrifice, Agon, shall I proceed? Others contend, that the Name comes from Mount Agon, where this Solemnity was celebrated; but the most received Opinion is what Ovid gives, that this Festival was so named, upon account of the Games, or rather Wrestling-Matches that accompany'd it, called by the Greeks ἀγῶνας.

The Angeronalia, a Festival of Angerona the Goddess of

(1) Lib. 11. c. 2. * Qui præsidebat rebus agendis. (2) Lib. 1. de Ling. Lat.

of Silence, as Harpocrates was the God thereof among the Greeks, was celebrated the 21st of December.

The Armilustrum, a Festival of the 19th of October, had this peculiarity, that all were in Arms at the Sacrifice which was there offer'd. This Solemnity is often confounded with that celebrated by the Salii, Priests of the God Mars, during which they carried the Ancilia, or small Bucklers, which I speak of elsewhere: But they ought to be distinguished, 1. Because the latter happen'd on the second of March; 2. They play'd upon a Flute at the Festival of the Armilustrum, and upon the Trumpet at that of the Ancilia.

The Caprotinae, celebrated on the 9th of *July, were a Festival in honour of Juno surnamed Caprotina, where there were none but Women to minister in the Sacrifices. The Servant-maids, for whom they were celebrated, run about during this Solemnity, beating themselves with the Fist and with Whips.

The Carmentia, celebrated on the 15th of January, were for Mothers of Families. I speak in another place of the Prophetess Carmenta, Evander's Mother.

In the Charistia, a Festival celebrated on the 11th of the Kalends of March†, Relations met together, and gave Presents to one another.

As the Caprotinae were for Female Slaves, so the Compitalia, or the Festival of the Cross-Streets, instituted by Tarquin the elder, were for Men Slaves, who alone could assist at them, and there offer Sacrifices to the Genii of the Cross-Streets, in honour of whom the Festival was kept (1).

The Consualia, dedicated to the God Consus, were celebrated in a subterranean Chapel of the Circus, consecrated to that Divinity. Upon this Day neither Horses nor Mules were put to work. This Festival, as most others, had Games, as well as Sacrifices and Libations.

In

* Rather on the 7th or Nones of July, therefore called Nonae Caprotinae.

† Or 19th of February.

(1) Dionys Halicarn. l. 4.

In the Faunalia, celebrated on the Nones of December * in honour of Faunus, they sacrificed He-Goats, and made Libations of Wine: Their Place of meeting for that purpose was in the heart of the Woods.

The Feralia, instituted, as Ovid tells us, by Æneas, were a Festival for the Dead, in which they brought Meat to the Tombs, there to celebrate a Feast.

The Fontinalia, so called because on that Day they threw into the Wells Crowns, which were afterwards put upon Children's Heads, fell upon the 13th of October.

The Fordicidia or Fordicalia, from the word Forda, which signifies a pregnant Cow, happen'd upon the 15th of April, and the Sacrifice was a Cow with Calf.

The Fornacalia, whose Institution was owing to Numa Pompilius, celebrated on the 12th before the Kalends of March †, were a Holiday on which they baked Flower in an Oven, in honour of the Goddess Fornax.

As Laverna among the Greeks was the Deity of Thieves, so was Furina among the Romans, in whose honour they instituted a Festival, named Furinalia, which, according to Resinus, was celebrated on the 12th of the Kalends of July ‡. The Priest of this Goddess was called Flamen Furinalis. She had likewise a sacred Grove, where Plutarch tells us, Gracchus was kill'd.

The Hilaria, whose Name sufficiently denotes the Gayety of the Festival, were celebrated in honour of Cybele, on the 8th before the Kalends of April ||. Here they appeared in their finest Clothes; nay, they exchange'd the Dress which belonged to their Station for that of another, and if they had any thing in their Houses fine or curious, they were sure to have it carry'd before them in Procession.

The Laurentalia, instituted in honour of Acca Laurentia, the Wife of the Shepherd Faustulus, and Nurse to Romulus and Remus, fell upon the tenth Day before

X 4

the

* Fifth of that Month. † 18th of February. ‡ 20th of June. || 25th of March.

312 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book III.
the Kalends of January *. There the Pontiffs offer'd Sacrifices in the Velabrum near the Tiber.

The Ferie Latinae were celebrated not at Rome, but at Alba, where the Latin Towns, to the number of forty-seven, together with the Roman Magistrates, assembled to sacrifice with one accord, in honour of Ju- piter Latialis, a Bull, which they parted among them after the Ceremony was over. They who came to this Solemnity, brought with them Milk, Cheese, and other things, which were offer'd by way of Libation.
At first it lasted but two Days, then a third was added, and afterwards a fourth. Macrobius (1) observes, that it was not permitted to begin a War upon the days of this Solemnity, which, after Varro, he names Latiar.

The Lemuria were instituted for appeasing the malignant Genii, whom they called Lemures. They believed they were able to banish them from Houses which they infested by night, and terrified People, by throwing Beans at them.

The Romans had always some Motive for the Institution of their Festivals; by them they supplicated the Gods, either for a plentiful Harvest, or some other Blessing. By them they appeased those whom they thought they had injured, or sought to turn away the Calamities they were threatned with, as we may judge from the History of those we have now mentioned. Oftentimes it was to keep up the Remembrance of a Benefit received, and such was the Festival named the Luceria, a Word derived from Lucus, a sacred Grove. This Solemnity was celebrated in one of those Groves, which was between the Via Salaria and the Tiber, in commemoration of the Deliverance of the Romans, who were saved from the Gauls by flying into that Retreat.
Or else it was to keep up the Memory of some Disaster;
such was the Festival of the Populifugia, to commemorate the Day when the People, and even Romulus's Guards fled, upon the News of the Confederacy of the Fidenates and the other Latins, against the Romans.
Sometimes they were merely to promote mutual Joy;
of

* 23d of December. (1) Sat. Lib. 1. c. 16.

of this kind was the Festival of Maiumæ, so called because it was celebrated on the first of May, when the principal Persons of the City repair'd to Ostia, where they exercised themselves in Sports of every kind. As Solemnities where Pleasure has full sway, are of all others the hardest to be abolish'd, this last continued a long time even under the Christian Emperors.

We have seen that there were Festivals appropriated to certain Stations in Life, as the Caprotinæ for the Maid-Servants, and others for the Men-Servants; here are some more of the same kind. The Merchants had one, which they celebrated in the Month of May, in honour of Mercury, the God of Commerce.

The Matralia were the Festival of the Matrons, in honour of the Goddess Matuta, to whom they offer'd rustick Libations which they boiled in earthen Pots: These are the Libations which Ovid (1) names Flava Liba. But as Grandeur wants to be every where maintain'd, even at the foot of the Altar, the Roman Ladies, while they excluded from this Festival all the other Slaves of their own Sex, admitted one whom they buffeted heartily. These Matrons had also another Festival, named Matronalia, which they celebrated in honour of the God Mars, on the first of that Month which is named from him. Ovid (2) gives five Reasons for the Institution of this Festival. The first, in memory of the Peace made between the Sabines and Romans, in which the Sabine Women, who were married to the Romans, had so great a hand. The second, that Mars might make these Roman Ladies as happy as Romulus his Son. The third, that they might be blest with the same Fruitfulness as the Month of March imparts to the Earth. The fourth, because it was upon the first of March that a Temple had been dedicated on Mount Esquilinus, to Lucina the Goddess of Childbed. The fifth, which comes to the same, because Mars was the Son of Juno, who presides over Marriage.

The Pastors and Shepherds too had their Festival, that of the Palilia, dedicated to Pales their Goddess. On

(1) Fast. 1. 6. (2) Fast. 1. 3.

On that Day the People took care to be purify'd with Perfumes, mingled with Horses Blood, with the Ashes of a Calf that was burnt as soon as it was taken from the Mother's Belly (1), and with Stalks of Beans. The Shepherds, on the Morning of the Festival-day, purify'd likewise their Folds and Flocks, with Water and Brimstone, and burn'd the Shrub called Savine, whose Smoak diffused itself over all the Fold. After this, they offer'd in Sacrifice to the Goddesses, Milk, boil'd Wine, and Millet; then follow'd the Feast. In the Evening they made Bonfires of Straw or Hay, and leap'd over them: Ovid describes this whole Solemnity at full length. These Ceremonies were accompanied with Musical Instruments, such as Flutes, Cymbals, and Tabours, which play'd all the day long.

In fine, the young People and the Scholars had likewise their Festival, named Quinquatria, the Etymology of which may be seen in Varro and in Festus. On that Day the Scholars made Presents to their Masters: This Festival fell upon the 14th before the Kalends of April *.

We shall finish this List with some other Festivals of less Note, on which we shall be very short. The Meditrinalia were the Days on which they tasted the new Wine. The Romans had a Goddess Meditrina, and in honour of her this Festival was instituted.

The Opalia were the Festival of Ops, the same with Cybele. In ancient times they were celebrated the same day as the Saturnalia, but Cæsar, in the Reformation of the Kalendar, removed it to another time of the Year.

The Quirinalia were the Festival of Romulus, surnamed Quirinus. It was term'd the Festival of Fools †, because on that Day, whoever had forgot to celebrate the Fornacalia, which have been mentioned, was obliged to sacrifice to Quirinus, as an Attonement for their Omission.

The

(1) The Vestals had the sole right of burning this Calf.

* The 19th of March.

† Feriae Stultorum.

The Regifugium was instituted to keep up the Memory of the Expulsion of the Tarquins; and on that day the Rex Sacrificulus, or the King-Priest, fled as soon as the Sacrifice was offered. Plutarch (1) assigns another Origin of this Festival; but Ovid (2) and Festus are in this particular rather to be believed than he.

As the Fear of future Evils had a great share in the religious Worship of the Pagans, they instituted Festivals in order to be preserved from them. Of this number was their Robigalia, in honour of the God Robigus, by whom they believed their Corn was secured from blasting. It was celebrated about the end of April; and the Offering to this Divinity was a Sheep and a Dog, with Wine and Incense.

The Septimontium was a Festival instituted at Rome, when they enlarged its Precincts by taking in a seventh Hill. This Festival, at which they offer'd seven Sacrifices in different Places, fell in the Month of December; and on that day the Emperors gave Donatives to the People.

The Terminalia were so named, according to Varro (3), because they were celebrated on the last Day of February, which closed the Roman Year: or rather, as Dionysius of Halicarnassus alledges, because they were instituted by Numa in honour of the God Terminus, when that Prince ordered Land-marks to be fixed, that every Man might know the Extent of his own Ground. This Festival was entirely rural, and nothing of the Animal kind was there permitted to be offer'd, for fear of staining with Blood the Marches, near which they presented Fruits to the God who presided over them, and made Libations to him of Milk and Wine. These Circumstances however must have been alter'd some time after, since we learn from Plutarch (4), that the Peasants met on that day near the Marches, and there sacrificed a Sow or a Lamb. Be that as it will, there was nothing more sacred among the Romans than the Land-marks; and they who were so audacious as

to

(1) QQ. R. 62.

(2) Fast. 2.

(3) De Ling. Lat. Lib. 5.

(4) QQ. Rom. 15.

316 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book III.
to change them, were devoted to the Furies, and might be lawfully put to death.

The Tubilustrum was a Festival in the Month of April, instituted for purifying the Trumpets: for this they sacrificed an Ewe-lamb. They made also the same Purification in the Vulcanalia; a Festival celebrated on the tenth before the Kalends of May *, in honour of Vulcan, the God of Fire; and therefore on that Holiday they threw Animals into the fire.

Vertumnus, Pomona, and a vast number of other Gods, or Demi-Gods, had likewise their Festivals, as to which nothing particular being to be learned, I refer to Ovid, and to Rosinus, who has given a Roman Calendar with all its Festivals and Holidays (1).

We shall close this List with the Vinalia, which they celebrated twice a Year, on the ninth before the Kalends of May, and on the thirteenth before those of September. The first, instituted, according to Pliny (2), for tasting the Wine, had nothing to do with the Preservation of the Vines; whereas the second was in order to procure a favourable Season for the Vintage.

These were the Festivals of the Romans, mark'd out in their Calendar; and if upon occasion they celebrated some out of due course, as the Days set apart for publick Supplications, they were enjoin'd by the Magistrate in extraordinary Cases.

C H A P. XIV.

Of the publick Supplications, the Læsternia, Evocations, and Forms of Devoting.

THE publick Supplications were made either in some critical Juncture, as in time of a Plague, or some epidemical Calamity; or after an unexpected Victory, or when a new-elected General apply'd to the Senate to be confirmed by them, and to have a Supplication

* 22 of April.

(1) Ant. Rom. Lib. 4. c. 2.

(2) Lib. 18. c. 19.

plication appointed for obtaining the Favour of the Gods; and also for other Reasons. These Supplications were solemn Days, on which there was to be no pleading upon any account whatsoever, and they were celebrated by Sacrifices, Prayers, and publick Feasts. Sometimes the Senate limited the Duration of this Festival to one Day; sometimes it took up several; and History informs us, that some of them lasted fifty Days.

We are not to insist upon private Supplications, which were nothing else but Prayers, which every one put up to the Gods, either to obtain Health, a good Harvest, &c. or to thank them for Mercies received from them. A single Formula of their Prayers will be sufficient to give us some Idea of them: Here is one preserved in an Inscription (1), which Camilla Amata makes to the Fever for her Son in his Sickness. Divine Febri, sanctæ Febri, magnæ Febri, Camilla Amata pro filio male affecto. P. Camilla Amata offers up her Prayers for her sick Son, to the divine Febris, the holy Febris, the great Febris.

There was another kind of publick Supplication, which they called the Leetisternium (2). This Ceremony consisted in a Feast which they prepared, and which was to be kept in the Temple; and because, according to the Custom of those times, they planted Beds round the Tables, and placed upon these Beds the Statues of the Gods, in whose honour the Festival was celebrated, in the same way as Men lay thereon at Meals; hence they got the name of Leetisternia (a). The Epulones mention'd under the Article of the Priests, presided at this Ceremony, and were the Regulators of it. Valerius Maximus (3) takes notice of a Leetisternium, celebrated in honour of Jupiter. That God, that is his Statue, was laid there upon a Bed; while those of Juno and Minerva were

(1) Gruter 97. i. (2) Macr. Sat. 3. (3) Lib. 2. c. 1.

(a) The word is compounded of Leetus a Bed, and sternere to make up.

were upon Chairs: Nam Jovis epulo ipse in Lectulum, Juno & Mercurius in Sellas ad cœnam invitantur.

Titus Livius, Cicero, Lampridius, and others, make frequent mention of this Ceremony; and the first of these Authors refers its Institution to the Year of Rome 354 (1), upon occasion of a Plague which raged in the City. This Lectisternium lasted for eight days, and was celebrated in honour of Apollo, Latona, Diana, Hercules, Mercury and Neptune. Valerius Maximus indeed mentions another more ancient, since, according to him, it was celebrated under the Consulship of Brutus, and Valerius Poplicola; but it seems it was either less solemn, or Livy knew nothing of it.

Until the time of Casaubon, the Lectisternium was believ'd to have been of Roman Institution, and not to have been known out of Italy; but that learned Critick, examining a Passage of the Scholiast upon Pindar (2), and finding there mention made of those Pillows, or Cushions, which they put under the Statues of the Gods, from thence has justly concluded, that the Lectisternium was in use among the Greeks. Authors have been found to support this Discovery, and the Truth of it is now no longer controverted. And indeed Pausanias speaks in several places of those sorts of Cushions; and in his Travels thro' Arcadia, tells us, that some of them were put under the Statues of Peace; and in his Phocica, he speaks of those on which they placed the Statues of Æsculapius. Valerius Maximus (3) says the same of the Statues of Harmodius and Aristogiton. “The Statues, says he, of these two Heroes, who had done so much to rescue Athens from the Tyranny it groaned under, having been carried away by Xerxes, Seleucus restored them afterwards; and when the Ship that brought them arrived at Rhodes, the chief Men of the City invited them to be their Guests, and placed them upon Pillows: Rhodiiqueque eas urbi suæ appulsas, cum in Hospitium publicè invitassent, sacris etiam pulvinaribus collocaverunt. And

(1) Lib. 5. c. 15.

(2) Od. 1. of the Olymp.

(3) L. 2. c. 10.

And Suetonius reckons those Pillows, which the Latins named Pulvinaria, and the Greeks κλῖνας, among those things that were only appropriated to the Gods, when speaking of Cæsar, he says (1) : Sed et ampliora humano fastigio decerni sibi passus est Templâ, Aras, Simulachra juxta Deos, Pulvinar, Flamen, Lupercos, &c. “ He even suffered such Honours to be decreed to him “ as are too high for mere Mortals, Temples, Altars, “ Statues near those of the Gods, the sacred Pillow, “ a Flamen, Luperci,” &c. So Arnobius (2) addressing the Pagans concerning some of their Gods : “ They must “ needs, says he, be acknowledg’d such by you, since “ you consecrate to them Temples, Pillows,” &c. James Spon, in his Travels thro’ Greece, tells us, that the Lectisternium of Isis and Serapis was still to be seen at Athens. It was a small marble Bed, of two Feet in length, by one in height, on which those two Divinities were represented sitting. This learned Traveller says, that others, like them, were found in the same City ; as also at Salamis and elsewhere. From this Relation we learn the true Form of the Lectisternia and Cushions. They were small Beds, either of Marble, Stone, or Wood, on which they placed the Statues of the Gods, in honour of whom a Feast was prepared:

After what has been said, it is evident, that the Lectisternium was equally in use in Greece and in Italy. Add to this, that the Days set apart for this Festival were most solemn, during which, it was not allowed to inflict Punishment upon any Persons, and Criminals were even set at liberty. It was the chief Magistrate, or High Priest, who appointed them, and their end was to appease the Gods, or to supplicate them for Favours. We have only to say farther, that the Table for the Feast, and the Beds on which the Gods were to lie, were adorn’d with Branches, Flowers, and odoriferous Herbs : so much now for this Subject; let us only give some short Account of the Evocations.

Of

(1) In Cæs. c. 76.

(2) Adv. Gen. lib. 4.

Evocations. Of these there were three sorts ; the first were magical Operations, which they used in order to call up departed Souls ; and of them I shall speak in the Article of Magick. The second, which we shall here consider, were ordinarily employed, during the Siege of some Town, which they thought it neither their Duty, nor in their power to take, without invoking the Gods, under whose Protection it was. We have in Macrobius (1) a Form of Evocation preserved, which will give the Readers a better Notion of the thing than all we could deliver upon the Subject. “ Whether it be a God, or whether it be a “ Goddess, under whose Tuition the City and People “ of Carthage is, I supplicate you, I conjure you, and “ I earnestly request you, ye Great Gods, who have “ taken this City and People under your Protection;

“ to abandon both City and People, to quit all these “ Mansions, Temples, sacred Places ; to cast them “ off, infuse into them Fear, Consternation; and a “ Spirit of Forgetfulness, and vouchsafe to repair to “ Rome to dwell among us : Graciously accept of our “ Mansions, Temples, sacred Things, and our whole “ City. Let it be seen, that you are the Defence of “ me and my Army, and of the Roman People.
“ Grant me these Petitions, and I vow and promise
“ to found Temples and Games to your Honour.”

Lastly, the third sort of Evocation was; that which was used in calling up the Gods. In order to understand what I am to say upon this Head, we must know it was a Doctrine of the Pagan Theology, that the Gods in a peculiar manner presided over certain Places, and that frequently several of those Places were under the Protection of the same God ; and it being impossible for him to be in them all at once; it was necessary to use the Ceremony of Evocation, when his Presence was thought needful. They had Hymns proper to this Operation, which they called κλείσματα, as are most of those which are ascribed to Orpheus, and those of the Poet Proclus. Those Hymns generally were

com-

(1) Sat. L. 3. c. 9.

composed of two Parts : The first was taken up in the Praises of the Gods, and in celebrating the different Places under their Protection ; the second contain'd the Prayer whereby they endeavour'd to invite and allure them to the Places where their Presence was necessary. When they thought the Patron God was arrived, they celebrated the Festivals named ἐπιδήμια. Such were some of those the Argives kept in honour of Juno, and the Inhabitants of Delos and Miletus for Apollo.

As soon as the Danger which had made them invoke the Gods was over, they gave them liberty to go any where else ; and they had other Hymns for celebrating their Departure. Julius Scaliger, who may be consulted upon this Subject (1), observes, that these Hymns, which they called ἀπονεμτικοί, wherein Bacchylides the Lyrick Poet chiefly excell'd, were of greater length than those used for inviting the Gods, in order to detain them as long as possible. For when we desire, says he, we want to be quickly possess'd of the Object of our Wishes ; but to be as long as possible before we be deprived of it.

To the Evocations I must add the Forms of Devoting, which the Romans called Devotio. They were either private, as those of the two Decii, and of Marcus Curtius, who devoted themselves to save the Romans ; or publick, performed by the Dictator or Consul, at the Head of an Army. Here is their Form transmitted to us by the same Macrobius (2). “ Father Dis, Pluto, Jupiter, Manes, or by whatever Name it is lawful to call you, “ I beseech you to fill this City Carthage, and the “ Army I mean, with Terror and Consternation : “ Grant that they, who bear Arms against our Legions “ and Army, may be put to the rout, that the Inha- “ bitants of their Cities, and of their Fields, with all “ that dwell in them, of every Age, may be devoted “ to you, according to the Laws, by which our “ greatest Enemies are devoted. I, by the Autho- “ rity of my Commission, devote them in name of (1) Poet. L. 3. Cap. 112, 113, & 114.
Y “ the

(2) Sat. l. 3. 9.

“ the Roman People, in name of the Army, and in “ name of our Legions, that you may preserve both “ the Commanders, and those who serve under “ them.”

Antiquity has not transmitted to us the Form of private Devoting, but certain it is there was one; and when Decius devoted himself, he gave notice to the Pontif Valerius, as I shall have occasion afterwards to mention, to proceed to pronounce the Form of Devoting: Decrum ope, says he, Valeri, opus est ; agedum ; præi verba quibus me pro legibus devoteam.

Whenever the Law devoted any one to death, it was permitted to kill him. There was one of Romulus's Laws conceived in these Terms : Si Patronus Clienti fraudem faxit, sacer esto. If any Patron defrauds his Client, let him be devoted. It was to Pluto, or Dis, and the other infernal Deities, that Criminals were devoted.

I shall say nothing here of the Supplications and Vows made by particular Persons : I foresee, that the Enumeration of them would be endless ; and we could learn nothing from them, but that the Gods having been always looked upon by the Pagans as the Authors of all Good and Evil, they were careful to address them, in order to obtain those good Things, and be deliver'd from the evil : that in Dangers or Sicknesses, they put up Vows to them for Deliverance, and Recovery of Health : in fine, that, in gratitude, they put into Temples the Members, for the Cure whereof they thought themselves indebted to them.

Of these, we have great numbers preserved in Antiquaries, as may be seen in their Works. Among these Vows, there were some that bore the Characters of different Gods, as that which is called the Hand of Æneas, upon which is Votum Cecropis, and which has been explain'd in a small Tract of Thomasine. Sometimes it was a single Hand, an Arm, a Leg, or an Eye, without any Symbol. What we find most singular among these Vows, is a Table of Brass, on which

which mention is made of all the Cures wrought by the Interposition of Æsculapius *.

C H A P. XV.

Of the Religious Ceremonies used at the founding of Cities.

I Took notice just now, that they used Evocations at besieging a City, in order to invoke the Gods, under whose Protection it was; and as these same Gods were own'd for Patrons of the City at the time it was founded, this makes it necessary to say something of the Ceremonies in use upon that occasion. We learn from Festus, that the Etrurians had Books containing the Ceremonies observ'd at the founding of Cities, Altars, Temples, Walls and Gates. And Plutarch tells us, that Romulus, before he laid the Foundations of Rome, sent for Men from Etruria, who inform'd him in all the Punctilios of Ceremony which he was to observe. According to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, they began with offering a Sacrifice, after which they kindled fires near Tents; and they who were to have any Employment in building the Town, leap'd over these Fires, to purify themselves. Then they dug a Ditch, into which they threw the first Fruits of all things that served for human Nourishment, and a handful of Earth from the Country to which each of them belong'd, who were to assist at the Ceremony.

At the same time they consulted the Gods, to know if the Enterprize would be acceptable to them, and if they approved of the Day chosen to begin the Work. Then they chalk'd out the Boundaries by a Score of white Earth, which they called Terra pura; and for want of this kind of Chalk, they made use of Flower, as Strabo assures us to have been done by Alexander, when he laid the Foundation of Alexandria. This first Operation being finished, they opened a Furrow, as deep as possible, with a brazen Plough; and to this

Y 2

Plough

* Vid. Montfaucon's Antiq. V. 2. p. 1. B. 4. C. 6.

Plough they yoked a white Bull, and a white Heifer. All the Ground open'd by the Plough was reputed holy. While they were forming the Boundary, they stop'd at certain Intervals to renew the Sacrifices, and mark'd the Places where they were offered, by a Heap of Stones, which they called Cippi. In these Sacrifices, they invoked the Gods, to whose Protection the new City was recommended, as well as the Gods of the Country, denominated Dii Patrii Indigetes; which was done secretly, because it was necessary that the tutelary Gods of every City should be unknown to the Vulgar. Ovid, in his Fasti, has given us the Form of Prayer, which Romulus put up to the Gods whom he sought to favour his Enterprize.

Vox fuit hæc Regis : Condenti Jupiter urbem Et Genitor Mavors, Vestaque mater ades.

Quosque pium est adhibere Deos, advertite cuncti, Auspicius vobis hoc mihi surget opus, &c.

In fine, so much regarded was the day on which a City was founded, that they kept up the Memory of it by an anniversary Festival; and at Rome, this Festival was what they called the Palilia, as has been said. Mr. Blanchard, in a Dissertation, a Copy of which is printed in the third Volume of the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres (1), gives an Account of this Ceremony, and of some others, that have not a necessary Connection with the Pagan Religion. Ovid has happily comprehended all these Ceremonies, in the following Verses (2).

Apta dies legitur, qua mœnia signet Aratro.

Sacra Palis suberant : inde movetur opus

Fosse fit ad solidum, fruges jaciuntur in imâ,

Et de vicino terra petita solo.

Fossa repletur humo, plenæque imponitur aræ,

Et novus accenso finditur igne focus.

Inde premens strivam designat mœnia sulco,

Alba jugum niveo cum bove vacca tulit.

In this Book, we have seen the History of the Rise and Propagation of Idolatry. I have discoursed of what

(1) P. 61.

(2) Fast. L. 4.

what concerned the Worship paid to the Gods ; of Temples, Altars, Sacrifices, Priests, and Festivals celebrated in their honour, &c. It still remains to examine several important Articles, which regard Idolatry ; but these shall be the Subject of the following Book.

* B O O K IV.

Which treats of the Superstitions authorized by Idolatry.

AMONG these Superstitions, I reckon the Veneration that was paid to Oracles in general, and to the Sibylline Books in particular, which, to the Romans, were a standing Oracle consulted by them upon all occasions ; the Presages, Prodigies, Expiations, Magick, Judicial Astrology, Divination, the Lots, the Præstigia, the Auguries, the Auspices, and some others.

C H A P. I.

Of the Oracles.

AS the Oracles, which Seneca defines to be the Will of the Gods declared by the Mouths of Men, and which Cicero simply calls the Language of the Gods, Deorum Oratio, depended upon the Pagan Religion, and were a considerable Part of it, their History belongs to this Mythology. Nothing was more famous than these Oracles : they were consulted not only for important Enterprizes, but even merely in Affairs of private Life. Were they to make Peace or War, to enact Laws, reform States, or change the Constitution ;

Y 3

in

* N. B. The second Volume of the Original begins with Book IV.

in all these Cases they had recourse to the Oracle by publick Authority. Again, in private Life, if a Man had a design to marry, if he was to enter upon a Journey, or in short, whatever Business he was to undertake, was he sick and out of order, he went directly to consult the Oracle. Mens Desire of knowing Futurity, of securing the Success of their Designs ; that Curiosity which is so deeply rooted in human Nature ; all these led them to consult the Gods, who were reputed prophetick : for all the Gods had not that Character. Hence the Institution of Oracles, that Eagerness to consult them, and those immense Donations wherewith their Temples were filled ; for an anxious Mind subdued by vain Curiosity sticks at nothing.

Upon this Principle, we need not doubt but that every Nation, where Idolatry prevailed, had its Oracles, or some other means of searching into the hidden Events of Futurity. There never was any Nation where Impostors were wanting, and a Tribe of covetous Mortals, who pretended to the Gift of foreknowing and predicting mysterious future Events. They have been found among the most gross and barbarous Nations, such as the Iroquois, and other Savages of America. The ancient Gauls had their Druids, who were regarded by them as Prophets. Among the Egyptians and Phenicians, the Priests were cloathed with this Character, and thus doubtless it was among other Nations. But as a particular Examination into the Oracles of every idolatrous People, would carry us too far, and as we want Records, from which to compile their History, we shall confine ourselves to the Oracles of the Egyptians and Greeks ; especially those of the latter, which were both very numerous, and highly celebrated.

Before we enter upon the History of these Oracles, it is necessary to examine in a few words two important Questions. 1. Were all the Predictions ascribed to them, and of which Authors are so full, the mere Imposture of Priests ; or did they proceed from the Devil ? 2. Did the Oracles actually cease at the coming of Christ ? Van Dale, in a Treatise, which cannot be censured for want of learning, has attempted to prove that all those Predictions proceeded entirely from the Tricks of those who had the Charge of the Oracles; and that they did not cease when Christ came into the World. M. Fontenelle, than whom none was more proper to throw out all the stiff Pedantry of Greek and Latin, which makes Van Dale's Treatise but dry, and only fit for the Learned, has put it into a genteeler Dress, and adapted it to the Capacity of every Reader; but this Work has already made so much noise, that I shall easily be forgiven, tho' I say no more of it.

As the Opinion of Van Dale seem'd to contradict the unanimous Sentiment of all the Fathers, and the constant Tradition of the Church, which ascribed a great part at least of the Oracular Responses to the Devil, who was not chain'd up till the coming of Jesus Christ; Father Baltbus the Jesuit, in a learned Treatise, undertook the Defence of Tradition and the Fathers; and without denying the Imposture of the Priests, which was often mix'd with the Oracles, he proves in an equally perspicuous and solid manner, the Intervention of the Devil in some Predictions, which all the efforts of Incredulity were incapable of ascribing to the Cheats of Priests alone. And as for the time of the Cessation of these Oracles, he proves with the same Erudition, that if they did not cease altogether at the coming of Christ, they at least began then to decline; they were no longer in such high Reputation; they were no longer consulted with the usual Apparatus: Tho' it is unquestionable that they did not quite cease, till Christianity triumph'd over Idolatry.

'Tis not to my purpose to enlarge farther upon these two Questions, the Particulars of the Case being in every body's hands. Yet I cannot help making some Reflections upon the first, that serve to overthrow Van Dale's Scheme. Is it then credible, that if the Oracles had been nothing but the Offspring of Priestcraft, whatever artful Methods they may be thought to have used, and however successful in pumping out the Secrets and Schemes of those who came to consult them; is it credible, I say, that those Oracles would have lasted so long, and supported themselves with so much Splendour and Reputation, had they been merely owing to the Forgery of the Priests? Imposture betrays it self, Falshood never holds out. Besides, there were too many Witnesses, too many curious Spies, too many People whose Interest it was, not to suffer themselves to be deluded. One may put a cheat for a time upon a few private Persons, who are over-run with Credulity, but by no means upon whole Nations for several Ages. Some Princes, who had been play'd upon by ambiguous Responses, a Trick once discover'd, the bare Curiosity of a Free-Thinker, any of these, in short, was sufficient to blow up the whole Mystery, and at once to make the Credit of the Oracle fall to the ground. How many People deluded by hateful Responses, were concern'd to examine, if it was really the Priests by whom they were seduced. But why! was it so hard a matter to find one of the Priests themselves, capable of being bribed to betray the Cause of his Accomplices, by the fair Promises and more substantial Gifts of those, who omitted no means of being thoroughly informed in a Subject of such Concern? But it seems, there were no mercenary Souls in that virtuous Age! Gold had no bewitching Charms, Contempt and Dishonour had lost their Power! Why else would not the Priests of an Oracle, whose Credit was low, or entirely sunk, have revealed, either thro' Despair or Revenge, the Impostures of those who carried off from them all their Gain: They, who by practising the like Tricks, had good Reason at least to suspect those of others? What an odd Combination is this, and how unparallel'd, to hold out against Interest, against Reputation: to unite so many Impostors in a Secret so religiously kept? To these Reflections, Father Balthus adds another, drawn from human Sacrifices that were required by the Oracles; since Man, says he, however enthralled to his Passions, never would have demanded such Victims.

I said before, that all the Gods were not Oracular; for in old times there were hardly any who deliver'd

Oracles but Themis, Jupiter, and Apollo ; but this Privilege was granted afterwards to almost all the Gods, and to a great number of Heroes, as we shall see in due time.

In order to consult the Oracle, that time was to be chosen, when it was believ'd the Gods deliver'd them ; for all Days were not equal : at Delphi there was but one Month in the Year, when the Priestess answer'd those who came to consult Apollo. In after-times, there was one Day in each Month, when that God pronounc'd his Oracles. All these Oracles were not deliver'd in the same manner : Here, it was the Priestess who answer'd for the God whom they consulted ; there, it was the God himself who pronounced the Oracle : In another place they received the Response of the God in their Sleep, for procuring which they used certain preparatory means of a mysterious nature ; sometimes they received the Response in Letters under a Seal ; and in fine, in other places, by casting Lots, as at Preneste in Italy. Sometimes they were obliged to use many Preparatives, in order to qualify themselves for receiving the Oracle, such as Fasting, Sacrifices, Lustrations, &c. At other times, so little Ceremony was requisite, that the Consulter received his Answer directly, upon coming up to the Oracle ; as Alexander did, when he came to Libya to consult that of Jupiter Hammon : for no sooner did the Priest see him, than he gave him the Compellation of, Son of Jupiter ; to obtain which, was the whole end of his Journey. But 'tis time to pass on to the particular History of the most celebrated Oracles : And as those of Dodona and Jupiter Hammon were the most ancient, I shall begin with the History of them.

ARTICLE I.

The Oracle of Dodona.

We learn from Herodotus, that the Oracle of Dodona, the most ancient of Greece, and that of Jupiter Hammon in Libya, had the same Original, and both owed their Institution to the Egyptians, as all the other Antiquities of Greece. Here is the Allegory, under which this Piece of History is wrap'd up. Two Pigeons, said they, taking flight from Thebes in Egypt, one of them came to Libya; and the other having flown as far as the Forest of Dodona in Chaonia, a Province of Epirus, alighted there; and let the Inhabitants of the Country know, that it was the Will of Jupiter to have an Oracle in that place. This Prodigy astonished those who were Witnesses to it, and the Oracle being founded, there was very soon a great Concourse of Consultors. Servius (1) adds, that Jupiter had given to his Daughter Thebé these two Pigeons, and communicated to them the gift of Speech. Herodotus (2), who judg'd rightly that the Fact which gave rise to the Institution of the Oracle, was couch'd under the Fable, has examined into its historical Foundation. Phenician Merchants, says this Author, some time ago carried off two Priestesses of Thebes; she who was sold in Greece, took up her residence in the Forest of Dodona, where the Greeks came to gather Acorns, their ancient Food; there she erected a small Chapel at the foot of an Oak, in honour of Jupiter, whose Priestess she had been at Thebes; and this was the Foundation of that ancient Oracle, so famous in succeeding Ages. The same Author subjoins, that the Woman was called the Pigeon, because they understood not her Language; but soon coming to be acquainted with it, they reported that the Pigeon spoke.
of

In order to explain the ancient Fables, it frequently happen'd that the Greeks, who were ignorant of the eastern Languages, whence they were derived, invented new ones. The learned Bochart thought he had discover'd the Origin of th's now under our Consideration, in two Phenician or Arabian Words of a double meaning, the one of them signifying a Pigeon, the other a Priestess. The Greeks, always inclined to the Marvellous, instead of saying that a Priestess of Jupiter had declared the Will of that God, chose to say it in a fabulous way, that they were pronounced by a Pigeon. Whatever probability is in the Conjecture of this learned Author, there appears to be more in what is

(1) In 3. Æn. v. 466.

(2) L. 1.

is offer'd by the Abbé Sallier (a), who takes this Fable to have been built upon the double meaning of the Word πέλειαι, which signify'd Pigeons in Attica, and several other Provinces of Greece, while in the Dialect of Epirus, it imported Old Women. Servius, who fully comprehended the sense of this Fable, is only mistaken in his Explanation of it, by changing the Appellative Peleias into a proper Name. “There was, says he, in the Forest of Dodona, a Fountain that run with a soft murmuring Noise, at the foot of an Oak : An old Woman named Pelias interpreted this inarticulate Sound, and by means thereof gave Predictions to those who came to consult her (b).”

The double meaning of this same Word, supplies us with an Answer to the Question, which Ptolemy Ephes-tion (1) says Alexander proposed to his Master Aristotle : Why Homer makes the πέλειαι furnish Jupiter with Ambrosia ? for the Philosopher might have solved the Question, by saying, the Poet meant by that Word, not Pigeons, but the Priestesses of that God, who prepared the Meat of the Sacrifices that were offered to him.

In ancient times, the Oracle of Dodona was given by the murmuring of the Fountain now mentioned; but afterwards, it seems, they had recourse to more Formalities, and this was the Artifice they fell upon. They suspended in the Air (c) some brazen Kettles, near a Statue of the same Metal which was likewise suspended, and held a Lash in its hand. This Figure being agitated by the Wind, struck against the Kettle that was next it, which communicating the Motion to the rest, raised a clattering Din which continued pretty long ; and upon this Noise they form'd Predictions. Hence the Forest of Dodona had even taken its Name, for Dodo in Hebrew signifies a Kettle. If you ask, what gave rise to the Fable of those Oracles being delivered by the Oaks

(a) See the Mem. of the Acad. of Belles Lettres, T. 5. p. 35.

(b) Quæ murmura anus, nomine Pelias, interpretata hominibus diserebat. Serv. in 3 Æn. V. 466.

(1) L. 1.

(c) Suidas upon the Authority of Strabo, or rather he who has epitomized him, in that Place where there is a Blank in the Original.

332 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book IV.
Oaks themselves; the Answer I take to be this, that the Ministers of that Oracle hid themselves in the Hollow of the Oaks, when they gave their Responses. From these speaking Oaks, to mention it by the by, came the Origin of that other Fable about the Mast of the Ship Argo, cut in the Forest of Dodona, which, according to Onomacritus, Apollonius of Rhodes, and Valerius Flaccus, gave Oracles to the Argonauts, as we shall see in the History of their Expedition (1).

Suidas (2), speaking of the Oaks of this Forest, says, they spoke, and gave Responses to the Supplicants in this form, Thus saith Jupiter, &c. Van Dale in his History of Oracles (3), after remarking that Suidas has barely copied Eustathius, reports the Opinion of Aristotle and several other Authors, and takes particular notice how much the Ancients vary in their Accounts of this Oracle; this Variation among them, no doubt, is owing to the care that was taken, not to allow those who came to consult the Oracle, to approach too near it, so that they could only hear a certain Sound, but by no means could judge whence it proceeded.

But whatever be in that, no sooner was the Sound of the Kettles over, than the Women whom they named Dodonidæ, delivered their Oracles (a), either in Verse, as appears from the Collection made of them; or by the Lots, as Cicero seems to think, in his Books of Divination.

ARTICLE II.

The Oracle of Hammon.

What I have taken from Herodotus at the beginning of the preceding Article, proves the Oracle of Jupiter Hammon in Libya to have been as ancient as that of Dodona, whose History we have seen. This other became likewise very famous, and they flock'd from all Parts to consult it, notwithstanding the Inconveniences of so long a Journey, and the burning Sands of Libya they had

(1) Tom. 3. (2) In the Word Dodona. (3) P. 201, and following.

(a) See Plutarch upon the Cessation of Oracles.

had to go through. One knows not well what to think of the Fidelity of the Priests who ministred to the God. Sometimes they were proof against Corruption, as appears from the Charge they gave in at Sparta against Lyfander, who had offer'd to bribe them, in that Scheme he was projecting to change the Order of Succession to the Throne; sometimes they were not so scrupulous; witness the Story of Alexander, who, either to screen the Reputation of his Mother, or from pure Vanity, affected to be reputed the Son of Jupiter; since the Priest of that God, as has been said, stood in readiness to receive him, and saluted him, Son of the King of Gods.

We learn from Quintus Curtius, and other ancient Authors, that the Statue of Jupiter Hammon had a Ram's Head with its Horns; and from Diodorus Siculus (1), the manner in which that God delivered his Oracles, when any one came to consult him. Twenty-four of his Priests bore upon their Shoulders in a gilded Barge, the Statue of their God, sparkling with precious Stones; and thus, without keeping a certain course, they moved on whithersoever they thought the Impulse of the God carried them. A Troop of Matrons and Virgins accompany'd this Procession, singing Hymns in honour of Jupiter. Quintus Curtius, who reports the same Story (2), adds, that the Barge, on which they bore the Statue of this God, was adorned with a great many silver Goblets hanging down on either side. Probably it was from some Sign or Motion of the Statue, that the Priests pronounc'd the Decisions of their God; for as Strabo remarks (3), upon the Authority of Callisthenes, the Responses of that God were not Words, as at Delphi, and among the Branchidae, but a Sign; and he quotes upon this occasion, that Verse in Homer; where the Poet says, Jupiter signify'd his Consent by bending his Brows.

I take in here the Oracle of Apollo, in the City of Heliopolis in Egypt, because, according to Macrobius (4), that God gave his Responses

The Oracle of Apollo at Heliopolis.
Responses

(1) L. 17. (2) L. 4. c. 7. (3) L. 17. (4) Sat. 1. 1. c. 23.

sponses in the same way with Jupiter Hammon. “The “ Statue of that God, says he, is carried in the same “ manner as those of the Gods in the Procession at the “ Circensian Games. The Priests, attended by the “ principal Persons of the Country who join in the Ce“ remony, having their Heads shav’d, and after a long “ Contenance, set forward, not as they are inclin’d “ themselves, but according as they are impelled by the “ God whom they bear, by Motions resembling those “ of the Statues of Fortune at Antium.” It was probably by the same kind of Motions of the Statue of The Oracle of Jupiter Phlius. Jupiter Phlius, that his Priests deliver’d their Oracles, as may be seen in Eusebius (1) and in Rufinus.

ARTICLE III.

The Oracle of Delphi.

If the Oracle of Delphi was not the most ancient of those in Greece, it was at least the most celebrated, and that which continued longest. To relate all that has been said about this Oracle, would oblige me to copy almost all the ancient Authors, and not a few of the Moderns: And therefore, to satisfy those who don’t love long Narrations, I shall only give here an Abstract of its History.

At what time this Oracle was founded, is not known;
 which, in the first place, proves it to be of great antiquity, nor was Apollo the first who was consulted there. But the Ancients not being agreed as to the Gods who had this Oracle successively, ’tis necessary to give their Opinions. Æschylus, in the beginning of his Tragedy of the Eumenides, says, Terra was the first who gave Oracles there; after her Themis, then Phæbe, another Daughter of Terra; Phæbe, according to the Mythologists was Mother to Latona, and Grandmother to Apollo; and he, in short, was the fourth.
Ovid only informs us (2). that Themis delivered Oracles at the foot of Parnassus; and that Pyrrha and Deucalion came to consult her about the means of replenishing

(1) Hist. Eccl. l. 9. c. 3.

(2) Met. l. 1. v. 316.

plenishing the Earth, whose Inhabitants had been destroyed by the Deluge. Pausanias (1) adds, that before Themis, Terra and Neptune had likewise given their Oracles there; and if we take the Authority of the old Scholiast upon Lycophron, Saturn too had been consulted there with Neptune and Terra. Diodorus Siculus, who was at the pains to inquire into the Origin of this Oracle, reports (2) a Tradition, which he had taken from Monuments of the greatest antiquity: Goats, says he, that were feeding in the Valleys of Parnassus, gave rise to the Discovery of this Oracle. There was in the Place since called the Sanctuary, a Hole, the Mouth of which was very strait. These Goats having come near it with their Heads, began to leap and frisk about so strangely, that the Shepherd (a), being struck with it, came up to the Place, and leaning over the Hole, was seized with a Fit of Enthusiasm, whereby he was prompted to utter some extravagant Expressions, which passed for Prophecies. The News of this Wonder drew thither the People in the Neighbourhood, who no sooner approach'd the Hole, than they too were transported into the like Enthusiasm. Surprized with so astonishing a Prodigy, they supposed it to proceed from some friendly Deity, or from the Earth itself; and from that time, they began to confer a particular Worship upon the Divinity of the Place, and to look upon what was deliver'd in those Fits of Enthusiasm as Predictions and Oracles. The Place where this Hole was observed, was on a rising Ground, near Parnassus a Mountain in Phocis, on the South-side; and here they afterwards built the Temple and City of Delphi.

Several Gods having given Oracles there successively, as has been already observ'd, the Historians and Poets give a very odd Account of the Manner of their abdicating their Right. Terra and Neptune possessed it in common; with this difference, that Terra gave her Oracles herself, and Neptune his by the Ministration

(1) L. 9.

(2) L. 16.

(a) Plutarch call this Shepherd Coretas.

tion of a Priest named Pyrcon. From Terra, the Oracle passed to Themis her Daughter, who possessed it pretty long, and resign'd in favour of Apollo, whom she fondly doated upon. According to an ancient Tradition followed by Euripides (1), the Resignation was far from being voluntary. Apollo, whom Pan had taught the Art of Prediction, being arrived at Parnassus, with the Equipage describ'd by Homer, that is cloath'd in his immortal Robes, perfumed with Essences, and in his hand a golden Lyre, on which he play'd melodious Airs, seiz'd the Sanctuary by force, slew the Dragon, which Terra had posted there to be the Keeper, and made himself Master of the Oracle. Nep-tune, who likewise had his share therein, not being inclin'd to dispute it with his Nephew, exchanged with him for the Island of Calauria, over-against Trezene. From that time, none but Apollo deliver'd Oracles at Delphi. 'Tis easy to perceive, that this Fiction has no other Foundation but the Interest of the Priests, who seeing the Zeal of the People turn cool, try'd to awaken it, by presenting them with new Objects of Worship.

Whatever be in that, the Oracle of Apollo got the better of all the rest, both in its high Reputation and Long-standing. Thither they flocked from all parts to consult the God ; Greeks and Barbarians, Princes and private Persons, Men of all Characters, upon every minute Enterprize, as well as Affairs of great importance, came to Delphos, either in Person, or sent a Deputation to know the mind of Apollo. Hence the vast Donations and immense Riches, wherewith the Temple and City were filled, and which became so considerable, as to be compared to those of the Persian Kings.

About the time when this Oracle was first discover'd, all the Mystery requisite to obtain the Prophetick Gift, was to approach the Cavern, and suck in the Vapour which issued from it; and at that time, the God inspir'd all sorts of Persons indifferently : but at length, several of those Enthusiasts, in the excess of their Fury, having thrown

(1) Iphig.

thrown themselves headlong into the Gulf, they thought fit to provide a Remedy against that Accident, which frequently happen'd. They set over the Hole a Machine, which they called a Tripod, because it had three Feet, and commissioned a Woman to get up on this sort of Chair, whence she might catch the Exhalation without any Danger, because the three Feet of the Machine stood upon the Rock. This Priestess was named Pythia, from the Serpent Python, slain by Apollo, as we shall see in his History. At first there were promoted to this Ministration, young Women, who were yet Virgins, and great Precaution was taken in the choice of them. The Pythia was ordinarily chosen from a poor Family, where she had liv'd in Obscurity, free from Luxury, and Affectation of Dress, and other gaudy Ornaments with which young Women set themselves to show. Ignorance itself was one of the things that qualify'd them for being promoted to this Dignity, and no more was required in her who was to be elected, but to be able to speak and repeat what the God dictated. The Custom of chusing young Virgins lasted very long, and would have been kept up still, had it not been for an Accident which occasion'd its being abolished. A young Thessalian named Echecrates, being at Delphi (1), fell in love with the Priestess, who was extremely beautiful, and ravish'd her. To prevent any Abuses of the like nature for the future, the People of Delphi made an express Law, ordaining that none should be chosen but Women above fifty yearsold. At first they had only one Priestess, and she sufficed for giving Responses to those who came to Delphi (2); but in after-times there were two or three of them.

The Oracles were not delivered every day: Sacrifices, repeated over and over again, until the God who delivered them was pleased, consumed frequently a whole Year, and it was only once a year, in the Month Ἑλισίος, which answer'd to the beginning of Spring, that Apollo inspired the Priestess. Except on this set Day, the Priestess was forbid, under pain of Death, to go into the Sanctuary to consult Apollo. Alexander, who before his Expedition into Asia, came to Delphi on one of those silent Days during which the Sanctuary was shut, entreated the Priestess to mount the Tripod: She refused, and quoted the Law which stood in her way. This Prince being naturally hasty, and impatient to set out, drew the Priestess by force from her Cell, and was leading her himself to the Sanctuary, which gave her occasion to say, My Son, thou art invincible. At these Words, he cry'd out that he was satisfy'd, and would have no other Oracle.

(1) Diod. 4. 1. (2) Plat. loc. cit.

As nothing serv'd so much to raise or keep up the Reputation of an Oracle, as that air of Mystery which was given to every thing about it, we may be sure that nothing was neglected at Delphi, to procure it Veneration. They used infinite precaution in chusing the Victims, inspecting the Entrails, and in the Omens they drew from them. The neglecting the smallest Punctilio, was a sufficient motive to renew the Sacrifices that were to precede the Response of Apollo, and they repeated them till all was right. The Priestess her self made great Preparation for discharging her Duty: She fasted three Days, and before she mounted the Tripod, she bath'd herself in the Fountain of Castalia. There she ordinarily wash'd her Feet and Hands, sometimes her whole Body; and she swallowed a certain quantity of Water from that Fountain, because Apollo was thought to have communicated to it a part of his enthusiastick Virtue. After this, she was made to chew some Leaves of the Laurel-Tree, gather'd near that Fountain: The Laurel was the Symbol of Divination, and wanted not its Influence to promote Enthusiasm. After these Preparations, Apollo gave Signals himself of his Arrival in the Temple; the whole Fabrick, by I know not what Artifice, trembled and shook to its very Foundations, as likewise a Laurel-Tree which was at the Entry of the Temple. Then the Priests, who were likewise called Prophets, took hold of the Priestess, led her into the Sanctuary, and placed her upon the Tripod. As soon as she began to be agitated by the divine Exhalation, lation, you might have seen her Hair stand on end, her Mien grow wild and ghastly, her Mouth begin to foam, and her whole Body suddenly seiz'd with violent trembling. In this plight she attempted to get away from the Prophets, who were holding her as it had been by force, while her Shrieks and Howlings made the whole Temple resound, and fill'd the By-standers with a sacred Horrour. In fine, being no longer able to resist the Impulse of the God, she gave herself up to him, and at certain intervals utter'd some unconnected Words, which the Prophets carefully pick'd up, rang'd them in order, and put in form of Verse, giving them a Connection which they had not as they were delivered by the Priestess (1). The Oracle being pronounc'd, she was taken down from the Tripod and conducted back to her Cell, where she continued for several days, to recover herself from her Conflict. We are told by Lucan, that speedy Death was frequently the Consequence of her Enthusiasm (2).

As the Priestess was only the Instrument made use of to reveal the Will of Apollo, so the Oracle had several other Ministers; Priests or Prophets who took care of every thing belonging to it; who chose the Victims, offer'd up the Sacrifices, repeated them when they were not propitious, conducted the Priestess to the Tripod, where they placed her in a convenient Posture for receiving all the Vapour that issued from the Cave, at the Mouth of which she sat; they put her Words together, and deliver'd them to the Poets, another sort of Ministers, by whom they were put into Verse. From a Passage in Plutarch (3) it appears, that those Poets, together with the Prophets, were about the Priestess when she pronounc'd the Words which the God dictated to her. The Verses composed by those Poets, were often stiff, of a wretched Composition, and always obscure; which gave occasion to that piece of Raillery, that Apollo the Prince of the Muses, was the worst of Poets. Sometimes the Priestess herself pronounc'd her Oracles in Verse, at least we are told so of one of them, called Phemonoe; in later times they contented themselves with delivering them in Prose; and this Plutarch reckons to have been one Cause of the Declension of the Oracle. There were belonging to this Oracle several other Ministers, whose Names and Functions may be seen in the third Dissertation of M. Hardion; insomuch that, as M. Fontenelle has it, the whole Town of Delphi was opulently maintain'd by the Oracle.

(1) Herod. Plut. Strabo, &c. (2) Pharf. l. 5. (3) Loc. cit.

340 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book IV.

The Sanctuary where the Priestess was, being cover'd with Branches of Laurel, she herself surrounded with Prophets and Poets, and there being two Women besides to hinder the Profane from coming near her, it was difficult to know precisely what was done there; and had it not been for Persons of Curiosity, who pry'd more narrowly into the Secret of the Priests, we should not have been able to speak so positively as we have done, concerning the Manner in which this Oracle was delivered.

ARTICLE IV.

The Oracle of Trophonius.

Tho' Trophonius was only a Hero, nay, according to some Authors; an execrable Robber; yet he had an Oracle in Bæotia, which became exceeding famous, and where grand Ceremonies were used, before obtaining the Response. As no body has describ'd it more fully and more accurately than Pausanias who had consulted it, and submitted to all its irksome Formalities, we cannot do better than transcribe what he says of this Personage and his Oracle (1). Erginus, says he, the Son of Chymenus King of Orchomenos, being far advanced in Years, and inclined to marry, came to consult the Oracle of Apollo, whether he should have Children. The Priestess puzzled with his Question, answered him in enigmatical Terms, that tho' he was rather too late in coming to a resolution, yet he might entertain good hopes if he married a young Wife. Conformably to this Response, he married a young Woman, by whom he

(1) In Bæot. p. 599.

he had two Sons, Trophonius and Agamedes, who both of them became afterwards great Architects.

By them was built the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, and Hyrieus's Treasure-House. In the Construction of this Edifice they had recourse to a secret Stratagem, known to none but themselves: By means of a Stone in the Wall, which they had the Art of taking out and putting in again, so as no body could discover, they had access every night to this Treasury, and robb'd Hyrieus of his Money. He observing his Money diminish'd, and yet no appearance of the Doors having been open'd, set a Trap about the Vessels which contain'd his Treasure, and there Agamedes was catch'd. Trophonius not knowing how to extricate him, and fearing lest if he was the next day put to the rack, he should discover the Secret, cut off his Head.

Without entering into a critical Examination of this Story, which seems to be but a Copy of what Herodotus fully relates of one of the Kings of Egypt, and two Brothers who robb'd his Treasure by a like Stratagem, I would have it be observ'd, that Pausanias gives us no Account of the Life of Trophonius; only as to the manner of his Death he tells us, that the Earth open'd and swallow'd him up alive, and that the Place where it happened is still called at this day, Agamedes's Pit, which is to be seen in a sacred Grove of Lebadea, with a Pillar set over it.

The Death of those two Brothers is told otherwise by Plutarch, who cites Pindar. After the building of the Temple of Delphos, whose Foundation was laid by Apollo himself, as it is in Homer, they ask'd their Reward of that God, who order'd them to wait eight Days, and in the mean time to make merry; but at the end of that term they were found dead.

Lebadea, continues Pausanias, is a City as much adorn'd as any throughout Greece: The sacred Grove of Trophonius is but at a very little distance from it, and in this Grove is the Temple of Trophonius, with his Statue, which is the Work of Praxiteles. They who come to consult his Oracle, must perform certain Ceremonies.

Before they go down into the Cave where the Response is given, they must pass some Days in a Chapel dedicated to Good Genius and to Fortune. That time is spent in Self-purification, by abstinence from all things unlawful, and in making use of the Cold Bath, for the Warm Baths are prohibited ; thus, the Suppliant is not allowed to wash himself, unless in the Water of the River Hercyna. He must sacrifice to Trophonius and all his Family, to Jupiter surnam'd King, to Saturn, to Ceres surnam'd Europa, who was believed to have been Trophonius's Nurse ; thus the God had plentiful provision of Flesh offered to him in Sacrifice. There were Diviners also to consult the Entrails of every Victim, to know if it was agreeable to Trophonius that the Person should come down into his Cave ; but he especially revealed his mind by the Entrails of a Ram, which was offered up to him in the last place. If the Omens were favourable, the Suppliant was led that Night to the River Hercyna, where two Boys * about twelve or thirteen years old, anointed his whole Body with Oil. Then he was conducted as far as the Source of the River, and was made to drink two sorts of Water ; that of Lethé, which effaced from his mind all prophane Thoughts ; and that of Mnemosyné, which had the quality of enabling him to retain whatever he was to see in the sacred Cave. After all this Apparatus, the Priests presented to him the Statue of Trophonius, to which he was to address a Prayer : Then he got a linnen Tunic to put on, which was adorned with sacred Fillets ; and after all, was solemnly conducted to the Oracle.

This Oracle was upon a Mountain, within an Inclosure made of white Stones, upon which were erected Obelisks of Brais. In this Inclosure was a Cave, of the figure of an Oven, cut out by Art. The Mouth of it was narrow, and the Descent to it was not by Steps, but by a small Ladder. When they were got down, they found another small Cave, the Entrance to which was very strait : The Suppliant prostrated himself on the Ground, carrying a certain Composition of Honey in either

* Pausanias adds, that those Boys were called Mercurys.

either Hand, - without which he is not admitted; he first puts down his Feet into the Mouth of the Cave, and instantly his whole Body is forcibly drawn in.

They who were admitted, were favoured with Revelations, but not all in the same manner: Some had the Knowledge of Futurity by Vision, others by an audible Voice. Having got their Response, they came out of the Cave the same way they went in, prostrate on the Ground, and their Feet foremost. Then the Suppliant was conducted to the Chair of Mnemosyné, and there being set down, was interrogated what he had seen or heard: From that he was brought back quite stupify'd and senseless, into the Chapel of Good Genius, till he should recover his Senses; after which he was obliged to write down in a Table-Book, all that he had seen or heard; which the Priests interpreted in their own way. Pausanias adds, that there never had been any but one Man who enter'd Trophonius's Cave without coming out again. This was a Spy sent thither by Demetrius, to see whether in that holy Place there was any thing worth plundering. His Body was found far from thence, and 'tis likely, that his Design being discovered, the Priests assassinated him in the Cave, and carry'd out his Carcass by some Passage, whereby they themselves came into the Cave without being perceiv'd. The same Author concludes: What I here write, is not founded upon Hearsay; I relate what I have seen happen to others, and what happen'd to my self: For to be assured of the Truth, I went down into the Cave and consulted the Oracle.

Plutarch, who tells us that in his time all the Oracles of Bæotia had ceased, except that of Trophonius, makes mention in his Treatise concerning Socrates's Genius, of one Timachus, who gave account of what he pretended to have seen in Trophonius's Cave; but he seems to have been but an Impostor, who regards not whether the thing be true or false, but only if it is wonderful and extraordinary; and deserves much less to be believed than Pausanias.

As to the time when the Oracle of Trophonius was founded, we are not able to determine: Only we know from Pausanias, that he was not heard of in Bœotia itself, till that Country being distressed with a great Drought, they had recourse to Apollo at Delphos, to learn from that God, by what means they might put a stop to the Famine. The Priestess answered, that they were to apply themselves to Trophonius, whom they would find in Lebæda. The Deputies obey'd; but not being able to find an Oracle in that City, Saon the oldest of them, spy'd a Swarm of Bees, and observ'd to what side it turn'd. He saw that those Bees flew towards a Cave; follow'd them, and thus discovered the Oracle. They say, continues Pausanias, that Trophonius himself instructed him in all the Ceremonies of his Worship, and after what manner he would be honour'd and consulted; which makes me think that this Saon was himself the Founder of that Oracle, which, no doubt, was instituted upon occasion of the Famine I have mention'd.

ARTICLE V.

Of other Oracles.

After having spoken at some length of the principal Oracles, it will not be amiss to say something of those that were of less note. Apelle, of all the Gods, was he who had the greatest number. That of Claros, a Town in Ioniz, near Colophon, tho' of less Antiquity than several others, was yet very famous, and very often consulted. The City Claros is thought to have been founded by Mante, the Daughter of Tiresias, after the second War of Thebes, some Years before the taking of Troy. This Daughter, of whom Antiquity tells many Wonders, with respect to her prophetick Gift, deploring the Miseries of her Country, melted into Tears, and those Tears of hers formed a Fountain and Lake, whose Water communicated the Gift of Prophecy to those who drank it: But the Water not being wholesome, it likewise brought on Diseases, and was a means of shortning Life. Pliny speaking of it (1), expresses himself to this purpose: Colophone in Apollinis Clarii speculaculus est, cujus potu mira redduntur Oracula, bibentium brevior vitâ.
of

The same God had a great many others, of which I shall name the principal from Van Dale (2): There was one, and that a very famous one too, in the Suburbs of Daphne at Antioch. According to Lucan, one in the Island of Delos, which was thought to be the Birth-place of that God. According to Herodotus, he had one at Didyme among the Branchidæ. One at Argos, as we learn from Pausanias. In Troas, and in Æolis, according to Stephanus; at Baiæ in Italy, as we learn from Capitolinus; in Cilicia, in Egypt, in the Alps, in Thrace, at Corinth, in Arcadia, in Laconia; in fine, in an infinity of other Places, as may be seen in that Place of the modern Author, which I have just now cited.

Tho' the other Gods had not an equal share with Apollo, the God of Divination, yet every one of them almost had his Oracle. Jupiter, besides that of Dodona and some others, the honour whereof he shared with Apollo, had one in Boeotia, under the name of Jupiter the Thunderer, and another in Elis (3). One at Thebes and at Meroe (4); one near Antioch, and several others. Æsculapius was consulted in Cilicia, at Apollonia, in the Isle of Cos, at Pergamus, Epidaurus, Rome, and elsewhere. Mercury at Patras, upon Hemon, and in other Places. Mars in Thrace, Egypt, and elsewhere. Hercules at Cadiz, Athens, in Egypt, at Tivoli, in Mesopotamia, where, according to Tacitus, he gave his Oracles by Dreams, whence he got the Name of Somnialis, as may be seen in an Inscription of Spon, and in another recited by Reinesius. Isis, Osiris, and Serapis, delivered in like manner their Oracles by Dreams, as we learn from Pausanias, Tacitus, Arrian, and several others. This manner of giving Oracles, to mention it by the by, was very common: By this we may explain those

(1) L. 2. c. 103.

(2) De Orac. Ethn. dur. atque interitu.

(3) Strabo.

(4) Herodotus.

those Inscriptions cited by Gruter, in which we read; Ex visu Deæ: Visu jussa posuit: Visu monitus, Somnio monitus, &c. That of Amphilochus mentioned by Dion, was likewise delivered by Dream. The Ox Apis had also his Oracle in Egypt; the manner of consulting whom was singular. If he eat what was offer'd him by the Suppliant, it was a good sign; but a bad one when he refused it, as it happen'd to Germanicus. It was much the same with the Ceremony practis'd at Rome, when they drew good or bad Omens from what they called their sacred Chickens; as if the Events of Futurity had depended upon the good Appetite or full Stomach of an Ox, or of a Chicken.

The Gods called Cabiri, if we may credit St. Athanasius, had their Oracle in Beotia. Diana, the Sister of Apollo, had not a few: She had one in Egypt (1), in Cilicia, at Ephesus, not to mention several others. Virgil makes mention of that of Jaunus in Italy. Those of Fortune at Preneste, and of the Lots at Antium, are too well known to need any Enlargement upon this Subject. The Fountains too delivered Oracles, for to each of them a Divinity was ascrib'd: such, in particular, was the Fountain of Castalia at Delphi, another of the same Name in the Suburbs of Antioch, and the prophetick Fountain near the Temple of Ceres in Achaia. What Pliny tells us of that of Limyra, is very singular: It gave Oracles by means of the Fishes. The Consulters presented Meat to them: if the Fishes fell on greedily, it was a favourable Omen for the Event about which they came to interrogate them; if they refused the Bait, by rejecting it with their Tail, it betoken'd bad Success (a).

Juno had several Oracles: One near Corinth, one at Nysa, and in other Places. Latona, according to Herodotus, had one at Butes in Egypt. Leucothoe had hers in Colchis, according to Strabo. Memnon, in Egypt,
as

(1) Herodotus.

(a) Fons Limyræ transire solet in loca vicina, portendens aliquid: Nimirum quod cum piscibus transit. Responsa ab his petunt incole cibo, quem rapiunt annuentes: Si vero eventum negent, caudis abigunt. Plin. l. 31, c. 2.

as we learn from Tacitus and Lucian. Machaon, at Gerania in Laconia, according to Pausanias. Minerva, who was denominated Fatidica, of consequence was not without her Oracles: She had one in Egypt (1), in Spain, upon Mount Ætna, at Mycenæ, in Colchis; and elsewhere. Those of Neptune were at Delphos, and at Calauria, near Neocesarea, and elsewhere (2). The Nymphs had theirs in the Cave of Corycia. Pan had several, the most famous of which was that in Arcadia. That of the Palici, according to Macrobius, Virgil, and Stephanus, was in Sicily (3).

Pluto had one at Nysa, as we learn from Strabo. Saturn had of them in several places; but the most famous was that of Cumæ in Italy, and that of Alexandria in Egypt. Lucian discourses of that of the Syrian Goddess; Gruter of that of Sylvanus. Those of Venus were dispersed in several Places, at Gaza, upon Mount Libanus, at Paphos, in Cyprus, &c. Serapis had one at Alexandria, which Vespasian went to consult; the Priest who minister'd to the God, would only reveal to him in secret what he had to tell him concerning the grand Designs he had in view. Upon which I shall remark by the way, that it was a very rare thing for those who came to consult the Oracles, to be permitted to enter the Sanctuary; and Van Dale, who has exhausted the Subject, finds but two Examples of it, that of Alexander, who, as Plutarch reports after Calisthenes, entered alone into the Sanctuary of Hammon: and that of Vespasian, who, according to Tacitus, was introduced into that of Serapis.

I cannot pass in silence that of Venus Aphacite, mention'd by Zozimus, which was consulted by the Palmyrenians, who revolted under the Reign of Aurelian, about the Year of Jesus Christ 272. Aphaca * was a Place between Heliopolis and Byblos, where Venus had a Temple, hard by which was a Lake resembling a Cistern. They, who came to consult the Oracle of that Goddess, threw Presents into the Lake; and it was

(1) Herodotus. (2) Pausanias. (3) See their History.

* 'Tis a Syriack word, and signifies an Embrace. See Suidas.

was no matter what kind they were of. If they were acceptable to Venus, they went to the bottom; if she rejected them, they swam on the Surface, even tho' of Gold or Silver. The Historian, I have quoted, subjoins, that in the Year, which preceded the Ruin of the Palmarenians, their Presents sunk to the bottom; but that in the following Year all floated above.

Ammianus Marcellinus tells us of a God called Beza, but little known to Mythologists, who had an Oracle at Abydos, in the Extremity of Thebais, which was delivered by Letters under a Seal. Zozimus reports, that some of those Letters which had been left in the Temple of that God, were sent to Constantius. Upon which, the Emperor caused very strict Enquiry to be made, and imprison'd, or banish'd a considerable number of Persons: probably the Oracle had been consulted about the Fate of the Empire, or the Success of some Plot, they were forming against the Emperor.

'Tis hardly credible, that Geryon, the three-headed Monster, who was slain by Hercules, should have had an Oracle! He had one however, as well as his Conqueror. This Oracle was in Italy, near Padua; and Suetonius tells us (1), that Tiberius went to consult that God. There was the Fountain of Aponus, which, if we may believe Claudian, restored Speech to the dumb, and cured all sorts of Diseases. That of Hercules was at Tivoli, and was given by Lots, as Statius tells us, much after the manner of those of Fortune at Preneſte and at Antium, as I shall explain afterwards. I have spoke of Fountains, whose Waters had a prophetick Virtue. The Rivers did not enjoy the same Prerogative: we find one however that was privileged, and which, according to Pliny the younger, had an Oracle. It was Clitumnus, a River in Umbria. The Temple of that God, says this Author, is ancient and much revered: Clitumnus is there dressed in a Roman Garb. The Lots denote the Presence and Power of the Divinity. There are likewise in the same place several Chapels, some of which have Fountains and Springs; for Clitumnus

(1) In Tiber.

Iunus is as it were the Father of several other small Rivers, which unite their Streams with his.

Not was it only the Gods had Oracles : the Demi-Gods and Heroes had theirs too. Lutatius speaks of that of Castor and Pollux, which was at Lacedemon (1). Bartbius (2) makes mention of that of Amphiaras at Oropus, in Macedonia; and Mopsus had likewise one in Cilicia, as we learn from the Ancients. The Head of Orpheus, according to Ovid, delivered Responses at Lesbos; Amphilochus, at Mallos; Sarpedon, in Troas; Hermione, in Macedonia; Pasiphae, in Laconia, as we learn from Tertullian, who, in his Book upon the Soul, cites the Work of Hermippus; Chalcas, in Italy (3); Aristæus, in Bæotia (4); Autolytus, at Sinope (5); Phryxus, among the Colchi; that of Rhesus, was at Pangea; Ulysses, if we may believe the old Commentator on Lycophron, had likewise an Oracle; and so had Zamolxis, among the Getes, as Strabo assures us, not to mention a great many more. Even Ephestion too, Alexander's Minion, and Antinous had Oracles. After the death of the former, nothing would satisfy Alexander, but to have Ephestion made a God; and all the Courtiers of that Prince consented to it without the least hesitation. Immediately Temples are built to him in several Towns; Festivals instituted to his Honour; Sacrifices offered; Cures ascrib'd to him; and that nothing might be wanting, Oracles are given out in his Name.

Hadrian practis'd the same Fooleries towards Antinous: He caus'd the City Antinopolis to be built to his Memory, gave him Temples and Prophets, says St. Jerom; now Prophets belong'd only to the oracular Temples. We have still a Greek Inscription to this purpose.

TO

(1) Upon the 413th Verse of the Thebaid. (2) Upon the same Author, L. 9. v. 658. (3) Strabo. (4) Greg. of Nazianz. (5) Strabo.

TO ANTINOVS, THE COMPANION OF THE GODS OF EGYPT; M. VLPIVS APOLLO-NIVS HIS PROPHET.

After this, we shall not be surpriz'd at Augustus's having deliver'd Oracles at Rome, as we learn from Prudentius. These modern Oracles however were never in so much repute as the ancient ones, and they made these new-created Gods deliver only so many Responses, as were thought convenient in order to make their Court to the Princes who had deify'd them. And to be short, they did not consult them very seriously; and in Affairs of importance, they still had recourse to Delpbos, Claros, or the Cave of Trophonius.

But there would be no end of it, was I to enumerate all the Pagan Oracles. Van Dale, after having discoursed of the chief of them, contents himself with naming those at the end of his Work; a List of whom he had collected from the Ancients; and in this List, which may be consulted, he reckons up near three hundred, the most of them belonging to Greece. But to be sure he has not named them all; for there were few Temples where there was not an Oracle, or some other sort of Divination.

Of all the Parts of Greece, Bæotia was that which had most of them, upon account of the Mountains and Caverns it was full of: for 'tis proper to remark with M. Fontenelle, that nothing suited better with Oracles than Caverns and Mountains (a). It was in those Caves, whose View inspired a sort of religious Horrour, that the Priests could artfully contrive Passages whereby to go in, and come out, without being perceived; Machines, hollow Statues, within which they hid themselves,

(a) Plutarch remarks, that there were more than five and twenty in Bæotia alone, which was a very small Province. As many were reckoned in the Peloponnesus, and fifteen about Delphi, either at the same time, or successively.

selves, and several other Conveniencies to give more Reputation to their Oracles. For in fine, altho' I am persuaded with the most learned Fathers of the Church, that the Devil presided over Oracles, and that it was either he himself personally present, or the Priests acted by him, who deliver'd Responses concerning future Events ; since, let Men say what they will, there is no other possible way of explaining all that we learn from Antiquity relating to those Responses : yet I am fully convinced, that the Cheats of the Priests had often, nay, for the most part, if you will, a very great hand in them ; and consequently we may believe, that they neglected no Method for supporting their Impostures. The Discovery, which Daniel made of the Tricks of Belus's Priests, who came by night thro' subterraneous Passages, and carried off the Meat, which they said was eat up by the God himself ; this, I say, is a convincing Proof of the Cheats that were practised in the Pagan Temples ; a Proof which leaves no room to doubt but the like Tricks were used in the Oracles. Accordingly, when the Christian Religion had once triumphed over Idolatry, and when the Oracles were abolished with it, there were Discoveries made in the Caves and Dens where there had been Oracles, and several Marks of the Fraud and Imposture of the Ministers who had had the Charge of them.

To conclude : We must not think, that all the Oracles we have been speaking of, and others, of which we know but the bare Names, did subsist at one and the same time. There were some of them older, some of them later, and of all Dates, from that of Dodona, which was look'd upon as the most ancient, down to that of Antinous, which may be reckoned the last. Sometimes even the ancient ones came to be laid aside. Their Credit was lost, either by discovering the Impostures of their Ministers, or by Wars, which laid waste the Places where they were, or by other Accidents unknown. One thing we know, that the immense Riches, which were at Delphi, had frequently been a Temptation to rife that Temple, as was done more than once; tho' at the same time, those Pillages did not make the Oracle to cease (a).
than

Upon the Ruin of those, they took care to found new ones in their room; and these, in their turn, gave place to others: but the precise time of the Declension of many of those Oracles, and of the Institution of the new, is not known.

A R T I C L E VI.

Various Manners in which the Oracles were deliver'd.

Before we finish what belongs to this Subject, I am to examine two Heads, which I have only hinted at in some places of this Chapter. The first, concerns the different Manners in which the Oracles were deliver'd: The second, the more remarkable Responses handed down to us by Antiquity.

We have seen in what manner several Oracles were given; that at Delphi, they interpreted and put in Verse what the Priestess pronounced in the time of her Fury; that at the Oracle of Hannou, it was the Priests who pronounced the Response of their God; that at Dodona, the Response was given from the Hollow of an Oak; that at the Cave of Trophonius, the Oracle was gather'd from what the Suppliant said before he recover'd his Senses; that at Memphis, they drew a good or bad Omen, according as the Ox Apis receiv'd or reject'd what was presented to him; and that it was thus likewise with the Fishes of the Fountain of Limyra. We must now add, that the Response of the God was often given from the bottom of his Statue, whether it was the Devil delivered his Oracles there, or the Priests, who had hollowed those Statues and found a way to convey themselves thither, by some subterraneous Passage; for, to say it over again, the Suppliants were not allow'd to enter the Sanctuaries where the Oracles were given, far less to appear too curious in that point. Accordingly they took care, that neither the

Epi-

(a) It was pillaged by a Robber, of the Race of the Phlegreans, by the Phocians, by Pyrrhus, by Nero, and lastly by the Christians.

Epicureans nor Christians should come near them; and the reason is very obvious. In several places, the Oracles were given by Letters sealed up; as in that of Mopsus, and at Mallos in Cilicia. He, who came to consult these Oracles, was obliged to give his Letter into the Priests hands, or to leave it upon the Altar, and to lie in the Temple; and it was in time of his Sleep, that he received the Answer to his Letter; whether it was that the Priests had the Secret of opening these Letters, as Lucian assures us of his false Prophet Alexander (1), who had founded his Oracle in Pontus; or whether there was something supernatural in the Case, I shall not determine.

The Manner of delivering the Oracle at Claros had somewhat still more extraordinary, since no more was required but that the Person should communicate his Name to the Priest of that God *. Tacitus is my Author. “ Germanicus, says he, went to consult “ the Oracle of Claros. The Responses of that God “ are not delivered by a Woman, as at Delphos ; but “ by a Man chosen out of a particular Family, and “ who is for the most part of Miletus. All he re- “ quires is to be told the Number and the Names of “ the Suppliants. Then he retires into a Grotto, and “ having taken Water from a secret Spring, he gives “ a Response in Verse, suitable to what every one has “ been thinking upon ; tho’, for the most part, he is “ extremely ignorant.”

Among the Oracles which were deliver'd in a Dream, there were some for which Preparations were necessary by Fastings, as that in Amphicraus in Attica, as Philostratus informs us of him (2), and some others, where they were oblig'd to sleep upon the Skins of the Victims.

One of the most singular Oracles was that of Mercury, in Achaia, which Pausanias treats of (3). After a great many Ceremonies, which we need not here enum-

(1) In Alex. (2) Life of Apol. Tyan. L. 2. (3) In Ach.

* Numerum modo consultantium & nomina audit. Annal. L. 2.

enumerate, they whisper'd in the Ear of the God, and ask'd him, what they were desirous to know; then they stop'd their Ears with their hands, went out of the Temple, and the first Words they heard upon their coming out, was the Response of the God.

Oracles were frequently given by Lot; and this is what we must explain. The Lots were a kind of Dice, on which were engraven certain Characters or Words, whose Explanation they were to look for in Tables made for the purpose. The way of using those Dice for knowing Futurity was different, according to the Places where they were used. In some Temples, the Person threw them himself; in others, they were drop'd from a Box; whence came the proverbial Expression, The Lot is fallen. This Playing with Dice was always preceded by Sacrifices, and other usual Ceremonies.

There were of these Lots in several Oracles, even at Dodona, as appears in the case of the Lacedemonians, when they came thither for a Consultation, as we have it in Cicero (1); but the most famous Lots were at Antium and Prænestæ, two Towns in Italy. At Prænestæ, it was the Goddess; and at Antium, the Goddesses of Fortune; that is, her Divinity was represented by Statues. Those of Antium had this Singularity, that they moved themselves, according to Macrobius's Testimony (2); and their various Movements served either for the Response, or signified if the Lots could be consulted. From a Passage in Cicero (3), where he says, the Lots of Prænestæ were consulted by consent of Fortune, it would seem, that the Fortune which was in that City was a sort of Automaton, like those at Antium, which gave some sign with its Head, much like that of Jupiter Hammon; who, as has been said, thus signified to the Priests who carried him in Procession, what Rout they were to take. An Event which Suetonius relates, undoubtedly raised the Lots of Prænestæ to great Reputation, contrary to the Intention of Tiberius, who was going to destroy them; since he tells

(1) De Div. L. 1. (2) Sat. L. 1. c. 23. (3) De Div. L. 1.

tells us, that they were not to be found in a Coffre securely sealed, when the Coffre was open'd at Rome, but when brought back to Præneste they were again found.

In Greece and Italy, they frequently drew Lots, from some celebrated Poet, as Homer and Euripides; and what presented itself upon opening the Book was the Decree of Heaven; of this, History furnishes a thousand Examples. Nothing is yet more common than the Sortes Virgilianæ, or Lots which were drawn from Virgil's Poems. Lampridius informs us, that Alexander Severus, when yet a private Man, and at a time when the Emperor Heliogabalus bore no Goodwill to him, received by way of Response in the Temple of Præneste, that Passage in Virgil;

—————*Si qua fata aspera rumpas,
Tu Marcellus eris* (1).

If thou canst by any means surmount severe Destiny, thou shalt be Marcellus.

In the Eastern Countries, Arrows served for Lots; and these the Turks and Arabians use at this day, in the same way as the Ancients did. We learn from the Prophet Ezekiel, that Nebuchadnezzar, coming from Babylon with a great Army, stop'd in a Cross-way, to know by means of the Arrows which he mingled, mis-cuit Sagittas, if he should make War upon Egypt, or against the Jews; and the Prophet adds, that the Lot fell upon Jerusalem. Under this Head, we may take in the Consultation of the Sibylline Books, which were look'd upon at Rome as a continual Oracle; but of this I shall discourse at length in the History of those Prophetesses.

In fine, Lots were even introduced into Christianity, and taken from the sacred Books, where the first words that threw up, decided what they wanted to know. We shall conclude by reporting some singular Responses of Oracles.

The ordinary Ambiguity of the Oracles, and their double Meaning, could not chuse but be a great Support to them; since, by

Singular Responses of certain Oracles.

A a 2

(1) Æn. L. 6. v. 882.

interpreting them in a certain sense, which they could bear, the Oracle was sure to be fulfill'd. Thus the Response given to Cræsus, by the Priests of Delphos, must, in all Events, have appear'd a true Prediction. Cræsus, said the Priests, in passing the Halys shall overthrow a great Empire: For if that Lydian Monarch had conquer'd Cyrus, he overthrew the Assyrian Empire; if he himself was routed, he overturn'd his own.

That deliver'd to Pyrrhus, which is comprized in this Latin Verse, Credo equidem Æacidas Romanos vincere posse (a).

had the same advantage; for, according to the Rules of Syntax, either of the two Accusatives may be governed by the Verb, and the Verse be explain'd, either by saying the Romans shall conquer the Æacids, of whom Pyrrhus was descended, or these shall conquer the Romans.

When Alexander fell sick at Babylon, some of his Courtiers, who happen'd to be in Egypt, or who went thither on purpose, passed the Night in the Temple of Serapis, to enquire if it would not be proper to bring Alexander to be cured by him. The God answered, It was better that Alexander should remain where he was. This in all Events was a very prudent and safe Answer. If the King recover'd his health, what Glory must Serapis have gained by saving him the Fatigue of the Journey! If he died, it was but saying he died in a favourable Juncture after so many Conquests; which, had he lived, he could neither have enlarged nor preserved. That is actually the Construction they put upon the Response; whereas had Alexander undertaken the Journey, and died in the Temple, or by the way, nothing could have been said in favour of Serapis.

When Trajan had formed the Design of his Expedition against the Parthians, he was advised to consult the Oracle of Heliopolis, to which he had no more to do but send a Note under a Seal. That Prince, who had no great Faith in Oracles, sent thither a Blank Note;

(a) Cicero won't allow that any such Response was given.

Note; and they return'd him another of the same. By this Trajan was convinced of the Divinity of the Oracle. He sends back a second Note to the God, wherein he enquired, whether he should return to Rome after finishing the War he had in view. The God, as Macrobius tells the Story*, ordered a Vine, which was among the Offerings of his Temple, to be divided into pieces, and brought to Trajan. The Event justified the Oracle; for the Emperor dying in that War, his Bones were carried to Rome, which had been represented by that broken Vine. As the Priests of that Oracle knew Trajan's Design, which was no Secret, they happily devised that Response, which, in all Events, was capable of a favourable Interpretation, whether he routed and cut the Parthians in pieces, or if his Army met with the same fate.

But among the Responses of the Oracles, some were of a singular Nature. Cræsus not being satisfy'd with that of Delphos, altho' he had been excessively liberal to it, as Herodotus informs us, sent with a view to surprize the Oracle, to enquire of the Priestess, what he was a doing at the very time when his Deputy was consulting her. She answered, he was then boiling a Lamb with a Tortoise; as he really was. Cræsus who had contrived this odd Ragou, in hope that the Oracle would never hit upon the Secret, which he had communicated to no Mortal, and which at the same time was in the nature of the thing so unlikely to be thought of, was amazed at this Response: it heightens his Credulity, and new Presents must be sent to the God. But this Fact being very singular, and containing other Circumstances besides, I shall relate it as it is in Herodotus (1). “ Cræsus seeing the Power of the Persians “ grow greater and greater every day, by the Valour “ of Cyrus, thought it high time to be making ready “ to bear it down. Before he took any steps, he sent “ to consult the Oracles of Greece and Africk. Ac- “ cordingly he named Deputies for Delphos, some for “ Dodona, others for the Oracle of Amphiaraus, for “ that

A a 3

* Lib. 1. c. 23.

(1) Herod. L. 1.

“ that of Trophonius, and for that of the Branchidæ, “ which was upon the Frontiers of the Milefians. He “ dispatched some into Asrick, to consult the Oracle “ of Jupiter Hammon. This first step was only to “ found the Oracles; and provided they gave a true
 “ Answer, he proposed to send thither a second time, “ to learn from them whether he should carry on his “ design’d Enterprize against the Persians. He com“ manded the Deputies to observe exactly what time “ interven’d between their setting out from Sardis, “ and the Day of the Consultation; and to enquire at
 “ the several Oracles what Craſus was doing that day.
 “ What were the Answers of the other Oracles we are “ not told; but upon their Arrival at Delphos, they “ were not well enter’d into the Temple, when the “ Priestess told them in heroick Verse, that she knew
 “ the immense Expanse of the Ocean; that she, like “ the Gods, could number the Grains of Sand on the “ Sea-shore; that she understood the Language of “ him who never speaks, nor was any thing a Secret “ to her; that she actually saw him, who was now in “ secret, boiling in a brazen Pot, with a Lid of the “ same Metal, the Flesh of a Lamb mixed with that “ of a Tortoise. When the Deputies sent to the o“ ther Oracles arrived, Craſus examined with great “ care their several Answers, and had no regard to “ any of them, except to that of Amphiaraus, as to “ which our Author gives us no light; but so soon as “ the Deputies from Delphos arriv’d, the King was “ struck with Astonishment upon hearing the Response
 “ of the Oracle, and look’d upon it as the most infal“ lible of all.”

A Governour of Cilicia, who had a Gang of Epicu-reans about him, who were still endeavouring to inspire him with a Contempt of the Oracles, resolv’d, as Plutarch says pleasantly, to send a Spy to the Gods.
 He gave him a Letter, well sealed, to carry to Mallos, where was the Oracle of Mopsus. As the Deputy was lying in the Temple, a Man remarkably well-made appeared to him, and pronounced the word

Black.

Black. This Answer he bore to the Governour, which tho' it appear'd ridiculous to the Epicureans, to whom he communicated it, yet struck himself with Astonishment, and upon opening the Letter, he shewed them these words which he had there written : Shall I sacrifice to thee a white Ox or a black ?

Sometimes the Responses of the Oracles were nothing but a Piece of meer Banter ; witness that which was given to a Man, who came to demand by what means he might grow rich. The God answer'd him, That he had no more to do but make himself Master of all that lay between Sicyon and Corinth. Another wanting a Cure for his Gout, was answered by the Oracle, He was to drink nothing but cold Water.

We shall finish this Article with a Response, related by Strabo (1), which proved fatal to the Priestesses of Dodona who gave it. During the War between the Thracians and Bæotians, the latter came to consult the Oracle of Dodona, and were answer'd by the Priestesses, that they should have happy Success, if they were guilty of some impious Action. The Deputies of the Bæotians, from a Persuasion that the Priestesses had a mind to deceive them, to favour the Pelasgi, from whom she was descended, and who were in alliance with the Thracians, took and burnt her alive, alledging, that in whatever light that Action was considered, it could not but be justify'd. And indeed, if the Priestesses had an Intention to cheat them, she was punished for her Deceit : if she spoke sincerely, they had only literally fulfilled the Oracle. These Reasons however were not admitted, the Deputies were seized ; but not daring to punish them before they were judg'd, they brought them before the two remaining Priestesses ; for, according to Strabo's Account, there were at that time three belonging to that Oracle. The Deputies having remonstrated against this Proceeding, were allowed two Men to judge them with the Priestesses. These were clear for their being condemn'd ; but the two other Judges were more favourable to them. Thus the Votes being equal, they were absolv'd.

(1) Strab. p. 177.

360 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book IV.

We may remark in the Conclusion, that as the Priests turn'd into Verse what was deliver'd by the Priestess in her Fury ; so their Poetry was often wretchedly bad. The Epicureans especially made it their open Jest, and said, in raillery, It was surprizing enough, that Apollo, the God of Poetry, should be a much worse Poet than Homer, whom he himself had inspir'd. The Priests were even frequently obliged to steal from that famous Poet, despairing to make so good of their own. No doubt, it was the Railleries of these Philosophers, and more particularly those of the Cynicks and Peripateticks, that obliged the Priests to lay aside that Practice of turning the Responses of the Pythia into Verse ; which, according to Plutarch, was one of the principal Causes of the Declension of the Oracle of Delphos.

C H A P. II.

History of the Sibyls.

NEXT to the Oracles, we come to treat of the Sibyls, whose Predictions were, to the Romans especially, a kind of standing Oracle, consulted by them upon all occasions wherein the Republick was threatened with any Disaster.

I presume, it will not be expected I should insist long upon a Subject, already fully handled by several learned Men ; but this Mythology being design'd for general Use, and there being many who are not in a Condition to consult Books, where Hebrew and Greek are crouded together without reserve, I can't forbear mentioning the more necessary things upon the Subject, referring those who want to go deeper into it, to the learned Dissertations of Gallæus (1) ; to the Treatise upon it by M. Petit (2), Physician in Paris ; to Van Dele ; to Thomas Hyde (3) ; and in particular to Lactantius, who has handed down to us the ancient Tradition

(1) See Gallæi Dissert. de Sibyll. Amst. 1683. in 4to. (2) Pet. Petit de Sibylla. Lip. 1686. 8vo. (3) De Rel. Vet. Pers.

dition concerning the Sibyls, which he had taken from the Works of Varro.

For the sake of Method, I divide what I have to say in this Chapter into several Articles. 1. I shall examine whether there really were Sibyls. 2. How many were of them. 3. Upon what ground the Ancients believ'd they had the Gift of Prophecy. 4. How the Collection of their Predictions was made up. 5. How they deliver'd their Oracles. 6. Lastly, If they were reputed Divinities, and what Worship was paid to them.

ARTICLE I.

If there were Sibyls.

The Ancients gave the Name of Sibyls to a certain number of young Women, whom they believ'd endued with the Gift of Prophecy: Whether this Name be originally Hebrew, as Delrio, Peucerus, Neander, and some others contend; or Latin, as Suidas says; or African, as Pausanias will have it (1); or in fine, Greek, as most of the Learned assert. This last was the Opinion of Diodorus, who derives the Name from a Word importing in the Greek Language, Inspired, Enthusiast (a), because they were fully persuaded that the Sibyls were inspired by the Gods: But of all who have enquired into the Etymology of this Name, Lactantius is he whose Opinion is generally followed. This learned Author says, it signifies the Counsel of God: Omnes (feminae Vates) Sibyllae sunt a Veteribus nuncupatae, vel ab unius Delphidis nomine, vel a consiliis Deorum enuncian- dis; Σίβης enim, Deos, non Θεῶς, ἔ' consilium, non Βαλὴν, sed Βουλὴν, appellabant Æolico Sermonis genere; itaque inde Sibyllam dictam esse, Σιβουλὴν, (Consilium Dei.)

Be that as it will, all Antiquity concurs in establishing the Existence of some such Persons, and tho' there is a considerable variation with respect to their Number, as we shall see afterwards, that does not however destroy the certainty of their having existed. One disputes

(1) In Phoc.

(a) See below, the Translation of the Passage of this Author.

putes about their Number, another about their Country; a third about the time when they liv'd, &c. But these very Disputes prove their Existence to be taken for granted; so that it cannot be deny'd, without overturning whatever is most certain in Antiquity, and without contradicting, at the same time, several Fathers of the first Centuries, who have given into the unanimous opinion of Antiquity. I have no mind to cite all the Testimonies that might be drawn together for proof of this Truth; but then I can't expect to be believ'd merely upon my own word.

Plato (1), on occasion of that sort of Fury with which some Persons are seized, and are enabled thereby to know Futurity, after making mention of the Priestess of Delphos, and of Dodona, subjoins: "Were we to " discourse of the Sibyl, and other Persons who were
 " possess'd with the same Enthusiasm, we should lose
 " our time and our labour." Aristotle (2) examines the Cause to which the Sibyls Capacity of knowing future Events may have been owing; and consequently he supposes their Existence. Diodorus Siculus (3) takes occasion, from the Story of Daphne the Daughter of Tiresias, whom the Epigoni in accomplishment of their Vow, sent to Delphos after the taking of Thebes, to enter more fully into this Subject. "This Daughter,
 " says he, was no less knowing than her Father, in " the Art of Divination, and she made therein very " great progress, after she had been transported to Del- " phos. Being endued with a wonderful Genius, she " wrote a great number of Oracles in several manners,
 " the one differing from the other. 'Tis said, that
 " Homer appropriated to himself several of Daphne's
 " Verses, and made use of them to embellish his Poems.
 " Being often possess'd with a divine Fury in delivering " her Responses, she got the name of Sibyl; which, in " the Language of the Country, signified Enthusiast," Strabo (4) makes mention of the Sibyl Erythraea, and of another, who, according to him, liv'd in the time of Alex.

(1) In Phaed. (2) Prob. 30. Q. 1. (3) Lib. 4. (4) L. 14.

Alexander, and whose Name was Athenais; and in another place the same Author asserts (1), that there had been one more ancient. Plutarch, in that small Piece wherein he examines into the Cause of the Cessation of Oracles, speaks at great length of the Sibyls, and to stop the mouth of those who gave no credit to their Oracles, he recites several examples of the taking of Towns, of Wars, Irruptions of Barbarians, Migrations of different Nations, and several other remarkable Events, which had happen'd in the manner they had foretold. Elian (2) speaks of four of these Sibyls, as we shall see in the following Article. Pausanias (3) gives a description of the Rock where the Sibyl Erophile, who liv'd before the Siege of Troy, dwelt, and where she deliver'd her Oracles, tho' according to him, she was not the most ancient of all. The same Author speaks of the Tomb of this Sibyl, and gives her Epitaph and some of her Oracles (a). Stephanus, in the Article of Gergis, a Town of Troas, says, upon the Authority of Phlegon, that the Sibyl who was born there was called Gergithia, and that the People of that Town represented her upon their Coin, with a Sphinx: Aristophanes, in his Comedy of the Birds, names three Sibyls, of whom, one was Sister to Apollo, another was an Erythræan, and the third, a Native of Sardis.

To these Testimonies I might add that of Varro, the most knowing of the Romans, who not only names ten Sibyls, but also cites ancient Authors who had spoke of them; but I reserve what he says of them to the following Article. I might add that of Cicero, who makes mention of the Sibyls in his Books of Divination; that of Virgil, who tells such curious things of the Cumean Sibyl; those of Pliny, Solinus, of the Philosopher Hermias, of Procopius, Agathus, Jamblichus, Ammianus Marcellinus, Justin, and a world of others. I might add to these, what has been said of them by St. Justin Martyr, Lactantius, St. Jerom, St. Augustin, and other Fathers of the Church; and I might close the History of this

(1) L. 16. (2) Hist. Var. l. 12. (3) In Phoc.

(a) The Passage of this Author is given in the last Article.

this Tradition, with the Authority of all the Learned whom I have quoted at the beginning of this Chapter. 'Tis therefore unquestionably certain, that there were at different times, and in different places, Persons to whom it was believed the Gods had communicated the Faculty of knowing and predicting future Events, and who bore the name of Sibyls.

ARTICLE II.

The Number of the Sibyls.

If the Ancients are agreed as to the Existence of the Sibyls, they are far from being so as to their Number. The cause of their Uncertainty about this Subject is, that one and the same Sibyl travell'd into several Countries, and after having stay'd some time in one Place, and delivered Oracles there, she pass'd into another: Frequently two different Names were given to the same, sometimes that of her Country, sometimes that of the Places of her abode. The opinion, however, most generally received, is that of Varro, recited by Lactantius; and the Account of them given by that learned Father of the Church, is as follows (1). “ Varro, in the Books “ which he compos'd upon divine Things, dedicated “ by him to C. Cæsar the High-Priest, when he comes “ to the Article of the Sibylline Books, says, that those “ Books were not the Work of only one Sibyl, but of “ ten, for there were so many of them in all. Then he “ names them one after another, with the Authors who “ had spoke of them before him. The first, says he,
 “ and the most ancient one, was a Persian by Birth, as “ we learn from Nicanor, the same who had wrote the “ History of Alexander of Macedon. The second was “ born in Lilya, and of her Euripides makes mention, “ in the Prologue to his Tragedy, intitled Lamia. The “ third was of Delphos, as we learn from the Book of “ Divination compos'd by Chrysippus. The fourth had “ her Birth among the Cimmerians in Italy; Nævius “ speaks of her in his History of the Punick War, and “ Piso in his Annals. The fifth was of Erythræa, ac“ cording

(1) De Fal. Rel. l. 1. c. 6.

“ cording to Apollodorus, who was of the same Coun“ try ; the prophesy'd to the Greeks who were going “ to besiege Troy, the happy Success of their Enter“ prize, and at the same time, that Homer should one “ day write a great deal of Fictions upon that Subject.
 “ The sixth was of Samos, and her History was to be “ found in the most ancient Annals of the Samians, as “ we learn from Eratosthenes. The seventh born at “ Cumæ, was named Amalthæa, according to some Au“ thors, and according to others, Demophile or Hiero- “ phile: It was she who offer'd to Tarquin the elder, a “ Collection of Sibylline Verses, in nine Books. The “ eighth was the Hellepontine, born at Marpesus * near “ the Town of Gergis in Troas † : Heraclides of Pontus “ said, she liv'd in the time of Cyrus and Solon. The “ ninth, likewise a Phrygian by birth, gave her Oracles
 “ at Ancyra, the place of her Residence. The tenth,
 “ in fine, named Albunæa, was of Tibur or Tivoli, and “ was honour'd as a Divinity in the Neighbourhood of “ the River Anio.”

These are the ten Sibyls whom Varro admitted: But in order to give more light to what that learned Roman said of them, 'tis necessary here to make some Reflections. 1. He does not mention the Name of the Per- sian Sibyl, whom the Persians called Sabethe. 2. Eu- ripides speaking of the Libyan Sibyl, says, she was the Daughter of Jupiter and Lamia. She travell'd into several Places, to Samos, Delphos, Claros, &c. 'Twas these Travels, in short, that led some Authors to say, that three or four Sibyls had been made out of one.
 3. Diodorus Siculus names Daphne, the third of Varro's
 Sibyls, and says, she was born at Thebes in Bæotia.
 4. Eusebius reckons, that the Erythræan Sibyl, the most famous of all, lived not in the time of the Trojan War, as Varro believes, upon the Authority of Apollodorus, but under the Reign of Romulus. 5. She of Samos, whose Name is not mention'd by Varro, was called, according to Suidas, Pitho, or Persuasion, and according to Eusebius, Eriphile.

Suidas,

* Marmissus, in Suidas. † Gergiticum. ibid.

Suidas, who speaks of the Sibyls, like a Compiler not very accurate, has given us two Articles about them which don't resemble one another, tho' in both he reckons ten of them. Thus, Gallæus is mistaken in saying, that he made fourteen of them, as is Rosinus in affirming, that he named only nine.

Ælian, on the contrary (1), allows none but four of them, namely, the Erythræan, the Egyptian, she who was born at Samos, and another at Sardis in Lydia. Solinus seems persuaded, that their number ought to be reduc'd to three, those of Sardis, and Cumæ, and the Erythræan, wherein he is followed by Ausonius (2), who likewise admits no more of them than three.

Et tres fatidicæ nomen commune Sibyllæ

Quarum tergemini fatalia carmina libri.

Martianus Capella cuts off one more of them, and owns none but the Erythræan and the Phrygian. In fine, P. Petit, whose Work I have cited at the beginning of this Chapter, contends that there was none but one Sibyl, the Erythræan; and that her being called by different Names, such as the Cumæan, &c. was owing to her having travelled into different Countries, where she resided, and delivered her Oracles. Thus, with respect to this Sibyl, the Case was contrary to what had happened as to other fabulous Facts. For when several Persons bore the same Name, they used to insert into the History of the one who was most famous, the whole Adventures of the rest; thus accordingly it happen'd in the case of Hercules, as we shall see in the History of that Hero. Here again, Varro, and others who have multiply'd the Sibyls, have distributed among several, the Actions, Travels, and Predictions of only one. That learned Author brings several Arguments to support his Opinion, which may be seen in the Work I have quoted; but two of them which he takes to be the strongest, to me appear not conclusive. The first is, that Plato and Pliny speak of the Sibyl in the singular Number; the former in the Passage I have already given; the latter in these Words: Divinitas, & quædam Societas cœlitum nobi- nobilissima, ex feminis in Sibylla fuit, ex viris in Melampode apud Græcos, apud Romanos in Marcio. But these two Authorities are by no means conclusive: Plato, in that Passage of his Dialogue, was only speaking of the Sibyls by the by, and it was sufficient for his purpose to give an example of the prophetick Fury with which some Persons were acted. The same answer may be given as to what is said by Pliny, who in like manner, having no other thing in view but to give some examples of those who had a particular Intercourse with the Gods, has named Melampus and Marcion for the Men, and for the Women the Sibyl, without intending thereby to exclude others.

(1) Var. Hist. l. 12. c. 35. (2) Gryph. Num. tern.

The second Argument of M. Petit, appears stronger. The Collection of the Sibylline Verses was writ in Greek; now the question is, how all the Sibyls knew that Language? How should she of Persia, the Libyan, the Hellepontine, the Sardian, all of them have spoke Greek, in Countries where the Greeks were not known in their time? But who pretends that all the Sibyls spoke Greek? Was there any difficulty of making a Greek Translation of their Predictions, which were collected with the same care as the Oracles of Pythia? Besides, tho' it is true that the Sibylline Books now extant are in Greek Verse, how are we sure that they were always so? The Pythia deliver'd her Responses in Prose, and it was People particularly commissioned, who put them into Verse, as has been said in the preceding Chapter. I suppose then, and 'tis a very probable Supposition, that some curious Persons made a Collection of all the Sibylline Predictions, at least of so many of them as they could find, and having caused such of them as were in foreign Languages to be translated, put them into Verse: Thus, in all appearance, were the different Collections of those Predictions made up.

Thomas Hyde (1) in his Treatise of the Religion of the ancient Persians, has an opinion about the Sibyls, still more singular than that of P. Petit, since he denies that there ever were any of them. This Fable, which

(1) De Rel. vet. Pers. p. 392.

368 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book IV,
which was so current in Greece and Italy, derives its Origin, according to him, from Persia and Chaldea; and what gave rise to it there, was the Sign of the Virgin, in which Sign, the brightest Star was called, and is still at this day named Σίβυλλα, or Σίββυλα, Spica; now this Word comes from the Persian Sambula, or Sumbula, and signifies in that Language, an Ear of Corn. Accordingly, the Persians in their Planispheres were wont to represent that Star under the figure of a young Virgin, holding a handful of Ears. As the Persians and the Chaldeans, says this learned Author, are the Inventers of Astrology, and drew their Predictions from the Inspection of the Stars, they gave particular attention to that Sign, as representing a Virgin.

The Greeks, continues the same Author, who learn'd the Arts and Sciences from the eastern Nations, and who invented Fables upon the smallest Ambiguity in Language, meeting with the Word Sambula in the History of the Persian Astrology, feign'd first the Sibyl Sambetbe, and then the rest: But, as in Fictions 'tis not easy intirely to deface the Tradition which gave rise to them, hence the same Greeks always look'd upon the Sibyl of Persia, as the most ancient of all.

However ingenious the Conjecture of this learned English Writer may be, it cannot destroy the united Testimony of all Antiquity, which allows that there were, in different Times and Countries, such extraordinary Persons, who were reputed to have a particular Foreknowledge of Futurity, and whose Predictions carefully collected, were consulted upon important Occasions; for how many Suppositions must be made, in order to destroy so general a Tradition? The most that can be granted to this Author, is, that the Sibyl of Persia, nam'd Sambetbe, owed her original to the double meaning of the Word Sambula; but that is no Argument against the Existence of other Sibyls.

This would be the proper place to examine when the Sibyls liv'd; their Parentage, the Place of their birth, and the Order wherein they ought to be placed; but so many different Opinions in relation to these four Articles

articles are to be found among both Ancients and Moderns, that after strict Examination, one is at a loss what to fix upon. I have chosen to name them in the same order as Lactantius has done after Varro, altho' I am not ignorant that several of the Learned have inverted that Order, as if it was a thing worth while to make a bustle about it. What does it really avail whether that of Persia be the first and most ancient of all, as Varro alledged; or the fifth, as Boissard will have it; or only the eighth, according to Onuphrius Panvinus. Gallæus has taken the trouble to put together all that has been said upon this Subject; to him the Learned may have recourse.

ARTICLE III.

What Ground there was to believe that the Sibyls were endued with the Gift of Prophecy.

The Ancients have reason'd profoundly upon the Intercourse and Union which the Creature is capable of attaining to with the Deity; and this Union and Correspondence they reckon'd might be so intimate, that when Man was arriv'd to a certain degree of Perfection, the darkest Events of Futurity were then laid open to his view. To this pitch of Perfection, several endeavoured to arrive, and some of them were actually believ'd to have attain'd it, by virtue of that sort of Magick, which they term'd Theurgia, as shall be said in one of the subsequent Chapters. Thus at present, taking it for granted that this was one of the fundamental Articles of the Pagan Theology, we may say, that what made them believe the Sibyls possess'd of a prophetick Gift, must have been owing to their having had a persuasion that they enjoy'd this intimate Union with the Gods, especially with Apollo the Master of Divination. It was likewise for this reason that they gave the same Privilege to the Pythia of Delphos, and to the Priestesses of Dodona, whom they believ'd intimately united with the Divinity by whom they were inspir'd. Thus reason'd the Platonicks upon the Union which Man may have with the Gods: But other Philosophers had very different different Sentiments about the prophetick Spirit of the Sibyls, and attributed it to the Influence of a black and melancholy Humour, or to some other Disease. Others were of opinion, that the Fury to which they were wrought up, enabled them to know and foretel future Events, as Jamblichus (1) and Agathias (2) maintain. To this Fury, Cicero added Dreams, which sometimes inform us of things to come. There are, says he (3), two ways of foreknowing Futurity, either in a way of Fury, or by Dreams: Cum duobus modis animi, sine ratione & scientia, motu ipsi suo soluto & libero inciterentur; uno furente, altero somniente. Furoris Divinationem Sibyllinis maxime versibus contineri arbitrati, &c. This illustrious Author says in another place; there are Persons, who without any Science, without any Observation, foretel future Events, by I know not what furious Impulse: Carent arte ii qui non ratione aut conjecturâ, observatis ac notatis signis, sed concitatione quadam animi Ut Sibylla Erythræa.

We find ancient Authors who ascrib'd this Faculty of Divination which the Sibyls had, to the Vapours and Exhalations of the Caverns inhabited by them, as has been said of the Cave of Delphos.

Lastly, St. Jerom maintain'd that this Gift was communicated to them as a Reward of their Chastity: Hear how the Father of the Church, celebrating the Praises of Chastity, delivers his Thoughts with relation to the Sibyls: Quid referam Sibyllas, Erythræam atque Cumanam, & cæto reliquas, nam Varro decem esse autumat, quarum insigne Virginitas, & Virginitatis præmium Divinatio (4). True it is, that Chastity has always been looked upon, even by the Pagans, as a necessary qualification in those who approach'd the Altars; that the Priests, before they offered up the Sacrifices, were obliged to prepare themselves for that Service by Continence, and that there were even some of them who used medicinal means to acquire this Gift. 'Tis likewise true, that in order to be assured of the Chastity of the Priestess

(1) Ad Porp.
(4) Ad Jovin.

(2) Hist. l. 1.

(3) De Div. l. 1.

Priestess of Delphos, they chose her in the earlier times, from among the Country-People, where this Virtue is less expos'd than in Towns. I know not, however, what foundation St. Jerom had, for entertaining such a favourable Notion of the Chastity of the Sibyls, since there is one of them who boasts of having had a great number of Lovers, without being married, in this Verse which I have taken from the Latin Translation (1) ;

Mille mihi Læti, Connubia nulla fuere.

The Sibyl of Persia too, speaks of her Husband who was with her in Noah's Ark, as we shall see in the Sequel.

Our Opinion therefore is, that the Sibyls, being of a sullen melancholy Humour, living retired, and giving way to a fanatick Impulse, as Virgil describes the Sibyl of Cumæ, deliver'd at a venture what came into their mind, and that in the course of their frequent Predictions, they sometimes hit right ; or rather by the help of a favourable Commentary, People persuaded themselves that they had divin'd. And indeed, how easy was it for those who collected their Predictions, and put them in Verse, as was done to those of the Priestess of Delphos, to retrench or add what they pleas'd, and that frequently even after the Event? Some have been Prophets in spight of themselves, and the Publick frequently gives itself the trouble to accommodate Words spoke at random, to Facts which were never dream'd of by him who utter'd them. Do we not see instances of this every day among ourselves, with relation to one of our pretended Prophets (2)? And tho' his Work is a Master-piece of Obscurity, have not several Events that happened since his Death, been therein discover'd? The good-natur'd Ronsard at least, was fully persuaded that this extraordinary Man both knew and foretold what was to come, since after having search'd what Cause might have rendered this same Futurity present to his view, he thus concludes:

B b 2

In

“ In short, let the Cause be what it will, he it is who
 “ by dubious Words drop’d from his prophetick Lips, “ has like an ancient Oracle foretold the greatest part of “ our Destiny, for many a year to come (a):

ARTICLE IV.

Of the Collection of the Sibylline Verses.

As to the manner how the Collection of the Sibylline Verses was made, ’tis not known. ’Tis not likely that they prophesy’d in Verse, far less that they themselves kept their Predictions, and digested them into Order. Besides, they lived in different periods of Time, and in Countries remote the one from the other. How then came the World by a Collection of those Predictions, put in Hexameters? In what Age did it appear? Who was its Author? These are Facts which Antiquity has not transmitted down to us. All that we know is, that a Woman came to Tarquin the Proud, offering him a Collection of those Verses, in nine Books, and that she demanded for them three hundred Pieces of Gold; that when the Prince would not give that Sum, she threw three of them into the Fire, and exacted the same Sum for the remaining six; which being refused her, she burnt three more of them, and still persisted in asking the three hundred Pieces for those that were left; at length, the King fearing that she would burn the other three, gave her the Sum she demanded.

This Story has all the air of a Romance; it is attested however by a great many Authors, and perhaps the Falshood of it lies only in the Circumstances: For ’tis certain that the Romans had in their possession a Collection of the Sibylline Verses, and that they preserv’d it from the Reign of Tarquin to the time of Sylla, when it perish’d in the burning of the Capitol, where it had been deposited. And therefore, that the Reader may be

(a) Bref, il est ce qu’il est : Si est-ce toutefois
 Que par les mots douteux de sa prophete voix,
 Comme un Oracle antique il a de mainte année Predit la plus grand part de notre destinée.

be able to judge of this Fact, I shall put it in a true light. Lactantius, who relates it in the Narrative which we have given, says, it was the Sibyl of Cumæ who presented this Collection to Tarquin, and he has been follow'd by Pliny, Solinus, and Isidorus. Perhaps Lactantius had found it in Varro's Books of divine Things, whence he had taken his Account of the Sibyls; but other Authors barely affirm, that a Woman offer'd those Books to Tarquin, without saying it was the Sibyl herself. Servius, who agrees to this Fact, and appears to have examined it, says, it is not credible that the Sibyl of Cumæ, with all the length of Years they have given her, having been in the time of Æneas who consulted her, was also alive in the time of Tarquin; that is, five or six hundred Years after. Multæ Sibyllæ fuerunt, says he, quas omnes Varro in libris rerum divinarum commemorat, & requirit a qua sint Romana fata conscripta; & multi sequentes Virgilium, ab hac Cumana dicunt, quæ licet longæva dicatur, non tamen valde congruit, eam usque ad Tarquinii tempora durasse, cui libros Sibyllinos constat esse oblatos (1).

I might quote several other ancient Authors for the truth of the substance of this Story; but I content myself with the single Testimony of Pliny, who asserts it to be universally attested: Inter omnes vero convenit, Sibyllam ad Tarquinium Superbum tres libros attulisse; ex quibus igni duo cremati ab ipsa, tertius cum Capitolio Syllanis temporibus, &c (2). In this Passage there are only two Articles, in which we find Pliny differs from Lactantius, or if you will, from Varro: First, in saying the Books were presented not to Tarquin the elder, but to Tarquin the Proud; and then, that this Collection consisted, not of nine Books, but only of three, wherein Solinus his Copier agrees with him; Circumstances which are so far from destroying the Fact, that in my opinion, they serve but to confirm it.

Be that as it will, the Romans carefully kept this Collection, from the time of Tarquin to the burning of the Capitol, when it was consumed with that Edifice.

(1) In 6. Æn. (2) L. 13. c. 13.

In this long period of time, it was only consulted by the Priests, as we learn from Solinus (1): Cujus Librum ad Cornelium usque Syllam Pontifices nostri consulebant.

After this Accident, the Romans to repair their loss, sent, as Tacitus has it (2), into different Places, to Samos, to Troy, into Africk, Sicily, and among the Colonies settled in Italy, to collect all the Sibylline Verses could be found; and the Deputies brought back a great quantity of them. As no doubt there were many of them dubious, Priests were commissioned to make a judicious Choice of them. Post exustum civili bello Capitolium, quæsitis Samo, Ilio, Erythris, per Africam etiam, ac Siciliam, & Italicas Colonias Carminibus Sibyllæ; (una seu plures fuere) datoque Sacerdotibus negotio, quantum humanâ ope potuissent, discernere. Fenestella in Lactantius says only, that the Senate, after the Capitol was rebuilt, sent to Erythræa, P. Gabinius, M. Otacilius, and L. Valerius, to search for the Verses of the Sibyl of that Name, and that they had found in the hands of private Persons, about an hundred of them, which they brought to Rome.

Thus was the second Collection of Sibylline Verses made up; but I don't believe they had equal Faith in them as in the former. They had been in the possession it seems, of private Persons, who added or retrenched what they had a mind. There were none, according to Lactantius, but the Verses of the Cumæan Sibyl, that were carefully kept by the Romans: And these, none had access to see. The Quindecimviri were the only Persons who had permission to inspect and consult them. As to those of the other Sibyls, they were in every body's hands: Hæc omnia Sibyllarum carmina & fermentur & habentur, præter quam Cumææ, cujus Libri a Romanis occulantur, nec eos ab ullo, nisi a Quindecimviris inspicere fas habent. The Consequence of this was, that upon every Event, Predictions were propagated in Rome and through all Italy; and this abuse went so far, that Tiberius forbid the keeping of those private Collections, and order'd that they, in whose hands hands they were, should deliver them up to the Prætor : Simul commonefecit (Tiberius) quia multa vana sub nomine celebri vulgabantur, sanxisse Augustum, quem intra diem ad Prætorem urbanum deferrentur, neque habere privatim liceret (1).

(1) C. 8. (2) Annal. l. 6. c. 12.

To conclude, these Books were not writ upon Paper ; but upon Linen-cloth, that they might last the longer : 'Tis to this that Claudian alludes, in these Verses (2),

Quid meditentur aves ? quid carmine poscat

Fatidico custos Romani carbasus ævi ?

As also Symmachus, when he says ; Cumanos (Versus) iuncta texta sumpserunt.

There was a College of fifteen Persons founded, to be the Guardians of this Collection, whom they called the Quindecimviri of the Sibyls (a) : To them this Depositum was committed : By them it was to be consulted ; and so great was the Faith that was put in the Predictions it contain'd, that whenever they were to enter upon a War ; when Plague or Famine, or any epidemical Calamity infested either City or Country, hither they were sure to have recourse. It was a kind of standing Oracle, as often consulted by the Romans, as that of Delphos was by the Greeks and other Nations. We learn more particularly from Dionysius of Halicarnassus, on what Occasions they had recourse to the Sibylline Books, “ The Senate, says he, orders them “ to be consulted, upon the rise of any Sedition, upon “ the defeat of the Army, or when some Prodigies “ are observed, which presage a great Calamity, as there “ have been many such.” As to this last Article, it is confirmed by Varro (3) : Ad cujus (Sibyllæ) Libros tot annis post publicè solemus redire, cum desideramus quid faciendum sit nobis ex aliquo portento. And the Roman History furnishes us with several Examples, which prove that they consulted them upon like occasions.

B b 4

We

(1) Tacit. ibid. (2) De Bel. Ger. l. 8.

(a) They were at first only two, then ten, as has been said in explaining the Oracles.

(3) De Rē Rust. l. 1. c. 1.

We know not what was the fate of this Collection of Sibylline Verses ; for as to that which we have at present, consisting of eight Books, upon which Gallæus has made a learned Commentary, tho' it may possibly contain some of the ancient Predictions, yet all the Critics look upon it as a very dubious Composition, and likely to have been the Product of the pious Fraud of some more zealous than judicious Christians, who thought, by compiling it, to strengthen the Authority of the Christian Religion, and enable its Defenders to combat Paganism with more advantage : As if Truth stood in need of Forgery and Lyes, in order to its triumphing over Error. What puts the matter quite out of doubt, is, that we find in this indigested Collection, Predictions relating to the Mysteries of Christianity, clearer than they are in Isaiab and the other Prophets. There the very Name of Jesus Christ, and that of the Virgin Mary, occur in every Page. It speaks of the Mystery of Redemption, of our Saviour's Miracles, his Passion, his Death and Resurrection, the Creation of the World, the terrestrial Paradise, the Longevity of the Patriarchs, the Deluge. One of the Sibyls even vaunts, that she had been in the Ark with Noah. There mention is made of the Invention of Arts, and they who are said to have excelled in them, are the same with those whom Moses names ; with a thousand other particularities which are evidently drawn from the sacred Books : Insomuch that it is amazing to find Authors so blindly prepossess'd as to hold, that whatever this Collection contains was composed by the Sibyls. Would God have revealed to Pagans the Mysteries of our Religion, in a clearer manner than he had done to his own People, by the Mouth of his Prophets ?

I said, there were probably in this last Collection Verses taken from the two former ; but 'tis not easy to distinguish such as were borrowed thence from those which the Author has spun out of his own Brain. P. Petit, 'tis true, attempted to do it ; but to me, it appears, that this otherwise ingenious Author has, in this part of his Work, shew'd more Credulity than sound Criticism. He even seems so prepossessed in favour of his Sibyl, and allows her such a deep Insight into Futurity, that the Priestesses of Apollo, compared to her, was but a Learner (1). But what proves undeniably the difference between this Collection and the ancient one, is, that the Sibylline Verses, consulted at Rome, breath'd nothing but Idolatry, and the Worship of false Gods, and for the most part prescrib'd nothing but barbarous Sacrifices, and human Victims; whereas those we have now remaining, inculcate the Worship of the true God, and are mostly calculated to lead Men to Piety.

We are then to distinguish three Collections of Sibylline Verses; for I wave those that some private Persons might have. The first is that which was presented to Tarquinius, which contain'd only three Books. The second is that which was compil'd after the burning of the Capitol, consisting of several Shreds, which the Deputies we mentioned had brought back from their Travels; how many Books it contained is what we don't know. The third, in fine, is what we have in eight Books, wherein there is no doubt, but the Author has inserted several Predictions of the second, whether he took them from a Copy, or pick'd up such of them as were become publick; but he has added a vast number of others, which certainly were not the Composition of those Prophetesses.

If we credit Servius, the ancient Collection contain'd in all but a hundred Predictions. This Author upon these Verses of the sixth Book of the Æneid,

Excisum Euboicæ latus ingens rupis in antrum

Quò lati ducunt Aditus centum, Ostia centum,

Unde ruunt totidem voces, responsa Sibyllæ, makes this Remark: There were but a hundred Responses, or an hundred Predictions of the Sibyls, neither more nor less: Sane sciendum omnia Responsa Sibyllæ, plus minusve centum contineri sermonibus (a);

but

(1) See that Author's third Book.

(a) I have followed the Amendment of P. Petit, who suppresses the but 'tis probable, that this learned Commentator meant only in this place the Sibyl of Cumæ, to whom the Passage in Virgil relates. Laëtantius, who allowed ten Sibyls, as also Varro, attributes to each of them a Book of Predictions (1), tho' there is no way to distinguish to which of them each of those Books belong'd, except that of the Erythræan Sibyl, who had put her Name at the Head of the Book which contain'd hers: Et sunt singuli Libri, qui quia Sibyllæ nomine inscribuntur, suntque confusi, nec discerni ac suum cuique assignari potest, nisi Erythrææ quæ et nomen suum verum carmini inseruit. I know not whence Laëtantius had taken what he here says; but 'tis certain the Romans had but three of those Books; the Avarice of Tarquin having occasion'd the other six to be burn'd by her who presented them to him.

Before we close this Article, I reckon it will not be amiss to insert here some Predictions of the Sibyls: by these we may judge what account ought to be made of the Collection wherein they are contain'd: I shall make use of the Latin Translation. Hear how the Persian Sibyl, who calls herself the Daughter of Noah, speaks of the Deluge:

. *Siquidem cum dilueretur
Mundus aquis, cum vir solus probus exuperavit.
Quidam, quem per aquas vexit domus erula sylvis,
Et pecudes et aves, rursus impleretur ut orbis,
Ejus ego nurus, ejus item de sanguine nata.*

And she adds in another place;

*O ævi sexti stirps prima, ô gaudia magna!
Quod sortita fui, postquam discrimina mortis
Effugi, jactata meo cum conjuge multum, &c.*

But as this Sibyl is not very sure of what she says of herself, or rather as the Impostor, who puts Words in her mouth, had forgot himself in this place, she asserts elsewhere, that she had met with the Adventure of Lot's Daughters; and again in another place, she calls herself Christian:

Nos

the Particle Nos, to reconcile Servius with himself. Petr. Pet. de Sibylla, L. 3. c. 14.

(1) Div. Inst. L. 1. c. 6.

Nos igitur sancta Christi de stirpe creati Cælesti, nomen retinemus proximitatis.
As if there had really been Christians in the days of Noah or of Lot.

She whom they called the Libyan, speaks of the miraculous Birth of Jesus Christ, and of his Miracles in these Terms ;

Virgo hunc sancta dabit terris, gremioque fovebit.
.....
.....
.....
Ille quidem morbis pressos sanabit, et omnes Firmos restituet læsos, &c.

Wou'd you not think this was Isaiab, or one of the Evangelists speaking ? She of Delphos is as plain upon our Saviour's Conception and Nativity :

*Non tarde veniet, tacitâ sed mente tenendum
Hoc opus ; hoc memori semper qui corde reponet
Hujus pertendant cor gaudia magna Prophetæ
Eximii, qui Virgineâ conceptus ab alvo, Prodibit sine contactu maris, &c.*

Then forgetting that she speaks in the Character of a true Prophet, she resumes her Pagan Stile, and mentions her Gallantries with Apollo :

Quod fuerim Phæbo grata, ferens pretium.
The Cumean Sibyl, after having spoke of the Incarnation,

E cælo veniens mortales induit artus.
throws out at random several Predictions, which the Romans did her the honour to believe had a relation to their Empire.

Among the Predictions of the Erythræan Sibyl we find Acrostick Verses, the initial Letters of which form these words, Jesus-Christus, Dei-Filius, Salvator. Of her St. Augustin says to this purpose (1), “ The Ery- “ thræan Sibyl has prophesy'd of Jesus Christ in a very “ perspicuous manner : I had seen a Translation thereof,
“ but it was a very false one, when Flavianus the Pro-“ consul, a very knowing Man, shew'd me the original “ Greek

(1) De Civ. Dei, L. 18.

“ Greek, where was this Prediction in Acrostick Verses, “ each of which began with one of the Letters which “ make up these words, Ἰησὺς Χριστὸς Θεὸς υἱὸς Σωτὴρ.”

The Sibyl of Samos, after having spoke of God, in an equally sublime and orthodox Manner, says, there is none but he who is worthy to be ador'd.

Principium, finem, media omnia novit : ab ipso Omnia sunt : solus Deus est, neque est Deus alter.

.

.

.

*Illum igitur solum existentem colite Opificem mundi,
 Qui solus e sæculo, et in sæculum fuit, estque futurus.*

She of Cumæ in Ionia speaks of the Resurrection of Jesus Christ, of the End of the World, and of the general Conflagration ; then she foretels the Overthrow of Alexander's Empire, on whose Ruins the Power of the Romans was to be formed.

The Hellepontine prophesies of an Age under Jesus Christ as happy as the golden Age, so much sung by the Poets, and mentions the Eclipse that was to happen at his Death.

The Pbrygian foretels the Annunciation, and the Birth of Jesus Christ, miraculously conceived in the Womb of a Virgin, his Death, his Passion, his Resurrection ; and as if she had copied the Evangelists, she prophesies that he shall shew his Hands and his Feet to his Apostles.

*Tum Dominus linquet manes, lucemque reviset,
 Prima resurgendi lectis vestigia monstrans.
 Porro suis primum Dominus patefiet, eritque
 Corporeus, sicut fuit ante, manusque pedesque Ostendet, &c.*

To these Predictions so plain and clear, she subjoins others about Idolaters, whom she threatens with the Wrath of God, unless they abandon the Worship of Idols. She foresees the last Judgment, and Jesus Christ seated upon a Throne, coming to judge all Mankind. She does not even omit the Signs that are to usher usher in the Last Day, nor the Trumpet, which shall be heard in the four Corners of the World.

In fine, she of Tibur or Tivoli, speaks also of the Birth of Jesus Christ at Bethlehem; but if the Cumæan Sibyl foretold the Romans only a Train of Prosperity, she threatens Rome with the most grievous Calamities; and after having drawn an ugly Picture of that City, she thus denounces its approaching Ruin:

Nunc Deus æternus disperdet teque tuosque;

Nec super ulla tui in terra monumenta manebunt.

The Author of this Collection had conceal'd his Forgeries much better, if, instead of inserting so many Predictions, which God never revealed to Pagan Women, he had interspersed it with several of their Oracles, which are to be found in profane Authors; but it would seem he had not read them over so carefully as Gallæus, P. Petit, and others who have collected them. A single Example, which I am going to quote from Pausanias, will let us see how they were conceived; and at the same time in what manner they were apply'd to Events. “Philip, says that Author (1), “having given battel to Flaminius, was totally routed, “and obtain'd a Peace, but upon condition, that he “should evacuate all the Fortresses which he held in “Greece; nay, this Peace, tho' dear bought, was but “an empty Name, since, in effect, he became the “Slave of the Romans. Thus was fulfilled what had “been long before foretold by the Sibyl, inspired no “doubt from above, that the Macedonian Empire, “after having arrived to the highest pitch of Glory “under Philip the Son of Amyntas, should sink and “fall into ruin under another Philip; for the Oracle “which she delivered was conceived in these Terms: “Ye Macedonians, who value yourselves on being the “Subjects of Monarchs sprung from the ancient Kings of “Argos, know, that two of the Name of Philip shall “bring about your greatest Prosperity and Misfortune. “The first shall give Lords to mighty Cities and Nations; “the second, vanquish'd by a People come from the East “and

(1) Achaic. p. 412.

“ and West, shall involve you in irrecoverable Ruin, and “ subject you to everlasting Infamy. Accordingly, adds “ Pausanias, the Romans, by whom the Macedonian “ Empire was overthrown, were in the West of Eu- “ rope, and they were assisted by Attalus King of My- “ sia, and by the Mysians; who were the Eastern “ People (1).

’Tis easy to judge from this, and several other Examples which might be brought, that most of the Predictions of the Sibyls, which are still to be found in ancient Authors, had been made after the Event.

The Sibyls had likewise foretold several other Overthrows of Empires, Earthquakes, and other Calamities, which the Pagans believed to have happened conformably to their Predictions, as has been said. It would seem they had made particular mention of that great Earthquake, which shook the Island of Rhodes to its very Foundations, since the Author I have now cited, says upon this Occasion (2); That the Prediction of the Sibyl was fully accomplish’d.

ARTICLE V.

In what Manner the Sibyls deliver’d their Oracles, and what we are to think of the long Life that was attributed to them.

Gallæus, in his thirteenth Dissertation upon the Sibyls, explains at great length all the Manners in which Futurity may be revealed to Men. He quotes all the Passages of Scripture, where they are mentioned, and carefully examines in what sense the Devil may be said to foreknow and reveal it. I have no mind to follow him in Questions, which would carry me too far. It would be necessary first of all to prove, that the Sibyls gave true Predictions, and then to determine from whom they had their Revelations; each of those two Articles is clog’d with great difficulties.

Let us resume a little of what we said upon the Oracles, and apply it to the Sibyls. The Oracles were sometimes pronounced viva voce, as those of the Priests

(1) In Acha. Lib. 7. p. 412. Han.

(2) In Cor. p. 97.

Priestess of Delphos; the Sibyl of Cumæ in Italy sometimes delivered hers in the same manner, since Helenus tells Æneas, as he is advising him to consult her when he arriv'd in Italy, to intreat her not to write her Predictions upon Leaves of Trees, as she usually did; but to answer him in another manner, which Æneas literally obeys, when he comes to consult her:

. Foliis tantum ne carmina manda,
Ne turbata volent rapidis ludibria ventis;
Ipsa canas oro (1).

The Priests of Apollo, after remaining a while upon the Tripod, turn'd furious, and in the Transport with which she was actuated, pronounc'd her Oracles; the Sibyl was seized with the same Fury when she utter'd her Predictions.

. Sed pectus anhelum,
Et rabie fera corda tument, majorque videri,
Nec mortale sonans, afflata est numine quando
Jam propiore Dei (2).

Ovid represents her much in the same way:

. Tandemque Deo furibunda recepto,
Magna petis, dixit, &c. (3).

As there were Priests at Delphos, whose business it was to gather up what the Priests pronounced in her Fury, and put it in Verse; so 'tis probable, that they did much the same with the Responses of the Sibyl, since all those, which Antiquity has transmitted down to us, are likewise in Verse.

The Oracles were delivered in other different ways, either in a Dream, or by Letters under a Seal, &c. As to the other Sibyls, 'tis not known in what manner they delivered theirs. Virgil informs us only of the singular manner how the Sibyl of Cumæ was wont to declare hers. She wrote them upon the Leaves of a Tree, which she ranged in order at the Entrance to her Cave; and it requir'd one to be pretty nimble and expeditious, to gather up the Leaves in the same order as she left them. For if they happen'd to be discompos'd by the Wind, or any other Accident, all was lost; and

(1) Æn. L. 6. v. 74. (2) Ibid. v. 48. (3) Met. L. 14. v. 107.

384 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book IV,
and the Person was obliged to go away without expecting another Response.

. *Rupe sub imà
Fata canit, foliisque notas et nomina mandat.
Quaecunque in foliis descripsit carmina Virgo,
Digerit in numerum, atque antro seclusa relinquit.
Illa manent immota locis, neque ab ordine cedunt:
Verum eadem verso tenuis cum cardine ventus
Impulit, et teneras turbavit janua frondes,
Nunquam deinde cavo volitantia prendere saxo,
Nec revocare situs, aut jungere carmina curat.
Inconsulti abeunt, sedemque odere Sibyllæ (1).*

This manner of the Cumæan Sibyl's delivering her Oracles was by no means a Fiction of the Poet's; it was an ancient Tradition which we find in Varro. That learned Roman, according to Servius (2), says expressly in his Book of Divine Things, that this Sibyl wrote her Predictions on the Leaves of the Palm-tree. The same Servius likewise informs us, that she had three ways of delivering her Oracles, either by word of Mouth, or by Writing, or by Signs: Tribus modis futura prædicit; aut voce, aut scriptura, aut signis, id est quibusdam notis, ut in Obelisco Romano videmus; vel, ut alii dicunt, notis literarum, ut per aliquam literam, significet aliquid (3). It may be ask'd what this Author means by those Signs; but since he tells us himself they were Marks like those which are found upon the Obelisk that was at Rome, 'tis plain, that he has in his view that hieroglyphical Writing, in use among the Egyptians, and which was upon the Obelisk that had been carried from Egypt to Rome: as to which Pliny may be consulted (4).

In fine, nothing was more famous in Italy, than the Cave where this Sibyl had delivered her Oracles. Aristotle (5) mentions it as a Place of great Curiosity; and Virgil gives a magnificent Description of it. Religion had consecrated this Cave, and made a Temple of it, as shall be said in the following Article.

(1) Æn. L. 3. v. 444. (2) In 3 Æn. (3) Loc. cit. (4) L. 36. c. 8. & 9. (5) Adon.

I am not now to collect all that the Roman Historians and Poets say of this Sibyl; but I cannot pass in silence, what Ovid tells in his Metamorphoses, of her Amours with Apollo. That God, says he (1), falling in love with her, she promised to receive his Addresses, if he would grant her to live as many Years, as she had Grains of Sand in her hand: but after she had obtained her Request, she repaid the God with nothing but Ingratitude, and was punished in the Enjoyment of her vain Desire; for having forgot to ask, that her youthful Vigour might be continued through that length of Years, she lived till she became a Burden to herself, oppressed with old Age, and so emaciated, that she had nothing left but the Voice.

. Nullique videnda

Voce tamen noscar, vocem mihi fata relinquent.

'Tis easy to see, that this Fable is founded upon a double Tradition; the one, that they look'd upon Apollo to be the God, who had deepest Insight into Futurity, and who communicated the same to his Favourites, which accounts for their saying, he had been in love with this Sibyl, who was believ'd to be greatly endued with the prophetick Gift. And what accounts for the other part of the Fable is the general Persuasion that prevailed of the Sibyl's having lived to a very great Age. Virgil, in two Passages, calls her of Cumæ the aged Priestess, Longæva Sacerdos (2). Erasmus assures us, it was from this Longevity of the Sibyls, that the Proverb came, Sibyllâ vivacior (3); and Propertius says, in the second Book of his Elegies (4), Tho' you should live as many Ages as the Sibyl:

Et si Cumææ sæcula Vatis agas.

To the same purpose are usually quoted the Verses of an old Poet, who gives three Examples of Persons who were long-liv'd, viz. Hecuba, the Wife of Priam; Æthra, the Mother of Theseus; and the Sibyl.

Ovid tells us, that at the time when Æneas consulted her, she had already lived seven hundred

C c

Years,

(1) Met. L. 14. v. 130. (2) Æn. L. 6. (3) Adag.
(4) El. 2.

Years, and that she had three hundred more to live :

. *Namque mihi jam sæcula septem
Acta vides : superest, numeros ut pulveris æquem,
Ter centum messes, ter centum musta videre.*

Phlegon gives the same Account of the Erythræan Sibyl ; and she herself, in her Predictions, boasts of this Privilege.

These Testimonies for the Longevity of the Sibyls, induce me to make two Reflections. First, that 'tis easy to see they are nothing but Exaggerations of the Poets. That some of them lived as long as Hecuba and Ætbra, that is, fourscore or fourscore and ten Years, has nothing in it extraordinary ; but this is the most we can allow. Even Lucian, who gives a long Detail of Persons who were long-liv'd (1), makes no mention of the Sibyls ; which is a strong Presumption against the great Age which is assigned to them. But as poetical Fictions have always some Foundation, learned Authors will have it, that the Sibyl of Cumæ was said to have lived a thousand Years, only because she had foretold what was to befall the Romans in that space of time. The Transformation of that Sibyl into Voice, is nothing but an Emblem, which imports that her Oracles were to last for ever.

The second Reflection is, that in all appearance, the Sibyl of Cumæ was the same with that of Erythræa, who having quitted her native Country, came and settled in Italy. And indeed, if we credit Servius, the Amour, which we have just now taken from Ovid, concerns the Erythræan Sibyl. That Author speaking of Apollo's Amours with that Virgin, subjoins to what we have said of her, that the God granted her the long Life she sought, only upon condition she would abandon the Isle Erythræa, the Place of her Birth, to come and settle in Italy. Accordingly she came thither, and fixed her Residence near Cumæ, where she lived so long, till, quite spent with old Age, nothing remain'd of her but the Voice. Those of her own Country, says the

(1) In Macr.

the same Author, whether out of pity, or some other Motive, wrote her a Letter; but fearing, that she would not be able to read the Character then in use, and which must have been much alter'd since she had left their Island, they thought fit to use the oldest they knew, and to seal the Letter after the old fashion; but no sooner had she read it than she died.

We may add, that the Ancients give the same Account of the long Life of the Sibyls of Erythræ and Cumæ in Ionie, as we have now given of the Cumæan Sibyl in Italy; which made Gallæus inclined to believe that those three Sibyls were but one, who had passed her Life in the Island of Erythræa in Ionie, and at Cumæ in Italy, where she ended her days.

ARTICLE VII.

Of the Worship paid to the Sibyls.

The Pagans, especially the Romans, had the highest possible Veneration for the Oracles of the Sibyls, the Collection whereof they preserved in the Capitol, under a Guard of fifteen Priests, who consulted them upon important Occasions, as I have already said. We must add here, that their Veneration for the Sibyls themselves was no less than for their Oracles; and if they did not always look upon them to be Divinities, they at least reputed them of a middle Nature between Gods and Men. This is what one of the Sibyls said of herself, according to Pausanias (1). While she acknowledg'd, that after a Life of several Ages, she was to pay the Tribute which all Men owe to Death; at the same time she said, she was to be one day transform'd into that Face which appears in the Moon, as may be seen in Plutarch (2); as if before the Sibyls were, that Planet had not exhibited the same Appearance of a Face, which is thought to be there discern'd. Mythologists, ancient and modern, have trifled egregiously in making moral and physical Lectures upon this Metamorphosis of the Sibyls, and I hope it will not be expected I am to copy them. And indeed what reasonable Allegories can be imagin'd as a Foundation for a Fiction so frivolous ?

(1) In. Phoc.

(2) Opusc. de Facie Lunæ.

Such was the Idea the Ancients had of the Sibyls: In later times, they, at least some of them, had divine Honours paid them. P. Petit, in the Treatise we have mentioned, says, there is nothing in Antiquity to persuade us, that the Sibyls were worship'd as Divinities (1); but he is certainly in a mistake. Lactantius, who had read the Work of Varro, in which he speaks of the Sibyls, is positive that the Tiburtine was worship'd as a Goddess at Tibur: Tiburi cultam ut Deam juxta ripas amnis Anienis, cujus in gurgite simulacrum ejus inventum esse dicitur, tenens in manu librum (2). It would likewise seem, that the Worship which those of her own Country paid to her, was brought to Rome, since that learned Father of the Church subjoins immediately after those words now cited, Cujus sacra Senatus in Capitolium transtulit. The highest Mark of supreme Worship given to any one, was to consecrate Temples to him; now 'tis certain, that some of the Sibyls had Temples. St. Justin Martyr mentions that of the Sibyl of Cumæ in Italy, built over the very Cave where she had delivered her Oracles: and as he had the Curiosity to visit it when in Italy, he has given a very full Description of it. Virgil makes mention of this Temple; or rather he considers as a Temple the Grotto where the Sibyl delivered her Oracles, because in after-times there was one actually built there: Vocat alta in Templâ Sacerdos (3). We read in M. Spon's Travels (4), that near the Place, which the People of the Country give out to be the Cave of the Tiburtine Sibyl, are to be seen the Ruins of a small Temple, which is thought to have been consecrated to her. We may add farther, that the Inhabitants of Gergis, in the lesser Phrygia, had a custom of representing upon their Medals, the Sibyl who was born in that City, as being their great Divinity (5).

Another Proof of the Worship paid to the Sibyls, is that

(1) L. 2. c. 14. (2) Lact. de Fal. Rel. l. 1. c. 6. (3) Æn. L. 6.
(4) P. I. p. 57. (5) Alex. ab Alex. Gen. Dier. L. 4. c. 15.

that there were Statues erected to them, which were placed in the Temples ; those of which Gallæus has given us Prints, were even in the Church of Sienna, where probably they had been left at its Consecration. Now, if we would know what Honours were paid to Statues in the Temples, Arnobius will inform us : Cum per omnia supplices irent Tempia, cum Deorum ante ora prostrati, limina ipsa converrerent osculis (1) ; They prostrated themselves before the Statues of the Gods, and kissed the very Ground. We may add farther, that they would not touch the Book containing their Oracles, unless their Hands were cover'd ; which was the Practice in all the other religious Ceremonies (2).

These are the most positive Arguments we find for the Worship paid to the Sibyls. 'Tis true Gallæus (3) alledges others in confirmation of this Truth ; but there are many of them, which, in my opinion, are the farthest possible from being conclusive.

But however this be, it is probable, that a religious Worship was paid to the Sibyls in several Places, especially in the Places of their Nativity ; but I don't believe there are any other Proofs of it, than those which I have now pointed out.

In fine, to bring this Subject to a period, it only remains, that I briefly take notice of the Tomb and Epitaph of the Erythræan Sibyl, the most celebrated of all. As the Passage, where it is mentioned by Pausanias, contains some Particularities concerning this Sibyl, which are not to be met with elsewhere, I shall copy him, making use of the elegant Translation of M. *Gedoy*n. “ The Sibyl Herophile, says Pausanias (4), is “ later than she who was Daughter to Jupiter and “ Lamia, and yet she lived before the Siege of Troy ; “ for she prophesy'd, that Helen should be educated at “ Sparta, to be the Curse of Asia, and that upon her “ account all Greece should one day conspire the Ruin “ of Troy. The Inhabitants of Delos have Hymns in “ honour of Apollo, which they ascribe to this Woman. “ In these Verses, she gives herself out not only for

C c 3

“ Hera-

(1) Adv. Gen. L. 1. (2) See Gall. p. 267. (3) Gall. p. 267.
(4) In Phoc. p. 630.

“ Herophile, but for Diana too. Sometimes she makes “ herself the Wife, sometimes the Sister, and some“ times the Daughter of Apollo ; but then she speaks
 “ like one inspired, and as it were delirious : For else“ where she says she was born of an immortal Mother,
 “ one of the Nymphs of Ida, and a mortal Father ; I “ am, says she, the Daughter of an immortal Nymph,
 “ but of a mortal Father, a Native of Ida, that Coun- “ try where the Soil is so parch’d and light ; Marpeffus
 “ is the Birth-place of my Mother, and the River Ai- “ doneus. Accordingly about Mount Ida in Phrygia, “ there are to be seen at this day, the Ruins of Mar- “ peffus, where are still remaining about sixty Inhabi“ tants. Marpessus is about two hundred and forty “ Furlongs from Alexandria, a City of Troas. The “ Inhabitants of Alexandria say, Herophile was the “ Keeper of the Temple * to Apollo Smintheus, and “ that she had given an Interpretation of Hecuba’s
 “ Dream, whereof the Truth was justified by the E“ vent. This Sibyl passed a good part of her Life at “ Samos ; then she came to Claros, which belongs to “ the Colophonians ; then to Delos ; from that to Del- “ phos, where she deliver’d her Oracles from the Rock
 “ I have spoke of. She ended her days in Troas : her “ Tomb is still subsisting in the sacred Grove of Apollo “ Smintheus, with an Epitaph in elegiack Verse, en-“ grav’d on a Column, which is to this effect : I am
 “ that famous Sibyl, whom Apollo had for the Interpre- “ ter of his Oracles ; once an eloquent Virgin, now lying “ speechless underneath this Marble, and condemned to “ an eternal Silence : nevertheless by the Favour of the “ God, dead as I am, I enjoy the sweet Society of Mer- “ cury, and of the Nymphs my Companions. And in“ deed, nigh her Monument stands Mercury in a “ quadrangular Figure ; on the left, a Fountain of “ Water falls into a Bason, where Statues of Nymphs “ are to be seen. The Erythraeans are they of all the “ Greeks who claim this Sibyl with the greatest warmth.
 “ They vauntingly shew their Mount Corycus, and in
 “ this

“this Mountain a Cave, where they pretend Herophile “had her Birth. According to them, a Shepherd of “the Country, named Theodorus, was her Father, and “a Nymph her Mother. This Nymph was surnamed “Idæa, because every Place was then called Ida, which “was planted with a number of Trees. As for those “Verses, which speak of Marpessus and the River Ai- “doneus, as her native Country, the Erythræans strike
 “them out of the Poems of Herophile.”

I must not omit that the Veneration for the Sibylline Verses lasted a good while under the Reign of the Emperors ; but a part of the Senate having embraced Christianity, in the time of Theodosius, that superstitious Veneration began to be laid aside ; and at last Stilico, under the Reign of Honorius, caused them to be burned.

But so much now for these celebrated Virgins, whose Predictions were in vogue for so many Ages among the Pagans : let us pass to other means that were used for knowing the Will of the Gods, and that Futurity about which human Curiosity has always been most keenly exercised.

C H A P. III.

Of Divination.

MA N, always anxious about future Events, did not content himself with seeking to come at the Knowledge thereof by Oracles, and the Predictions of the Sibyls ; he attempted to make the Discovery by a thousand other ways, and invented several sorts of Divinations, and for these he even established Maxims and Rules, as if such frivolous Observations had been capable of being reduced to fixed and certain Rules.

Divination was defined, Rerum futurarum Scientia, and it was of several sorts, as shall be shewn as we go on. This Science is as ancient as Idolatry, and made a considerable part of the Pagan Theology. It was

392 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book IV.
even authorized by the Laws, particularly among the Romans.

Cicero, who has composed two Books, equally curious and elegant, upon Divination, examines first how far the thing is possible, and delivers three Opinions of the Philosophers on this Question. Some believed, that as soon as the Being of Gods was admitted, a Divination must likewise necessarily be admitted. Others held, that there might be Gods, and yet there be no Divination; and the last were persuaded, that the thing was possible, tho' there were even no Gods existing. 'Tis not worth while to reason upon these three Opinions: Religion informs us, that Futurity is not only hid from Man, unless God please to reveal it to him; but also that it is a criminal tempting of Providence to pry into it, and that all the Arts employed for that end, are as criminal as insignificant. Cicero himself, tho' immers'd in Pagan Darknesh, yet in the Work I have quoted, makes a jest of those Pieces of Superstition, and has turned them into ridicule; tho' his Brother had done all that lay in his power to support them.

This learned and ingenious Author divides Divination into artificial and natural. I am then of their opinion, says his Brother Quintus, who allow two sorts of Divination; the one wherein Art has a great share; and the other wherein it has none. 'Tis an Art in those who follow the ancient Observations; but it is not so in those, who, without having recourse to any Conjecture, founded upon previous Observations, foretel future Events by a kind of Agitation of the Mind, and by a Motion free and detach'd from all sorts of Reasonings, as is frequently their Case who deal in Dreams, and sometimes theirs who are actuated by a certain Fury, as Boeotian Bacchis, Epimenides of Crete, and the Erythræan Sibyl.

To prove the universality of the Practice of Divination, he says in another place: Now, is there any People who do not receive, either Divination by Art, as for instance, that which is drawn from inspecting the Entrails of Victims, from the Interpretation of Prodiges and Thunders,

Thunders, from the Use of Auspices, from the Practice of Lots and Astrological Predictions; or natural Divination, which is what they get by Dreams, and by Prophecy (a).

I have said enough of natural Divination, that is, of Dreams and enthusiastick Impulse, in the Chapter of Oracles, and in that of the Sibyls: As to the artificial, it was practised a hundred different ways. The sacred Scripture speaks of nine sorts of Divination: The first was by inspection of the Planets, Stars, and Clouds; of this we shall discourse in the Chapter of Astrology. The second, by means of Auguries. The third, by Witchcrafts. The fourth, by Charms. The fifth, by consulting Spirits; or, as Moses says, those who interrogated Python, or a familiar Spirit. The sixth, by Diviners, or Magicians, whom the same Moses calls Jedeoni. The seventh, by Necromancy, or by calling up the Dead. The eighth, by means of Staves or Rods, as may be seen in the Prophet Hosea (1): This sort of Divination may be called Rabdomancy; and Bolomancy, that which was perform'd by mingling Arrows: The Prophet Ezekiel mentions this, in relation to Nebuchadnezzar, as shall be said elsewhere. In fine, the ninth was by inspection of the Liver, and was term'd Hepatoscopia.

These nine sorts of Divination are very ancient, since most of 'em were in use even in the time of Moses: A world of others have been since invented, which it shall suffice to name. In the mean time we shall insist a little longer upon those which were practised by the Greeks and Romans, because they fall in with the History of their Religion, whereof they were a part.

The four most general kinds of Divination, were those in which they had recourse to some one of the four Elements, Water, Earth, Air, and Fire; whence these Divinations derived their Names (a). As

(a) Translation of Mr. l'Abbé Regnier des Marets.

(1) Hof. iv. 12.

(a) The Names of Pyromancy, Hydromancy, Geomancy, are compounded of the Greek Words, signifying Fire, Water, Earth, and so others; and of the Word μαντεια, which in the same Language signifies Divination,

As to the first, they made use either of Sea-Water, and then it was called Hydromancy, or Spring-Water, and it was named Pegomancy. This sort of Divination is very ancient, since we are told, it derives its Origin from the Persians, who communicated it to other Nations, and particularly to the Greeks, especially to Pythagoras, who, according to Varro, was very much addicted to it (1). The Ceremony was performed two ways, either by filling a Basin with Water, and suspending a Ring to a thread, which they held with one Finger, while he who perform'd the Operation pronounc'd certain Words, and according as the Ring struck against the sides of the Basin, he drew from it his Predictions ; or by conjuring up Spirits who appear'd at the bottom of the Basin ; and it was this second kind which Numa Pompilius practised.

Pegomancy, or Divination by Fountain-Water, was performed by throwing Lots, or a kind of Dice. They drew happy Presages when they went to the bottom ; but when they remain'd on the surface of the Water, it was a bad Omen. Rous (2) informs us, that there were other Methods besides of prognosticating by means of Water ; 1. By drinking the Water of certain Fountains, as that of Castalia in Bœotia, which had the Virtue of communicating that Gift. 2. By throwing Cakes into certain Fountains, as into that of Ino in Laconia ; for if they went to the bottom, it was a good Omen, but bad if they floated above, as we learn from Pausanias (3). The same Observations were also made by Letters, which they used to throw into the two Lakes of the Palici, as shall be said in the History of these Gods. 3. When the Image of the thing they wanted to see, appear'd in the Water, as they tell us it happen'd in the Fountain of Apollo Phryxus, in Achaia. 4. By throwing Glass-Vials into certain Waters, to know the issue of some Disease ; for 'tis alledg'd, that upon taking them out, a judgment could be made whether it was mortal, or if the Patient would recover.

5. By

(1) Aug. de Civ. Dei, l. 7. c. 53. (2) Arch. Att. (3) In Lac. p. 203.

5. By observing the motion of three Stones which were thrown into the Water: for which that Author may be consulted (1).

Pyromancy was performed by means of Fire, either by observing the sparkling of the Flame, or by the Light of a Lamp. For this purpose at Athens, they had always a Lamp burning in the Temple of Minerva Polias, constantly fed by Virgins, who regularly observed the motion of the Flame, the Aruspices observ'd it in like manner, as we shall take notice afterwards.

Another ancient kind of Pyromancy, was to fill Bladders with Urine, which they threw into the Fire; and by observing in what manner the Urine run out when the Bladder burst, they believed they could pre-sage future Events: As also by throwing Pitch into the Fire, and attending to the manner of its burning, taking particular notice of the Smoke, &c. Several ways were devised of divining by means of Fire, but I insist only upon those which made a part of Idolatry.

Geomancy was performed by employing Earth, as its Name sufficiently denotes. It consisted mostly in drawing Lines or Circles, by which they flatter'd themselves to be able to divine whatever they were desirous to be informed about; or in observing the Chinks and Crannies which naturally break out in the surface of the Earth, whence, said they, issued divine Exhalations, as we have said of the Cave of Delphos.

Divination by means of Air, was also perform'd in different manners, either by observing the Flight of Birds and the Cries of certain Animals, or by examining from what side Thunder broke, or upon occasional appearance of Meteors and Comets; but of these we shall speak in the Article of Auguries and Prodigies: In fine, from the inspection of the Clouds; and it was a Woman named Anthusa, who, in the time of the Emperor Leo, invented this sort of Divination, which, if we credit Photius, had never been thought of by any body before her.

There were besides, an infinity of other sorts of Divination,

(1) Arch. Att. l. 7. c. 7.

vination, which I shall only name, that I may come to those which were authorized by the Laws and by Religion. They gave the name Ornithomancy to that which they drew from the Flight or the chirping of Birds, Cledonismancy to that which they drew from the Voice. Cicero remarks on this occasion (1), that the Pythagoreans not only observ'd the Voice of the Gods, but of Men too; Pythagorici non solum voces Deorum observabant, sed & hominum. Divination by the Lines which appear in the Palm of the Hand, was denominated Chiromancy; and this sort of Divination has been most in vogue, and been of longest continuance.

That which was practised by means of Keys, was named Clidomancy; by a Sieve, Coscinomancy; by Meal, Alphitomancy; by means of certain Stones, Lithomancy; by one or more Rings, Dactyliomancy; by conjuring up the Dead, Psychomancy, or Sciomancy; by the Flame of a Lamp, Lychnomancy; by means of a Mirror, Catoptromancy; when waxen Figures were made use of therein, it was denominated Ceromancy; if it was perform'd with an Ax or Hatchet, Axinomancy; and when they had recourse to Numbers, Arithmomancy.

We meet with some other kinds of Divination in Cicero's Books; in the fourth Book of Wisdom, by Cardan; in Robert Fludd, and elsewhere: But possibly we have dwelt too long upon so vain and frivolous a Subject. As most of these Divinations made a part of the Science of the Augurs, Auspices, and Aruspices, whose Functions were authorized by the Laws of the Romans, and constituted a part of their Religion, we shall see in the subsequent Chapter, what use they made of them.

C H A P. IV.

Of the Auguria, Auspicia, and Aruspicia.

THE Augurium, to speak accurately, was taken from the Phenomena which appeared in the Skies; the Auspicium, from the Flight and Chirping of Birds; and the Aruspicium from the inspection

of

(1) De Div. l. 5.

of the Entrails of the Victims : The Augurs however, observ'd also the Chirping of Birds ; and hence the very Name Augur, is thought to be derived, ab avium garritu.

Be that as it will, the Augur's Art is very ancient, since it was in use in the time of Moses, who thus prohibits it, as well as every other sort of Divination : Cave ne imitari velis abominationes illarum gentium, nec inveniatur in te qui lustret filium tuum, aut filiam, ducens per ignem ; aut qui Ariolos sciscitetur, & observet somnia atque auguria, &c (1). 'Tis thought to have taken its rise among the Chaldeans, whence the Greeks, and then the Romans, came to the knowledge of it. The last had so great esteem and regard for this Science, that there was a Law of the twelve Tables, forbidding to disobey the Augurs, under pain of Death : Quæ Augur injusta, nefasta, vitiosa, dirave dixerit, irrita infestaque sunt : Quique non paruerit, capitale esto.

This Art was known in Italy before the time of Romulus, since that Prince did not set about the building of Rome till he had taken the Auguries. The Etrurians or Tuscans practis'd it in the earliest times, and had render'd themselves extremely expert in it since the time they had learn'd it from Tages. The Kings who were Romulus's Successors, not to suffer a Science to be lost which they thought so useful, and at the same time not to render it contemptible by becoming too familiar, fetch'd from Etruria the most skilful Augurs, to introduce the practice of it into the religious Ceremonies, and to teach it to their Citizens ; and from that time, they sent every Year into Tuscany some of the Youth of the best Families in Rome, to study it there, as I shall prove in the Sequel.

Romulus at first made up this College only of three Augurs, taken from the three Tribes which then comprehended all the Inhabitants of the City, and Servius added a fourth. None were qualify'd for being Members of this College, but such as were of a Patrician Family, and the Custom of admitting no others into it,

continued

(1) Deut. xviij. v. 9, 10.

continued till the Year of Rome CCCCLIV, under the Consulship of Q. Apuleius Pansa, and M. Valerius Corvinus, when the Tribunes of the People insisted on having Plebeians raised to the Augural Dignity; which after some struggle was granted to them, and five were chosen from among the People: Thus this College consisted of nine Persons till the time of Sylla, who added two more to it, as we learn from Livy and Florus; or fifteen, according to other Historians, who will have it, that under that Dictator the College of Augurs was composed of twenty-four Persons. The Head of this College was named Magister Augurum. The number of Augurs, however, was not limited to those who composed this College, since besides those who were in Commission, the Emperors had private ones for themselves, who lived at Court, and attended them wherever they went; and some of the Cities subject to the Romans had so many of them, that the College of Augurs at Lions, amounted to three hundred Persons.

In the earlier times, the Augurs were elected by the Assembly of the People, but afterwards only two of the eldest of each Curia had the Privilege to propose one from among those who had studied that Science; and after a serious examination, he was admitted or rejected by the College in a body: And this Custom continued to the Year of Rome DCLI, when Marius, dissatisfied that another should have been promoted to the Augural Dignity, which he had solicited, promulgated a Law (1), investing the People for the future with the Power of electing the Augurs, the Pontiffs, and the other Priests (2); but not long after, Sylla abrogated this Law, and restored to the Augurs the Right of Election, of which they had been divested through the Resentment of Marius. They did not enjoy it long; for Julius Cæsar, who aspired after the Dignity of High-Priest, which he despaired of attaining, but by the Faction of the People, prevail'd with the Tribune Titius Attius Labienus to re-establish the Domitian Law. There were likewise other Alterations made in
this

(1) The Domitian Law.

(2) Cic. de Leg. Agr.

this matter during the time of the Broils that harrassed the Commonwealth. But at length, Augustus, after having put an end to the civil Wars, reinstated the College of Augurs in their Right of Election; and thus it stood till the time that the Emperors reserv'd it to themselves.

Great Precautions were taken in the Election of Augurs; and none were qualify'd for being advanced to that Dignity, but Persons of a blameless Life, and free from all corporal Defects. And then his Character was sacred and indelible, nor could the Augurs be deposed on any account whatsoever. Their Functions were of very great Consideration, both with regard to Religion and the State. The Senate could not assemble, but in a place which they had consecrated. If in the time of an Assembly, either of the Senate or People, they observed any bad Omen, they had a Power to dissolve the Meeting, as also to invalidate the Election of Magistrates, who had been chosen under bad Auspices.

In fine, so high regard had they for the Augurs, and for their Declarations, that such as contemned their Persons, or made their Predictions the subject of their Raillery, were accounted impious and prophane. Accordingly, they construed as a Punishment from the Gods, the Overthrow of Claudius Pulcher, who ordered the sacred Chickens to be thrown into the Sea, because they had refused to eat what was set before them: If they won't eat, says he, they shall drink.

They enter'd upon no important Enterprize, no War, no Siege, without having first consulted the Augurs. If the Presages which they drew on these occasions, were favourable, Prospera, they made answer, Id aves addicunt, the Birds are for it: If they were bad, Adversa, Infausta, Piacularia, their answer was, Id aves abdicunt, the Birds are against it. When the Omens offer'd of themselves, they were called, Oblativa; and if they only appear'd when sought after, Impetrata.

The Auguries were taken in different manners, and always with particular Ceremonies. They were taken from the Flight of Birds, and three things were observ'd; the Augury, Augurium; the Auspice, Auspicium; and that particular Motion called, *Tripudium; from the Entrails of Animals, and this they called, the Extispicium: From Prodigies, as shall be said in a separate Article: From Meteors, and the Phenomena which appeared in the Heavens; and of all the ways of taking the Augury, this was the most authentick and certain, in regard that these sorts of Phenomena were seldom exhibited more than once, on one and the same Day. Accordingly, when the chief Augur had a mind to dissolve an Assembly, he had no more to do but to give publick intimation, that he had observ'd Signs in the Heavens, with this Formula; Alio die dixerit, He refers to another Day. But the Senate considering, that the Power of the Augurs was capable of authorizing numbers of Abuses, decreed that those Advertisements of theirs should not henceforth adjourn Assemblies that were legally convened.
from

Among the Signs in the Heavens which the Augurs observ'd, there were some that had no Meaning, and these they called Bruta, or Vana; others which declared a certain Event, were term'd Fatidica; of these last, such as appear'd while they were deliberating upon an Affair, had the name of Consiliaria Signa: Such as did not offer till the thing was determined, were called Auctoritativa, or confirming Signs. Of these again there were two kinds; Postularia, which obliged them to renew the Sacrifices; and Monitoria, which warn'd them of what was to be avoided.

All Days and Seasons were not equally proper for taking the Auguries, and therefore Metellus, as Plutarch reports, forbid them to be taken after the Month of August, because the Birds moult in that Season. As little were they allowed to be taken, immediately after the Ides of each Month, because the Moon then begins to wane, nor after Noon on any day whatsoever.

The

* When the Corn was thrown to the Chickens, if they fell greedily upon it, so that some of it drop'd out of their Mouths and rebounded from the ground, it was called Tripudium, or Tripudium Solistimum, than which no Omen was more auspicious.

The Place where the Augury was taken, was to be on an Eminence, and therefore, according to Servius, it was called Templum, Arx, Auguraculum, and the Field consecrated to that use, Ager effatus (1). When the Weather was calm and serene, (for the Augury was not allowed to be taken in any other State of the Air) and when all the other Ceremonies were perform'd, the Augur cloathed in his Robe call'd Læna or Trabea, and holding in his right hand the augural Staff, which resembled our Bishop's Crozier, sat down at the Entry to his Tent, survey'd all around, and after having mark'd out the Divisions of the Heavens with his Staff, and drawn one Line from East to West, and another from South to North, he offered up Sacrifice, and addressed this Prayer to Jupiter: Jovis Pater, si mihi es Auctor, Urbi, Populoque Romano Quiritium, hæc sanè sartèque esse, ut tu nunc mihi bene spon sis, beneque volueris. Father Jupiter, if thou art the Protector of Rome, and of the Roman People, grant me a favourable Augury. Or as Livy has it, upon occasion of the Election of Numa Pompilius: Jupiter Pater, si est fas hunc Numam Pompilius, cujus ego caput teneo, Regem Romæ esse, ut tua signa nobis certa & clara sint inter eos fines quos feci. Jupiter, if it is thy Will, that this Numa Pompilius, on whose Head I lay my hands, should be King of Rome, grant clear and unerring Signs within these Bounds which I have marked out. This Prayer being over, the Priest turned his Eyes to the right and left, and towards whatever Place the Birds took their flight, from thence to determine if the Augury was prosperous or unhappy.

As this Ceremony constituted a Part of the Religion of the Romans, it was attended to with high Veneration, and during the Sacrifice and Prayer, profound Silence was kept. If the Augury was favourable, he who had taken it came down from his place, and gave Intimation of it to the People in this form which we have already reported; The Birds approve it, or disapprove it. Though the Augury was favourable, they sometimes defer'd the Enterprize till

D d

(1) Serv. in Virgil.

402 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book IV.
till the Gods confirm'd it by a new Sign : This is what we learn from Virgil in these Verses ;

Da deinde auxilium, Pater, atque hæc omina firma ;
Jupiter be propitious to me, and confirm the Presages thou hast now given me.

Of all the Signs in the Heavens, which were observ'd in taking the Augury, the most unerring were Thunder and Lightnings; especially when it thunder'd in serene Weather. If the Thunder and Lightnings came from the left hand, it was a good Omen, and a bad one if they came from the right. Virgil, who has shewn his Skill in introducing into his Poems a great Part of the religious Customs of the Romans, says to this purpose (1) :

Audiit, & cæli Genitor de parte serenâ
Intonuit lævum, &c.

Donatus explaining this Verse, lets us know that the Reason why Thunder breaking on the left, was reputed a favourable Omen ; namely, that all Appearances on that hand proceeded from the right of the Gods :
Quia sacrificantis latus lævum, dextra est ejus qui postu-lata largitur. The Thunders, which passed from North to East, were reckoned auspicious.

The Winds were another Sign of the Heavens observ'd in Auguries, because they looked upon them as the Messengers of the Gods, who came to signify their Decrees to Men. Lutatius, the ancient Commentator upon Statius, explaining that Place where the Poet says, that the Inspection of the Winds, and of the Flight of Birds caused the War to be deferr'd,

. Ventisque aut alite visa
Bellorum proferre Diem, &c.

observes that the Augurs drew their Presages from the Winds : Solent Augures Ventorum flatibus futura cog- noscere ; but he lets us know nothing more particular upon this Subject. Thus we are at a loss to determine what Winds were favourable, and what were unlucky.

Farthermore, all that we have now been saying of the Auguries that were taken from Signs in the Heavens,
was

(1) Æn. L. 9. v. 630.

was equally practised in those which they took from the Flight of Birds: Their different manner in flying prognosticated good or bad Omens. If it was an unlucky Omen, it was called Sinistra or Funesta, or Arcula, that is, such as prohibited any Enterprize; Devia, to denote that the same Enterprize would be difficult to accomplish; Remora, when it ought to be delayed; Inebra, when the Augury seem'd to portend some obstacle in the way; and in fine, Alteræ, when a second Prefage destroy'd the first.

The Birds, whose Flight and Chirping they more exactly noticed, were the Eagle, the Vultur, the Kite, the Owl, the Raven and the Crow. Horace (1) says of the Raven:

Oscinem Corvum prece suscitabo Solis ab ortu.

And Virgil speaking of the Crow:

Sæpe sinistra cavâ prædixit ab ilicè Cornix.

But the most common way of taking the Augury, consisted in examining the manner how the sacred Chickens took the Corn that was offered them. They generally fetch'd these Chickens from the Island of Negropont or Eubæa, and they had them shut up in Coops. He who had the care of them was named Pullarius, as we learn from Cicero (2): so great was the Faith which the Romans had in the manner of their feeding, that they undertook nothing of Importance, without having previously taken this sort of Augury. Even Generals of Armies had them brought into their Camps; and consulted them before they gave battel. The Consul, after notice given to the Person who had the care of those Chickens, to make the necessary Preparations for taking the Auspice; threw down Grain to them himself: If they fell on with greediness*, the Omen was good; but if they refused to eat, spurning away the Corn with their Feet, and scattering it here and there, it was reckoned so unlucky, that they desisted from the Enterprize for which they consulted them.

D d 2

'Tis

(1) L. 3. Od. 27.

(2) De Div.

* There appears to be somewhat omitted in the Original; I have filled up the Sense from Rosinus Ant. L. 3. c. 10.

'Tis matter of just Surprize to find that so grave and wise a People as the Romans, had for whole Ages been addicted to such a childish Superstition, and made the greatest Enterprizes depend upon a Chicken's having or wanting an Appetite; but the Fact is nevertheless unquestionably true. Cicero indeed openly ridicules it, without appearing to have made it a serious Affair; but the times it seems were changed when he wrote his Books of Divination: it may be questioned, whether in another Age it would have been safe for him to rally the thing as he does.

Be that as it will, the Romans were so attach'd to the Auspices and Auguries, and had so great Faith in them, as to take them upon every Enterprize. After having used the antecedent Ceremonies prescrib'd by Religion, they always consulted a Person well versed in that sort of Science. We have their form of interrogating him whom they address'd still remaining: Quintus Fabius, favour me with your Assistance in taking the Auspice; tell me if all the usual Ceremonies have been punctually observ'd, and if there is nothing deficient in the Auspice. Quinte Fabi, te volo mihi in Auspicio esse; dicito si silentium esse videtur. To which the Answer was: There is nothing deficient in it; Silentium esse videtur.

The Aruspices were equally regarded at Rome with the Augurs. As their Functions consisted in examining the Entrails of the Victims, they were likewise named Extispices, a name compounded of two Latin words, Extæ, Entrails, and inspicere, to survey, to observe, as has been said in speaking of the Sacrifices. The Tuscans, of all the People of Italy, were most Masters of this Science, they having been taught it by Tages; and it was from their Country that the Romans brought those whom they employ'd, or at least chose them from among those whom they had sent thither to be instructed in it: for they sent every Year into Tuscany, as the Senate had ordained, six young Persons, according to Cicero, or ten, as Valerius Maximus has it, or twelve, as we are assured by other Authors, to be instructed in the Knowledge of the Aruspices, and other sorts of Divination. And for fear that this Science should be undervalued, by the Quality of the Persons who professed it, they chose these Youths from among the best Families in Rome : Tantum autem studium antiquis, non solum observandæ, sed etiam amplificandæ Religionis fuit, ut e florentissima & opulentissima Civitate decem principum filii Senatus-Consulto singulis Hetruriæ populis, percipiendæ sacrorum disciplinæ gratiâ, traderentur (1).

Andrew Glareanus reckons, that as the Tuscans were divided into twelve Nations, so we ought to read in Valerius Maximus, and in Cicero's second Book of Divination, twelve Youths, and not ten, as it is in Valerius Maximus, nor six, as Cicero makes it; being persuaded that the Text in both these Authors has been vitiated by some Transcriber. We said Tages was the first who taught the Tuscans the Science of the Aruspices, and that other sort of Divination, which the Latins call the Tuscan Divination; we are now to let you know who this Tages was. Cicero thus relates his History, or rather his Fable (2) : “ A Peasant, says
“ he, labouring in a Field, and his Plough-share go“ ing pretty deep into the Earth, turned up a Clod, “ whence sprung a Child, who taught him as well as “ the other Tuscans, the Principles of Divination.”

Ovid tells the same Fable in the 15th Book of his Metamorphoses (3):

Indigenæ dixere Tagen, qui primus Hetruscam Edocuit gentem casus aperire futuros.

As the manner of relating a Fact, may considerably alter its Circumstances without destroying it, I am persuaded, that the Fable I have now rehearsed has a true Foundation, and that it imports, either that Tages was of an obscure Birth, or that he was a Native of the Country, Autochthon; for it was those sorts of People they commonly gave out to be sprung from the Earth. However this may be, Tages grew expert in the Science of Divination, especially in that which consisted in exploring the Entrails; and he afterwards communicated it to the Tuscans, who likewise became great Proficients therein. He had even composed upon this Subject a Treatise, which was kept with peculiar care, and explained afterwards by Antistius Labeo, who divided it into fifteen Books.

D d 3 it

(1) Val. Max. L. 3. c. 11. (2) De Div. L. 2. (3) V. 558.

'Tis not known, whether Tages himself had invented this sort of Divination, or if he had learned it from Strangers who travelled into Tuscany in his time. This much at least we are assured of by several Authors, that it was known and practised in other Countries. The Greeks had it in the time of Tiresias and Cares; the first of whom, according to Pliny, invented the Auspice; and the second, the Augury. Clemens of Alexandria, who has preserved to us precious Fragments upon Antiquity, alledges that the Phrygians were the first of all the Nations in the World, who made Observations upon the Singing and Flight of Birds; and at the same time informs us, that they gave the name of Præpetes to those who made Observations by the Flight; and of Oscines, to those who studied their Chirping; which, by the way, may serve to make us understand the Verses of Horace, which I have quoted in this Chapter.

Other Authors again trace the Original of this Science higher up, and maintain, that it was in use in the earliest Ages in Chaldea, and in Egypt, whence the Greeks learned it, and for a long time put it in practice. Nay there were in Greece two Families, the Jamidae and the Clytidae, who were peculiarly set apart for the Functions which it prescrib'd. From Greece it passed into Etruria, and the Tuscans accomplished themselves therein, so as to become the most knowing of all the Aruspices, as has been already said. It must have been diffused thro' several Parts of Italy, even before the Foundation of Rome; since Romulus, in his new City, founded a College of three Auspices, chusing one from each Tribe.

The Aruspex drew his Presages from the Motions of the Victim which they led to sacrifice, from its Entrails, and from the Fire in which it was consumed. If the Victim
suffer'd

suffer'd itself to be led without any struggle ; if it gave no extraordinary Cries when it got the deadly Blow ; if it did not get loose from the Person's hands who led it ; all these were good Omens, and bad if the contrary happened. The Victim being struck down, its Belly was rip'd up, and its Entrails examined, especially the Liver, the Heart, the Spleen, the Kidneys, and the Tongue. Their Colour was particularly noticed, and accurate Observation made, if they appear'd withered, and if every Part was as it ought to be.

Before the Victim was opened, one of the Lobes of the Liver was allotted to those who offered the Sacrifice, and the other to the Enemies of the State. That which was found to be ruddy, and of a fresh Vermilion Colour, neither larger nor smaller than it ought to be, not blemished nor withered, prognosticated the greatest Prosperity to those for whom it was set apart ; that which was lean, livid, &c. presaged the worst of all Omens. Lucan, who has describ'd with a great deal of Elegance all the Operations of the Aruspices, has not omitted this Circumstance :

*The Liver wet with putrid Streams he spy'd,
And Veins that threatned on the hostile side ;
Part of the heaving Lungs is no where found,
And thinner Films the sever'd Entrails bound ;
No usual Motion stirs the panting Heart ;
The chinky Vessels ouze on ev'ry Part ;
The Cawl where wrapt the close Intestines lie,
Betrays its dark Recesses to the Eye.
One Prodigy superiour threaten'd still ;
The never-failing Harbinger of Ill :
Lo ! by the fibrous Liver's rising Head,
A second rival Prominence is spread, &c.*

Rowe's Lucan. B. i. v. 1057.

Next to the Liver, the Heart was the Part which they observed with most care. If it palpitated, was lean, and of a less size than ordinary, all these were bad Omens ; but if no Heart was found in the Victim, they drew from thence the most unhappy Presages. We are assured, that on the day of Cæsar's Assassination, this Part was wanting in two Victims which they had offered up. The same thing happen'd, say they, to Caius Marius in a Sacrifice which he offer'd at Utica in Africk, and to the Emperor Pertinax.

In like manner they did with the Spleen, the Gall, and the Lungs; nor was the Augury propitious unless these three Parts had much the same Qualities with those that were requisite in the Heart and Liver. If the Entrails drop'd from the hands of him who examined them; if they smelt rank; in fine, if they were livid, wither'd, or bloated, the Aruspex boded nothing from thence but Misfortunes.

After having scrupulously examined the Entrails of the Victim, they kindled the Fire and drew several Omens from its manner of burning. If the Flame was clear, if it mounted up without dividing, if it did not go out till the Victim was entirely consumed, this was an infallible Mark that the Sacrifice was acceptable. If on the contrary, they had difficulty in kindling the Fire; if the Flame divided; if, instead of fastening on the Victim, it only play'd around, or if it sunk downward, all these were bad Presages.

Again, the Aruspex drew his Prognosticks from the Wine used for the Libation. If it lost its Colour and Flavour, the Omen was unlucky. This, according to Virgil (1), is what happened to Dido, when offering a Sacrifice she perceived the Wine was chang'd into a blackish and corrupted Blood:

. Latices nigrescere sacros

Fusaque in obsecrum se vertere vina cruorem.

As also to Xerxes, who, according to Valerius Maximus, being at Supper the Evening before he laid siege to Sparta, saw, to his astonishment, the Wine that was served up for his Drink turn three times into Blood: Infusum namque Pateræ ejus vinum, in sanguinem nec semel, sed iterum & tertio conversum.

Such were the Presages drawn by the Augurs, the Auspices, and Aruspices: But as there were several others

(1) Æn. L. 4. v. 473.

others, which every private Man might observe, I shall speak of them in the following Chapter.

C H A P. V.

Of Presages and Prodigies.

MR. Simon, in a Dissertation, whereof a Copy is printed in the first Volume of the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres (1), reduces to seven kinds the Presages now to be under our Consideration.

1. Casual Words, which were again divided into two Classes ; those whose Author was unknown, which they called Divine Voices : Such was the Voice whereby the Romans were apprized, without knowing whence it proceeded, of the Approach of the Gauls, and to which they built a Temple, under the name of Aius Loquutus. These same articulate Sounds were called human Voices, when it was known who pronounced them. They used this sort of Presage, either by picking up the first Words they heard at coming out of the House, or by sending a Slave into the Street, to report the first Words which he heard. To this kind of Presage, we may refer what was taken from the Words pronounced by Children at play, which were interpreted either in a good or bad sense.

2. The Startings of some Parts of the Body, chiefly of the Eyes, the Eye-brows, and the Heart, formed the second kind of Presages. The Starting of the right Eye and of the Eye-brows, was a happy Omen ; that of the Heart, or its Palpitations, were a bad Omen ; and presaged, according to Melampus, the Treachery of a Friend. The Numbness of the little Finger, and the Starting of the Thumb of the left Hand, portended nothing favourable.

3. The Tingling of the Ear, and those imaginary Sounds, which were sometimes heard, were likewise bad Presages : Hence this ancient Epigram,

Garrula

*Garrula quid toties resonas mihi noctibus auris ?
Nescio quem dicis nunc meminisse mei.*

4. Sneezings in the Morning were by no means good Omens, but those in the Afternoon were.

5. Accidental Falls were always bad Omens, even those of Statues : Thus, those of Nero being found overturned one first Day of January, they foreboded from thence the approaching Death of that Prince. If at going abroad, a Person hit his Foot against the Threshold of the Door ; if by any straining, he broke the Strings of his Shoes ; or if at rising from his Seat he happen'd to be held by his Robe, all these were taken for bad Omens.

6. The accidental Rencounter of certain Persons, or certain Animals, presaged either good or bad. If they met in the Morning an Æthiopian, a Dwarf, an Eunuch, a Man deformed, they were sure to return quickly home, and stir no more abroad for that Day. The Rencounter of a Serpent, of a Wolf, a Fox, a Dog, a Cat ; the Squeak of a Mouse, &c. presaged nothing but bad luck. The Lion, the Ants, the Bees, were, on the contrary, of a happy Omen.

7. Again, there were Names of good or bad portent ; and they were very scrupulous in observing, that the first Soldiers they lifted, the Children who serv'd at the Sacrifices, those who perform'd the Dedication of a Temple, should have lucky Names ; and they had an aversion to those which imported any thing sad or disastrous.

Several other Presages might be added to those we have now recited : But what could we learn from a longer detail, but that the Superstition of the Pagans knew no bounds, since there was hardly any Action in life, especially among the Romans, for which they had not recourse to Presages ; none where they believed themselves at liberty to neglect them ? But that superstitious Attention was chiefly engaged in all the Ceremonies of Religion, in the publick Acts, which for that reason, were all usher'd in with this Preamble ; Quod felix, faustum, fortunatumque sit ; in Marriages, at the Birth of Children, in Travelling, in their Repasts, &c.

&c. But it was not enough to observe the Presages, it was necessary to accept of them when favourable, thank the Gods for them, beg of them their Accomplishment, and even supplicate them to send new ones in confirmation of the first; and in case they were bad, pray that they would divert their Effect: Quod Di prius Omen in ipsum convertant (1), says Sinon, in Virgil, speaking of Calchas.

The Romans had particular Gods whom they invoked, and to whom they sacrificed, when they wanted to have bad Omens diverted, and the Effect of them prevented; and these Gods were named Averrunci, or Averruncani, from the old Latin Word averruncare, which signify'd to ward off or divert. But independently of the aid of those Gods, they thought bad Presages could be redress'd by many other ways, since, in order to obviate the bad effect of an unlucky Expression or Object, it sufficed to spit hastily, as it were to throw out the Poison they had suck'd in. They were scrupulously careful, when they could not shun making use of unlucky Words, to soften the terms, and keep as far as possible from the shocking Idea which they naturally raised: Thus, instead of saying directly, a Man was dead, they said, he has liv'd, Vixit. At Athens they called a Prison, the House; the common Executioner, the publick Man; the Furies, Eumenides, or the good-natur'd Goddeses; and so of the rest.

The Prodigious.

Of all Presages, Prodigious were the worst, and those for which the Pagan Religion prescrib'd the greatest Ceremonies. When the Prodigy was followed by any dismal Event, they were always credulous enough to believe, that the one had been the Cause of the other, or at least sent to prognosticate the same. Titus Livius, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and other Historians, have taken care to insert into their Works the Prodigious, which the Annals they consulted, inform'd them to have fallen out at different times; and they have mark'd the

(1) Virg. Æn. l. 2. v. 190.

the calamitous Events which followed upon them, Pliny likewise reports a great number of them, as also Valerius Maximus; and Julius Obsequens has made up a Collection of them. I have no design to dwell long upon a Subject so known, and the Dissertation of M. Freret, printed in the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres (1), may save a good deal of reading upon this Subject.

All the Prodigies related of by the Ancients may be reduced to two Classes. In the first, we comprehend those Miracles of Paganism which seem inexplicable, unless we have recourse to a supernatural Cause. Such, among others, was the Story of the Dii Penates, or Household Gods, which is thus related by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (2). “While they were employed in carrying on the Works, there happen’d a surprizing Prodigy. The Temple and the Sanctuary being put in order to receive the Gods which Æneas had brought from Troy, and which he had placed at Lavinium, their Statues were transported into the new Temple; but the next day they were found in the very same Place, and upon the same Bases whence they had been taken the Evening before, tho’ the Gates had been shut during the night, nor was there any appearance of a Breach in the Walls: They were transported a second time from Lavinium in form, after a Sacrifice had been offered up to appease the offended Gods; but they were again found set down in the same Place at Lavinium.”

We may take into the same Class, that of Jupiter Terminalis, which there was no possibility of forcing from its place, at the time of building the Capitol: The Adventure of Accius Nævius, who cut, as they say, a Flint-Stone with a Razor, to convince the Incredulity of a King of Rome who slighted the Augurs, and the Tuscan Divination: That of the Vestal Virgin Æmilia, who drew Water in a Sieve: That of another Vestal, who with her Girdle drew to shore a Ship stranded, which the strongest Efforts of others were not able to move:

(1) T. 4. p. 411. (2) L. 1.

move: And that of another, who with the Lappet of her Gown kindled the sacred Fire, which her inadvertency had suffer'd to go out. To the Prodigies of this first kind we may join, the Apparition of those two young Knights, mounted on two white Horses, who were seen near the Lake Rhegillum, at the time when the Dictator Posthumius was upon the point of losing the Battle, and, having fought for the Romans till they had gain'd the Victory, disappear'd in a moment, while the General, who order'd strict search after them, that he might have rewarded their Valour, could never hear account of them more: The Adventure which Julius Obsequens relates (1) of that Statue of Juno, who being interrogated by a young Man, if she would go to Rome, gave a nod with the Head, to signify the Goddess's consenting to go; and not only so, but answered, that she would go with all her heart, to the great astonishment of all who were present at this Prodigy; Visne ire Roman, Juno? Posteaquam capite annuisset, se libenter ituram, magnâ omnium admiratione respondit: That of the two Oxen that spake: And in fine, that of the Shield which fell from Heaven, under the Reign of Numa Pompilius, as is told by the same Author; with several others which appear to be supernatural Effects.

The Prodigies of the second Class were indeed of the kind of purely natural Events, but being less frequent, and appearing to be contrary to the ordinary Course of Nature, were ascribed to a superiour Cause, thro' the Superstition and excessive Credulity of the Pagans, affrighted with the sight of these Effects, either rare or quite unknown. Such were most part of Meteors, as the *Parbelia, the Appearances of Fire and Lights by night, monstrous Births, whether of Men or Animals, Showers of Blood, of Stones, of Ashes or Fire, and a thousand other things purely natural, whereof I shall give some Examples, drawn from ancient Authors, and in particular from Julius Obsequens

Under

(1) C. 19.

* The Image of the Sun reflected on the Clouds when the Atmosphere is in a certain Disposition.

Under the Reign of Romulus, says this Author (1); and at a time when that Prince was besieging the Town of Fidenæ, there fell a Shower of Blood, and soon after, Rome was infested with the Plague. Under that of Tullus Hostilius (2), there fell from Heaven a prodigious quantity of Stones, much like a Shower of Hail. Under the Consulship of P. Posthumius Tubero, and of Menenius Agrippa, there were seen in the Heavens, during a considerable part of the Night, burning Arrows (3).

The same Author makes frequent mention of these same fiery Meteors appearing in the Heavens, like Armies encountering one another; as also Spectres and extraordinary Voices that had been heard by night.

The Lake of Alba, according to Livy, swell'd to a considerable height, without any preceding Rain, or other visible Cause; and that Incident so terrify'd the Romans, who were then employed in the Siege of Veia; that not having an opportunity to consult the Tuscans, with whom they were then at War, they were obliged to send to the Oracle of Delphos. Under the Consulship of M. Valerius Maximus, and of Q. Manilius Vitulus (4), Blood was seen rising out of the Earth, while a Shower of Milk fell from Heaven; and under that of C. Quintus Flaminius, and of P. Furio, a River appeared cover'd with Blood.

The other Prodigies reported by the Ancients, are pretty much of the same kind. To be short, they are either Statues of Gods struck with Thunder, or overspread with Blood; Earthquakes, or sudden Inundations: Here, a Child of two Months cries out, Triumph (5); there, the Heavens are all inflamed, and Nights illuminated by the Sun, or rather by a Globe of Light which resembles him; or else 'tis thick Darkness at Noon-day. Sometimes you have the Birth of a Monster, of an Infant, for instance, with two Heads and but one Hand; or who has the Shape of some brute Animal; a Stone of an enormous Size falling from Heaven; a Rainbow without Clouds, &c.

It

It would be no hard matter, if one was so disposed, to account for the Prodigies of this second kind, from natural Causes. All those nocturnal Fires, those inflamed Spears, those Armies appearing in the Heavens, are what we now call the Lumen Boreale, northern Lights, so common for some Years past, and perhaps as ancient as the World. Those extraordinary Inundations, whereof no visible Cause could be discern'd, might have been owing to some Fermentation which raised the Waters. Showers of Stones, of Ashes, or Fire, were the effect of some Vulcano, like those of Mount Ætna or Vesuvius. Those of Milk, a whitish Water condensed by some quality in the Air: No body questions now-a-days, but that those of Blood, are the Stains left upon Stones, upon the Earth, and upon Leaves of Trees, by Butterflies which hatch in hot and stormy Weather, M. de Peyresc had guessed at it an hundred Years ago, upon occasion of one of those Showers; having observed, that the same Stains were found in cover'd Places; and M. Reaumur, in his Memoirs for the History of Insects (1), has put the matter beyond doubt.

As to the Prodigies of the first kind, I own they are harder to be explain'd: But are they all well attested? Were they all seen and writ down by Persons of ability, at the very time when we are told they happen'd? Are they not mostly founded upon popular Traditions? May they not, some of them at least, be explained naturally, especially if we strip them of those marvellous Circumstances, with which excess of Credulity had cloathed them? We may say with the Author of the Dissertation now quoted, that those Facts, and all others that resemble them, are to be looked upon as Fables invented by corrupt Priests, and swallowed down by an ignorant superstitious Populace. The consent of People, says he, who believe all, tho' they have seen nothing, and who are always the Bubbles of Stories of that kind, can hardly have more weight to make us entertain them, than the Testimony of Pagan Priests, who

(1) Tom. II.

416 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book IV.
in every Age and Country, have had too strong Motives from Self-Interest, for improving those sorts of Miracles, to be Vouchers of great Credit.

Be that as it will, inexpressible was the Astonishment and Consternation of the Pagans, upon the apparition of one of those Prodigies, even of such as might easily have been accounted to be purely natural Effects. The whole Empire was in perplexity upon such an occasion, it was the only Subject of Conversation at Rome: The Senate gave orders to the Quindécimviri, to consult the Books of the Sibyls, for it was principally upon those occasions they had recourse to them, as I have already remark'd, after Varro, and they prescrib'd the Ceremonies of Expiation, whereof we shall speak in the following Chapter. If in the mean while, any Calamity happened to befall the Commonwealth; if an Enemy declared War against it; if it was overtaken with an epidemical Distemper, &c. All was imputed to the Influence of the Prodigy; it was this had come to denounce these Calamities.

Is it not surprizing, I must again repeat it, to see the Romans, of whom we have so high an Idea given us, who are extolled as the wisest and most intelligent People of the World; to see that Kingly People, as Virgil calls them, carry Superstition such a length as we have seen they did, chiefly with relation to Prodigies? But our Astonishment ceases, when we consider the weakness of Man, having no other Guides but his own light. It will perhaps be said, it was only the Vulgar who gave into those childish Superstitions, and that the more knowing People and the Philosophers, knew better things. The Religion however, which prescrib'd the particular Ceremonies on those Occasions, was the same for the People and for the Philosopher. Cicero himself, who in his Books of Divination had made a jest of most of the popular Superstitions, and who, in another place, expresses his wonder how two Augurs when they met, could refrain from laughing at one another, says, in the same Work, that the Aruspice ought to be respected, for the sake of the Religion

gion and Republick whereby it is authorized: Aruspicinam ego, Reipublicæ causa communisque Religionis, colendam censeo. But we shall examine more thoroughly, what Opinion we are to have of the Religion of the Pagan Sages, in the Reflexions upon Idolatry, which occur at the end of the next Book.

C H A P. VI.

Of Expiations.

EXpiation was an Act of Religion, instituted for purifying the Guilty, and the Places which were reckon'd defiled. Tho' this Ceremony, to speak accurately, was only to be used for Crimes, yet they put it in practice upon several other Occasions (a). Dread of publick Calamities, and hope of appeasing the incensed Gods, occasioned the Institution of several sorts of Expiations: Monsters, Prodigies, Presages, Auguries, all were subject to it; and the expiatory Sacrifices were renewed upon a thousand occasions, insomuch that there was hardly any Action in life, whether private or publick, but had need of them, or which was not either followed or usher'd in with the Ceremony of Expiation. Was a General to assume the Command of an Army; were Games or Festivals to be celebrated, an Assembly to be called, or was a Person to be initiated into any Mystery, they were sure to have recourse to expiatory Sacrifices. As to private Life, every Individual took care to purify himself, not only for the smallest Faults, but even upon occasion of every Object which Superstition taught to consider as of bad portent. Accordingly, these Words, which occur so often in the Writings of the Ancients, Expiare, Purgare, Februare, signify'd to perform Acts of Religion, either for blotting out some Fault, or for diverting impending Calamities.

Tho' in general, publick Expiations were accompany'd

(a) See the Copy of a Dissertation on this Subject, by M. l'Abbé de Boissy; Mem. of the Acad. of Bel. Let. T. 1. P. 41.

pany'd with Prayers and Sacrifices, yet there were of them more or less solemn, encumber'd with more or fewer Ceremonies, nor was it always the same Gods who were to be invoked. Those whom the Latins stiled Averrunci, were implored in order to avert the Evils which some Prodigy or Object of bad Omen had portended. They were free to make their Addresses to others, upon private Occasions, wherein they thought there was need of Expiation.

There were then several sorts of Expiations, and particular Ceremonies for each kind. I shall say but little of those used by every private Man, since it sufficed for him to wash himself, or to receive the holy Water when he was entring into the Temple; but I shall expatiate more fully upon those which Religion and the Laws had prescrib'd.

Expiations for Prodigia. One of the most solemn, was what they used upon the appearance of some Prodigy. The Senate, after having order'd the Sibylline Books to be consulted by those who had the keeping of them, to see what was to be done upon those occasions, ordinarily appointed Days of Fasting, Festivals, especially those of the Leßisternia, Games, publick Prayers, and Sacrifices. Then you might have seen the whole City of Rome, and in imitation of her, all the other Cities of the Empire, in Mourning and Consternation; the Temples adorn'd, the Leßisternia prepared in the publick Places, expiatory Sacrifices repeated over and over again. The Senators and Patricians, their Wives and their Children, with Garlands on their Heads; every Tribe, every Order, preceded by the High-Priest, and the Diunviri, march'd gravely thro' the Streets, and this Procession was accompany'd with the whole Youth, singing Hymns, or repeating Prayers, while the Priests were offering expiatory Sacrifices in the Temples, and invoking the Gods to divert the Calamities, with which they thought themselves threatned.

Expiation for Homicide. Anciently, but a few Ceremonies were required for the Expiation of Homicide; but in after times, a great many were added, and it became

came even exceedingly burdensome. All that was requisite at first for a Person's Purification from Murder, was to wash himself in running Water ; and thus it was, according to Athenæus (1), that Achilles was purify'd, after having killed Strambelus King of the Leleges. Aeneas, as he was leaving Troy, then in the Enemies hands, left to his Father the care of the Household-Gods, which he was going to take along with him, not daring to touch them with his polluted Hands (a), until he had purify'd himself in some River : Donec me flumine vivo abluero (2) ; a Punishment, if indeed it was one, abundantly gentle, for a Crime such as Homicide. Accordingly Ovid, after having mention'd several Heroes who had been purify'd in this manner, breaks forth into this Exclamation ; How credulous must they be, who believe that the Crime of Murder can be purg'd away at so easy a rate !

Ab ! nimium faciles, qui tristia crimina cædis

Fluminea tolli posse putatis aqua (3).

This sort of Expiation did not last long, since we see in the Heroick Ages, it was attended with more irksome and solemn Ceremonies : at that time, when the Offender was a Person of Distinction, even Kings themselves did not disdain to perform the Ceremony. Thus in Apollodorus, Copreus who had slain Iphifus, is expiated by Euristheus King of Mycenæ. Adrastus, according to the Testimony of Herodotus, came to receive Expiation from Cræsus King of Lydia. Frequently the Hero guilty of Manslaughter was even obliged to traverse several Countries, not lighting upon any body who would give him Expiation ; which was the Case of Hercules, who was expiated at length by Ceyx King of Trachinia.

No body has given a fuller Description of the Ceremonial of this sort of Expiation, than Apollonius of Rhodes, on occasion of the Murder of Abfyrtus, Medea's

E e 2

Brother,

(1) L. 2. c. 8.

(a) Tu Genitor, cape sacra manu, patriosque Penates ;

Me bello a tanto digressam, & cæde recenti

Attrectare nefas.

Virg. Æn. l. 2.

(2) Æn. l. 2.

(3) Fast. l. 2.

Brother, slain by Jason: That Prince, says he, being arrived with Medea in the Island of Æa, sent their Addresses to Circe, desiring her to perform the Ceremony of Expiation for them; and having obtain'd permission to come to the Palace of that Princess, they advanc'd both of them, with downcast Eyes, after the manner of Suppliants, till they came up to the Hearth, where Jason stuck into the Ground the Sword wherewith he had slain his Brother-in-law. Their Silence and Posture made Circe easily perceive that they were Fugitives, guilty of some Murder, and she prepared herself to expiate them. First, she caused a young Pig not yet weaned, to be brought, and having cut its Throat, she rubb'd the Hands of Jason and Medea with its Blood. Then she offer'd Libations in honour of Jupiter Expiator. After which, having ordered the Remains of the Sacrifice to be thrown out of the Hall, she burn'd upon the Altar, Cakes made of Flower, Salt and Water, and accompany'd these Ceremonies with Prayers proper to appease the wrath of the Furies, who commonly pursue the Guilty. The Ceremony ended, she caused her Guests to sit down upon magnificent Seats, where they were regaled.

The Romans had Ceremonies for expiation of Murder, different from those of the Greeks. We have a very authentick Example of them in Dionysius of Halicarnassus, who relates in what manner Horatius was expiated, after having kill'd his Sister. “ Sentence was “ given, says he (1), for the Father of the young Ho- “ ratius, and the Son was absolved from the Crime of “ Parricide: But the King, who did not think the “ Judgment of Men sufficient to absolve a Criminal, in “ a City which made profession of fearing the Gods, “ sent for the Pontifs, and would needs have them to “ appease the Gods and Genii, and the Offender to pass
 “ thro' all the Tryals that were in use, for expiating “ involuntary Crimes. The Pontifs therefore erected
 “ two Altars, the one to Juno, the Protectress of Sisters,
 “ the other to a certain God, or Genius of the Country,
 “ who

(1) L. 3. c. 22.

“ who has since bore the Name of the Curatii, whom “ Horatius had slain. Upon these Altars were offer'd “ several Sacrifices of Expiation, after which, the Cri“ minal was made to pass under the Yoke ; that is, “ under a cross Beam, supported by two other pieces of “ Timber,

The Ceremony of Expiation for Cities Expiation was one of the most solemn. In the Roman of Cities.
 Kalendar, there were Days mark'd out for this Ceremony (1): It was perform'd at Rome on the 5th of Fe- bruary. The Sacrifice which was there offer'd, was denominated, according to Servius, Suburbale, or Subur- bium, and the Victims there sacrificed, were called, as Festus has it, Amburbiales. Besides this Festival, there was another, which return'd but once in five Years, the Solemnity whereof was employ'd in purifying a whole City ; and from the word Lustrare, to expiate, the Name Lustrum came to denote, the space of five Years.

Important Occasions sometimes made it necessary to celebrate this Solemnity, out of the ordinary time, as was the Case, according to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, when the Tarquins were banished from Rome. If any particular place happen'd to be defiled, they took care to have it expiated ; and these sorts of Expiations had Names whereby they were design'd. That of the Crossways, for instance, was term'd Compitalia ; that of the Fields, Ambarvalia. The Greeks had particular Expiations for the Theatres, and for the Places where the People assembled.

Before and after a Battel, there was a Puri- Expiation fication of the Army, and that Ceremony was of Armies.
 termed Armilustrum ; a Word which was taken in after times, to express a Review of the Troops, as appears from several Passages of Cæsar's Commentaries ; just as that of Lustrum was taken for the Inrolment of the People ; but both these Ceremonies were always accompany'd with Sacrifices. The Festival of the Armi- lustrum

(1) See Rosinus's Rom. Kal.

lustrum was celebrated at Rome, on the fourteenth of the Kalends of November *.

To these publick Expiations, I might subjoin those which they used in order to be initiated into the greater and lesser Eleusinian Mysteries, into those of Mithras, into the Orgies, &c. But of these I shall speak in the History of Ceres, in that of the Persian Gods, and in that of Bacchus. It suffices to say here, that Fasting was often prescrib'd for Expiations of this sort; thus it is we are to understand Clemens of Alexandria, when he says, that those who were to be initiated, being interrogated by the Priests, answered, I have performed what is prescrib'd in order to the Mysteries, I have kept the Fast.

The publick Expiations were far from being equal in number to the private ones, since they used these in almost every Action of Life, as we have already remark'd: Thus, there were neither Nuptials nor Funerals, nor hardly any matter of consequence, that was not preceded by Expiation. Whatever was reputed of bad Portent; the Encounter of a Weasel; a Raven, or a Hare; an unexpected Storm, a Dream, and a thousand other Accidents, obliged the People to have recourse to the same Ceremony. But 'tis necessary to observe, that for these sort of private Expiations, there was not always a necessity, as in the publick ones, of offering Sacrifices, but a simple Ablution sufficed. The Sea-Water, however, when it could be had, was preferred to that of Rivers; and running Water to that which stagnated. Sometimes the Party was obliged to wash his whole Body, sometimes only his Hands or Ears. 'Tis from Euripides we learn this last Usage, when he makes Hippolitus say, that as he looked upon himself to be polluted for having been solicited to a Crime, so he must needs wash his Ears. Procopius of Gaza, speaking of the Expiations so much in use among the Jews, informs us that in general they made use of Water, Salt, Barley, Laurel, and Fire, which those were made to pass through, who were to be purify'd; and there is no doubt doubt but that the Pagans, in the Ceremonies of their Expiations, had imitated most of those which Moses had prescribed to the Jews, as is prov'd by learned Commentators on the sacred Books.

* The 19th of October.

Here I should subjoin what regards Oaths, Of Oaths. one of the most ancient and most solemn Acts of Religion, since it was a kind of Expiation, he who took the Oath, purging himself thereby from the Crime that was laid to his charge. But as this Subject has been handled by several Authors, whether Lawyers or Divines, I shall only refer the Reader to them, or rather to the two learned Dissertations of the late Abbé Massieu, printed in the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres (1).

There the Author examines, 1. Into the Origin of Oaths, which, he says, is near as ancient as the World, since they began as soon as Men became false and dishonest.

2. By what Divinities the Ancients swore; and he proves, that it was by almost all the Gods, especially by two, who were regarded as the Guarantees thereof, to wit, Good Faith, Bona Fides, and Deus Fidius. The Gods themselves swore by Styx, and this Oath was of all others the most inviolable (a).

3. The Ceremonies of the Oath; at first they were very simple, and no more was required but holding up the Hand, as is still the Practice at this Day. The Great introduced more Formality into it; Kings lifted up their Scepters, Generals of Armies their Spears or Shields, and the Soldiers their Swords, the Points of which some of them put to their Throats, as we learn from Marcellinus. In later times, it was required that the Oath should be taken in the Temples, the Party laying his Hand upon the Altar. Nay, if there was occasion for taking an Oath when no Temples were near, an Altar was raised in haste, or there were portable ones immediately set up. Frequently too it happen'd, that those

E c 4

(1) Tom. 1, and 4.

(a) See the Article of the infernal Rivers.

424 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book IV.
those who swore, dipt their Hands in the Blood of the sacrificed Victims.

4. What were the moral Sentiments of the Ancients about Oaths ; and they were such, that Perjury was looked upon as the greatest of Crimes. But more allowances were made for the Oaths of Orators, Poets, and Lovers, but then these were not taken in Courts of Justice. That fine Sentence of Pythagoras, *Honour the Gods, and revere an Oath, comprehends, according to the Commentators on that famous Philosopher, the purest, and at the same time, the most sublime Morality, with relation to this last Act of Religion.

5. The Use which the Ancients made of an Oath in civil Society ; and this was much the same as among our selves, that is, it was required of all who enter'd into any Office, or who were to intermeddle in any manner of way with the Government, and the publick Revenues. The General, when he assumed the Command of an Army ; the Soldier when he was list'd ; those who enter'd into the Priesthood, or into other Offices which depended upon it ; the Vestals, the Augurs, the Feciales, or those who were employed in Treaties of Peace ; all of them were obliged to take an Oath.

6. In fine, what Notion they had in those Days, of such as violated their Oath. And he finds that they were looked upon as the basest of all Mortals, since they had trampled upon all the sacred Ties of Religion, and endeavoured to put a Cheat upon the Gods, as well as upon Men.

C H A P. VII.

Of Magick.

AFTER having spoke of Divination, and other Means which the Pagans made use of for coming at the knowledge of future Events, I must needs say somewhat of Magick, which, of all the Excesses to which

* Αἰδούμενος μὲν πρὸς τοὺς Θεοὺς. Νομὸς ὡς διακινεῖται, τίμα, καὶ σέβας ἔρχεται. Pyth. Aur. Carm.

which a vain and criminal Curiosity has carry'd Men, was the greatest, and at the same time the most dangerous. How may we be justly amazed, on the one hand, to consider the Uselessness of so frivolous an Art; on the other, the Crimes in which it has involv'd the most civiliz'd and most knowing Nations, as well as the more rude and barbarous ones! It will not, I presume, be expected, that I should fully handle a Subject, on which we have perhaps but too many Works already. I shall speak of it, only so far as it had a relation to the Pagan Theology, and to the superstitious Practices of Idolatry.

The Ancients are not agreed as to the Time when, nor Country where Magick had its Original. But what does it avail to know, whether it was the Egyptians or Chaldeans, or other People, who were Inventors of an Art, as abominable as it is frivolous? What we may aver, is, that it is of very great antiquity, and perhaps as old as Idolatry itself. Scripture informs us, that the Egyptians practis'd it from the earliest Ages, when it makes mention of the Magicians whom Pharaoh oppos'd to Moses, and who imitated, by their Incantments, almost all the Miracles which God wrought, by means of that great Man. Among those Magicians, there were two whom St. Paul names Jannes and Jambres, whom Pliny had heard of; but he puts them and Moses, their great Adversary, in the same rank, and takes them for Jews as well as him: Est & alia Magices factio, a Mose, a Jamne, a Jopate Judæis pridem, sed multis millibus annorum post Zoroastrem. It is the same Zoroaster, in short, whom the Ancients believ'd to be the first Inventor of Magick: Rex Bactrianorum Zoroaster, says Justin after Trogus Pompeius, qui primus dicitur artes Magicas invenisse.

Magick is commonly distinguish'd into several kinds: The Natural, which is nothing but a deeper and more exact Insight into Physical Causes, than that of the ignorant Vulgar, whose way is, to take for Prodigies, Effects, of whose Cause they are ignorant, and for real Predictions what was foretold to happen by the natural Philosopher.

Philosopher. We are told, it was in this sort of Magick that Hermes Trismegistus of old, Zoroaster, and some others excell'd. The Indians, Chaldeans, Egyptians, and Persians, were also very much addicted to it; and in this Science, we are assured by Plato, that the Children of the Kings of Persia were educated.

The second kind of Magick is what they call Mathematical, which, joining certain subtle and ingenious Usages; to the pretended Influence of the Stars upon things here below, pretends to produce miraculous Effects. As this coincides with Astrology, of which we are to speak in the following Chapter, we shall insist no longer upon it: Only we may observe, that certain Machines well made, and some pieces of Clock-work, in times of Ignorance pass'd for effects of this Magick, and made those be taken for Magicians who had compos'd them. M. Bonami, in a Dissertation whereof a Copy is printed, in the 7th Volume of the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres, of which I shall make considerable use, in the Sequel of this Chapter, says, 'tis highly probable that the Egyptian Magick, so famous in the Writings of the Ancients, consisted in nothing but Discoveries drawn from the Mathematicks and natural Philosophy; since so many of the Greek Philosophers, who travell'd on purpose into Egypt, in order to be instructed in the Sciences of the Egyptians, such as Pythagoras, Empedocles, Democritus, Plato, not only brought back nothing but pieces of mere natural Knowledge, but did not even alledge that any other was there to be acquired.

But I am persuaded, that the Magicians of Egypt put in practice the most superstitious Rites, and this is the Idea of them given us by Moses. I shall not even name the other sorts of Magick, which are founded upon Usages as criminal as insignificant, and which lead those who are addicted to them into Excesses, which are shocking to think of. Thanks to Heaven, so vile a Science is now-a-days exploded; Men's eyes at length are open'd, to see the vanity of those Superstitions, and the folly of relying upon them; and if it is still practised by some of the rude and abject Multitude, yet sure it never was in less repute, than it is in our days.

Let us now come to that Magick which constituted one of the principal Doctrines of the Pagan Theology, than which none had more illustrious Partisans, especially among the Philosophers who lived in the first Ages of Christianity.

Magick may be defined, the Art of producing in Nature, things above the Power of Man, by the assistance of the Gods, upon using certain Words and Ceremonies. As the Magicians invoked two sorts of Divinities, the one benevolent, and the other malevolent and mischievous, this difference constitutes two sorts of Magick. The one, namely that which had recourse to the beneficent Gods, was called Theurgia *; the other, which had no other end but to do mischief, for which purpose it invoked only the malevolent Genii, was called Goétia †. The wisest of the Pagan World, and their greatest Philosophers, despised the latter, as much as they esteemed the former. This, namely Theurgy, was, according to them, a divine Art, which serv'd only to advance the Mind of Man to higher perfection, and render the Soul more pure; and they, who by means of this Magick had the happiness to arrive at what they call'd Autopsia, or Intuition, a state wherein they enjoy'd intimate Intercourse with the Gods, believ'd themselves invested with all their Power, and were persuaded that nothing to them was impossible.

Towards this state of Perfection all those aspired, who made profession of this sort of Magick; but then it laid them under severe Regulations. None could be Priest of this Order, but a Man of unblemish'd Morals, and all who joined with him in his Operations; were bound to strict Purity; they were not allowed to have any commerce with Women; to eat any kind of animal Food, nor to defile themselves by the touch of a dead Body. The Philosophers, and Persons of the greatest Virtue, thought it their honour to be initiated into the Mysteries of this sort of Magick. Their Goétia

* Θεουργία.† Γοητεία.

tia was quite different: Every thing render'd it equally odious and contemptible. The Professors of it had correspondence with none but the evil Genii, and employ'd their Operations only to do mischief. The Apparatus of their Ceremonies heighten'd the aversion which all sober People had to this Magick. The subterraneous Places were chosen preferably to others: The Darkness of the Night, the black Victims which they offer'd, the Bones of the Dead, the Corpses with which they were surrounded in the Caves; the Infants whose throats they cut, to rake into their Entrails for an insight into Futurity; all conspired to make it equally shocking and criminal.

Jamblicus, in his Treatise of Mysteries, insists at great length upon this Subject, and his Work supposes thro' the whole, this distinction between the Theurgia and Goetia, and of the first he seems to have a high esteem. What both of them had in common, is, that they equally employed Words, to which they believed a certain Virtue to be annexed. Sometimes the mere Charm of these Words wrought all the effect that was expected. Sometimes it was necessary to add to them Compositions of Herbs; there was always a necessity of observing exactly the time when the Sacrifices were offered, the Days, the Hours, the aspect of the Stars, the number and quality of the Victims. What puzzled them most, was to know what Divinities they were to invoke, what Offerings to present to them, what Plants, what Perfumes, were most agreeable to them. And indeed, the Dose, if too strong or too weak, render'd the whole magical Operation abortive, as well as the omission of a single Divinity. As one broken String disconcerts the Harmony of an Instrument; just so, Jamblicus remarks, one God, whose Name had been omitted, or in whose honour they had neglected, among the other Ingredients that were offer'd, the particular Perfume, Herb, or whatever else was specially consecrated to him, defeated the effect of the Sacrifice.

Pliny ridicules this Superstition with some Humour (1), when, after mentioning an Herb, the mere throwing of which into the midst of an Army, was sufficient, they said, to put it to the rout, he asks, "Where was this Herb when Rome was so distress'd by the Cimbri and Teutones? Why did not the Per- sians make use of it when Lucullus cut their Troops in pieces?" Then resuming his serious air, he expostulates with Scipio for having drawn together such quantities of Arms and warlike Engines, since one single Plant had been sufficient to open to him the Gates of Carthage.

(1) L. 26 c. 4.

As Paganism admitted a vast number of Gods, some of them beneficent, others malevolent; as each had his own particular Worship and Ceremonies appropriated to him; so none could obtain a favour from them, nor desired success in their Enterprizes, unless they were careful to observe the manner of worshipping them, as it was taught by Religion. This Principle laid down, 'tis easy to see that both the kinds of Magick above named had a plain Connection with their Theology, and that such as professed either of them, must needs have been excellent Pagan Theologues. This is what makes Pliny say, that Magick, the Offspring of Medicine, after having fortify'd itself with the help of Astrology, had borrow'd all its Splendor and Authority from Religion.

They who profess'd Theurgy, did not arrive all at once at that state of Perfection to which they aspired, and they were first to undergo Expiations; next, they got themselves initiated into the lesser Mysteries, which were as a Preparation for a more advanced State: They were obliged to fast and pray, to live in strict Continence and Self-purification: Then came the high Mysteries, where their sole Employment was to meditate, and contemplate universal Nature, who by that time disclosed all her Secrets to them who had passed thro' those Tryals. Nero, who was so foolish that he would needs command the Gods, which he thought there was no way of attaining but by Magick, had such a high esteem for the Magicians (1), that he sent for them from every every Quarter, and heap'd favours upon them. Tiridates, for his pains in providing him with them, was rewarded with the Crown of Armenia.

(1) Plin. l. 30. c. 12.

The Pagans were so fully persuaded of the Power of Magick, especially of the Theurgick kind, and of the Efficacy of Mysteries, that they believed those Prodigies of Valour perform'd by Hercules, Jason, Castor and Pollux, and other Heroes, were owing to their initiation into these Mysteries. Varro, the most learned of the Romans, was so convinced of the Force and Power of that Magick, that he did not doubt but what Homer relates of the Transformation of Ulysses's Companions into Hogs, was the effect of Circe's Inchantments. He judg'd the same way of what was given out concerning the Arcadians, who, according to the Story, as they were swimming over a Pond were transformed into Wolves, and recovered their former figure at the end of nine Years, if after abstaining from human Flesh during that time, they repass'd the same Pond.

I have observ'd, that in order to succeed in the Operations of Theurgy, it was necessary that nothing should be forgot in the Rites and Ceremonies which were prescrib'd in relation to it: Thus it also was with the Forms of Prayers and other Words that were of necessity to be pronounced; and tho' those Forms were often composed of words in a strange Language, which were not understood, it was necessary however to recite them, such as they were, without omitting one Syllable; as was said in speaking of the Evocations and Forms of Devoting (1). They were even so fully persuaded of the necessity of keeping exactly to the Ceremonial, that it was alledged, if Tullus Hostilius had consulted the Pontif set over the religious Rites, when he undertook to bring down Jupiter from Heaven, according to the Forms prescrib'd in the Ritual of Numa Pompilius, he had not been thunder-struck for an Omission in some Punctilio of the Sacrifice, which he offer'd for that end. This piece of History, to mention it by the way, informs us, that Numa, among the religious Ceremonies

he

(1) L. 3.

he taught, had prescribed those for Evocations, which were a consequence of Theurgick Magick.

Among these Evocations, the most solemn, and at the same time the most frequently practised, was that of conjuring up Souls departed. The Custom of raising the Manes was so ancient, that its Origin is traced as high as the earliest periods of time; and all the Anathemas denounc'd by the sacred Authors, against those who consulted familiar Spirits, are proofs of the Antiquity of this Practice. Among the different sorts of Magick which Moses prohibits, that of calling up the Dead is there expressly specify'd: Nec sit . . . qui quærat a Mortuis Veritatem. Every body knows the History of Saul, who went to consult the Witch of Endor, to call up the Ghost of Samuel (1). I shall not enter into the effect which this Conjuratation produc'd, nor shall I examine if it was really Samuel who appeared to that Prince, or if it was the Devil who deceived him under a borrow'd appearance, or in fine, if the Witch herself imposed upon him by some illusion. We know that the Fathers and ecclesiastick Writers are much divided in their Sentiments about it, and that there is nothing in Religion to determine us to follow the one Opinion rather than the other. I only take notice of the use of the thing, and this, 'tis certain, was as ancient, as it was universally practised.

The Evocation of the Manes.

Prophane Authors look upon Orpheus as the Inventor of this cursed Art, and so far indeed it is true, that the Hymns which are ascrib'd to him, are mostly real pieces of Conjuratation: But 'tis probable that this Practice came from the eastern People, and was carried into Greece with the other religious Ceremonies, by Colonies which came and settled there. Let this be as it will, it is certain that in Homer's time, this sort of Conjuratation was in practice, as appears from some Passages in the Iliad, where mention is made of it. Nor was it at that time reputed odious or criminal, since there were Persons who made publick profession of conjuring up Ghosts, and

(1) 1 Sam. xxviii. ver. 11, 12.

and there were Temples where the Ceremony of Conjuration was to be perform'd. Pausanias speaks of that which was in Thesprotia, where Orpheus came to call up the Soul of his Wife Eurydice (1). 'Tis this very Journey, and the motive which put him upon it, that made it be believ'd he went down to Hell. Ulysses's Travels into the Country of the Cimmerians, whither he went to consult the Ghost of Tiresias, which Homer so well describes in the Odyssæy (2), has all the air of such another Conjuratation ; and the same may be said of all the other pretended Journeys into Pluto's Kingdom.

But 'tis not only the Poets who speak of conjuring up Spirits ; History likewise furnishes examples thereof.
Periander, the Tyrant of Corinth, visited the Thespro- tians, to consult his Wife about something left with her in trust : And Historians tell us, that the Lacede- monians having starved Pausanias to death in the Temple of Pallas, and not being able to appease his Manes which tormented them without intermission, sent for the Magicians from Thessaly, who having brought up the Ghosts of his Enemies, they banished Pausanias's Ghost so effectually, that it was obliged to quit the Country.

I have no mind to display the horrid Rites that were practised by those who dealt in Necromancy, when they raised the Souls of the Dead : 'Tis enough that I have shew'd the Union and Connection, which this execrable Art had with the Pagan Religion which authorized it.

We shall conclude, by remarking that this Phrase, to call up Souls, is not accurate : For what the Magicians, and Priests appointed in the Temples of the Ma- nes called up, was neither Soul nor Body, but a sort of middle Substance, between Soul and Body, which the Greeks called εἰδωλον, the Latins, Simulachrum, Imago, Umbra *. When Patroclus prays Achilles to grant him the honours of Burial, 'tis that he might not be hindred
 from

(1) In Bæot. (2) L. 11.

* The English Reader may consult for this, Mr. Pope's Note upon Homer, Iliad 23. v. 92.

from passing the fatal River by the thin Phantoms of the Dead: It was neither Soul nor Body that went down to the infernal Regions, but these Phantoms. Accordingly, Ulysses sees the Phantom of Hercules in the Elysian Fields, while the Hero himself is in Heaven. But I shall explain this point of the Pagan Theology, when I come to speak of the infernal Regions.

C H A P. VIII.

Of Astrologers.

THE Ancients are not agreed as to the People who have a just claim to the Invention of Astrology. Herodotus says, it took its rise in Egypt; and 'tis agreed, that it was cultivated there from the earliest periods of time; but the name of Chaldaick Science, which it has always had, proves that it is in Chaldea we are to search for its Original: accordingly this is the Sentiment of Cicero (1). "As the Assyrians, says he, "inhabiting vast Plains, whence they have a full view "of the Heavens on every side, were the first who ob- "serv'd the course of the Stars, they too were the first "who taught Posterity the effects which were thought "to be owing to them; and of their Observations have "made a Science, whereby they pretend to be able to "foretel every one what is to befall him, and what "Fate is ordain'd for him from his Birth." A Passage in the Prophet Isaiab informs us, that this Art of Prediction by means of the Stars, was very ancient in Chaldea, and particularly at Babylon, the Capital thereof: Let now the Astrologers, says that Prophet, (2), making an Apostrophe to that idolatrous City, the Star-gazers, the monthly Prognosticators, stand up and save thee from those things that shall come upon thee.

We see then, judicial Astrology was known in Chaldea in the earliest Ages: This is all we can say for certain about the Origin of this Science. For how little ground should we gain did we know assuredly, as Suidas says,

F f

(1) De Div. l. 1.

(2) If. xlvii. 13.

says, that Zoroaster and Ostanes were the Inventors of it, since many Difficulties would still remain as to the Country of these two Personages, and still more as to the Time when they lived? Testimonies from Berosus and Eupolemus, cited by Eusebius (1), inform us indeed, that Abraham was well versed in the Knowledge of the Stars, and was Master of what was anciently called, the Chaldaick Science; but these two Authors have not distinguish'd Astronomy, to which that holy Patriarch perhaps applied himself, from judicial Astrology: For it frequently happen'd that these two Sciences were confounded, tho' the one is as solid and useful, as the other is vain and frivolous.

From Chaldea this Science passed into Egypt, where it was very much cultivated, as has been already remark'd; and from Egypt into Greece: this is the ordinary course which Sciences, Arts, and Fables took. The Greeks, vain and curious as they were, gave great Application to it; and we are told that Chilo the Lacedemonian, one of the seven wise Men of Greece, was the first who addicted himself to it. From Greece it was propagated to the other western Countries, where it made such progress, that never was any Science more universally diffused.

I am not to insist upon its Propagation, far less upon the different Rites which the Astrologers used, to come at the knowledge of Futurity by surveying the Stars: Nothing is so frivolous as the Principles they built upon. And indeed, what is that position of the Heavens which the Astrologer takes, to ground his Predictions upon? The ancient Astronomers had divided the Zodiack into twelve portions, and gave Names to the twelve Constellations, of which it was form'd; but they might have had other Names, as they actually had in other Planispheres. The Barbarick Sphere, says Firmicus, was entirely different from that of the Greeks and Romans; and that of the Chinese again was different from all the three. In the Greek Sphere, the Planets bore the Names of seven Divinities; the Ara- bians,

(1) Præp. Ev. l. 7.

bians, who would have thought themselves guilty of Idolatry, had they placed human Figures in the Heavens, put Animals or other things in their room; Peacocks, for example, in place of the Twins; a Sheaf, instead of the Virgin; a Quiver, instead of Sagittarius, &c. All this was quite arbitrary. How comes it then that the Astrologers judg'd of the Temper and Actions of Men from the Names of those Planets or Constellations, under whose aspect they were born? What ground had they for saying, that he who was born under the Sign of the Virgin, was chaste? That they at whose Birth Venus had presided, were galant and amorous? That Mercury inspired with Wit and Ingenuity; Saturn with Wisdom and Prudence; that the Moon made the good Sailors; Mars, the Warriors? &c. Had these Constellations and Planets the smallest Connection with the Symbols that represented them? And how came they to have the same Connection in Countries, where they were differently represented?

Farther, who can pretend to take the exact position of the Heavens, at the moment of any one's Birth; of those Heavens where the Scenes are continually shifting, and which are so immensely distant from us? But why attempt to refute those Absurdities? Numbers of others have done it before me, and the Triumph on this Subject is so easy, that there is but little honour in the Success. In short, is it not evident, so evident I mean, as to be able to strike the most opinionative and headstrong with Conviction, that those Bodies which roll in Spaces so remote from us, cannot so exactly direct their Influences, that is, the minute Corpuscles which fly off from them, (for there is no other way of conceiving their Action) as to meet with nothing to divert them from falling directly upon our Earth, which is but an invisible Point in respect of them, where it would take them many Years to arrive, even tho' they should move with the velocity of a Cannon-Bullet; upon a Kingdom, a Province, a Town, a House, and in particular, upon a Man, who occupies but a small Space in that same invisible point of Earth? How is it conceivable, even tho' these Corpuscles should come into the place where a Child is born, that they should be able to determine all the Actions of the Child's Life, with which they have certainly no manner of Connection ; to act upon his Thoughts, upon his Liberty, &c. ? What wild Extravagance then has embolden'd Men to advance, that these Influences acted so powerfully upon us, that they determined all our Actions, inclined us to good or evil ; that they formed our Tempers, our Inclinations, our Habits ? How could it be said in good earnest, that the Sign of the Ram presided over the Head ; the Bull over the Gullet ; the Twins, over the Breast ; the Scorpion, over the Entrails ; the Fishes over the Feet : That the Lion gave Strength ; that the different aspects of these Signs were the Causes of the good or bad Disposition of our Bodies ? That there was great need of caution, for example, in taking Medicine under the aspect of the Bull, because, as this Animal chews his cud, the Person would vomit it up ? With a thousand other Extravagances which I would be ashamed to repeat.

We shall end this Chapter and Book, with one Reflection. Would it then be for our Interest to see into this Futurity, which Men have strain'd so hard to know ? No, surely no ; 'tis with infinite Wisdom, that God has conceal'd it from us, as Horace says :

Prudens futuri temporis exitum

Caliginosa nocte premit Deus.

Nothing is more moving nor more elegant than what Cicero says upon this occasion (1). “ In what deep “ Melancholy had Priam spent the remainder of his “ Life, had he known the lamentable Fate that awaited “ him ? Would the three Consulships, the three Tri“ umphs of Pompey, have made him sensible of the “ smallest impression of Joy, had he been capable to “ foresee, what we ourselves are even unable to men“ tion without shedding a flood of Tears, that on a day, “ after the loss of a Battel, and the total defeat of his “ Army, he should be slain in the Desarts of Egypt ?
 “ And

(1) De Div. l. 2.

“ And what would Cæsar have thought, if he too had “ known, that in the midst of that very Senate, which “ he had fill'd with his Friends and Creatures, near “ the Statue of Pompey, in sight of his Guards,
 “ he should be stabb'd with Wounds from his best “ Friends, and his Body be abandon'd, not a Soul “ daring to approach it? 'Tis therefore more for our “ Interest and real Good, to remain in our present state “ of Ignorance, than to know the Evils which are to “ come upon us.” Certe igitur ignoratio futurorum malorum melior est, quam scientia.

B O O K V.

Of the Nature of the Gods ; of their Division into several Classes.

ALL that we have seen in the two foregoing Books, respects Idolatry in general, its Origin, its Advances. In the third, we have discoursed of the Worship which the Pagan World paid to their false Divinities ; of all that was subservient to that Worship, Temples, Altars, sacred Groves, Sacrifices, Priests, Victims, &c. In the fourth, we have run over all the sorts of Divination ; Oracles, Sibyls, Aruspices, Auguries, &c. It now remains that I examine, what was the Nature of those Gods, who for so many Ages were the Objects of Worship to the far greater part of the World ; who were those whom they looked upon as their Children ; and lastly, make a Division of them into different Classes. In this Book, after having reported the Opinions of the ancient Philosophers concerning the Divinity, I shall prove from the most considerable Testimonies of Antiquity, that notwithstanding their Refinements, they still believed that most of the Gods had been Men, subject to Death like their Votaries; and this Article of the Pagan Theology will, I hope, be undeniably proved.
 Ff 3 the

C H A P. I.

Of the Nature of the Gods.

TH E R E is nothing in the world about which the ancient Philosophers reasoned so much, as about the Nature of the Gods; but we are very imperfectly acquainted with their Systems; and had it not been for Diogenes Laertius, and Cicero, who have preserved to us the History of their Opinions, the one in the Lives of the Philosophers, the other in his three Books of the Nature of the Gods, we should have been entirely in the dark about them. 'Tis true, we ought to make a great distinction between these two Authors, the former being much less to be depended upon than the latter, who appears fully Master of his Subject: But as he has treated it like an Academick, we are often at a loss to find out what is his own Opinion. That learned Philosopher introduces in his Work three Philosophers of opposite Sects, an Epicurean, a Stoick, and an Academick, who dispute about the Nature of the Gods. As for the two first, each of them has a Creed of his own, and believes himself quite orthodox in exclusion of the other; but the Academick, who will yield to nothing but Evidence, stops them short by turns, discovers to them the fallacy of their Prejudices, and thinks himself secure against Error, only by affirming nothing positively on either side.

We see plainly that 'tis not in their Systems we are to look for a just Idea of the Divinity; and if ever they wandered in their vain Speculations, as the Apostle reproaches them, 'tis especially when they attempted to speak of the Gods. They even shook off the Yoke of the gross Idolatry of Greece and Rome, only to take up with vain Subtilties in its room, or the Systems which they devised were frequently even worse than Polytheism itself. And indeed, let us run over the whole of

Cicero

Cicero's Work; let us examine the Sentiments of the Philosophers which he has recited with so much Learning; we shall find that they who are the most orthodox, that is, they who suppose a Being independent on Matter, an infinite and eternal Intelligence, a first Mover who gives the World its present conspicuous Order; we shall find, I say, that they suppose at the same time the Eternity of that Matter, and that none of them either comprehended or allowed a Creation, as has been said already upon another occasion. This, upon impartial enquiry, will be found the amount of the Opinions of all the Philosophers.

We must farther observe, that the Philosophers studied the Nature of the Gods, only with a reference to things of Sense, the Origin and Formation whereof, they were curious to know; and instead of subjecting Physicks to Divinity, they only founded their Divinity upon Physicks. Thus, the different Manners in which they conceived the Arrangement of the Universe, made up their different Creeds about the Deity. For, let it be said with Thales, that Water is the Principle of all things, and that God is the Intelligence by whom the Universe was form'd of Water; it will be replied to him, that this Intelligence did not form the Water which itself made use of. If one alledged with Anaximander, that the Gods had a communicated Existence, that they are born, and die after long intervals, and that these are so many numberless Worlds; might it not be justly said to him with Cicero (1); How can he be allowed to be a God who is not eternal?

Let a Disciple of Anaximenes pretend that the Air is God, that he is produced, that he is immense and infinite, that he is always in motion: But how could the Air be God, would they say, since it has no Form, whereas God ought to have a Form, nay, a most beautiful Form? Besides, to say that he is produced, is to say that he is perishable. Anaxagoras, the Pupil of Anaximenes, was no doubt nearer the Truth, since he maintain'd that the System and Dispo-fiction of the Universe, were the effect of the Power and Wisdom of an infinite Being; but then that same wise and powerful Being had not made that Universe, which he disposed into such a beautiful Order.

(1) De Nat. Deor. l. 1.

If Pythagoras, as Cicero reports (1), believed that God was the Soul diffused thro' all the bounds of Nature, and he from whom human Souls were derived; besides, that this System is nothing but the pure Materialism of Strato and some others, how easy would it be to triumph with Cicero, in objecting to him, that if this was the case, God must needs suffer pain, that he would be torn and rent in pieces, when those Souls are detached from him? Now, a God is incapable of suffering. Besides, why is the Mind of Man ignorant of any thing, if it be God?

If Parmenides enters the lists to prove, that God is like to a Crown, a luminous uninterrupted Circle, which encompasses the Heavens: He will be ask'd, with Cicero, where he finds the divine Figure in that Circle, and how Thought can possibly be there? If the same Philosopher deifies War, Discord, Concupiscence, a thousand other things, which, instead of being immortal, Sickness or Sleep, Oblivion, or Time alone will destroy; may not such Hypotheses as these be justly treated after the manner of Visions and mere Chimæras?

If Democritus gives the title of God, both to the Images of Objects which strike our Senses, and to Nature, which furnishes, which conveys these Images, and to the Ideas with which they fill our Minds; when after this he asserts that nothing is eternal, because nothing continues eternally in the same state: Is not this, to use Cicero's Words, to destroy, and at once to demolish the Existence of the Gods, and all the Opinions which establish it?

“ As for Plato, says the same Author (2), it would “ take a long discourse to shew how he varies upon this “ Subject. In his Timæus, he says, the Father of this “ Universe cannot be named; and in his Books of the “ Laws,

(1) Loc. cit.

(2) Ibid.

“ Laws, that we ought not curiously to enquire what “ God is. When he holds that God is incorporeal, it “ is to make way for his Conclusion, that God is a “ Being absolutely incomprehensible, neither capable “ of Sensation, nor Wisdom, nor Pleasure ; Attributes “ essential to the Gods. He likewise says, both in the Ti- “ mæus, and in his Treatise of the Laws, that the World,
 “ the Heavens, the Stars, the Earth, the Souls of Men,
 “ the Divinities who teach us the Religion of our Fa“ thers, all these, he says, are God ; Opinions, conti“ nues the same Author, which, considered by them“ selves, are evidently false, and taken all together,
 “ are prodigiously inconsistent.”

Xenocrates again, says Cicero (1), who had the same Master with Aristotle, reasons no better than he upon this Subject, since he admits eight Gods, whereof the Planets make five : But I have said enough elsewhere of the Opinion of those who reckon'd the Stars in the number of the Gods. As for that of the Stoicks, who added illustrious Men to the number, I reserve it for the following Chapter. Nor shall I say any thing of the Opinions of the other Philosophers, since it is enough to know, that they are reducible to three Classes. The first is that of the Materialist-Philosophers, who believed that mere Matter, void of Sense and Reason, was capable of forming the World ; whether it was that one of the Elements produced all the rest, as Thales asserted of the Water ; or, that Matter being divided into an infinity of Atoms, these Atoms, by dancing fortuitously thro' the infinite Void, at length, by a happy Concourse, ranged themselves into regular Forms, as Epicurus dreamed.

The second is the Opinion of those more enlightned Philosophers, who rose to more sublime Conceptions, and from the beautiful Order of the Universe inferred, that it must needs be the effect of an intelligent Cause ; but not being able to comprehend a Substance not material, they believ'd Intelligence to be a Property of Matter ; and this Perfection they attributed to the ætherial

(1) Ibid.

ætherial Fire, or to the Fire of the more subtilized and more agitated Matter.

The third, in fine, is that of those Philosophers, who finding that Intelligence could not be material, concluded that it must be absolutely distinguished from all that is Body: But at the same time they believ'd, as has been already said, that Bodies existed independently on that Intelligence, whose Power was necessary to the animating and ranging them into order.

I shall add nothing here to what I have said elsewhere of those ancient Egyptian Philosophers, who under the Name of Cneph comprehended a first Being, from whose Mouth proceeded the primitive Egg, whence all other Beings were derived: Nor shall I dwell longer upon this Subject, which respects the History of Philosophy, rather than that of Religion. They who want to be more particularly instructed in the Opinions of the Philosophers, as to the Divinity, may consult, besides Niogenes Laertius and Cicero, the History of Philosophy by Stanley, and Cudworth's Intellectual System. Let us come to something more particularly relative to Mythology.

C H A P. II.

Wherein the Nature of the Pagan Gods is more particularly examined.

IT was not upon these vain Speculations that the Pagan Theology was form'd at first. On the contrary, it was only to polish and refine that gross System, that the Philosophers contriv'd so many different ones of their own. 'Tis of the Nature of the Gods, as they were really the Objects of the establish'd Pagan Worship, that I am to discourse; and there occurs an important Question to be previously examined. Had all these Gods been Men? or at least, had not some of them been so? I am persuaded that the examination of the second part of this Question, will be thought needless. Have we not always heard, have we not read in different Authors,

Authors, both ancient and modern, that illustrious Men had been raised to the Rank of Gods, had been honour'd with a publick Worship? We find some of the Learned, however, who, after having seriously examin'd the Opinions generally adopted, think them not always supported upon a solid Foundation; some I know, who hold that no example can be given of any Man, who was worshipped as a God. 'Tis therefore, on this second part of the Question that I am to enlarge most, and I hope to prove the thing undeniably; for as to the first, I don't believe there ever was any Author, either ancient or modern, who thought that all the Pagan Gods had been Men. Let us reflect on what I said, in discoursing of the Origin and Progress of Idolatry (1): There I shew'd, that Idolatry at first was far from being so monstrous as it came to be in After-ages; that the Idea of the first Being, the Creator of the Universe, having been insensibly defaced, they had first affix'd it to sensible Objects; that the heavenly Bodies, especially the Sun and Moon, whose resplendent Beauty made a more vigorous Impression upon the Minds of Men, and whose Influences seem'd to act more immediately upon them, had attracted the first Homage, and been the first Gods; that from the Adoration of the Stars, Mankind had passed on to that of the Elements, the Rivers, the Fountains, &c. and in a word, to the Worship of universal Nature. I add, that this was the Opinion of most of the Philosophers. Cicero, giving the Opinion of Chrysippus (2), says, he maintain'd that the Air was Jupiter, that the Sea was Neptune, the Earth Ceres, &c. Denique disputat Æthera esse eum, quem Homines Jovem appellant; quique aer per maria manaret, eum esse Neptunum; terramque eam esse, quæ Ceres diceretur; similique ratione percurrit vocabula reliquorum Deorum.

Zeno, according to Diogenes Laertius (3), had much the same Notions, since, according to that Chief of the Stoicks, it was the universal Soul of the World, who assumed different Names, according to the different

(1) L. III. (2) De Nat. Deor. l. 1. (3) In Zeno.

444 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book V,
 rent Relations of his Power: That it was called Dios, because it is the Spring of all Operations; Athene, because its Empire is in the Heavens; Hera, because it is the Mistress of the Universe; Vulcan, as presiding over the Fire; and Poseidon, in so far as its Power extends over the Waters.

Pliny speaking of the Divinity, says, that Men had divided it into several Parts, in order to worship these Parts separately, according to their various Exigences:
Fragilis & laboriosa Mortalitas in partes ita digessit, infirmittatis suæ memor, ut portionibus coleret quisque quo maxime indigeret (1).

What I have now said, gave rise to those divisions of the Gods into different Classes, as we shall see afterwards; especially into that of Natural Gods, who were the Stars and other Parts of the Universe; and of Animated Gods, that is, Men who had the honour of Deification conferred upon them. 'Tis therefore certain, that the Pagan World adored other Gods besides deify'd Men, who, as I have proved elsewhere, were only the last Objects of Idolatry, while the Stars were the first Deities of the Pagan World.

To come now to the second part of the Question, which I proposed to examine, I maintain that there were Men to whom divine Honours were really paid, and that the Greeks had hardly any other Gods but deify'd Men. I begin with the Testimony of Herodotus, because he is the Author, on whom the Learned before mentioned rely for the proof of their Allegation:
 Let us hear what that famous Historian says, speaking of the Persians (2). “ They have neither Statues nor “ Temples, nor Altars, and those who have them,
 “ they tax with Folly. What I take to be their Rea“ son, is, that they don't believe like the Greeks, that “ the Gods are of human Race.” Αγαλμάτα μὲν καὶ νηὲς καὶ βωμὰς οὐκ ἐν κόσμῳ ποιευμένους ἰδρύεσθαι, ἀλλὰ καὶ τοῖσι ποιεῦσι μωροῖν ἐπιφέρειν· ὥς μιν ἐμοί δοκεῖν ὅτι οὐκ ἀνθρωποφύεας ἐνόμισαν τὰς θεάς, κατὰπερ οἱ Ἕλληνες, εἶναι.

Herodotus therefore supposes, that the Greeks believ'd
 the

(1) L. 2. c. 7.

(2) L. 1. c. 131.

the Gods derived their Origin from Men, or, which comes to the same, that they had been Men. I shall not quote particular Passages from Diodorus Siculus, since, if I were to copy all the Places where he supposes that the Gods had been Men, I might transcribe the whole first Books of his History. It cannot be denied, that he has considered Saturn, Atlas, Jupiter, Apollo, Bacchus, and the rest, as the Gods, nay, as the primary Gods of Paganism, yet he speaks of them as of illustrious Men; he enters into the detail of their Actions and Conquests, and forgets not the History of their Birth and of their Death. In a word, all the Historians, Mythologists, and Poets, have delivered the same Sentiments with Diodorus, upon this Subject. No body will doubt but that Jupiter was the greatest Divinity of the Greeks and Romans; and yet we are told the History of his Birth, and the Stratagem which Rhea his Mother made use of to rescue him from the Cruelty of Saturn. They tell us of his Education, his Conquests, his Amours, his Offspring; in fine, of his Death, and of the Place where his Tomb was erected. The same account is given of the other Gods.

It may be objected, that Poets, at least such as Hesiod and Homer, ought not to be taken into the number of those whom I cite for proof of this Truth; but as they did not invent what they say of the Gods, as I have proved elsewhere, but only followed the establish'd Notions of their Times, they are to be looked upon as the first and most ancient Witnesses to this Tradition, that the Gods had been Men.

Tho' the Philosophers invented different Systems about the Divinity, as we have seen in the preceding Chapter, there were, however, considerable Sects among them, who embraced the Opinion of deify'd Men; as that of the Stoicks and Platonists, those at least, in the later times. Cicero, who in his second Book of the Nature of the Gods displays so ingeniously the Opinions of the former, says, they allowed an universal Soul, a Fire active, vital, intelligent, which animated all Nature; and that every Being wherein any singular Virtue was to be seen,

seen, or wherein this active Principle seem'd to manifest itself more conspicuously, deserv'd the name of Divinity : And by consequence, that this Title ought to be conferr'd upon great Men, in whose Soul that divine Fire shone forth with a brighter lustre.

Jamblicus, who labour'd so much to refine the prevailing System of Paganism, could not however but admit a Class of animated Gods, and deify'd Men, as we shall see in another Chapter. Here then are two Sects of Philosophers, who, conformably to the Poets and Historians, acknowledge the two Species of Gods I have mentioned, Gods Natural, and Gods Animated.

If from the Testimonies of Greeks, we pass to those of the Latin Authors, we shall find the Opinions I maintain, still more clearly established by their Authority. Varro, as St. Augustin has it (1), went a little too far, since he asserted, that one would be at a loss to find, in the Writings of the Ancients, Gods who had not been Men. Cicero, in like manner says, that in every period of time, it had been a Custom to rank among the Gods, those who had taught Men the use of proper Food, and other Necessaries for the preservation of human Life : Non solum hæc ætas, sed tota Posteritas, reperti alimenti gratiâ, repertores ut Deos omnium clarissimos honoravit (2) : A decisive Testimony, since it proves not only that Men were taken into the number of the Gods, but even of the Great Gods.

It would signify nothing to object to me, that Cicero is not there delivering his own Opinion, but only representing, in the first Book upon the Nature of the Gods, the Sentiments of the Philosophers, whom he afterwards refutes ; for besides that we don't find he has said any thing to the contrary, we may at least conclude from this Passage, that there were Philosophers who maintain'd that most of the Gods had been Men ; and this is all I am aiming to prove.

The Books of Labeo, which Servius speaks of (3), would be very proper, were they yet extant, to prove the

(1) De Civ. Dei, l. 8.
the third Æneid.

(2) De Nat. Deor. l. 1.

(3) Upon

the same Allegation: That Work was intitled, of the Animated Gods, De Diis quibus Origo Animalis est, and consequently supposed the distinction I have mention'd above, between natural Gods, such as the Stars, and Gods animated, such as Men, whom a kind of Consecration rais'd to the Order of Gods. Servius, who had read this Work, says so in express words: Labeo in Libris qui appellantur, de Diis quibus Origo Animalis est, ait esse quædam sacra, quibus Animæ humanæ vertuntur in Deos, qui appellantur Animales, quod de Animis fiant. Servius speaks for himself as well as Labeo, since, among the different Etymologies of the word Indiges, he gives this: vel certè Indigetes sunt Dii ex hominibus facti.

But it was not only the Greeks and Romans who had these Sentiments about the Gods; the Phenicians and Egyptians had the same Idea of them. Sanchoniathon, of whom I have spoke in the second Book, had in his Work compos'd the History of the ancient Princes, whose Merit had rais'd them to divine Honours; and who are thought by very learned Men to have been the Patriarchs themselves. Philo of Byblos his Translator observes, that Taautus had in like manner written the History of the ancient Gods, which Authors in succeeding Ages had turned into Allegory. Then he lays down a distinction, which sufficiently proves what I am endeavouring to establish. “The Ancients, says he, “had two sorts of Gods; the one were immortal, as “the Sun, the Moon, the Stars, and the Elements; “the other mortal, that is to say, the great Men, who “by the Merit of their glorious Actions, or by the Services they had done to Mankind, had been advanced “to divine Honours, and had, as well as they who “were by nature Immortal, Temples, Columns, a religious Worship, &c.”

The same Truth may be demonstrated from the sacred Books, which, by informing us that the Sacrifices of the Pagans were only Sacrifices to the Dead, suppose at the same time, that they to whom such Sacrifices were offered, had been Men. I might subjoin the Passage of the Book of Wisdom, wherein mention is made of a Father, who causes a Figure to be made, representing the Son whom he has lost, whom he honours as a God, and who became afterwards a publick Divinity ; but this I have already quoted in speaking of the Origin and Progress of Idolatry (1). In fine, we may oppose to those who stand out against all these Proofs, the Authority of the primitive Fathers of the Church, and of the Apologists for the Christian Religion ; Persons of Learning who have combated the Pagan System with so much advantage, and, to be sure, were better informed in the nature of it than we, who are too remote from the time when it was the predominant Religion, to be able to judge of it so well as they.

The strongest Objection which the Philosophers made to them, was, that the accounts which their Poets had given of the Gods, were only to be looked upon as Fictions hatch'd from their own Brain ; and that in truth, the publick Worship was ultimately directed to the immortal Beings and superiour Intelligences, who presided over and governed the World : As a Proof whereof, said they, Eubemerus (a) was universally reputed an Atheist, for having alledged that the Gods had been mortal Men. But our Apologists did not allow themselves to be dazzled with this specious Reply : They proved to those Philosophers that Allegory had come too late ; that it was a thing of their own Invention, which they employed only to refine a System equally monstrous and absurd. They shew'd them by an uninterrupted and generally receiv'd Tradition, that the first Race of Men who were rude and illiterate, were far from having made such Refinements in Religion, but had, in the sincerity of their Hearts, paid divine Homage to those, who had either taught them the necessary Arts of Life, or done them some other important Service. And to prove it with more success, they had recourse to the Testimonies of Varro, Cicero, and several other Ancients whom I have not quoted ; for this Article of the Pagan System is what they have most enlarged

(1) L. 3.

(a) See the following Chapter, where we speak of this Author.

enlarged upon, and proved with most Solidity. 'Tis then evident, according to these different Authors, that among the Pagan Gods, there were some who had been Men: But as Objections are raised against this Opinion, I shall propose and answer them in the following Chapter.

C H A P. III.

Wherein Answers are given to the Objections that may be raised against the Opinion, that several of the Pagan Gods had been Men; with new Proofs to confirm it.

THE first and perhaps the strongest of these Objections, is, that had it been generally believ'd that there were Gods who had been Men, Eubemerus would not have been looked upon as an Atheist, for maintaining that Opinion in the History which he publish'd upon that Subject, under the Title of Sacred History. Before we answer this Difficulty, 'tis proper to let the Reader know something of this Author and his Work.

The Ancients are not agreed as to the Place where Eubemerus was born; but without entering into critical Questions which would carry me too far from my Subject, and upon which, you may consult the Dissertation of Abbé Sevin (a), I hold to the Opinion of Polybius, who says, he was a Messenian by Birth. Cassander, King of Macedonia (b), whose Interest he espoused, heap'd Favours upon him, and gave him considerable Posts. It was by that Prince's Orders he undertook long Voyages, and in the relation he gives of one of these Voyages, he publish'd this History of the Gods, for which he was so much reproached. This Work, and the Latin Translation of it which was done by Ennius, are not now extant; and 'tis highly probable that

G g

the

(a) See the Mem. of the Acad. Bel. Let. Vol. 8.

(b) This is the second of Alexander's Successors; so that 'tis easy to know when Eubemerus lived.

the Copies of it were suppress'd as much as possible. Diodorus Siculus, who had read this Relation, spoke of it in the sixth Book of his History; but this Book, as we know, is lost. Eusebius (1) by good luck has preserv'd us a Fragment of it, and from him we quote the following Account of it.

“ Eubemerus being admitted into Cassander’s intimate “ Friendship, and for that reason obliged to execute “ Commissions of Trust from him in remote Countries, “ came, as we are told, to the southern Parts of Arabia, “ called the Happy. From thence setting sail upon
 “ the same Ocean (a), he made a pretty long Voyage, “ and landed in several Islands of that Sea. Among “ others he lighted on one which was called the Island “ Panchaia. All the Inhabitants of that Island lived “ in the practice of an extraordinary Piety, continually “ offered great Sacrifices to the Gods, and frequently “ brought Offerings of Gold and Silver into their “ Temples: The whole Island seem’d to be but one “ Temple. Eubemerus admired what he was told as “ to the Antiquity, and what he himself saw of the “ Magnificence of their Edifices There is espe“ cially on the top of a very high Hill, a Temple to “ Jupiter, called Triphilian: They alledge it was built “ by the God himself, when being as yet a mere Man,
 “ he reigned over the whole Earth.

“ In this Temple is a Column of Gold, upon which “ are engrav’d in the Panchaick Characters, the princi“ pal Actions of Uranus, Saturn, and Jupiter. There
 “ we are informed, that Uranus, the most ancient King
 “ of the World, had been a just and beneficent Man, “ perfectly well versed in the knowledge of the Stars,
 “ and the first who had offered Sacrifice to the Gods of “ Heaven; which was the Reason of his getting the “ name Uranus or Heaven. His Sons by Vesta his “ Wife, were Pan and Saturn, and his Daughters, “ Rhea and Ceres. Saturn reigned after Uranus, and “ having

(1) Præp. Evan. l. 2. c. 3.

(a) That is, upon the eastern Ocean, which washes the east side of Africa.

“ having married Rhea, had by her Jupiter, Juno, and “ Neptune. Jupiter succeeded to the Throne of his “ Father, married Juno, Ceres, and Themis; the first “ bore to him the Curetes, the second Proserpine, and “ the third Minerva. Having afterwards gone to Ba- “ bylon, he was entertained there by Belus: Thence he “ pass'd into the Island Panchaia, and there erected an “ Altar in honour of his Grandfather Uranus. In “ his return from that Island, he came into Syria, to “ the Court of Cæsius, who reign'd there at that time.
 “ Thence he came into Cilicia, where in a pitch'd “ Battel he vanquish'd Cilix, who was Sovereign of that “ Country. He travers'd other Places besides, and “ every where was honour'd and revered as a God.”

This is all that the Fragment cited by Eusebius contains; but Diodorus had before made mention in another place (1), of the same Island of Jupiter Triphilian, and of the Names of the Inhabitants of the Country: I give you here what he says of the Temple, the rest not belonging to my Subject.

“ This Temple is very stately, and wholly built of “ white Stones: The Length of it is about 200 Perches,
 “ and of a proportional Breadth. It stands upon Columns
 “ very massy, and extremely embellish'd by the Sculp“ tor. The Statues of the Gods, remarkable for their “ Largeness and immense Weight, are also Master“ pieces of Art.”

After some other Particulars, Diodorus says, the *Panchaia*ns shew Characters, which Jupiter, say they, had drawn with his own Hand when he laid the first Foundations of their Temple. He adds, that this Temple, situated about sixty Furlongs from Panara, the Capital of the Island, in a delightful Spot of Ground, watered with noble Springs, was full of Offerings of Gold and Silver, which in process of time had been prodigiously accumulated; that the Gates were wrought with Ornaments of Gold and Silver, with Ivory, and Wood of the Frankincense-Tree; that the Bed of the God was six Cubits long, and four in breadth; that it was of massy Gold, and of finished Workmanship; that the Table was no less magnificent, and near as large as the Bed by which it stood; that at a little distance from the Bed was erected a high Column of Gold, with an Inscription upon it, in what the Egyptians call sacred Characters, containing the History of Uranus, of Jupiter, Diana, and Apollo; the whole written with Mercury's own Hand (a). He says in another place, that the Panchaians were originally from the Island of Crete, whence Jupiter had conducted them into Panchaia, and ordered them to maintain Commerce with the Cretans their Ancestors.

(1) L. 5.

All the Ancients looked upon this Relation of Eubemerus as a Romance, forged out of his own Head, and the Author of it as an Atheist. The Island of Panchaia, according to Plutarch (1), is a Chimæra, and no Man, either Greek or Barbarian, ever saw it, any more than the pretended Temple of Jupiter Triphilian. Cicero examining this Question, is hardly more favourable to Eubemerus than Plutarch. “This Question, “says he, has been treated by Eubemerus, whom our “Ennius translated into Latin. He speaks of the “Death, and of the Tombs of the Gods: Was it his “Design to confirm Religion, or to subvert it?”

I take not upon me to defend either this Writer or his Relation, which carries all the Characters of a real Romance; but as to the Substance of the System, what was there then in it of so extraordinary or unheard of a nature, to deserve the Reproaches which were thrown upon its Author? Do not all the Poets, the more ancient ones especially, speak of the Gods as he does? Does not Hesiod give the same Genealogies of them? Does he not tell us that they were born and died one after

(a) Diodorus first said that the Panchaian Characters had been drawn by Jupiter himself, and this is likewise the Opinion of Eusebius and Lactantius, who probably had read either the Relation by Eubemerus himself, or Ennius's Translation: Then the same Author asserts, that they had been written by Mercury. We may reconcile these three Writers by saying, that as it was by Jupiter's Orders Mercury drew them upon the Column it is as if he had writ them himself.

(1) De Isid. & Osir.

after another? Has not Eubemerus shew'd more Discretion than Homer and the other Poets, since none of those shocking Stories of the Gods are related by him, which are to be found in their Works? In the preceding Chapter we have seen how many Authors, even of those whom we most regard, had debased the Gods to the rank of Men, or rather raised Men to the rank of Gods. Had not Cicero himself, from whom I have quoted a Passage directly to the purpose, the same Sentiments with Eubemerus? Does he not say, (which is an additional Proof of his Opinion) that Heaven is almost wholly peopled with Mankind, and that they who have the Name of Gods had been Men? Quod totum prope Cælum, nonne genere humano completum est? Illi qui majorum gentium Dii habentur, hinc a nobis profecti reperiuntur (1).

Diodorus Siculus is so far from taxing Eubemerus with Impiety, that on the contrary he makes use of his Authority to prove the Opinion which I maintain. “The “Ancients, says he, have transmitted to Posterity a “Distinction of Gods into two Classes. The one, ac“cording to them, are eternal and immortal, as the “Sun, the Moon, and other Luminaries: They join
“with them the Winds, and all Beings which partake “of their Nature. These they believe have been from “Eternity, and that they are to continue to Eternity.
“The Gods of the second Class were born upon the “Earth, and arrived at the Titles and Honours of Divi“nity, only for the Blessings they conferred upon Men:
“Such are Hercules, Bacchus, Aristæus, and the like.
“The Historians on the one hand, and the Mytholo“gists on the other, give us very different Accounts
“of these terrestrial Gods. The Historian Eubemerus,
“for example, &c.”

It cannot be objected that this was only Diodorus's own private Opinion, since he himself says, it was the Opinion of all the Ancients; and after having cited for proof of it, the Authority of Eubemerus, as we have now seen, he subjoins: “We might satisfy ourselves

(1) De Nat. Deor. l. 1.

“ with this Passage of Eubemerus, taken from his sacred History ; but to gratify those who are curious to know what Opinion the Greek Mythologists had of these Gods of theirs, I shall set before you what we find in Hesiod, Homer, and Orpheus.” The rest of the Book, wherein he had examined what these ancient Poets said of the Gods, is lost ; but as we have the Works of two of these Poets, ’tis easy to see what Accounts they there give of the Gods : To be sure they speak of them with less Decency than Eubemerus.

But why was he then reputed an Atheist ? We might answer, in the first place, that at the time when his sacred History appear’d, the face of Religion was quite changed. The Pythagoreans and Platonists, justly shocked with the gross Ideas which the first Greek Poets had given of the Gods, labour’d to turn them into such Allegories as might diminish their Absurdity, as has been said elsewhere. Not being able to hear the Birth of the Gods continually sounding in their ears, that pretended Birth, they said, was nothing but the Introduction of their Worship into the Country where the Poets asserted they were born. The extravagant and ridiculous Idea of a Saturn who devours his own Children, was nothing, according to them, but the Emblem of all-consuming Time. The other poetical Fictions, they explained much in the same way. In this Interval appears an Author, who says, he had seen in an Island an Inscription engrav’d in very ancient Characters, containing the History of the Gods ; which speaks of their Birth, their Conquests, and their Death ; consequently he seems design’d to renew, or rather to confirm by so authentick a Proof, the exploded Opinions of the ancient Poets : Is there then any wonder that they looked upon him as Impious and Atheistical ? Will not this be always the Fate of every Man who attempts to destroy an establish’d Religion ?

This Answer, however specious it is, not being entirely satisfactory, since in fact neither Diodorus Siculus, nor the Authors whom I quoted in the preceding Chapter, incurred the same Censure as Eubemerus, tho’ they were posterior to him, and in the main have said the same thing with him in relation to the deify'd Men: So that I am persuaded there were some Doctrines of a pernicious tendency, artfully wrought into Euhemerus's Relation. Perhaps he had rejected the Gods of the first kind, the Stars, and those Intelligences, who, according to the Philosophers whom we just now mentioned, conducted them, and were reckoned to govern the World; and having reduced all the Gods to illustrious Men, whom it was easy to see at bottom not to be true Gods, since they were born and died like other Men, whereas the Gods ought to be eternal and immortal in their Nature, he thereby sap'd the whole Foundations of Religion. And this undoubtedly was what made him pass for an Atheist: For had he admitted these Deities of the first Class, and barely recited the History of those of the second, that is to say, of the animated Gods, such as it is in the Fragment we have now remaining, he had said nothing but what may be found in the Poets and Historians who have given the Genealogy of these same Deities, and have spoke of their Birth, their Actions, their Death, and their sepulchral Monuments.

It may be objected to me in the second place, that Herodotus (1) makes a Distinction between the Worship which was paid to the Gods, and that which was paid to the Heroes, that is, to deify'd Men. Sacrifices, says that Author, were offered to Hercules the Son of Alcmena, as to a Hero; but to Olympian Hercules, who was one of the great Divinities of Egypt, as to a Being of an immortal Nature. To this Authority might be join'd that of Pausanias, who says (2), Honours, such as belong'd to Heroes, were paid to Alexanor, but divine Honours to Evamerion, whom the Pergemenians, authorized by an Oracle, surnamed Telephorus.

I might answer first, that the Egyptian Hercules had been a Man, as well as the Son of Alcmena: And the same thing might be said of Alexanor and Evamerion; that Distinction in their Worship being only owing either to their greater Antiquity, or to the one having been

G g 4

(1) L. 2. (2) In Cor. p. 105.

been more illustrious and in higher Reputation than the other : But I go farther, and contend that the Heroes rose insensibly, and as it were by steps, till they came to the Rank of Gods and received divine Honours ; and this was the very Case as to the Greek Hercules, since, after he had been worshipp'd for some time as an Hero, he came at length to have perfect Sacrifices offered to him ; that is, Sacrifices where a part of the Victim was burnt in honour of the God, and the rest was eaten at the Feast which always accompany'd the Ceremony of Sacrifice. Of this, the Fact which Pausanias relates, leaves no room to doubt. Phestus, according to that Author (1), upon his arrival at Sicyon, being inform'd that Hercules had hitherto been worshipped not as a God, but only as a Hero, thought this was very unbecoming, and therefore ordered divine Honours to be paid to him : However, that this Innovation might not appear shocking to the Sicyonians, he allowed them still to reserve a small part of the Victim, to be offered to the same Hercules as to a Hero. From that time, adds this Author, they kill a Lamb, and having roasted the Thighs upon the Altar, they eat one part of the Victim, and offer the other to Hercules, as to a Hero ; infomuch that at this day he is revered both as a God, and as a Hero. The two Holidays which were afterwards kept in his honour, were greatly distinguish'd ; the first was called Onomata, and the other Herculia. This Fact undeniably proves, both that the Heroes arose to the rank of Gods, and that in the time of Phestus's arrival in Sicyon, Hercules was already worshipp'd as a God thro' the rest of Greece. For had it not been so, what ground would he have had for his Surprise and Indignation ? The same thing may be advanced as to Esculapius, Thalassius the God of Marriage, and several others, who, as Diodorus Siculus tells us, were taken into the number of the Gods, and worshipped as such.

We must not imagine that those great Men owed their Divinity to the Poets alone ; it was the People, the Pontifs, nay whole Cities that perform'd their Apotheosis. Would ever the Authority of the Poets have been sufficient to cause a Worship to be establish'd, Temples and Altars to be erected to Men, deify'd only by them? This is an Error forged by those who look upon Homer and Hesiod as the Fathers of the Pagan Theology; whereas in their Poems, they only celebrated those whose Worship was established, and spoke of them in the same way as the Priests and People did. Undoubtedly, remarks St. Augustin (1), the Apotheoses were publick Acts, ratify'd by the Authority of Senate and People: Those of Julius Cæsar, of Augustus, and other Emperors, are an incontestable Proof of it. Thus the Poets are not the Authors of the Theology, of which their Works are full; all they have done is only to transmit to us the Tradition thereof.

(1) Cor. l. 2. p. 102.

But if I am now ask'd, who those were whom they put into the number of the Gods; I answer, 1. They were the ancient Kings: And as, according to Lactantius (2), they had no knowledge of any, before Uranus and Saturn, this is the Reason why they were looked upon as the most ancient Divinities. 2. They who had done considerable Services to the World, either by the Invention of some Art necessary to human Life, or by their Conquests and Victories. 3. The ancient Founders of Cities. 4. They who had discover'd some Country, or had conducted Colonies thither. 5. Those whom Flattery promoted to that Rank, and of this number are the Roman Emperors, whose Apotheosis was order'd by the Senate. In fine, all who became the Objects of publick Gratitude.

But altho' I contend, and hope to prove it in the Sequel, that the Gods, not only of the Greeks, but of the Nations from whom they receiv'd them, I mean the Egyptians and Phenicians, were all of them Men, except the Stars, and other parts of the Universe which were deify'd; yet I am far from giving into the Notion of a learned Italian Prelate, who, in his universal History, whereof we have but the first Volume (3), says, that by the several Gods, of Homer for example, we are to understand the Kings of each particular Country,

or

458 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES - Book V. or the Country itself where they reign'd : That Jupiter is Sesostris and his Successors ; Juno, Syria ; Neptune, Asia minor ; Apollo, Babylon ; Diana, the Amazons ;
Mars, Armenia ; Mercury, Phenicia ; Venus, the Island of Cyprus ; Minerva, Egypt, &c. Upon this Perizonius may be consulted, who finds it no hard matter to refute that learned Author.

C H A P. IV.

Of the Progeny of the Gods.

AS there is nothing more obscure in fabulous History, than what concerns the Children of the Gods, 'tis proper that this Point be well clear'd up.
Herodotus distinguishes the Gods, as we have said, into three Classes. There were eight in the first ; twelve in the second ; and those of the third were the Offspring of the others, as Bacchus, &c. According to this Distinction, 'tis plain, that all those are to be looked upon as the Progeny of the Gods, who were neither of the first nor second Class ; but 'tis likewise certain that they called by that Name ;

1. Several Poetical Personages, as when 'tis said that Achæron was the Son of Ceres ; the Nymphs, the Daughters of Achelous ; Love, the Son of Poverty ; and an infinity of others.

2. Most of the Princes, who were rank'd among the Gods, claim'd some one or other of them for their Fathers or Ancestors, as shall be said immediately.

3. They who were the Offspring of the stolen Embraces of Priests with the Women whom they seduced in the Temples. The Temple of Belus at Babylon, which Herodotus mentions, was not the only one where it was a Custom to introduce every Night, one of the finest Women of the City. The same Game was play'd, according to the same Historian, at Thebes in Egypt, at Patara in Lycia, and no doubt in several other Places. Thus wicked Priests imposed upon the Creden-tiality of the ignorant People, making the Children which sprung

sprung from that incestuous Commerce; to pass for the Offspring of the Gods.

4. They who were Imitators of the glorious Actions of the Gods, and who excell'd in the same Arts, passed for their Sons, as Esculapius, Orpheus, Linus, and some others.

5. They who were found exposed in the Temples or sacred Groves: Thus Erichonius passed for the Son of Minerva and Vulcan, as St. Augustin has remark'd.

6. Such as signaliz'd themselves at Sea, were reckon'd Sons of Neptune.

7. They whose Character resembled that of some God, passed for their Sons. Was one eloquent? he had Apollo for his Father: Was he subtle or designing? he passed for a Son of Mercury. Thus it was fabled that Chione, the Daughter of Dedalion, had been Mistress to Apollo and Mercury, because she had two Sons, the one of whom, Philammon, excell'd in Eloquence; and the other, who was called Autolycus, was a dextrous Thief. In like manner they who were brave, claim'd Mars for their Father, as Oenomaus, Tereus, Romulus, &c. Much the same account may be given of those who were said by the Poets to be the Progeny either of the Rivers, or of the Mountains, as Daphne the Daughter of the River Peneus; Oenone, of Cebrenus; Aventinus, Tyberinus, Inachus, and numbers of others: By whom we are to understand, as Lactantius explains it, the Children of those who bore the Names of those Rivers or Mountains.

8. They whose Original was obscure, were reputed Sons of the Earth, as Tages, that celebrated Etrurian, who was look'd upon as the Inventor of the Tuscan Divination, and of the religious Ceremonies used in the Auguries. The Giants in fabulous History, were likewise, for the same reason, reckon'd Sons of the Earth.

9. When any Prince was concerned to conceal a scandalous Intrigue, they were sure to father the Offspring upon some God. Thus Prætus having got into the Tower, where Acrisius King of Argos, affrighted with the Prediction of an Oracle, had shut up his Daughter Danaë;

Danaë; they fabled that Jupiter had transformed himself into a Shower of Gold, to seduce that Princess, and Perseus passed for the Son of that God. Just so, Amulius having found a way to convey himself secretly into the Prison where Numitor had confin'd his Daughter Rhea Sylvia, Romulus and Remus sprung from the Embraces of that Prince with his Niece, were passed upon the World for Sons of Mars. The secret Gallant of Alcmena was taken for Jupiter, and Hercules was always look'd upon as the Son of that God. Æneas owed his Title of Son of Venus, upon which the Romans so much valued themselves, to the Report which his Father Anchises industriously spread abroad, of his having had a Son by that Goddess in the Forests of Mount Ida. The same Sentiments we are to have of Castor and Pollux, Leda's Twins; as well as of a world of others, whom it would be tedious to name. Olympias exerted all her efforts to make the World believe, that Jupiter was the Father of Alexander her Son; but so long as that Princess was alive, People were not so credulous, nor did that sham Story stop the mouth of evil Speakers.

10. In fine, almost all the Heroes of Antiquity had Gods at least for their Ancestors, and they passed either for their Sons or Grand-Sons; for you need but trace their Genealogies a little, 'till you find them commonly terminating in some God.

This is what I had to say upon the Nature of the Gods whom Paganism introduc'd; they not having been all upon an equal level, were distributed into several Classes, which shall be the Subject of the following Chapter.

C H A P. V.

Distribution of the Pagan Gods into several Classes.

AS the Number of the Gods whom the Pagans worship'd was almost infinite, if we would speak of them with any Order, we must range them into several Classes; this is what has been done by Mythologists gifts both ancient and modern, whenever the Question was about reducing into a kind of System, a Theology so monstrous as was that of the Pagan World.

Herodotus (1), after the Egyptians, classës the Gods into three sorts; thus it is he expresses himself with relation to Hercules: “Among the Greeks, says he, “Hercules and Pan are the last of the Gods; νεώτατοι τῶν Θεῶν; but among the Egyptians, Pan is a very “ancient God, and of the number of the eight who are “the first of all: Hercules is in the second Class, who “are twelve in number; and Bacchus in the third, “consisting of those who are the Offspring of the “twelve Great Gods.”

’Tis a pity but this Author had given us the Names of the Gods who compos’d these three Classes; we should then have had an exact insight into the Egyptian Mythology. The Learned, to supply this defect, have distributed the Gods into several Classes.

They were divided into Great Gods, Dii majorum gentium, or Gods of Counsel, Dii Consuentes or Consulentes; and into the Gods of lesser Nations, minorum gentium. The former were the great Gods acknowledged especially in Greece and Italy. The latter were those who had been added and associated with the ancient ones, and they were peculiar to certain People. Such was the Quirinus of the Romans, the Semo-Sancus of the Etrurians, &c. The Greeks acknowledged twelve of these Great Gods, whose Names Ennius has preserv’d to us; Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Neptune, Vulcan, and Apollo.

Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars, Mercurius, Jovis, Neptunus, Vulcanus, Apollo. Each of these Gods presid’d over one Month of the Year; Juno over the Month of January; Neptune, over February, and so of the rest: Or else over each of the Signs of the Zodiack, as we learn from Manilius (2); which comes to the same thing. One of the Whimfies of Alexander was, as Arrian has it, that he would needs be be admitted into the number of these great Gods, and so make the thirteenth in this first Class.

2. The Romans added eight more to the number; these were the select Gods, Selecti; Janus, Saturn, the Genius, Sol the Sun, Luna the Moon, Pluto, Bacchus, and the ancient Vesta, or Terra, the Earth. These Gods had a privilege exclusive of others, to be represented in Gold, in Silver, and in Ivory; which is to be understood only of the later times; for in the beginning, as has been already remark'd, they used nothing in the Figures of the Gods but Timber, or some shapeless Stone. Potius Lignea, says Pliny (1), aut fictilia Deorum simulachra, in Delubris dedicata, usque ad devictam Asiam, unde irrepsit Luxuria.

3. Then came the Gods called Semones, or Semi-homines, or Semi-Dii, who were believ'd not of Dignity enough to be Inhabitants of Heaven, tho' they deserv'd a better place than the Earth; as Priapus, Hippona, Vertumnus, and all the Heroes in particular.

4. There were common Gods, who were those who favour'd all Parties; as Mars, Bellona, Victory, Fortune: Or who were adored in every Place, and among all Nations; as Vesta, or the great Mother of the Gods: and thus it is that these were distinct from the Gods called Topical, who were worshipped only in certain Places (a), as Astarte in Syria; Derceto and Semiramis among the Assyrians; Quirinus, at Rome; Faunus, among the Latins; Tages by the Tuscans, and Sancus among the Sabins. Thus again, the Egyptians adored Isis and Osiris; the Mauritanians, Juba; the Carthaginians, Uranus; the Sicilians, Adramus; the Athenians, Minerva; the People of Delphos, Apollo; those of Naxos, Bacchus; those of Cos, Aristæus; those of Lemnos, Vulcan; those of Paphos, Venus. Such again was Theutat among the Gauls, Endovellicus among the Iberians, Mars among the Thracians, Adad among the Assyrians, Taraxippus among the Eleans, Coronis among the Sicyonians, Zamolxis

(1) L. 34.

(a) This Word comes from the Greek τόπος, a Place.

molx among the Thracians, not to mention a vast many more whose Names are less known (a).

5. Farther, there were in every Country the Gods Indigetes, so called, either because they had an Attachment to certain Places, quasi in loco degentes; or because they were ready to listen to those who needed their Aid, quia faciles invocari; or to denote that they were of the Country where they were invoked, quasi Indigenæ; or because it was not allowable to call them by their proper Name, quia indigetari nefas; for the Learned give all these Etymologies to the Name of these Gods Indigetes (b).

6. There were, besides, the Gods denominated Cabiri, as you would say associated, such were Proserpine, Pluto, &c. And in the same rank were placed, the Corybantes, the Curetes, and the Idæi Dactyli.

7. The Dii Palici, whose Worship was famous especially in Sicily; and the Patæci, whose Figures serv'd for Ornaments to the Prows of Ships, whereof they were the Patrons.

8. They ador'd likewise the Dii Penates and the Dii Lares; the Houses of private Persons serv'd them for Temples and Sanctuaries, as the Cross-Streets were the Places where they worshipp'd the Gods Compitales.

9. They acknowledg'd Gods of the Woods, of the Fountains, of the Rivers, and of the Sea; such as the Satyrs, the Nymphs, the Naiads, the Sirens, the Nereids, &c.

10. There are Authors who divide the Gods only into three Classes: Those whom the Poets have invented, are in the first; those of the Philosophers take up the second; and those of the Legislators and Politicians, the third (c).

II.

(a) See Lilio Gyraidi, Synt. 10.

(b) Servius upon the twelfth Book of the Æneid, thus speaks of the Name of these Gods: Indigetes duplici ratione dicuntur; vel secundum Lucretium quod nullius rei egeant.

Ipsa suis pollens opibus, nil indiga nostri.

Vel quod nos eorum indigeamus, unde quidam Deos omnes Indigetes appellari volunt. Alii Patrios Deos dici debere tradunt, alii ab invocatione dictos volunt, quod indegit est precor & invoco, vel certe Indigetes sunt Dii ex hominibus facti, & Dii Indigites, quasi in Diis agentes.

(c) Varro & Scævola, apud Aug. de Civitate Dei, l. 4.

11. Others divided Heaven into sixteen Mansions, and placed Gods in each (a), calling those αξωνοι who were not included in any of these Spheres.

12. Cicero (1) distributes all the Gods into three Classes; the first is that of the celestial Gods, who may likewise be called Majorum gentium Dii: The second is that of those who had been raised to that Dignity by their Merit, who may be called the Demi-Gods and Indigetes; the third is that of the Virtues, which exalt us to Heaven, and have themselves been deify'd.

13. Varro maintained that there were Gods known, and Gods unknown, and to these two Classes he reduced all the Gods of the Gentiles. In the first were those whose Names, Functions, &c. were known; as the Sun, the Moon, Jupiter, Apollo, and the rest. In the second were placed those, about whom nothing certain was known, and to whom, nevertheless, Altars were raised, and Sacrifices offer'd. The Philosopher Albricus (2) look'd upon the seven Planets, as the seven primary Gods of the Pagan World, whom he ranged in this Order, Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Apollo, Venus, Mercury, and Luna, the Moon. Pausanias (b), Cicero, Hesychius, and several other Authors, speak of Altars raised to unknown Gods; and we see in the Acts of the Apostles, that St. Paul says to the Athenians: As I passed by and beheld your Devotions, I found an Altar with this Inscription, To the unknown God, αγνωστῷ Θεῷ. Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you (3). Epimenides, that great Prophet of the Cretans, was he who founded this Superstition. Being consulted by the Athenians how they might appease the Gods, and put a stop to the Plague which was laying their Country waste, he answer'd, that they were to let go into the Fields, black Sheep, and cause the Priests to go behind them and mark where they stopp'd, and there offer them up in Sacrifice; and from that time,

23

(a) Martianus, see Lysio Gyraldi, Synt. 10.

(1) De Leg. 1. 2. (2) De Imag. Deor.

(b) Pausanias in Eliacis, αγνωστῷ Θεῷ βομῆς, Deorum ignotorum Aras.

(3) Acts xvii. 23.

as Diogenes Laertius remarks, several Altars were to be seen in the Fields, erected to unknown Gods (a) ; that is to say, from the twenty-seventh Olympiad, according to that Author, or if we take Suidas's Authority, from the forty-second.

14. Clemens of Alexandria (1) thought all the Pagan Gods might be reduced to seven Classes. In the first he reckons the Stars ; in the second the Fruits of the Earth, and the Gods who preside over them, Ceres, Pomona, Vertumnus, Bacchus, &c. The third includes the Gods of Punishment and Correction, as the Furies, and others. In the fourth he placed the Gods of Passions and Affections, such as Love, Shame, &c. The Gods of Virtues, as Concord, Peace, &c. according to him, form'd the fifth Class. The Great Gods, whom they term'd Dii majorum gentium, had but the sixth. Lastly, the salutary Gods, as Æsculapius, Hygieia, Telesphorus, and some others, were those of the seventh.

15. Jamblichus the Platonick Philosopher, divided the Gods into eight Classes (2). In the first he reckon'd the Great Gods, who, tho' invisible in their Nature, are present in all the parts of the Universe, meaning, no doubt, that universal Spirit of whom we have already spoke. Superior Spirits, whom he named Archangels, possess'd the second. Other Spirits of an inferior Order, the Angels, made up the third ; In the fourth were the Demons. They whom he calls greater Archons, that is, the Genii who presided over the sublunary World, and over the Elements, were in the fifth ; and the lesser Archons, whose Power extended only to gross terrestrial Matter, in the sixth. The Heroes form'd the seventh ; and lastly, the Souls of Men rank'd among the Gods, were in the eighth. See for this, the following Chapter.

16. Other Philosophers of the same Sect comprehended all the Gods of the Pagan World, or if you will,

(a) Ex eo tempore per agros Atticæ aræ sine nomine Dei visabantur. Diog. Laert.

(1) In Protrep. (2) De Myst. Sect. 2. c. 1.

will, all the Genii, under two Classes. Those whom they design'd ἀῖλοι Immaterial, and ὑλαιοι or Material, occupy'd the first; and those whom they called Mundane, or Supramundane, the second.

17. Some will have it that Mercury called Trismegistus, allowed three Classes of Gods. In the first were those whom he named Celestial; in the second the Empyreal, and in the third the Etherial. That celebrated Author, 'tis said, had composed a thousand Volumes upon the Gods of the first Class, and an hundred upon each of the other two.

18. Again, the Gods were divided into publick and private ones. The first were those whose Worship was established and authorized by the Laws. The second, they whom every one chose to be the Objects of his own private Worship. Such were the Gods Lares, the Penates, and the Souls of their Ancestors, whom every private Man was allowed to worship, in what way he had a mind.

19. The most general Distribution of the Gods, is into Natural, and Animated ones. By the former are understood, the Stars and other Physical Beings; by the latter, Men who by their Heroism, won divine Honours. But this, however, does not comprehend all the Gods, since the Genii of different Orders, of whom we shall speak in the next Chapter, are not included in it.

20. In fine, the last, which is what I am to follow in treating of the Deities of the Greeks and Romans, is the Division of the Gods into Celestial, Terrestrial, and Infernal.

C H A P. VI.

Of the Nature of the Genii or Demons.

I N the first Chapter of this Book we have given the Sentiments of the Philosophers about the Nature of the Gods; in the second and third, the Opinions of the Poets and Historians. We have told you in the fourth, who who they were who passed for Children of the Gods. In the fifth, we have seen the Distribution of the Gods into various Classes. We are now to examine what some Philosophers understood by the Genii or Demons.

The Platonick Philosophers, in the later Ages of Paganism, being attach'd to Theurgick Magick, which, according to them, rais'd the Soul to the most sublime Speculation, and enabled it to contemplate the Deity himself, with whom it brought Man into a most intimate Union, as has been said in the preceding Book ; they, I say, propagated the Doctrine of Genii or Demons, whose Power extended over this lower World, and in particular over Man. Porphry, the most celebrated of these Philosophers, wrote a long Letter to Anebo, an Egyptian Priest, requiring he would give him light into the most important Subjects of Religion, and particularly as to that of those Genii. Jamblichus his Disciple, under the name of Abamon, another Egyptian Priest, and Anebo's Master, answer'd this Letter ; and this Answer is the Subject of that Author's Book of Mysteries.

As Porphry's Letter is nothing but a Consultation, that Philosopher does not always discover in it what are his own Sentiments ; for having a mind to deal tenderly with the scrupulous Conscience of Anebo, who looked upon all the Questions which he proposes to him, as so many Mysteries of Religion, he seems to lay them before him, only as Doubts in which he wanted to be resolv'd. At present, I have only occasion for what relates to the Genii ; thus leaving the other Subjects treated in that Letter, I say, Porphry, tho' he has deliver'd himself with reserve, has yet inform'd us in many Particularities about the Nature of those Spirits. and the Effects that are attributed to them. First, says he, we are not to settle their residence in the Æther, or that pure Air which the Gods inhabit, but in an Air more gross, or even in our earthly Globe. He dares not even ascribe to the Demons, all the Impostures and bad Actions which are laid to their charge, and with which that Philosopher is justly shock'd ; but being unwilling to speak his mind openly against a receiv'd Opinion, he owns that there are good Genii, tho' at the same time he is persuaded, that in general, all the Demons have a share of Imprudence and Folly.

After having made this Distinction between the Demons and the Gods, that those have Bodies, whereas these have none, he interrogates Ancho, whether the Men who predict future Events, or who produce some other wonderful and extraordinary Effect, ought to ascribe the Cause thereof to their own Souls, or to those Intelligences : But he himself decides the Question, and seems persuaded that such Effects are to be attributed to the Genii ; which makes him say, that some Persons believe there are a certain Order of them who hear our Prayers, but who after all, are capable only of carrying on Imposture and Delusion ; that these Spirits assume all sorts of Forms, transform themselves into various Shapes, and imitate the Gods themselves, the Demons, and Souls departed : That these Spirits are they who work all manner of Wickedness, without producing any Good ; that they give bad Counsels, set themselves in opposition with all their might to good Actions, and bear a remarkable hatred to virtuous Persons ; that they love the scent of Flesh, and of the Blood of Animals, and that they delight in being flatter'd. He comes at last to mention all the Impostures of these malignant Spirits who delude Mankind, whether they sleep or wake.

This Letter is artfully written, and there can be no doubt, but Porphyry therein declares himself against the Existence and Power of these Genii he speaks of. And yet it would seem in some places, that he admits them, and that he is not always representing the Sentiment of others, but his own, as St. Augustin observes, who has examin'd the Contents of this Letter (1). “ That Men “ should menace the Gods, and that these Menaces “ should terrify them into a Compliance with their De-“ fires, these are things, says that Father of the Church, “ which rais'd Porphyry's just Admiration ; but under “ pretext

(1) De Civ. Dei, l. 10. c. 2.

“ pretext of wondering at them, and of enquiring into “ their Causes, he plainly enough insinuates, that they “ are the Operations of those Spirits, whose Qualities “ he before represented according to the opinion of “ others; seducing Spirits, whose Vices have made “ them so, and not their Nature, as he himself says
 “ and thinks.”

Be that as it will, Jamblichus answers this Letter Article by Article, and speaking in the ninth Section, of what regards the Genii, he seems equally persuaded of their Existence and Power. He introduces himself with an acknowledgment, that this Subject is very perplexed, and lies under great Difficulties. For, says he, 'tis believ'd that every Man may have his Demon, either by the Influence and Aspect of the Stars which preside over his Birth, or that is associated to him by Theurgick Magick. He adds, that the first of those Means has nothing in it but what is natural, but that the second depends upon Causes supernatural; and he severely censures the Author of the Letter, tho' he does not name him, for having mention'd only the first of those Means, on which he makes all his Difficulties to turn, without ever touching upon that which is the only true one. Then having prov'd the uncertainty of what is called Horoscope, and all the other Arts of Astrology, he shews that Theurgy, and nothing else, can lead to any certain Knowledge. “ 'Tis not then, concludes he,
 “ from the position of the Stars at the time of our Birth,
 “ that we have the Genius sent to us, who is to preside “ over our Life: He had an Existence before us, and “ he it is who at the moment of Conception, makes “ himself master of the Soul, and unites it to the Body.
 “ All our Thoughts proceed from him, and we only “ act conformably to the Ideas which he gives us (a).
 “ In fine, he governs us intirely, till the Soul train'd “ up to Perfection by the Speculations of Theurgy, or “ of that divine Magick which unites us with God, is “ releas'd from the bondage of this Genius, who then “ either abandons, or becomes a Slave to the Soul in

(a) See the VI and VIIth Chapters of the ninth Section.

“ its turn. This Demon, continues Jamblichus (1),
 “ is not ourselves, it is a Being independent upon us,
 “ of an Order superiour to our Soul, and not a part of “ it, as Porphyry seem’d to think. As he is not sent “ to us from any particular part of the Universe, such “ as the Stars, &c. but by the Universality of Nature,
 “ he presides over all our Thoughts, over all our Ac“ tions, and over all our Affections: Thus, there is no “ occasion, as the Author of the Letter insinuates, for “ our having severál of them, the one for Health,
 “ the other for Beauty, &c. one alone suffices, and ’tis “ ridiculous to admit one for the Body, and another “ for the Soul: In vain therefore it is, that some Per“ sons have instituted different Forms of Prayers for “ their Genii; there is no need of any more than one, “ since God who sends to each of us our Genius, is one
 “ in his Nature.”

Thus reasoned Jamblichus against his Master Porphyry, who did not seem so fully persuaded as he, of the Existence of those Genii. As this mysterious Philosophy drawn from Plato’s School, and supported by some Doctrines of the Christian Religion ill understood, made considerable progress in the two first Ages of the Church, the primitive Fathers apply’d themselves to combat it, and found it no hard matter to triumph over the vain
 Reasonings of the Sophists who maintain’d it.

Apuleius, in the Work which he composed upon the Demon of Socrates, which was, according to him, one of those Genii we have been now speaking of, after having told us that they were Spirits who had never been united to any Body, thus lays open to us the Opinion of Plato upon this Subject. “ Of those De“ mons, says he, Plato reckons that every Man has his “ own, who is his Guardian, and the Witness not only “ of his Actions, but of his very Thoughts; that at “ Death, the Genius delivers up to Judgment the Per“ son who had been committed to his Charge; and if,
 “ when the Person is interrogated by the Judge, his “ Answer is found not agreeable to Truth, the Genius “ censures and reprimands him very severely, as on
 (1) Ch. 8. “ the

“ the other hand, he pronounces an Encomium upon “ him when what he says is true; and 'tis upon “ the Approbation of the Genius that the Doom is pro-“ nounc'd; for this Demon knows whatever passes in
 “ the Man, even his most secret Thoughts.”

Tho' Plato and Jamblichus were of opinion that every Individual had but one of those Genii to conduct him, and preside over all his Actions, other Philosophers, however, of the same School, were persuaded that we had two, the one good, and the other bad; this is what we learn from Servius. That learned Commentator, upon this Passage in Virgil: Quisque suos patimur Manes (1), says: Volunt unicuique Genium appositum, Dæmonem bonum & malum; hoc est, rationem quæ ad meliora semper hortatur, & Libidinem quæ ad pejora; hic est Larva & Genius malus; ille bonus Genius & Lar.
 “ They will have it that every one has two Genii, the “ one good, and the other bad; that is, Reason which “ always excites Men to Good, and Lust which “ prompts them to Ill: The latter is what they call “ Larva, or evil Genius; the other good Genius, or “ Lar.”

The Opinion of the Existence of these Genii is antienter than Plato, and it would be difficult to trace out its Original. Perhaps it was brought from the same Source whence the Author of the Book of Enoch, of which we have treated (2), had taken what he relates of the Angels; that is, from the Tradition, tho' corrupted and altered, of the Rebellion of these Angels. Be that as it will, it was an Opinion generally received, that there were multitudes of these Spirits, inferiour indeed to the Supreme Being, to whom they were a kind of Ministers and Mediators, but superior to Man, whose Guardians they were.

The Gods, said some Philosophers, are removed at too great a distance from Men, to be capable of holding any correspondence or union with them; and it is only thro' the Intervention of those Powers of a middle Nature, between God and Man, that this Correspondence and Union can be establish'd. It is they who present our Prayers to the Gods, who lay our Vows before them, and who at the same time communicate to Men the Blessings which these same Gods vouchsafe to dispense unto them; false Divinity in its Principle, since however perfect a Creature is conceived to be, there will always remain an infinite Distance between God and him; sad Divinity in its Consequences, since it supposed recluse Deities, who being shut up in the Heavens, were not every where present themselves by their Immensity, but had need of the Ministration of other Powers, to know and relieve our Exigencies; Divinity, in short, which strangely perverted what the Scripture says of the Angels whom God has established as his Ministers: Qui facit Angelos suos Spiritus, &c.

(1) Æn. 1. 6. v. 743. (2) L. 2. c. 5.

It must however be allowed, that for any thing that appears, those Philosophers did not believe the Genii or Demons to have been Gods; but as Idolatry set no bounds to Superstition, those same Genii were afterwards looked upon as Divinities, and had their share in the Worship which was paid to the Gods. Hence the Temples, Chapels, and Altars, which Antiquity informs us to have been consecrated to them: Hence again those Inscriptions so common: Genio Loci, Genio Augusti, Junonibus, &c. 'Tis true, those Genii were reckon'd in the lowest Class, and among what Ovid calls, the Plebeian Gods *; but nevertheless they had their Altars and Sacrifices: For the very Reason which was given for worshipping them, was founded upon the Refinements of some Philosophers, who gave out, as shall be said in the Reflections upon Idolatry, that God supremely happy, was incapable of any degree of Resentment; but that those intermediate Beings between God and Man, were often peevish and out of humour, wherefore it was necessary to offer Incense and Victims to appease them.

Every Man therefore, according to the Principles of this Theology, had his particular Genius, or even two, accord-

* Plebs Deorum.

according to some Ancients; and this is what makes Pliny say, as we have already observed in speaking of the Progress of Idolatry (1), that the number of the Gods, for he expressly takes into the number the Genii, and Junones, who were the Genii of the Women, was so great, that they were more numerous than Men.

Of this number was the Genius of Socrates, upon which Plutarch and Apuleius have each of them composed a particular Treatise; a Genius, who, as he himself said, forewarn'd him when his Friends were going to engage in any bad Enterprize, who stopp'd him, hinder'd him from Action, but never put him upon it. Divinum quoddam, says Cicero, speaking of this Demon, quod Dæmonem appellat, cui semper paruerit, nunquam impellenti, sæpe revocanti. But after all the Reasonings have been about this pretended Demon, I adopt the Opinion of the late Abbé Fraguier, who, in a Dissertation printed in the fourth Volume of the Academy of Belles Lettres (2), ascribes all that has been said about it, to the Wisdom and Prudence of that Philosopher, which made him foresee many Things, which a Man of less Discernment than he would never have thought of; for Prudence, says Cicero, is a kind of Divination. “Tis very probable then, concludes that “learned Academick whom I just now named (3), that “the Demon of Socrates, a Demon, of which so many “various Accounts have been given, so as even to “make it a question whether it was a good or bad An“gel, meant nothing, after all, but the Prudence and “Wisdom of Socrates, in piercing into Futurity; which “Socrates, according to his ironical turn of Mind, re“duced to pure Instinct, which, in the Poets and Rhapsodists is poetical Fury, in the Diviners prophetick “Fury; and which, filling both the one and the other “with an Illumination, which is the Mean between “Knowledge and Ignorance, sometimes enables them “to hit right.”

(1) L. III. (2) P. 360. (3) P. 371.

C H A P. VII.

General Reflexions upon Idolatry.

WE have seen what sort of Gods they were whom the blinded World adored. What a mortifying Spectacle to human Nature! to see, for more than two thousand Years, the whole Earth filled with Temples raised to vain Idols, where innocent Victims were offer'd up to criminal Deities; the richest Perfumes shed for Idols who had no sensation of them. Prayers were put up to Gods who were incapable of hearing their Votaries (a). Vain Endeavours were used to appease them, who knew not whether they had received any Provocation; and their Assistance was implored, who all the while knew nothing of our wants. Sure Man, left to his own guidance, is a strange fantastical Being!

Such was the forlorn State of the World, when God compassionating our Miseries, sent his own Son to this Earth. No sooner did this new Sun arise, than the Darknefs of Idolatry began gradually to disappear. The spotless Lamb was soon seen in possession of the Rights which the Devil had usurp'd; and Jesus Christ crucify'd, appear'd in the Center of the Capitol, instead of the infamous Jupiter.

But is it to be thought that Men of Parts gave credit to so gross a Theology? Did they not ridicule the popular Fables? And had not the Philosophers more consistent Notions of the Deity? 'Tis a Question very difficult to determine, what Idea the Philosophers and Poets had of God. 'Tis certain that most of them were Atheists, and acknowledg'd no other God but Nature: They believ'd, all of them, that Matter was uncreated, and they allowed God to have no other part in the Formation of the World, but to have disentangled the Chaos. Nor durst they even decide, whether it was God who had presided over that Operation, or Nature herself:

Hanc

(a) Aures habent & non audiunt, nares habent & non odorabunt.
Pj. cxv. 6.

*Hanc Deus, * vel melior litem Natura diremit,*
As it is in Ovid (1).

For in short, let the Opinions of the Philosophers be examin'd, we shall find they are reducible to three Classes, as has been said in the first Chapter of this Book. In the first I reckon those who allow'd only a Nature, infinite indeed and eternal, but inanimate ; as Epicurus, Strato, and others. In the second, those who acknowledged an intelligent but material Principle ; such as Zeno, and the Stoicks his Disciples. In fine, in the third, I include those who maintain'd, like Anaxagoras and Plato, that there was an Intelligence immaterial and infinite. Those of the two former Classes were undeniably Atheists ; those of the third, more enlightened, and more rational to be sure, erred at least in not believing a Creation, and were obliged to allow Matter to be independent and eternal, as well as the Intelligence, who thereof formed the World.

A Passage of Seneca, quoted by St. Augustin (2), explains all these Opinions in two Words: Ego feram, said that Philosopher, aut Platonem, aut Peripateticum Stratonem, quorum alter fecit Deum sine Corpore ; alter sine Animo : since here is the incorporeal God of Plato and Anaxagoras, sine Corpore ; the God of Strato, inanimate Matter, sine Animo ; and consequently the God of the Stoicks, who was that of Seneca himself, the Mean between the other two, Matter and Intelligence both together, or which comes to the same, material Intelligence.

As for the Poets, I have shewn at the end of the second Book, what we are to think of their Theology. We may also add, with the celebrated M. Bossuet, that nothing is more indecent, nor at the same time more shocking, than the manner in which they speak of the Gods. They make Monsters of them ; some they represent round, square, triangular, lame, blind ; they speak in a scurrilous manner of the Amours of Anubis with

* I see 'tis in some very good Editions, Et melior Natura ; which is capable of being explain'd in a very just Sense.

(1) Met. l. 1. (2) De Civ. Dei.

with the Moon ; they tell us that Diana had been drubb'd ; they bring in Jupiter making his Testament at the point of Death ; they represent the Gods fighting and receiving Wounds from Mortals ; they make them fly into Egypt, where, to conceal their Flight, they are fain to transform themselves into Crocodiles and Lizards : Apollo mourns the Death of Æsculapius, Cybele of her beloved Atys : One banish'd Heaven, is obliged to keep Flocks ; another reduced to the hard shift of labouring in Mason-work, has not Influence enough to procure his Wages : One is a Musician, another a Blacksmith, a third a Midwife. In a word, they have Offices assign'd them which are quite indecent ; which suits better with the Buffoonery of the Stage, than with the Majesty of the Gods.

In short, what shall we think of the Greeks and Romans in general ; of these two People, who look'd upon all the World besides as Barbarians, they who had adopted the Worship of all the Gods of the Nations whom they conquer'd ? What a monstrous System is their Theology ! What sort of Divines are Hesiod and Homer ! Ogyges, Danaus, Cadmus, Cecrops, and in general all the Leaders of Colonies who came from Egypt and Phenicia, introduced into Greece the Gods of their Country, and the Ceremonies of their Worship. What a strange Medley is their Theology ! For, in fine, what kind of Religion could that be which was introduced by Sea-faring People, who came in quest of Settlements ?

Perhaps it will be said, as has been already remark'd, that none but the Vulgar were Idolaters. The Corruption, on the contrary, was spread universally, and they who contemned the established Religion, were commonly Atheists, and the Remedy was worse than the Disease. After all, if we judge from the Conduct of the wise Men of Antiquity, we can't but allow that they gave into the very grossest Errors. What would we really say of a Man of Parts, whom we should see with a Censer in his Hand, prostrating himself before an Idol, or with his Eyes intent upon the Entrails of a Victim, where he is exploring his Destiny? Would we take such an one for an Hypocrite, who laughs in his heart at the Gods, whom, from a political View, he invokes? But if this be the Case, what Rule shall we have whereby to judge of the Sentiments of others? 'Tis possible that the same Persons, at going out of the Temple, might make a jest of the Ceremonies in which they had been joining. Does not Cicero rally the Augurs? Do not Lucian and some others make merry with their Gods? Juvenal says in one of his Satires, that there were none but Children who believ'd all that was said of the infernal Regions, and of Charon.

*Esse aliquos Manes, & subterranea regna,
Et Contum, & Stygio ranas in gurgite nigras,
Atque unâ transire vadum tot millia Cymbâ,*

Nec pueri credunt, nisi qui nondum ære lavantur (1).

Callimachus and Catullus say much the same thing: Seneca laughs at Jupiter's Gallantries, as we shall shew in the History of that God. Did not Dionysius the Tyrant order Apollo to be stripped of his golden Robe, and Æsculapius of his Beard, adding even a smart piece of Raillery (a)? All this is very true, but what Idea did others conceive of such; were they not looked upon as Persons impious and profane?

In a word, the System, of which we have been speaking, was the predominant Religion, and few People examined it so as to discover its Faults. There uses not to be a great deal of Reasoning upon the Subject of Religion; the common way is for the Children to follow that of their Fathers, and but few People are converted by Reasonings. Besides, the Pagan Religion was not very inconvenient: However incumber'd it was with Ceremonies, it allowed an entire Liberty in Morals. When a Religion is thus indulgent to People's Inclinations, they hardly think of examining into it: Would it have been agreeable to them to exchange Gods who were

(1) Juv. Sat. 6.

(a) He said, this Habit of Apollo was too warm in Summer, and too cold in Winter; and of Æsculapius, that it was ridiculous for the Son to have a Beard, while the Father had none.

were themselves the Models of Vices, for others who would have punish'd them with severity? We may conclude then, that all, Philosophers and People, followed a Religion whose System was so grossly contriv'd.

The Learned may now rack their invention, says M. Bossuet (a) with great Elegance, to find out the rise of Idolatry, and when, and by whom it first began. 'Tis however certain, that Lust and Ignorance introduced it; and that Interest, the Passions, and Voluptuousness maintained it. Thus, we are not to be surprized at its having prevail'd so long in the World, where even yet it is not destroy'd, since there are People at this day who groan under the Tyranny of the Devil; nor is that happy Period yet arrived, when all the World is to acknowledge but one God, by Jesus Christ. But what may give us surprize, is, how Idolatry has been propagated to the most remote Nations, and there continued till now, since it is certain that the modern Idolatry of the Indies, of Persia, and the North, is precisely the same with the ancient Egyptian Idolatry. The monstrous Errors into which Men have been carry'd out, will always be the disgrace of human Nature. Who would not indeed be surprized, to see the World, which God had made for the Manifestation of his Power, become a Temple of Idols (1); to see Man so blind as to adore the Work of his own Hands, and offer Incense to Beasts and Reptiles: And after having set up these Idols of his, to believe there was a necessity of shedding his own Blood, in order to appease them? For in fact, among every Nation of the World, Men have sacrificed Victims of their own Species, nor is there a Country upon Earth where this barbarous Custom has not been practised.

But if Idolatry be so great a Perversion of the human Mind, ought we not to be less astonished at its being destroy'd, than at its having continued so long? Its Extravagance, on the contrary, says the eloquent Prelate whom I do little more than copy, shews the difficulty
there

(a) Discourse upon Universal History.

(1) Id. Ibid.

there was to subdue it. The World had grown old in this Error ; enchanted by its own Idols, it had become deaf to the Voice of Nature, which cried aloud against them. Besides, every thing was engaged in its behalf, the Senses, the Passions, Lust, Ignorance, a false Veneration for Antiquity, the Interest of Particulars, and that of the State. On one hand, nothing was so monstrous as the System of Idolatry ; and at the same time, nothing so delusive. And indeed, how were the Passions soothed, by adoring Gods who had themselves been subject to them, and to find examples in them to authorize and justify the greatest Irregularities ? Religion, instead of curbing, serv'd to deify Vice : The Conduct of the Gods, their History renewed in the Festivals and Sacrifices, was wholly calculated for inspiring Men with a fond regard to their Passions. Gods revengeful, impure, and debauch'd, were made for a corrupt Nature, which wants to be gratify'd without Remorse, and with Impunity. We may add, with the same Author, that Idolatry was entirely calculated for Pleasure : Diversions, Shows, and in short Licentiousness itself, were consecrated by it to be a part of divine Worship. The Festivals were nothing but Games, and from no Action in human Life, was Modesty more effectually banished than from the Mysteries of Religion. What Power was requisite to restore the Impressions of the true God, which were so entirely defaced on the Minds of Men ? How shall such depraved Hearts be habituated to the strict Rules of the true Religion, which is chaste, an enemy to Sensuality, and solely attach'd to the good Things of an invisible World ?

But if Idolatry was so capable of supporting itself by its own Character, how was it to be overthrown when the whole World was combined in its Interest ? 'Tis well known what the Emperors did to crush Christianity in the bud ; those bloody Edicts, those unheard-of Persecutions, that Fury exerted against the primitive Christians, that Hatred of Mankind with which they were loaded ; all these are noted Facts. But these were not the most dangerous Weapons with which Hell had sup-
ply'd

ply'd Idolatry, since the Blood of the Martyrs was the Seed of new Christians, as Tertullian says; Sanguis Martyrum, Semen Christianorum. Here are Enemies more formidable than the Emperors; I mean the Philosophers, who employed all the shrewd Arts of a refined and delusive Wit, to give some Credit to so bad a Cause. What various means did they use to take off the Absurdities of their Religion? In how many different shapes did they represent Idolatry? Some, from an affected Reverence towards the Deity, maintained that every thing Divine was unknown; that it was not for Man to reason upon things so sublime; that it was his Duty to believe the Ancients, and to follow the established Religion without Reasoning(1). And when it was remonstrated to them that there could be but one God, they reply'd, that the divine Nature was so immense, that it could neither be expressed by one single Name, nor under one single Form; but that after all, Jupiter and Mars, Apollo and Juno, and the other Gods, were all at bottom, but one and the same God, whose infinite Perfections were represented by so many different Words: That as to the Stories of their Gods, and of their Amours, all these were but so many Allegories, whose design was to teach us the Formation of the Worlds: And that this was the Reason why Love, the most powerful of Gods, was said to have formed the Universe, because he had united the Elements, of which all things were composed.

But as this Resource of the Stoick Philosophy pay'd the way to Atheism, since after all, it was found that this God of theirs was nothing but the Universe, other Philosophers (2), still more subtle, took another way to reconcile the Unity of the supreme Being with the Multiplicity of the vulgar Gods. There was, said they, only one God Supreme; but such was his Greatness, that he did not meddle with Things minute; and having contented himself with making the Heavens and the heavenly Bodies, he had left to Subalterns the Care of framing and governing the lower World: And as they

(1) M. Bossuet loc. cit.

(2) Jamblichus, Porphyry, Celsus.

they were the Mediators between God and Men, it was necessary to offer Sacrifices unto them, and pay them Adoration. And when it was shew'd them that this Worship was due to none but the supreme God, and that it was Idolatry to confer it upon other Gods, the more ingenious among them (1) went the length of saying, that Sacrifice was not an Act of supreme Worship; that every thing material was impure, and therefore ought not to be offered to the Deity; that not so much as Language was to be employed in his Worship, because the Organs of Speech were material, but that God was only to be adored in silent Meditation; all other Worship being unworthy so exalted a Majesty. He added, that Victims and Incense were to be offered to those malignant Spirits who would needs pass for Gods, and whom it was necessary to appease, for fear they should do us harm.

I don't attempt a refutation of these vain Subtilties, which destroy themselves; but all this proves, that it was not easy to overthrow an Error so universal and so delusive. For in fine, tho' Idolatry, consider'd in itself, appears only to have been the effect of brutal Ignorance; yet when traced to its Original, it will be found to be a Work of deep Contrivance, carry'd to the utmost excesses by malicious Spirits, and whose Security lay in the countenance it gave to criminal Passions. But what render'd it still more difficult to be extirpated, is, its having been founded in that extravagant fondness which we have for our selves. To this undoubtedly was owing the invention of Gods like ourselves; Gods who were nothing but Men, subject to our Passions and Weaknesses; insomuch that under the name of false Divinities, it was upon the matter their own Ideas and Pleasures which Men adored; venerable and sovereign Deities whom Lust had formed. Thus the Heart of Man became the first Idol-Temple; and for the sake of those internal Deities, were Altars raised to the external ones. For as the ingenious Prelate whom I have already quoted several times says, Venus was ador'd because Men suffer'd them;

I i

(1) Porphyry.

themselves to be enslaved by the Passion of Love, and were pleased with their Chains: Bacchus, the most jovial of all the Gods, had his Altars, because they resign'd themselves, and sacrificed, as I may say, to sensual Delights, sweeter and more intoxicating than Wine. Thus before Idols could be overthrown, it was necessary to controul the Dominion of Lust, and throw down the Altar which it had raised to them in the Heart, a Work reserv'd for him whose province it was to enlighten the Nations; to prove by his Doctrine that solid Joy is that which springs from a good Conscience; for him who by his Death was to discipline the Soul of Man, depraved by so many Vices, dissipated by so many Passions, to Humility, Patience, and every enduring Virtue. Accordingly it appeared by an effect equally admirable and astonishing, that while the Philosopher, with all his fine methodical Reasonings, was unable to overthrow one Idol, simple Fishermen, the Outcasts of the World, who preach'd nothing but Crosses and Mortifications, saw them sink down to the Dust, tho' supported by the Power of Emperors, obstinately bent upon the Preservation of their Worship.

It cannot be doubted, after the Testimony of the Fathers of the Church (a), but that the Poets, under the Name of Jupiter, frequently meant the supreme God, gave him always a Superiority over the other Gods, and looked upon him as their Lord: Deum Sator atque Hominum Rex, says Virgil: They add, that all things are full of Jupiter, the Highways, and Places of publick Resort, the immense Ocean, no less than the narrow Pools; his Presence every where surrounds us and penetrates into our Souls. Plenæ autem Jovis sunt omnes equidem viæ, plena quoque hominum fora, plenumque mare & stagna; ubique omnes Jove repleti sumus, as it is in the Poet Aratus; and 'tis to the Words of this Poet that St. Paul alludes (1), when he says, In ipso vivimus,

(a) Clem. Alex. Strom. l. 1. Athenag. S. August. Eusebius, Origen. Theod. Tertull. Minuc. See Father Thomassin, Lecture des Poetes, tom. 1. l. 2. ch. 1, and 12.

(1) Acts xvii. 28.

vinus, movemur & sumus, ut quidam vestrorum Poetarum dixit: But it must likewise be owned, that for the most part, they understood by Jupiter no other than that ancient King of Crete, the Son of Saturn, a Prince guilty of Parricide, and defiled with a thousand other Crimes: That they took pleasure in recounting his Adventures upon all occasions; and make this sovereign Deity who govern'd all the rest, a Slave to the most infamous Passions, and in all things necessarily subjected to the irrevocable Decrees of Destiny *. Thus they can by no means be vindicated from an Idolatry, equally gross and ridiculous. Accordingly, when Celsus the Philosopher would needs insinuate that it was of small Consequence whether they gave God the Name of Jupiter, Adonis, or Ammon, provided they affixed to it that Idea of Sovereignty and Independency which belongs to the true God; Origen refutes him solidly (1), and lets him know, that the Christians abhorred that detestable Maxim, of giving the Name of Jupiter to the true God, or the Name of God to Jupiter; that this was the Badge whereby a Christian was distinguish'd from an Idolater. Lactantius and the other Fathers are of the same mind, and refute the vain Sophisms of those Apologists for Idolatry, with relation to this Subject.

But however obstinately prejudiced the Philosophers were, it must still have been more difficult to change
I i 2
their

* Mr. Pope, in his Note upon the Iliad, B. 16. v. 535. observes, that Homer assigns three Causes of all the Good and Evil that happens in this World, which he takes a particular care to distinguish: First, the Will of God, superior to all.—Διὸς δ' ἐτελείετο βουλή. Il. 1. Secondly, Destiny or Fate, meaning the Laws and Order of Nature, affecting the Constitutions of Men, and disposing them to Good or Evil, Prosperity or Misfortune; which the supreme Being, if it be his Pleasure, may over-rule, but which he generally suffers to take effect. Thirdly, our own Free-will, which either by Prudence overcomes those natural Influences and Passions, or by Folly suffers us to fall under them. Odyss. 1. v. 32. Ἄνθρωποι, &c.

Why charge Mankind on Heav'n their own Offence,
 And call their Woes the Crime of Providence?
 Blind! who themselves their Miseries create,
 And perish by their Folly, not their Fate.

(1) Contra Celsum, l. 2, and l. 5.

484 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES. Book V, their Hearts than to enlighten their Understandings;
 or, to speak more properly, their Hearts were as opposite to the Severity of the Christian Morals, as their Understandings were to the Truth of its Doctrines. A very glaring Instance of this is to be seen in the Conduct of Felix the Governour of Judea. St. Paul had no sooner pronounc'd the word Resurrection (1), Quo- niam de resurrectione mortuorum ego hodie judicor a vobis, than Felix dismisses his Accusers, saying, I will hear you when Lysias the chief Captain shall arrive. In another Discourse before the same Governour, as Paul rea- soned of Righteousness, Chastity, and Judgment to come, Felix falls a trembling, and says to him; Go thy way for this time, I shall call for thee at a convenient Season.
Quod nunc attinet, vade: Tempore autem opportuno ac-cersam te (2).

B O O K VI.

Of the Gods worshipped in the Eastern Countries.

A Preliminary.

AS the Countries that lay nearest the Plain of Shinar, where happen'd the first Dispersion of Mankind after the Deluge, were the first peopled, and Idolatry having begun in those Countries, that we may observe some Order in the History of the Gods which I am now to enter upon, 'tis necessary to speak of the Deities of the eastern Nations, before we come to those of Greece, Italy, and other western Parts.

'Tis our misfortune that we have no continued History

(1) Acts xxiv. 21. (2) Ib. ver. 25.

story of the Religion of those ancient Nations. Some Fragments of their Historians, scatter'd up and down in different Authors, and some Passages of Scripture, where mention is made of the Gods whom the People in the Neighbourhood of Palestine worshipped, are the only helps we have for coming at the knowledge of it. 'Tis true, several learned Men of the last Age and of this, have attempted to reduce the confused Accounts of the ancient Deities of the East into some Order; among whom, Selden, Bochart, Vossius, and in the last place, Mr. Fourmont, may be consulted with advantage: But notwithstanding their Conjectures, which are often extremely ingenious, especially with respect to the Names of these Gods, this Subject will always remain impenetrably obscure. We shall make the best use we can of the Labours of those learned Men, and endeavour to give as accurate an account as possible of the Divinities we are to treat of in this Book.

The oriental Nations, generally speaking, had hardly any other Gods but the Sun, Moon, and Planets: It was by the Worship of the Stars that Idolatry began, as has been already said. This Religion long continued among these People, and, except Egypt, you shall scarcely find a Country where they worshipped any Gods besides the Sun and Moon. Accordingly, we shall see, from the whole thread of this History I am now to give, that all the Worship of the eastern Nations was directed to these two Luminaries, which were adored under different Names. The Sun was the Osiris of the Egyptians, the Hammon of the Libyans, the Saturn of the Carthaginians (1), the Adonis of the Phenicians, the Baal or Belus of the Assyrians, the Moloch of the Ammonites, the Dionysius or the Urotal of the Arabians, the Mithras of the Persians, the Belenus of the Gauls. 'Tis well known, that among the Greeks, Apollo, Bacchus, Liber or Dionysius, were the same as the Sun; Macrobius (2) makes it evident to a Demonstration. What shall I say more? This Luminary was the Divinity vinity of almost every Nation, both in the old World and in the new.

486 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book VI.

Just so, the Moon was Isis in Egypt, Astarte in Phenicia, Alilat among the Arabians, Mylitta among the Persians; Artemis, Diana, Dietyana, &c. in Greece, in the Island of Crete, in Delos, and elsewhere. Macrobius goes yet farther (1), since he contends, as we have already said, that all the Gods whom Paganism adored, owed their Origin to the Sun and Moon.

When Alexander made the Conquest of Asia, these were the principal Gods who were there adored, and as yet they had no knowledge of those of Greece; but the Greeks, who were fond of being thought a very ancient People, after having introduced thither the Worship of their Gods, pretended that most of them were the same with those of the Nations they had conquered. Two Examples, among many which might be given, will make this evident. Having observed some Conformity between what was said of Beal of the Phenicians, and what they themselves fabled of their Saturn, they did not scruple to say, that the great Phenician Divinity was Saturn. Having in like manner remark'd what infamous Debauchery was practised in the Worship of some female Deity of that People, they concluded, that this could be no other than their Venus.

After these Preliminaries, we come to the particular Subject, beginning with the Gods of Egypt.

C H A P. I.

Of the Gods of the Egyptians.

THE Hebrews having dwelt a long time in Egypt, where they sometimes suffered themselves to be drawn away by the Superstitions of that idolatrous People, as the Prophet Ezekiel upbraids them, and as appears from the Golden Calf which they worshipped in the Wilderness, we might expect to have the History of the Egyptian Religion delivered in the Books of Moses; but tho' the Pentateuch seems principally written

(1) Loc. cit.

ten for the Extirpation of Idolatry, and tho' the Author of this Book is every now and then using Exhortations, Prayers, and Threatnings; tho' he therein names with Indignation, the Gods of the Nations whom the Israelites were to conquer, yet he enters not into any particular Account of the Egyptian Divinities, contenting himself in the Precepts which he prescribed to the Jews, to point at them in general, to inspire them with all the abhorrence of those false Divinities, which they deserv'd, and to wrap up the whole History of the Idolatry of that ancient People, under the general Name of the Abominations of Egypt. Perhaps he declined to revive so unhappy a Remembrance, knowing how dangerous it might have been with respect to the fickle and inconstant Nation he had to do with. He speaks however of those Gods, tho' in a general way; and from what he says of them, Selden has been able to trace an Affinity between the Words of Moses, and what Antiquity informs us of the Egyptian Gods. Accordingly, when that sacred Legislator (1) tells the Jews, that they had seen no Figure, and no Image, when God spake to them in Horeb, lest being corrupted thereby, they should make to themselves Representations of Man or Woman; Non vidistis aliquam Similitudinem in die qua locutus est vobis Dominus in Horeb, de medio ignis, ne forte decepti, faciatis vobis sculptam Similitudinem aut Imaginem masculi vel feminae; it would seem that this respects the Figures of the Gods represented by the Egyptians, under a human Form. When he subjoins, Nor the Similitude of any Animal that is upon the Earth: Similitudinem omnium jumentorum quæ sunt super terram, he seems to allude to the Oxen Apis & Mnevis, to the Goat worshipped at Mendes; to the Cats and Dogs, that is, to the Goddess Bubastis, and to the God Anubis, represented under the Figures of those Animals. By these Words, Vel avium sub cælo volantium, Or of Birds which fly in the airy Regions; 'tis obvious that he is alluding to the Birds worshipped in the same Country, such as the Ibis, the Ichneumon, and some others: And

(1) Deut. iv. 16, & seq.

by these, Or of Reptiles which crawl upon the Earth, or of Fishes which are in the Waters; atque Reptilium qui moventur in terra; sive Piscium qui sub terrâ moventur in aquis; he means the Oxyrinchus, the Crocodile, in a word, the Fishes and the Insects which were the Objects of Worship to that superstitious People. In fine, when he says to his People, “Lest thou lift up thine “Eyes unto Heaven, and when thou seest the Sun and “the Moon, and the Stars, even all the Host of Heaven, thou shouldst be enticed to worship them, and “serve Creatures which God hath created to be beneficial
 “to all the Nations under Heaven;” Ne forte elevetis oculos ad cælum, videas Solem & Lunam, & omnia Astra cæli, & errore deceptus adores ea, & colas quæ creavit Dominus tuus in Ministerium cunctis gentibus quæ sub cælo sunt; it would seem that he had a mind to point out Sabîsm, and guard the Jews against that sort of Idolatry, which he mentions last, tho’ probably it was the first Religion of the Egyptians, who, as I have remark’d with respect to them, and all the idolatrous Nations, offered Adoration to the heavenly Bodies, before they came to worship other parts of Nature, and at last to deify’d Men, which I take to have been the last Excess to which Idolatry was carry’d.

Be that as it will, the ancientest of the prophane Historians, and he who speaks in the most knowing manner of the Religion of the Egyptians, is Herodotus; so that before we enter into the particular History of the Divinities of that ancient People, it is proper to quote all that he says of them. The Egyptians, according to him (1), are the first People in the World who knew the Names of the twelve great Gods, and from them the Greeks had learned them. They too are the first who erected Altars to the Gods, made Representations of them, raised Temples to them, and had Priests for their Service, excluding wholly the other Sex from the Priesthood. Never was any People, continues he, more religious. There are in Egypt two sorts of Writing, the one common, and the other sacred, and this last last is solely set apart for the Mysteries of Religion. The Priests of this Country shave their whole Body every third day. Cloathed in Linnen, with Sandals made of the Plant named Papyrus, they are not allowed to wear other Apparel, nor other covering for their Feet. They are obliged to bathe themselves in cold Water twice a day, and as often by night. So scrupulously exact must they be in the choice of the Victims which they are to offer to their Gods, that they are punished with Death if they offer up any which have not the qualities requisite. The Victim being led to the Altar, they kindle a Pile, and after having offered a Libation of Wine, they kill the Sacrifice, cut off its Head, and flea the rest of the Body : As for the Head, after having loaded it with Curses, they carry it to Market, and sell it to the Greek Merchants ; and if none of that Nation are to be found there, they throw it into the River. The Curse which they pour out upon this part of the Victim, is to this purpose : If there be any Evil to come upon any part of Egypt, may it light upon this Head. Thus it is, continues our Author, that they sacrifice thro' the whole Kingdom, and hold the Heads of Victims in such detestation, that they even abstain from eating that of any Animal. The Victim being flea'd, and the Priests having put up some Prayers, they take out the Guts, and leave the rest of the Entrails and the Fat, cut off the Legs of the Beast, the Kidney and the Shoulders ; and stuff its Body with pure Loaves, of Honey, Raisins, Figs, Incense, Myrrh, and other Odours ; and after having poured Oil thereon, they distribute the rest of the Victim for the Feast. The Priests always offer Sacrifice fasting, and all the Victims must be Males, the Females being consecrated to Isis.

(1) Herod. l. 2.

Farther, says he, all the Egyptians don't adore the same Gods, except Isis and Osiris, their great Divinities. They take Osiris to be the same with Bacchus or Dionysius. They who inhabit Thebais, have a great veneration for the Sheep, and offer only Goats in Sacrifice ; while those of Mendes revere the Goats, and offer offer to their God none but Sheep. The former give this Reason for their having a veneration for Sheep: Hercules, say they, being passionately desirous to see Jupiter, this God cloath'd himself with the Skin of a Ram, and appeared to him under that Disguise. This, according to the Historian, is the Reason why those of Thebais represent Jupiter with a Ram's Head, look upon that Animal as sacred, and abstain from offering any of them in Sacrifice, except once a year, on the day of Jupiter's Festival; when, to eternize the Memory of his Appearance to Hercules, they sacrifice one of them, cover with its Skin the Statue of the God, and place by it that of his Son, as if he was appearing to him anew.

I am informed, says Herodotus, that the Egyptians took their Hercules into the number of their twelve great Gods; For, as to the Greek Hercules, adds he, I have been able to learn nothing of him in the Country. Whence we may conclude, that it was not from the Greeks the Egyptians received the Name of that God; but that, on the contrary, the Greeks had learned it from the Egyptians. And what persuades me of it, Amphitryon and Alcmena, whom the Greeks give out to be the Father and Mother of Hercules, were Natives of Egypt. Add to this, that the Egyptians have no knowledge of Neptune, nor of the Dioscuri; how then should they have learned from the Greeks the Name of Hercules, without so much as having ever heard of their other Gods?

Herodotus, who appears to have been particularly inquisitive about what concerns this God, tells us, that in order to his better Information, he had gone to Tyre, a Phœnician City, because he had heard that Hercules had a famous Temple in that City; that accordingly he found that Temple adorn'd with magnificent Presents, and that there were two Statues of that God, the one of Gold, and the other of a precious Stone, which cast a great Lustre during the Night; that he had ask'd the Priests, if this Temple was ancient, to which they answer'd, that it was as old as the City, which had stood two thousand three hundred Years; a Date ancienter than the Greeks. He adds, that there was in the same City another Temple, dedicated to Hercules Thasius, and that having gone over to Thasos, he had there seen a Temple built in honour of that God, by those who carried off Europa; an Event prior to the Birth of the Greek Hercules by five Generations. Whence he concludes, that Hercules is an ancient Divinity, and that the Greeks do well to honour two of them; the one as an immortal God (a), the other as an Hero (b).

The same Historian adds several things besides concerning the Religion of the Egyptians, their Festivals, and their Sacrifices, which I shall quote afterwards.

I am fully persuaded, as I said elsewhere, that Idolatry was not so gross, nor so encumber'd with Ceremonies in its beginnings, as it was afterwards; and that the People I speak of, admitted at first but a small number of Gods, that is the Stars and the Elements. If we even credit Plutarch, we must not confound with the rest of Egypt, those of Thebais, whose Religion was much purer than that of the other Egyptians. The Inhabitants of Thebais, says this Author, according to the Correction of Vossius, are exempt from those Superstitions, since they acknowledge not any mortal God, admitting for the first Principle only the God Cneph, who has no beginning, and is not subject to death (c). 'Tis even certain, that so many monstrous Figures, under which the Egyptians represented their Gods, were either the effect of Priestcraft, or owing to the Reveries of those of their Philosophers, who believed the Transmigration of Souls. or the Product of the Imagination of Painters and Sculptors. Cicero gives this account of the Roman Gods: The Gods exhibit such Figures as Painters and Sculptors have been pleased to give them. Nos Deos omnes ea facie novimus, qua Pictores Fictoresque voluerunt (1). This Licence does not respect the earlier times, when perhaps the Egyptians them-

(a) Surnam'd Olympian. (b) See Vol. III. The Article of the Heroes.

(c) See what is said of this God afterwards.

(1) De Nat. Deor.

themselves had not so much as dreamed of representing the Gods under the Figures of Men or Animals. I add, that this last sort of Representation owes its Origin to the Doctrine of the Metempsychosis, which taught that the Soul passed after Death into the Body of Animals. Hence those monstrous Figures of so many Egyptian Divinities, whereof some appeared with the Head of a Cat; others with that of an Ape, a Hawk, an Ibis, a Dog, &c. such as those to be seen in the Cabinets of the Curious. But I shall explain this Part of the Egyptian Mythology in another Chapter of this Book.

Herodotus speaks in several places, sometimes of eight great Gods, then of twelve others worshipped by the Egyptians: but he does not name them exactly.

Tho' Isis and Osiris, according to this Author, and all the Ancients, were the most revered Gods of Egypt, and were honour'd in all the Country, whereas the others were only so in particular Nomes (a); yet I am of opinion, that they were neither the chief, nor the most ancient ones. Here is the Order in which they are put by Mythologists. At the head of their List, they put Vulcan and Vesta, that is the Fire; then come Saturn, Rhea, Ceres, Neith, or Minerva, the Nile, or rather the Ocean; for that River was so called of old; Jupiter, Juno, Mars, Hammou, confounded afterwards with Jupiter; and lastly, a third Jupiter surnam'd Uranius, or the Celestial. After these twelve great Gods came Osiris, Isis, Typhon, whom they named likewise Seth, Bebon, or Smyt, according to Plutarch, Neptbe his Wife, Venus, Orus, the Son of Isis, Arueris more ancient than Orus, and the Model of the Apollo of the Greeks: Canopus, Bubastis or Diana, Harpocrates, Anubis, whence came the Greek Mercury: Macedo, the Son of Osiris, Pan, or Mendes, Maro, Triptolemus, Hercules, Mercury Trismegistus, Anteus, Busiris and Prometheus: Lastly, Scrapis, whom some Authors confound with Osiris.

I should have set at the head of this Catalogue,
Cneph,

(a) This word signifies the different Prefectures of Egypt.

Cneph, the God of Thebais, a Being eternal and immortal, whom they look'd upon as the Author of all things. It was this first Principle whom they represented at Diospolis, under the Figure of a Man, who had a Plume of Feathers upon his Head, and held in his Hand a Scepter and a Girdle. Out of his Mouth came an Egg, whence sprung forth Phta, or the World, as we have explain'd at more length in the Article of the Egyptian Theogony. The great Chronicle, cited by M. Fourmont (1), gives a different List, and seems to confine the number of the Egyptian Gods to eight, and their Demi-Gods to nine. The former are Memnon, Vulcan, the Sun, Agathodæmon, Chronos, Isis, Osiris, another whom it does not name, lastly Typhon. The Demi Gods are Orus, Mars, Anubis, Hercules, Apollo, Ammon, Tithois, Sofus, Jupiter; whereupon I shall make three Remarks. First, that this Chronicle cannot be of primitive Antiquity; for Herodotus speaking of the Gods adored in Egypt, makes no mention of their Demi-Gods. He even positively says, that the Egyptians were not acquainted with any Hero, that is, with any Demi-Gods. Secondly, that this Chronicle contradicts soundest Antiquity, since it ranks among the Demi-Gods, Jupiter, Apollo, &c. who certainly were of the number of the Great Gods among the Egyptians. But thirdly, 'tis necessary in order to understand the History of all the Religions which were the Offspring of Paganism, to observe that they underwent many Changes; that new Gods were added to them; and that the Worship of the Ancients was sometimes even entirely abolish'd. Thus it is not surprizing to find the Lists which are given of the Gods of some Nations, and the Rank which they hold therein, to be so different.

There would be no end were we to add to these two Lists an infinite number of other Gods, whom every one chose according to his own humour, to be the Objects of his Worship; or those whom the Opinion of the Metempsychosis had hatched, by teaching that the Souls

(1) Rech. Crit.

Souls of great Men passed into the Stars, and sometimes into Animals, or into simple Plants. It was upon this Foundation they fabled, that the Soul of Isis dwelt in the Dog-Star, which they named Sothis; that of Orus, in Orion; that of Osiris, in the Oxen Apis and Mnevis; that of Typhon, in the Constellation of the Bear; those of Mercury, Diana, Apollo, Venus, and Saturn or Chronos, in the Planets of their Name.

After having thus represented the Substance of the ancient Religion of the Egyptians, we must come to some more particular Account of the Gods, whom we have now named, and then explain the Nature of that Worship which was paid to them. But I would premise, that in this Book, I am only to speak of those whose Worship was always confined to Egypt, or which was not admitted till very late into Greece and Italy. The History of the rest, of whom the Knowledge was introduced among the Greeks by the ancient Colonies, and who formed the Religion of that People, shall be the Subject of the third and fourth Volumes, where I shall take care to mark the time of their Transportation.

ARTICLE I.

The History of Osiris and Isis.

According to Herodotus and all the Ancients, Osiris and Isis were the two great Divinities of the Egyptians, and the most generally worshipped in all the Country; and almost the whole Mythology of that ancient People is included in what their Priests fabled about them. What throws a great Obscurity over their History, is, that sometimes they considered them as Persons who had formerly govern'd Egypt with a great deal of Wisdom and Prudence; at other times as Beings of an immortal Nature, who had framed the World, and ranged Matter into the Form which it retains at this very day.

They who make Osiris and Isis to have been human Persons, are all agreed, that they were Brother and Sister; but they differ about their Parents. The most common Opinion is that which Diodorus Siculus reports (1). The Sun, according to this Historian, was the first who reigned in Egypt; Vulcan succeeded him, then Saturn, who having married Rhea his Sister, had by her Isis and Osiris.

To give some light to a Subject so perplex'd, I am first to recite the Egyptian Mythology concerning Isis, Osiris, and Typhon: 2. Explain the Fables which the Greeks have intermix'd with it: 3. Enquire what there may be historical in this Subject: 4. In the last place, speak of the Worship which was paid to those Divinities.

The Egyptians seeing Good and Evil equally prevalent in the World, and not being able to conceive a Being essentially good, to be capable of permitting Evil, far less to be the Author thereof, were the first who invented two Principles, the one good, the other bad, and introduced this Error, which has since made such progress (a). They represented the good Principle under the Name of Osiris, and the bad one under that of Typhon: Hence the Wars and Persecutions of the latter against his Brother, whom he afterwards cut off. As they attributed all the Evil that reign'd in the World to Typhon, so they considered Osiris as the Author of all the Good. The Creation of the World, a long time disputed and retarded by the Machinations of the evil Principle, the Order and Harmony which there prevail'd, were the Work of Osiris: All the Troubles, the Horror, the Wars, and, in a word, all the Evils that ravage the Universe, proceeded from Typhon.

Egyptian Mythology, in relation to Isis and Osiris.

Plutarch, who, in his Treatise of Isis and Osiris, has preserv'd to us ancient Traditions which are no where else to be found, says, three Qualities were acknowledged in the good Principle, of whom, the one performed the Office of Father, and this was Osiris; the other that of Mother, who was Isis; lastly, that of Son, and here is their Orus, the first Production of the Father and Mother. The Egyptians, according to the same Author, vented a thousand other Fables upon the same Subject, which may be seen in the Treatise now quoted; quoted; but the most extravagant of all, in my Opinion, is that notion concerning Isis and Osiris having been conceived in the same Womb, and married in their Mother's Belly, by which Marriage, Isis, at her very Birth, was with child of Arueris. Their Priests related in a thousand different ways, the Wars and Persecutions of Typhon against Osiris his Brother, and Isis his Sister-in-law: And my suppressing the particular Account thereof, is only to save the Reader the trouble of surveying either things contradictory, or an extremely gross System of Physicks.

(a) See what has been said of it in the Treatise of Idolatry.

All the Egyptian Theology was therefore concealed under the Symbols of these two Divinities. Osiris among them was the Sun, the first Object of their Idolatry, and Isis, the Moon; and their very Names have a reference to those two Planets, since in their Language, Osiris denotes, One who sees clear; and Isis, the Ancient, an Expression which among them signify'd the Moon. All the Learned agree, that the Oxen Apis and Mnevis, consecrated to Osiris after his Apotheosis, were the Symbols of the Sun. Thus, whether it was that the Egyptian Priests, to cover the History of this Prince from the eyes of the People, gave out that he was really the Sun, or whether, acknowledging Osiris to have been a mortal Man who had governed Egypt, and conferred many Blessings upon it, they were willing to pass it upon the World, that his Soul was gone to reside in that Orb, still they agreed that he was now become that radiant Luminary, who by the benign Influences of his Beams, diffuses Fertility and Plenty over all, and that to him, Vows, Prayers, and Sacrifices were to be address'd. Thus was the Worship of Osiris confounded with that of the Sun, and that of Isis, with what was paid to the Moon. Thus, the Priests had found the art of making Idolatry not so gross, by saying, it was not a mortal Man, but an eternal Star, which was the Object of publick Adoration.

The Greek and Latin Authors extended still farther this Egyptian Mythology concerning Isis and Osiris, since, according to them, they comprehended all Nature, ture, and all the Gods of that ancient People: There is in the hands of the Antiquaries, a Monument which had been raised by Arrius Balbinus, where this Inscription is to be seen. Goddeſs Iſis, who art one and all things. Plutarch (1) ſays; that at Sais, in the Temple of Minerva, whom he takes to be the ſame with Iſis, there was one to this effect: I am whatever has been, is, and ſhall be; and none among Mortals has ever taken off my Veil. Apuleius (2) puts theſe Words in the mouth of that Goddeſs: I am Nature, the Mother of all things; the Miſtreſs of the Elements, the Beginning of Ages, the Sovereign of the Gods, the Queen of the Manes My Divinity, uniform in itſelf, is worſhipped under different Names, and by different Ceremonies: The Phrygians name me Peſſinuntian, Mother of the Gods; the Athenians, Cecropian Minerva; thoſe of Cyprus, Venus; thoſe of Crete, Diana Dictynna; the Sicilians, Proſerpine; the Eleuſinians, the ancient Ceres; others, Juno, Bellona, Hecate, Rhamnusia; laſtly, the Egyptians and their Neighbours, Iſis, which is my true Name.

According to Herodotus; the Egyptians took Iſis for Ceres, and believ'd that Apollo and Diana were her Children, and that Latona had only been their Nurſe; contrary to the Opinion of the Greeks, who looked upon her as their Mother. According to the ſame Author; Apollo and Orus, Diana and Bubastis, Ceres and Iſis are the ſame: Hence it is, continues he, that Æſchylus makes Diana the Daughter of Ceres.

In fine, the Mythologiſts aſſert that Iſis and Osiris included under different Names almoſt all the Gods of Paganism; ſince, according to them, Iſis is Terra, Ceres, Juno, the Moon, Minerva, Cybele, Venus, Diana; and in one word, all Nature; and this they give for the Reaſon why that Goddeſs was called Myrionyma; that is, who has a thouſand Names. Juſt ſo, in their Opinion, Osiris is Bacchus, or Dionyſius, the Sun, Serapis, Pluto, Ammon, Pan, Apis, Adonis, &c. But 'tis time to come to the hiſtorical Part of this ancient Mythology.

K k

498 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book VI.
thology. Let us begin with what we learn thereof from the Greeks.

History of Isis and Osiris.

What the Greeks thought of Isis. As they would needs reduce all Antiquity to their History, they have not been wanting to give out, that the Fable of Isis was originally from Greece; and therefore have confounded that Goddess with Io, the Daughter of Inachus King of Argos. Ovid, who had collected in his Metamorphoses, most of the ancient Traditions of the Greeks, thus recites this Fable (1).

Jupiter fell in love with Io, and to escape the Fury of Juno who was jealous of this Intrigue, he changed her into a Heifer. Juno, who appear'd to be touch'd with the Beauty of this fair Heifer, ask'd her of him, and Jupiter not daring to refuse her, for fear of increasing her Suspicions, she gave her to the Custody of Argus who had an hundred Eyes, enjoining him to use all his endeavours that she might not be stolen from him. But Jupiter sent Mercury, who having laid the vigilant Keeper fast asleep by the soft Musick of his Flute, cut off his Head, and set Io at liberty. Juno incensed, sent a Fury to persecute that unhappy Princess, who was so tormented with her Stings, that no where could she be at rest, she wandered from Place to Place, cross'd over the Sea, came first to Ilyrium, passed Mount Hæmus, arrived in Scythia, and in the Country of the Cimmerians; and after having wandered thro' several other Countries, she stopp'd at last on the Banks of the Nile, where Jupiter having appeas'd Juno, restored her former Figure. Here it was she brought forth Epaphus; and having died some time after, the Egyptians worshipped her under the Name of Isis.

It is easy to see that this is a true History, disguised by Fictions intermixed with it; but to come to a full discovery of its Truth is exceeding difficult. There are three Opinions about the famous Io.

The

(1) Met. l. 5. Fable of Io.

The first is that of almost all the Greeks (a), who to get the honour to themselves of so renowned a Goddess, gave out that she was the Daughter of Inachus the first King of Argos; that Jupiter ravish'd her, and carried her into the Island of Crete; that he had a Son by her named Epaphus, King of Egypt, Father of Libya (1); that she passed from thence into Egypt, where she married Osiris. The same Authors say, that this Osiris (2) was the same with Apis the Son of Phoroneus, second King of Argos, who having left the Kingdom to Egeleus his Brother, came and settled in Egypt, where he so signaliz'd himself during his Reign, that he was deify'd after his Death, under the Name of Serapis.

According to this Account, the Fable of Ovid is capable of a good enough Explication, by saying that Ia, the Priestess of Juno, was beloved by Jupiter Apis, King of Argos (3); that Niobe his Wife, who was likewise called Juno, having conceived a jealousy of her, put her under the guard of her Uncle Argus, a Man extremely vigilant, which made the Poets give him so many Eyes; that Apis put him to death to recover his Mistress, who to shun the Resentment of Niobe, embark'd in a Ship which bore the figure of a Cow upon its Forecastle, which gave rise to the Story of her Transformation; and that she was afterwards deliver'd of Epaphus: But we must not imagine, as some Authors have done, that she passed into Egypt; and that after having changed her Name, the Egyptians honour'd her as a Goddess, that in a word, she is the same with Isis. As little are we to think, that Serapis is the same with Osiris. I know that St. Augustin, after Varro, derives the Name of Serapis, from that of Apis King of Argos, and the word Soros, which imports a Coffin, because that before they had built a Temple to him, they paid him divine Honours in the Tomb where he was put after his Death (b); for

K k 2

'tis

(a) Apollodorus, l. i. c. 6. Pausanias, Strabo, Diodorus, &c.

(1) See the second Volume. (2) See Diodorus. (3) Voss. de Idol. L. i.

(b) Vossius de Idol. l. 6. derives the Name of Serapis from Sara Nepos, and reckons Serapis is the same with Joseph. M. le Clerc brings it from Sur Abbir, which imports Prince.

'tis pretty probable that St. Augustin is mistaken, by following, as to this Article, the Traditions of the Greeks, adopted long before his time by the Romans. Never did Apis King of Argos come and settle in Egypt, nor was there among that People another Apis, but the Ox which bore that Name, as the learned Marsham (1) undeniably proves. It was the similitude of the Names, and the double Meaning of the word Soros, that led the Greeks to say he was the same with Osiris, because in fact, the Ox was consecrated to him.

The second Opinion, with relation to Io, is that of Pausanias, who reckons that this Princess was really a Native of Greece, but that she was less ancient than the other, of whom we have been now speaking. She was not the Daughter of Inachus, but of Iasus, Son to Triopas, seventh King of Argos; and to be sure, if Danaus and Egyptus his Grandsons lived only about the 1420th Year before Jesus Christ, which is the time when the first of these Princes passed into Greece, Io must needs have lived long after Inachus. We may add, in confirmation of this Opinion, what Herodotus says (2), that Io was stolen away by Phenician Merchants to the flourishing City Argos; for besides, that this City got its Name only from Argus its fourth King, is it likely that it was a flourishing City in the time of Inachus its Founder?

We grant there was in Greece a Princess named Io, whether she was the Daughter of Inachus or of Iasus; that she was beloved by a Prince who bore the Name of Jupiter, and that he is the very same whom ancient Mythology has called the Jupiter of Argos (a)! We even allow what Herodotus says in the beginning of his History, that this Princess was carry'd off by Phenician Merchants, in reprisal for the Rape of Europa the Daughter of Argos, King of Phenicia; but she never passed into Egypt, and cannot be confounded with Isis, who is more ancient than she by several Ages, without overthrowing all the Traditions of the Egyptians. Io

was

(1) In Chronic.

(2) L. 1.

(a) See the History of Jupiter, Vol. 2.

was persecuted by Juno, who made her wander over the whole face of the Earth; Isis, who met with the same Treatment from her Brother-in-law Typhon, never came out of Egypt. The one, after having been Mistress to a King of Argos, was carry'd off by Strangers; the other was married to her Brother Osiris, and lived with him in great Concord and Harmony. Isis taught the Egyptians several useful Arts of Life; we have no such Account given of Io. What then could give the Greeks a handle to confound these two Persons? I answer, it was the introduction of the Worship of Isis into Greece, especially into the City Argos. For, as Herodotus judiciously remarks, the introduction of the Worship of some God into a foreign Country, was considered as the Birth of that same God in the Place where that Worship was established. Inachus taught the Greeks to pay honour to Isis, the Greeks looked upon her as his Daughter. Cecrops afterwards brought into Attica the Worship of Minerva, who was the Goddess of Sais his Country; and this, in like manner, gave rise to the Fable, that this Goddess, whom the Greeks named Athene, was that Prince's Daughter. Hence we see, how just the Reflection of Herodotus is, and at the same time, that we need seek for no other Origin of this Fable.

As for the Persecutions of Juno, which Ovid so particularly describes, we may say with a great deal of probability, that the Poet alludes to the Jealousy of the King of Argos's Wife, who perhaps caused her Rival to suffer many Severities; and if the Husband was called Jupiter, the Wife might very well pass under the Name of Juno. But 'tis time to relate the History of Isis and Osiris.

The Egyptians, according to Diodorus Siculus (1), and Plutarch (2), assert that this Princess was born in their Country; that she match'd with Osiris; that he liv'd with her in perfect Harmony, and that both of them made it their business to polish and civilize their Subjects, to teach them Agriculture, and several other necessary Arts of Life. Diodorus adds, that Osiris having form'd a design of making an Expedition to the Indies, to conquer them, not so much by force of Arms as by gentle Means, rais'd an Army made up of Men and Women; and after having settled Isis Regent of his Kingdom, and left about her Mercury and Hercules, the former to be her chief Counsellor, and the other the Lieutenant of his Provinces, he set out upon his Expedition, where he was so successful, that all the Countries whither he came subjected themselves to his Empire. His Journey was a perpetual Triumph. The same Author says, he first over-run Æthiopia, where he rais'd Dykes against the Inundations of the Nile; that from thence he travers'd Arabia, the Indies, and came next into Europe, invaded Thrace and the neighbouring Countries, left every where Marks of his Beneficence, reduced Men, then intirely savage, to the sweets of civil Society, taught them Agriculture, to build Cities and Towns, and returned crown'd with Glory, after having caus'd Columns and other Monuments to be erected in the Places where he had pass'd, upon which his Exploits were engraved. Here, by the by, are the Conquests, so much celebrated by the Poets, of the famous Dionysus or Bacchus, as we shall prove elsewhere.

(1) L. 1.

(2) Treatise of Isis and Osiris.

This Prince being returned to Egypt, found that his Brother Typhon had formed a Party against the Government, and made himself formidable; Julius Firmicus (1) adds, that he had even debauched his Sister-in-law Isis. Osiris, who was a pacifick Prince, attempted to calm the ambitious Spirit of Typhon; but he instead of submitting himself to his Brother, thought on nothing but persecuting him, and laying Ambuscades for him. Plutarch (2) informs us in what manner he at last took away his Life. Typhon, says he, having invited him to a sumptuous Entertainment, propos'd to the Guests after the Repast, that they would measure themselves in a Chest of an exquisite Workmanship, promising to give it to him who was of the same size. Osiris having enter'd into it in his turn, the Conspirators rose up from

(1) De Error. fal. Rel.

(2) De Isid. & Osir.

he Table, shut the Chest, and threw it into the Nile.

Isis inform'd of her Husband's tragical End, went about in search of his Corpse; and being informed that it was in Phenicia, hid under a Tamarind-Tree, where the Waves had thrown it out, she went to the Court of Byblos, where she enter'd into the service of Astarte, to have the better Opportunity of discovering it. At length, after infinite pains, she found it, and made such heavy Lamentations, that the King of Byblos's Son died thro' grief for her; which affected the King his Father to such a degree, that he allowed Isis to carry off the Body, and repair to Egypt. Typhon inform'd of the mourning of his Sister-in-law, opened the Chest, divided the Body of Osiris in pieces, and caused the several Members to be carried into different Places of Egypt. Isis carefully recollected his dissipated Members, inclosed them in Coffins, and consecrated a Representation of the Privities which she could not find: Hence the use of the Phallus, so celebrated in all the religious Ceremonies of the Egyptians. In fine, after having shed a flood of Tears, she caused him to be interr'd at Abydos, a Town situated to the west of the Nile. The Ancients, however, place the Tomb of Osiris in other Places, which is owing to Isis's having caused one to be erected for every part of her Husband's Body, in the very Place where she had found it.

In the mean time, Typhon was contriving how to secure his new Empire; but Isis being recovered somewhat from her distress, drew her Troops together in haste, and putting them under the Conduct of Orus her Son, this young Prince pursued the Tyrant, and vanquished him in two pitch'd Battels.

ARTICLE II.

History of Typhon.

The Fable of Typhon is one of the darkest Mysteries of Mythology. The Greeks and Latins, who knew not the Origin of it, have only darken'd it more, by endeavouring, according to their Custom, to bring it over to their History. Founding upon the Traditions which they had learned by their commerce with the Egyptians, they made of Typhon a Monster equally horrid and fantastical, whom the jealous Juno, said they, had produced from the Earth, to be avenged of Latona her Rival. That Goddess, according to a Hymn which is commonly ascribed to Homer, provok'd that Jupiter should have become Father of Minerva without her, would needs on her side be a Mother, without the Assistance of her Husband. To bring which about, she went to the Assembly of the Gods, and complain'd that while she alone was deem'd worthy to share Jupiter's Bed, this God had slighted her so far, as to bring into the World, without her Concurrence, the fairest and wisest Goddess of Olympus, while, during the whole time of their conjugal State, they had only had a God so ugly, that they were obliged to banish him from Heaven. After this Speech, she came down to Earth, whence she caused Vapours to arise, which formed the tremendous Typhon. Hesiod, without having recourse to Juno's Resentment, says (1) only that this Giant was the Son of Tartarus and Terra. Most of the Latin Poets have copied the Greek ones. Manilius expresses himself thus :

. merito Typhonis habentur
Horrendæ sedes, quem Tellus sæva profudit,
Cum bellum Cælo peperit (2).

Ovid does not recede much from this Opinion, when he makes the Serpent Python, who is the same with Typhon, as we shall prove in the Sequel, spring from the Steams of the Mud which the Deluge had left upon the Earth. “ The slimy Earth being warm'd by the “ heat of the Sun, formed not only Animals which “ were known before, but Monsters too, till then un“ known. She form'd in spight of herself, the mon“ strous Python, a Serpent of a new Species, who by “ the enormous size of his Body, became the Terrour
 “ of Men.”

Ergo ubi Diluvio tellus lutulenta recenti
Solibus æthereis, atque recanduit æstu,

Edidit

*Edidit innumeras Species, partimque figuras
Rettulit antiquas, partim nova monstra creavit;
Illa quidem nollet, sed te quoque, maxime Python,
Tum genuit (1).*

Apollodorus makes Typhon the most terrible of all Monsters (2). He had, says he, an hundred Heads, and from his hundred Mouths issued devouring Flames, and Howlings so dreadful that he equally terrified Gods and Men. His Body, whose upper part was cover'd with Feathers, and the Extremity entwin'd with Serpents, was so vast that he touched the Skies with his Head. He had to Wife, says this Author, Echidna, and his Offspring were, the Gorgon, Geryon, Cerberus, the Hydra of Lerna, the Sphinx, and the Eagle which prey'd upon the unfortunate Prometheus; in a word, all the Monsters that were hatch'd in the Country of Fables (a). Typhon, adds Hyginus (3), no sooner sprung from the Earth than he resolved to declare War against the Gods, and to revenge the Overthrow of the Giants: For we must take care to distinguish the War of the Giants from that of Typhon, which some Authors confound, against the Opinion of Apollodorus, who makes Typhon only born after their Defeat (4). Wherefore he advanced against Heaven, and so affrighted the Gods by his dreadful Figure, that they all fled. Egypt appear'd a proper Place to skreen them from the Attacks of this formidable Enemy; but as he gave them no respite, they were obliged to assume the Figure of different Animals. Jupiter transformed himself into a Ram, Apollo into a Raven, Bacchus into a Goat, Diana into a Cat, Juno into a Cow, Venus into a Fish, and Mercury into a Swan*.

Duxque

(1) Met. l. 1. v. 434. (2) L. 2.

(a) Hesiod, who in his Theogony distinguishes Typhoeë from Typhon, paints the former much in the same way, and says, that from him came the boisterous Winds. Then speaking of Typhon, he says, that he was married to Echidna in the Dens of Syria, and had by her the Children I have now named.

(3) Fab. 152. (4) Apol. Hesiod. Ovid. &c.

* Probably it should be read Cigogne a Stork, which the Ibis is thought to be.

. Duxque Gregis fit Jupiter, &c.

Delius in Corvo, Proles Semeleia Capro,

Fele soror Phæbi, niveâ Saturnia Vaccâ,

Pisce Venus latuit, Cyllenius Ibidis alis (1).

Manilius confirms the same thing, when speaking of Venus and Adonis :

Scilicet in piscem sese Cytherea novavit,

Anguipedem alatis humeris Typhona furentem,

Cum Babylonias submersa profugit in undas,

Inseruitque suos squamosis piscibus ignes. (2).

Jupiter, continues Apollodorus, having resum'd his Courage, darted a Thunderbolt against Typhon, and terrify'd him so with an adamantine Scythe which he had in his Hand, that he obliged him to give way. The God pursued him as far as Mount Casius, in the Extremities of Syria ; but Typhon having seized him by the middle of the Body, wrested from him his Scythe ; and having therewith cut off his Legs and Arms, carry'd him into Cilicia, shut him up in a Cave, and put him under the Custody of a Monster, half Woman half Serpent. Mercury and Pan having found a way to surprize the vigilance of this Keeper, restored to Jupiter his Legs and Arms, who mounting a Chariot drawn by winged Horses, pursued Typhon with Thunderbolts to the very inmost recesses of Arabia. Thence he brought him back to Thrace, where that Giant having pluck'd up a Mountain by the roots, darted it against Jupiter, who drove it back upon him with a Thunderbolt : The Blood with which it was cover'd, was the occasion of its being called Mount Ilemus. Typhon having at last retired into Sicily, was there buried, under Mount Ætna.

Such are the Fables which the Poets and Historians have published, vying with one another, in relation to Typhon. What Plutarch (3) and Diodorus (4) inform us about this Fact, is no doubt more historical ; but these two Authors have not fail'd, according to the Genius of their Nation, to intermix likewise several ridiculous Fictions with their Narration ; and besides, not being

(1) Met. l. 5.

(2) L. 4.

(3) In Isid.

(4) L. 1.

being very exact in Chronology, and having but a confused Knowledge of the primitive Histories of the World renew'd after the Deluge, amongst which this which I am now explaining is undoubtedly one, we must be very cautious how we follow their Direction.

Modern Authors have offer'd Conjectures upon this Subject, which don't appear to agree with the true Tradition. Some, among whom is Gerard Vossius (1), are of opinion that Typhon was the same with Og, King of Basban, a Country which the Scripture calls the Land of Giants (2). Og their King, of whom it is said (3), that he alone remain'd of the Race of the Giants, Solus quippe Og rex Basan remansit, ex reliquis Gigantibus; was so bulky that his Bed was nine Cubits in length, and four in breadth. The Rabbins have given such extravagant Accounts of the Stature of this Prince, that I am ashamed to repeat them.

Vossius founds his Opinion, 1. Upon the resemblance between the Names of those two Giants; for, says he, Typhon comes from τῦφω, uro, accendo, and Og signifies, ussit, ustulavit. 2. Upon what the Poets say of Typhon's Bed, which looks as if they had been acquainted with that of the King of Basban, to which, Virgil, he thinks, is particularly alluding in the ninth Book of the Æneid, in these Words, durumque cubile*; but 'tis evident that the Poet in this place is only speaking of the manner how this unfortunate Giant was buried under a Mountain, conformably to the Ideas of the other Poets. Ovid expresses himself thus (4):

*Vasta Giganteis ingesta est Insula membris
Trinacris, & magnis subjectum molibus urget Æthereas ausum sperare Typhoëa sedes.*

His third Reason is fetch'd from the Place where these two Giants were overthrown, since Homer says, that it was εἰς Ἀσίαν, which is undoubtedly to be understood of Syria, where the King of Basban reign'd. But this Reason proves nothing, as we shall see afterwards.

Bochart

(1) De Idol. l. 1. 26.

(2) Deut. iii. 13.

(3) Deut. iii. 14.

* Æn. l. 9. v. 715.

(4) Met. l. 5.

Bochart (1) imagines that Typhon was the same with Enceladus, relying upon this, that the Poets name the one indifferently for the other, and make them both perish in the same manner in the Island of Sicily; but it will still remain a question, who this Enceladus was. There are Authors who will have it that Typhon was King of Sicily; for which you may consult Boccace (2), who quotes for this Theodontius, whose Writings are lost. There are likewise some who take him to be the same as Esau, and they have been at pains to find out a Conformity between them.

Huetius, who cannot help thinking that Moses was the sole Object of all the poetical Fables, insists at very great length, in proving (3), that Typhon was the Legislator of the Hebrews, grown extremely odious to the Egyptians, by the destruction of their First-born; but without entering into the consideration of a Parallel, in which most of the heads seem not very natural, I shall only make one Remark, namely, that Typhon and Osiris are much more ancient than Moses; and that the idolatrous Worship of the Oxen Apis and Mnevis, consecrated to Osiris, was spread thro' Egypt before the Israelites enter'd there, since it was upon this Model, according to Selden, that Aaron made the Golden Calf, which the Jews worshipped in the Wilderness.

To establish now my own Opinion with relation to Typhon, in the first place 'tis certain, from the most uncontroverted Testimonies we have now remaining of prophane Authors, especially from Diodorus and Plutarch, that the Fable we are now upon is Egyptian, and I am much of Abbé Sevin's mind, as to Osiris, that he is the same with Menes or Mesraim. As the solid Reasons he uses in proof of this Article, are known to all those who have read his Dissertation, I need not repeat them here: I shall only add one which has escaped him. The Ox Mnevis, consecrated to the Sun, whereof Osiris was the Symbol, seems to carry an Allusion to the Name of that ancient King, called either Menes, or Menas,

Menas, or Mneus; Ælian even (1) names this Ox, μενὲς, which leaves no room to doubt of its having been called after the name of the King to whom it was consecrated; and this King being Osiris, as all are agreed, it is evident that Osiris and Menes are but one and the same Person.

But I am not of his opinion as to Typhon, whom he would have to be the same with Chus; I am rather inclin'd to think that he was the Brother of Osiris, whom Plutarch, upon the Authority of Manetho, calls Sebon. This Prince dissatisfied with Osiris, who had confined him in the lower Egypt, in the neighbourhood of Pelusium, towards the Extremities of Delta, conceived a Hatred against him, which wrought in his Breast till he had taken away his Life, in the manner as Plutarch relates.

We are not very certain, as to the Circumstances of Typhon's death; but whether he was drown'd in the Marshes of the Lake Serbonis, where Herodotus says the Egyptians had a Story amongst them, that he lay conceal'd (2); or whether he died in the Battle which he fought with his Nephew Orus, as has been said, the Egyptian Priests made the People in after-times believe, that the Gods had interested themselves remarkably in avenging Osiris, having destroyed with a Thunder-bolt his cruel Persecutor. Stephanus, whose Words I quote below, gives this for the reason, why the City Hieropolis, near the Lake Serbonis, was called The City of Blood, because there it was that the Tyrant had been thunder-struck: Hence the mysterious Fable of Typhon's having been swallow'd up in a Whirl of Fire. 'Tis very probable that Typhon was only the Surname of the Prince I speak of, and that it was given him afterwards, only in allusion to the Tradition of his having been consumed by Fire; as I shall shew, when I come to consider the most natural Etymology of the Word.

Thus perished the cruel Tyrant of Egypt; by his Death he left the Kingdom to young Orus, under the Regency of Isis his Mother. Without entring here into

(1) De Animal.

(2) L. 3.

into the grounds of the irreconcilable Enmity between the two Brothers, whereof the Egyptians relate so many Circumstances, as may be seen in F. Kircher (1); 'tis probable enough, that the Ambition of a turbulent and haughty Prince had a considerable share in it; but Love we must know was likewise in the play. 'Tis alledged, that Osiris lived in too much familiarity with Neptbé, Typhon's Wife, which inflamed his Jealousy to a high degree; but Julius Firmicus asserts, that it was Typhon, on the contrary, who was enamour'd of Isis: And if the Authority of Plutarch, who represents to us this Queen as the Model of conjugal Love, which she carried even to the most extravagant and unbounded Idolatry; ought to weigh more than that of Julius Firmicus, who, without doubt, has not the same Credit in affairs of Antiquity; I find, on the other hand, that the Greek Historian will supply Firmicus with two pretty strong Arguments for his Opinion. The first is, his asserting, that during the absence of Osiris, which was very long, Typhon raised no Commotions in the State. Considering how ambitious he was, would he not have improv'd a Circumstance so favourable, if Love had not hinder'd? The second is, what we find also in Plutarch; that Typhon, having been made Prisoner upon the loss of the Battle (2), was put in chains by Orus, who deliver'd him up to his Mother Isis, and that she gave him his Liberty; which so highly exasperated the young Prince, that he snatch'd her Diadem from her, instead of which Mercury her Confident crown'd her with another: Circumstances which prove two things; first, that Isis certainly had an inclination to Typhon. Is it to be conceiv'd, that she would have set the Murderer of her Husband at liberty, had she not entertain'd a violent Love to him? The second is, that the title of Confident, to say no worse, which the Poets in later times gave to Mercury the Son of Maia, agrees to this Egyptian Mercury, who was that Queen's Confident, as we learn from Diodorus.

But

(1) Oed. Ægypt.

(2) Loc. cit.

But whatever be in that, there is no great difficulty to discover the principal Grounds of the Fables that are superadded to this History. As Typhon had persecuted Osiris, whose Reign had made the fine Arts flourish, and been a Model of Justice and mild Administration, whereas that of Typhon had been nothing but a Series of Crimes and Cruelties; the Egyptians took a great deal of pains to bring an odium upon the Memory of the latter, whom they represented only as a Monster. But in vain have they darken'd their ancient Tradition; Truth finds its way through the Fables which they have intermixed with it. In fact, by the hundred Heads of Typhon, we learn in what manner he had carried on his pernicious Designs, and how many Persons of Power and Interest he had artfully drawn into his Party, that is, the chief and best Heads of all Egypt. The number of his Hands denoted, no doubt, his Strength, and that of his Troops: The Serpents that were wreathed about his Fingers and Thighs, represented his Cunning and Address. His Body cover'd with Feathers and Scales, equally denoted the Rapidity of his Conquests, and his invincible Force. By the Enormity of his Stature, and the Length of his Arms, which were said to reach from one end of the world to the other, Posterity were given to understand, that he had push'd his Conquests to the Extremities of Egypt, and that his Power had no bounds: By the Clouds which encompassed his Head, that the whole Business of his Life had been to embroil the State: And by the Fire which issued from his Mouth, that he had carried Devastation wherever he pass'd. For this reason he was represented at Cynopolis, sometimes under the figure of a Wolf; and though Strabo, who takes notice of the Worship which that City paid to that Animal, does not assign the reason, 'tis however pretty probable, that it was in order to appease Typhon, who is said by Plutarch (1) to have been transformed into a Wolf; but he was more frequently represented under the figure of a Crocodile, because of his

(1) In Isis.

his resemblance to that Animal, equally formidable for its Wiles and Cruelty : or under that of a Hippopotamus ; which makes Plutarch say (1), that the Egyptians consecrated to Typhon the most stupid of Animals, namely the As ; and the two of the greatest fierceness, the Crocodile and the Hippopotamus (a).

This Tradition of the Egyptians was not unknown to the Greeks, and I insist that all the Fables they have deliver'd about their Typhon and Pythou, are to be refer'd to it. For first, what did Ovid mean by the Serpent Pythou, sprung from the Slime of the Deluge, and slain by Apollo, who drain'd almost his Quiver upon this Monster ?

Hunc Deus arcitenens, &c.

*Mille gravem telis, exhaustâ pene pharetrâ,
Perdidit effuso per vulnera nigra veneno* (2).

Is he not plainly making an allusion to Typhon, whose Name is the same by a simple Transposition ? If he makes him a monstrous Serpent, was not Typhon represented under that figure ? without having recourse, with Bochart, to the Word Petben, which in the Hebrew Language imports a Serpent. If the same Poet makes him spring from the Slime of the Deluge, does he not point out thereby the bad Steams which rise in Egypt, after the Waters of the Nile are withdrawn ? In fine, if he says that Apollo slew him with his arrows, does he not conceal under this Emblem the Victory of Orus over Typhon, or at least the Triumph of the Sun-beams over the bad Steams of Egypt ?

Secondly, if the Greek Poets set Typhon at the head of the Giants, in the War which they wage with the Gods, do they not manifestly allude to the Persecutions of that Prince against his Brother, who has always been look'd upon as the great Divinity of Egypt ? If they make all the Gods to fly into this Kingdom, where, to shelter themselves from the Pursuits of that monstrous

(1) In Isid.

(a) We learn from Ælian, that Typhon was transform'd to a Crocodile : And upon that Tradition was founded the Aversion, which the Inhabitants of Heliopolis had to that Animal. De An. l. 10. c. 21.

(2) Met. L. 1.

strous Giant, they are obliged to lie conceal'd under the figure of several Animals, is not this their meaning, that the Grandees and Satraps of Egypt, who were of Osiris's party, upon the death of this Prince, hid themselves in the most remote Caves, or perished most of them by the Arms of the Conspirators? The Figures which the Poets make them assume, perhaps denote that Osiris having divided his Army into different Corps, had given them for Ensigns the Figures of those Animals, as we learn from Plutarch (1).

Thirdly, what other Meaning has Apollodorus (2), when he relates so mysteriously that Mercury and Pan restored to Jupiter his Hands and Feet, which Typhon had cut off, but that these two Princes, whom Diodorus (3) acknowledges to have lived under the Reign of Osiris, and whom he speaks of as two Persons exceeding wise, by their prudent Management recover'd his Affairs, which were in a very bad situation, regain'd his Troops, which his Brother had debauched from him, and by supplying him with Money, which is the Sinews of War, fortified his declining Party.

Fourthly, although the Greek Poets and Historians make Typhon perish in different places, and out of Egypt, where it is certain he died, yet we see by the Circumstances which they join to his Fable, that they follow the Traditions of that People, which informs us that he was killed with Lightning, or which comes to the same, that he was swallow'd up in a fiery Whirlwind. Homer (4) says, that this Giant was destroy'd ἐν Ἀρίμοις : The Ground, says the Poet, rung under their Feet, as when Jupiter incensed, brandishes his Thunder upon the Mount which covers Typhœus in the Country of the Arimæi, where the Tomb of this Giant is said to be. Madam Dacier (5) alledges, that by this word ἐν Ἀρίμοις; Homer intended the Island Ænaria, or Pithecusa, in the Sea of Tuscany; and this, according to her, is what Virgil had in his eye in these Verses :

. . . Dæ-

(1) De Isid. & Osir. (2) Lib. 1. (3) Lib. 2. (4) Il. 6.

(5) Her Note upon this Passage.

. Durumque cubile

Inarime, Jovis imperiis imposta Typhæo (1).

But this Poet was certainly mistaken by aiming at too servile an Imitation of Homer, and by making but one word of Inarime. The Learned are divided about the Situation of the Country of the Arimæans; there are some who, as Strabo tells us (2), place them in Phrygia, others in Cilicia; but certain it is that this Country can only be meant of Syria; and Strabo who is of this opinion, quotes a Fragment of Possidonius (3), who says that it is neither Cilicia nor any other Country that Homer intends in this place, but Syria itself, peopled by the Arimæans, whom the Greeks call Arimans or Arimians, 'Αριμάνες, 'Αρίμης.

This same Author adds (4), that Typhon was thunderstruck near Antioch, and that his being buried in the Earth was the Cause of the River Orontes springing from thence, which in former times bore the Name of this Monster. In fine, Josephus leaves no room to doubt of what Strabo says, since he asserts, that Aramus was the Father of the Aramæans, whom the Greeks, says he, call Syrians.

The other Poets are not agreed as to the Place where Typhon perish'd, but all of them allude to his sad Catastrophe. Accordingly Pindar informs us, that Jupiter kept him imprison'd in the Caves of Mount Ætna (5), where, according to Ovid, he vomited those Torrents of Flames which rise from the Cavities of that Mountain.

Degravat Ætna caput, sub qua resupinus arenas

Ejectat, flammamque fero vomit ore Typhæus (6).

The same Poet says much the same thing in his Fasts (7):

Alta jacet vasti super ora Typhoëus Ætna,

Cujus anbelantis ignibus ardet humus.

Silius Italicus gives Mount Ætna the very Name of Typhon:

Tum Catare ardenti nimium vicina Typhæo (8).

What the other Poets, such as Virgil (9), Statius (10), Claudian,

(1) Æn. l. 9.

(2) Lib. 12.

(3) Lib. 16.

(4) Lib. 5.

(5) Pyth.

(6) Met. l. 5.

(7) Lib. 4.

(8) Lib. 14.

(9) Æn. l. 3. v. 570, &c.

(10) Theb. 3.

Claudian, Cornelius Severus, &c. say of Enceladus, is to be understood of Typhon, since, according to Philostrophus (1) and the more knowing Mythologists, Typhon and Enceladus denote the same Person.

To the Poets we may join the Mythologists, as Hyginus (2), and several others, who unanimously agree, that under Mount Ætna Typhon was buried.

Those of the Ancients who have not looked upon Sicily and Mount Ætna as the Tomb of Typhon, depart not far at least from the same Tradition, since they have always chosen for that purpose, Places of a sulphureous quality, distinguished by subterraneous Fires and Earthquakes, as in Campania, or rather near Mount Vesuvius, as Diodorus alledges (3), or in the Phlegræan Plains, as Strabo relates (4), or in a place in Asia, whence there springs out of the Earth sometimes Water, and at other times Fire, as Pausanias has it (5). In a word, in all the Mountains, and in every other Place which was remarkable for Exhalations or Eruptions, as is well remark'd by the ancient Scholiast on Pindar, upon the first Pythick, after the Historian Artemon, who says, Every Mountain that throws out Fire, buries under it the unhappy Typhon, who is there devoured by the Flames; Circumstances, which carrying an Allusion to the Name of Typhon, to the account which the Egyptians gave of the manner of his Death, and to the Allegories which they draw from it, inform us, that the Poets and Historians, both Greek and Latin, have, amidst their most absurd Fables, transmitted down to us the Traditions of that ancient People.

Fifthly, the Opinion of the ancient Poets, that Thunder was the most formidable Instrument of divine Vengeance, and that those were impious Persons who were struck with it, came likewise from Egypt, where we see it was given out, in order to make Typhon more odious, that in this manner he had been punished by the Gods; tho' it was well known, that he had lost his life in the last Battel which Orus his Nephew fought with him.

L 1 2

Virgil

(1) Vit. Apollon. (2) Fab. 151. (3) Lib. 4. (4) Lib. 5.
(5) In Arc.

Virgil has preserv'd to us this traditional Opinion about those who had been thunder-struck, in making Anckises say : “ Odious as I am to the Immortals, ever “ since the Father of Gods and Men struck me with “ his Thunder, I drag an useless load of Years (1).”

Jam pridem invisus Divis & inutilis annos

Demoror, ex quo me Divûm Pater atque Hominum Rex Fulminis afflavit ventis & contigit igni.

Upon which it is proper to consult Servius and La Cerda.

Sixthly, we learn from Plutarch, that not only the Opinions of the Greek Philosophers, such as Heracitus, Empedocles, Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle, and others, about the Formation of the World, but also those of the Poets, are borrowed from the Traditions of the Egyptians with relation to Typhon and Osiris ; for what other foundation had Hesiod for speaking in the manner he does of the Chaos, Terra, Erebus, and Love, but those same Traditions, since by Terra he means Isis ; by Love, Osiris ; and by Tartarus, Typhon ; as Plutarch also informs us.

Seventhly, Typhon was become so odious to the Egyptians, that they even had an abhorrence to every thing that bore any resemblance to him ; for which reason, they had an annual Custom of throwing over a Rock, all the Asses that were of a red Colour, because they resembled that Tyrant, who had been red-hair'd. The Sea was likewise an Abomination to them, because they believ'd it was Typhon. But as much as they hated the Name of that Tyrant, so much did they honour the Memory of the beneficent Isis and Osiris.

ARTICLE III.

The History of the Worship paid to Isis and Osiris.

Isis having died some time after her Son's Victory over Typhon, the Egyptians paid Adoration to her with her Husband Osiris, as to Divinities ; and because they had apply'd themselves, during their Reign, to teach Agriculture, the Ox and the Cow became their Symbols.

Festivals

(1) Æn 1. 2. 647.

Festivals were instituted to their Honour, where several infamous Rites were afterwards introduced. There the infamous Image of the Phallus which Isis had consecrated, was carried in Procession, and it became the Symbol of Fruitfulness, tho' in its original Institution it had only been the mark of Isis's Passion for Osiris her Husband.

One of the chief Ceremonies in the Festivals of Osiris, was the Appearance of the Ox Apis, that was to succeed that which the Priests had drowned in the sacred Fountain, or which had died a natural Death. This Ox, whom the Priests nourish'd with so much care, and for whom all Egypt had such a veneration, was look'd upon as a God. To gain some credit to this Superstition, they said he represented the Soul of Osiris, which after that Prince's death had retired into that Animal, and chose to dwell there rather than any where else, because the Ox was the Symbol of Agriculture, which that Prince had taken so much care to improve.

Herodotus tells us, that this Ox was to be black over all the Body, with a square white Mark upon the Forehead : Upon the Back he was to have the figure of an Eagle, a Knot under the Tongue in the figure of a Beetle, the Hairs of the Tail double ; and, according to Pliny, a white Mark upon the right Side, which, as we learn from Ammianus Marcellinus and Ælian, was to resemble the Crescent of the Moon. And then the last Qualification was an extraordinary Generation, his Mother having conceived him by a Clap of Thunder (a). Porphyry (1), whose Design was to turn the ancient Theology of the Egyptians and other Nations into Allegories, says, that all these Marks had a reference to the Sun and Moon, to whom the Ox Apis was consecrated : That the black Hair which was to be the Colour of his Body in general, represented the scorching Influence of the Sun upon Bodies ; and that the white Spot which he had in his Forehead, and the Crescent which he bore upon the Side, were Symbols of the

(a) See Pliny, Plutarch, Diodorus, &c.

(1) De Abf.

Moon. This Author might have added, that the Eagle and the Beetle were also the Symbols of the Sun.

Without examining into these Myſteries, I am of opinion, that the Priests imprinted the Marks I have been ſpeaking of, upon ſome young Calves which they brought up ſecretly : And to remove any ſuſpicion of the Impoſture (a), they took care that their God Apis ſhould ſometimes be long before he appear'd.

The Feſtival of Apis laſted ſeven days : They went in crouds to bring him from the place where he was found ; the Priests led the Proceſſion, and every one was very deſirous to receive him into his Houſe. They believed that the Children who had ſmell'd his Breath, acquired a prophetick Gift, as Pliny, Solinus, and Lucian relate.

We learn from Pliny (1), that this God had two Stalls, or rather two Temples, Delubra ; whereas Herodotus (2) only ſays, it was a Hall, the Work of Pſammeticus, which, inſtead of Columns, was ſupported by Coloſſal Statues, twelve or ſixteen Cubits high (b).

Be that as it will, on the Day of Oſiris's Feſtival, the Priests conducted the Ox Apis to the Banks of the Nile, and drowned him with a great deal of Ceremony, and that preciſely on the Day, beyond which, according to their ſacred Books, he was not to be permitted to live (c). He was embalm'd and interr'd at Memphis, and after that, the Priests were permitted to enter into the Temple of Serapis, a Privilege which they were forbidden as long as the Feſtival laſted. After the Death of the Ox Apis, the People mourn'd and made lamentation, as if Oſiris had been now dead : The Priests cut off their Hair ; which in Egypt was a ſign of the deepeſt Mourning ; and this Mourning laſted till they got another Ox to appear, reſembling the former in the ſame Marks.

(a) St. Auguſtin was of opinion, that the Devils ſetting the Mark which we have here mentioned, before the Cows at the time of Conception, they communicated the Impreſſion to their Calves.

(1) Lib. 8. (2) L. 2. c. 46.

(b) See Strabo, lib. 7.

(c) Stato die, ultra quem vivere fas non erat, aquis mergebant Plin. lib. 8.

Marks. Then they began to make merry, as if the Prince himself had arisen from the dead. This Festival was still in continuance at the time of Cambyfes, who, arriving at Memphis upon his return from Ethiopia, an Expedition which proved so unhappy to him, found the People taken up in celebrating the Festival of Osiris (1), and imagining they were rejoicing at his Disgrace, sent for the Priests to demand the occasion of their Joy. They having made answer that they were celebrating the Appearance of Apis, who had not been seen for a great while, Cambyfes dissatisfy'd with the Answer, ordered them to bring before him that pretended God of theirs, and gave him a Wound with his Sword, whereof he died, caused the Priests to be lash'd, and ordered his Soldiers to massacre all whom they found celebrating this Festival.

I forgot to take notice, that after having found a Bull proper to represent Apis, he was left, before they conducted him to Memphis, in the City of the Nile, where he was fed for forty Days. During which time, the Women only were allowed to see him, and they presented themselves before him in a very indecent manner. The forty days being expired, he was put into a Barge, where they had a gilded Niche for his Reception; and thus he was carried down the Nile as far as Memphis.

'Tis not amiss, before we go farther, to take notice, that besides the Ox Apis worshipped at Memphis, there was another at Heliopolis, named Mnevis, which was likewise the Symbol of Osiris, if we credit Diodorus (2); tho' several Authors will have it, that the first was consecrated to Osiris, and the second to Isis. This much is certain, that the Superstition of the Egyptians in relation to the Ox Apis, was carried to the greatest excess. They honour'd him as a God, and consulted him as an Oracle. When he took what Food was offered to him (3), it was a favourable Response, and his refusing it was looked upon as a bad Prefage. Pliny observes, that he had declined to eat what the unfortunate Germanicus offer'd to him, and this Prince actually died very soon after, in the manner which every body knows. In like manner, as to the two Lodges that were built for him; when he enter'd one, it was an auspicious Omen for Egypt, and unlucky when Fancy led him into the other; to such Extremity did that People, so fam'd for Politeness, carry their Superstition.

L l 4 nate

(1) Herod. l. 2. (2) Lib. 2. (3) Plin. l. 8. c. 48.

Pausanias (1) says, that they who were to consult him, burnt Incense before-hand upon an Altar, filled with Oil the Lamps that were there lighted, and laid down upon that Altar a piece of Money, at the right side of Apis's Statue. Then having applied their Ear to the Mouth of the God, to interrogate him, they withdrew, stopp'd both their Ears till they got without the bounds of the Temple, and then whatever they first heard, they took for the Response of the God.

This Bull was almost always confined to one of his Lodges, and came but seldom abroad except into a Meadow, which was also inclosed, and where he was left for some time; and there it was that Strangers came to see him. When upon occasion, he was led thro' the Town, he had Officers to guard him, who kept off the Croud, and Children went before, singing Hymns in his praise.

We have seen in what manner the Priests drowned him in a sacred Fountain, when they judg'd he ought not to live any longer; but when he died a natural Death, they gave him magnificent Obsequies, where they were so lavish in their Expence, that they who were appointed for his Retinue, ruined their Fortunes by it. It once happen'd, in the time of Ptolemy the Son of Lagus, that fifty Talents were borrowed to defray the charges of his Funeral Rites.

Such, according to ancient Tradition, is the History of Isis and Osiris, and of the Ceremonies of those two Divinities, which the Greeks long after adopted into the History of their Bacchus, who was only a Copy of those ancient Egyptian Deities, as we shall shew upon another occasion.

To determine now who this Osiris was, and in what time he lived, is a matter of some difficulty. Some Authors alledge that he is Joseph (1), that ancient Patriarch, so famous in Egypt for having saved it from being destroyed by Famine, and govern'd it with so much Wisdom. Others will have him to be Moses: But how beautiful soever the Parallels are, which have been made between those two great Men and Osiris, it suffices to take notice, that this King of Egypt was antienter than they, and that his Worship was established in the irtime thro' all Egypt, since the Israelites imitated the Ceremonies thereof in the adoration of the Golden Calf.

Thus I am of opinion that Osiris is the same as Mizraim the Son of Ham, who peopled Egypt some time after the Deluge, and who, after his Death, was taken into the number of the Gods, according to the Custom of raising to that Dignity those who founded Empires: And the Reason why the Ancients call him the Son of Jupiter, is, that he was the Son of Ham, or Hammon, whom he himself had acknowledg'd as a God.

Marsham takes Osiris to be Ham himself, known under the name of Menis at the head of the Dynasties, who succeeded to the Gods and Demi-Gods; and he confirms his Opinion, by the Remark which Africanus had drawn from Menetho, concerning the first King of Egypt, whom a Crocodile had devoured; which agrees perfectly to Osiris, slain by Typhon, who was represented under the figure of that cruel Animal.

Notwithstanding the Obscurity which is in the History of Osiris, the Learned are obliged to allow, that he was one of the first of Noah's Descendants by Ham, and that he governed Egypt, whither his Father had repair'd, and there founded a small Kingdom, a few Years after the Dispersion which happen'd in the time of Peleg. 'Twas unquestionably from this Branch of Noah's Sons that Egypt got its first Inhabitants. This Country is frequently stiled in the sacred Books, the Land of Mizraim, or Mestraim, and there mention is made made of the City of Ammon. Now there is no doubt but Ammon is the same with Ham, whose Name has been soften'd by suppressing the first Consonant.

(1) Voss. de Idol. l. 2.

The Egyptians, who believed that first the Gods, and then the Demi-Gods had reign'd among them for several Ages, are all agreed that Men succeeded the Demi-Gods in the Kingdom, and that he whom they put at the head of the Dynasties of Men was called Menes, or Mnevis. The Name of Osiris, however, is not to be found in those Dynasties; but Diodorus Siculus, who has transmitted down to us with great Care, the most ancient Traditions of the Egyptians, asserts that this Prince is the same with Menes, the first King of Egypt, and to this we must hold. Perhaps at his Apotheosis his Name was changed to that of Osiris: For we are well enough assured, that the Greeks observed this Custom towards those whom they deify'd, as appears from the Examples thereof which I quoted at the beginning of this Work.

In fine, I shall close the Article of Osiris and Isis with some Inscriptions, found upon ancient Monuments, which shew, in a few words, what Sentiments concerning these two Divinities were entertained by the People who had adopted their Worship.

For Osiris.

SATVRN, THE YOUNGEST OF ALL THE GODS, WAS MY FATHER. I AM OSIRIS.

Then is this other Legend.

THIS KING CONDVCTED AN ARMY AS FAR AS THE DESARTS OF INDIA, AND FROM THENCE TOWARDS THE NORTH, TO THE SOVRCES OF THE ISTER, AND THEN AS FAR AS THE OCEAN.

I AM THE FIRST BORN SON OF SATVRN, SPRVNG FROM AN ILLVSTRIOUS PEDIGREE, AND FROM NOBLE BLOOD; COVSIN TO THE DAY: THERE IS NO PLACE WHERE I HAVE NOT BEEN, AND I DIF-
FVSED

FVSFD MY BLESSINGS WITH MVNIFICENCE OVER ALL THE HVMAN RACE.

Tho' there is a great number of these Inscriptions for Isis, I shali fatisfy myself with quoting three of them ; the first which we find in Diodorus Siculus (1), is conceived in these terms.

I ISIS AM THE QVEEN OF THIS COVNTRY, AND I HAD MERCVRY FOR MY PRIME MINISTER. NONE HAD POWER TO HINDER THE EXECVTION OF MY ORDERS, I AM THE ELDEST DAVGHTER OF SATVRN, THE YOUNGEST OF THE GODS.

I AM THE SISTER AND THE WIFE OF KING OSIRIS.

I AM THE MOTHER OF KING ORVS.
I AM SHE WHO RISES IN THE DOG-STAR.
THE CITY OF BVBASTIS WAS BVILT IN HONOV R TO ME.

REIOICE O EGYPT, THOV THAT HAST BEEN TO ME INSTEAD OF A NV RSE, AND MOTHER.

The second, which was upon a Marble found at Capua, bore these Words, as we said before :

TO THEE, O GODDESS ISIS, WHO ART ONE AND ALL THINGS, ARRIVS BABINVS MAKES THIS VOW.

The third, according to Plutarch (2), was at Saïs, engraved upon the Pavement of Minerva's Temple.

I AM ALL THAT HAS BEEN, THAT IS, AND THAT SHALL BE, AND NONE AMONG MORTALS HAS HITHERTO TAKEN OFF MY VEIL.

Tho' we put these Inscriptions in Capital Letters, as Monuments of that sort are ordinarily written, it will easily be understood, that we are far from insinuating that

(1) L. 1.

(2) De Is. & Osir.

that these Legends are actually in the Form which we have here given them, with the same Characters and in our own Language, but we have only given a literal Translation of them. 'Tis very probable that those which we read in Diodorus and Plutarch, were in like manner but Translations which they had made, instead of quoting them in the proper Idiom of the Originals. As to the Marble found at Capue, 'tis easy to see that the original Inscription is Latin.

C H A P. II.

Of the other Gods of Egypt.

TIS not my design to treat in this Chapter of all the Gods whom Egypt worshipped, because most of them having been known to the Greeks and Romans, who have intermix'd with their History several Fables to which the Egyptians were intire Strangers, I reserve what I have to say of them for the following Volumes. Thus, tho' Pluto, Hercules, Apollo, Mercury, and several others, have in reality an Egyptian Original, yet they shall have no place in this Chapter.

ARTICLE I.

Serapis, or Sarapis.

The Learned are much divided with respect to Serapis or Sarapis, for his Name is written either way. Some take him for a foreign God, whose Worship was not known in Egypt till the time of Ptolemy the Son of Lagus; others, among whom is M. Cuper (a), will have it, that he had been known and worshipped there from the earliest periods of time; that the Egyptians looked upon him as one of their greatest Gods, and that he was the same with Osiris. A short display of the Reasons of both, will enable the Reader to determine himself.

Those of the former appear very plausible. Herodotus (1), who is so full upon the Egyptian Gods, makes

no

(a) In his Harpocrates, p. 83, &c.

(1) L. 2.

no mention of Serapis: Would he have forgot him, had he been, as some learned Men pretend, one of the great Divinities of that People? The Isiac Table (a), upon which so many Egyptian Deities appear, presents us with nothing that resembles Serapis. There is preserv'd in the Cabinets of the Curious, and in Books of the Antiquaries, several Figures of Osiris and Serapis; and 'tis easy to see that those of the former, with whom they would confound him, are as different as their Names. In fine, what Tacitus relates (1), ought entirely to decide the question. Serapis, says that Historian, appeared in a Dream to Ptolemy (b), under the figure of a young Man exquisitely beautiful, and order'd him to send two of his most faithful Friends to Sinope, a City of Pontus, where he was worshipped, and to bring his Statue from thence. Ptolemy having communicated this Vision, deputed a select Embassy to Sinope, and from thence was the Statue of that God brought: Whence 'tis easy to conclude, that he was unknown in Egypt before this Event.

The illustrious M. Cuper does not yield to these Arguments, but maintains that Serapis was one of the great Gods of Egypt, where he had been worshipped long before the Ptolemys. The Proofs of his Antagonists have not shook him, and that which they bring from Tacitus, he thinks weak; for before it can have any force, it must be proved that Serapis was he whom they worshipped at Sinope, which can never be made out; for the God to whom that City paid adoration, was Pluto, nor was the name Serapis given him till his Statue was brought into Egypt. “When that God “came into Egypt, says the Historian now named, Timotheus, Master of the Ceremonies, and Manethon the “Sebennite, seeing his Statue, and observing there the “Cerberus and a Dragon, judg'd it to be Dis or Pluto,
“and persuaded Ptolemy that it was the same with Serapis.”

(a) See Chap. VI. of this Book.

(1) Hist. l. 4. c. 83.

(b) Tacitus does not tell us who that Ptolemy was, who had this Vision; but Macrobius says, it was the Son of Lagus.

“pis.” Plutarch gives the same Account (1): “He had not that Name when he came into Egypt; but upon his arrival at Alexandria, he took the Name the Egyptians gave to Pluto, which was Serapis.”

When Pausanias (2) relates that the Alexandrians received from Ptolemy the Worship of Serapis, he says at the same time, that there was already at Alexandria a very magnificent Temple of that God; and another not so grand, but of very great antiquity, in the City of Memphis. Tacitus himself, when he says that Ptolemy, after Serapis was brought into Egypt, built a stately Temple to him in the place named Racotis, asserts also, that there was another lesser one, consecrated to the same God, and to Isis; which proves, not that Serapis was not worshipped in Egypt till the time of the Embassy to Sinope, but only that the Worship of that God, perhaps neglected a long time, was re-established there with Solemnity.

As M. Cuiper takes no notice of those two Objections, the one of them drawn from the Silence of Herodotus, the other from the Isiack Table, I shall answer them for him, 1. Tho’ ’tis true that that Historian set apart his second Book for the History of the Egyptian Religion, yet we cannot be sure that he has omitted none of their Gods. Besides, having spoke fully of Osiris, who was perhaps the same with Serapis, he reckon’d it was not necessary to say any thing particularly of the latter. 2. The same thing may be said as to the Isiack Table: Tho’ a great number of the Egyptian Gods are there to be found, yet I reckon it cannot be affirm’d that they are all there, far less that they can all be distinguished by their particular Symbols.

The Proof which is drawn from the diversity of Representations, is yet less conclusive. The Egyptians vary’d exceedingly with respect to the Figures of their Gods, and the Symbols which they joined to them. The Figures frequently bore even a vast number of Attributes, which could not agree to a single Divinity: These were what we call the Panthean Figures, which re-

represented several Deities, as one may be convinc'd by viewing some of those of Isis, of Harpocrates, and others.

M. Cuper next refutes the Opinion of Macrobius, who says, that the Egyptians were forced by the Ptolemys to embrace the Worship of Serapis, come from Sinope; for he ought to have proved that this was the Name of Serapis in that City of Pontus; which was not so, as has been made out.

'Tis then very probable, whatever several learned Antiquaries say to the contrary, that Serapis was an Egyptian God, known and worshipped by that People long before the Ptolemys. I add, he was the same with Pluto; and tho' the Testimonies of Tacitus and Plutarch, which we have quoted, were less conclusive than they are, yet one of the finest Statues of that God, given by Fabretti to M. Cuper, at whose feet we see the three-headed Cerberus, would leave no room to doubt of it (a).

We have in the Antiquaries several other Figures, always known to be those of Serapis by the Calathus, or a kind of Bonnet which he wore upon his head. Sometimes he is join'd with Isis, and represented like a young Man, and then he is taken for Osiris or the Sun; frequently like a bearded old Man, very much resembling Jupiter, whose Name he also bore; at least, from the time that the Greeks were Masters of Egypt.

ARTICLE II.

Orus.

Orus, according to Herodotus (1), was the Son of Osiris and Isis, and the last of the Gods who reigned in Egypt. After he had put Typhon to death, he mounted the Throne. Diodorus, who so far follows Herodotus (2), subjoins, that the Titans having put him to death, his Mother who possessed the most rare Secrets of Medicine, even that of making immortal, having found his Body
in

(a) There is a Print of this Figure in Montfaucon's Antiquity, Tom. II. p. 185.

(1) Lib. 2. c. 144. (2) Lib. 22.

in the Nile, whither it had been thrown by the Titans; restored Life to it, and procured to him Immortality. After this, she taught him Medicine, and the Art of Divination. With these Talents, continues Diodorus, Orus render'd himself famous, and multiply'd his Blessings upon the World.

We have already given an account in the History of Typhon, in what manner Orus, by the Advice of Isis, reveng'd the Death of his Father, by taking away that Tyrant's Life, whom he destroy'd in the lower Egypt; this is all that we know of this last Egyptian God, after whom, the Demi-Gods began to reign. We are not here to enlarge upon that prodigious number of Years the Egyptians ascribe to the Reigns of their Gods, which in Diodorus's reckoning (1) comprehended a space of three and twenty thousand Years, from the Reign of the Sun to the time of Alexander's conquering the Indies. For, whether those Years be taken for lunar Years, or only for the Seasons, each Year including four, the number of three and twenty thousand Years is still manifestly fabulous, and Diodorus vainly uses his efforts to justify the Egyptians in this.

The Greeks, as the Author has it whom I just now cited, pretended that their Apollo was the same as the Orus of the Egyptians. Apollo was in reality like Orus, expert in Medicine, and in the Art of Prediction, and this God among them was the Sun, as Orus was in Egypt. Accordingly, we find him often called by the Ancients, Orus Apollo. It would be to no purpose to object, that it was Osiris, who in Egypt represented the Sun, since the Answer is easy, that this Luminary; the first and greatest of the Gods, had several Names, not only in the different Countries where he was worshipped, but frequently even in the same. It would also be in vain to object, that the Symbols of Osiris were different from those of Orus; for 'tis known that the Egyptian Mythology confounds Gods who are very different from one another, and that sometimes it distinguishes them by particular Attributes. 'Tis certain, for instance, as
the

(1) Loc. cit.

the most learned Antiquaries hold, that Harpocrates, of whom we shall speak in the following Article, represented the Sun among the Egyptians, as well as Osiris and Orus, tho' the Figures under which these Gods were represented, had no manner of resemblance to one another.

Let that be as it will, Orus occurs in the Isiac Table, under the figure of an Infant swath'd about, and covered from head to foot in an odd kind of Habit in form of Lozenges. He holds with both hands a Staff, terminating in a Bird's Head, and a Whip (a) resembling that which is to be seen on some figures of Osiris. In a Manuscript of M. de Peiresc, preserved in the Library of S. Victor, the same Orus is seen in a Group, between Isis and Osiris: There he is represented as a young Child, habited in a Tunick. Tho' the Head of Osiris is wanting, that of Isis is there, discernible by her Head-dress, upon which is the Lotus-Leaf in form of a Crescent. We may observe, before we finish this Article, that in all the Figures of Orus we have now remaining, he is always represented as a Child; doubtless, to point out to us that he was but very young when Typhon put his Father to death, and that Isis his Mother was obliged to defer the Punishment of the Tyrant, till her Son was in a capacity to be the Instrument of her Revenge.

ARTICLE III.

Harpocrates.

By surveying the Figures of Harpocrates, whereof we have a sufficient quantity remaining, 'tis easy to judge that he was the God of Silence; since in all of them he is represented in an Attitude; holding a Finger upon his Lips; the Egyptians; whose Mythology was exceedingly mysterious, intending thereby to denote, that the Gods were to be adored with respectful Silence; or, as Plutarch has it (1), that they who knew those Gods

M m

were

(a) This Whip, which is frequently to be seen in the figures which represent Osiris, Orus, and Harpocrates, was the Symbol of the God of the Sun.

(1) De Is. & Os.

were not to speak of them rashly. There was even a Law, according to Varro (1), which forbid under pain of death, to say that Serapis had been a mortal Man: And, as in the Temples of Isis there was an Idol, that is, an Harpocrates putting the Finger to his Mouth, the same Varro was of opinion, that he was there to recommend Silence as to that Article.

The Ancients agree that Harpocrates was the Son of Isis (2), and that his Mother having lost him when he was very young, she formed a resolution to search for him over Sea and Land, until she should find him. They tell us that it was upon this occasion she invented Sails for Ships, instead of the Oars that were used before; this is what we learn from Hyginus (a). Cassiodorus says the same thing (3), and seems to have copied Hyginus; with this difference, that in place of Harpocrates he puts Harpocras: And this, to mention it by the by, is what gave that Goddess the Epithet of Pelagia, which is to be seen in an ancient Inscription quoted by Gruterus.

This Circumstance of searching for Harpocrates bears too great a resemblance to what we have reported of Orus, from Diodorus Siculus, not to make us believe that Orus and Harpocrates were the same Person; and this is the Opinion of the most knowing Mythologists. In Diodorus, 'tis true, Orus is slain by the Titans, and Isis restored him to life; whereas, according to Hyginus, Harpocrates had only wander'd; but considering what surprising Diversity there is among Authors, in relation to those ancient pieces of History, there is nothing strange in Diodorus's saying that Orus had been slain, and that his Mother finding his dead Body, had restored him to life, tho' in reality he had only wander'd.

The illustrious M. Cuper, who has composed a Treatise upon Harpocrates, full of learned Researches, doubts not but this was the same Adventure, differently related by the Ancients, and makes but one Person of Orus and Harpocrates: And as the first was among the Egyptians the Symbol of the Sun, he concludes, that the second represented the same Luminary too. Accordingly you see him upon some Antiques, under the figure of a Child, rising out of the Flower of Lotus, his Head encompassed with Rays, and a Whip in his Hand, to denote the rising Sun. And tho' this Proof were not sufficiently convincing, yet this Luminary and the Moon which are drawn in the same Antique, would leave no room to doubt of it. The Attitude of the Finger upon the Mouth, evidently proves that it is a Harpocrates. This God is represented much the same way in the Flower of Lotus, upon a Medal of Antoninus. Tho' those two Monuments, whereof the one is an Abraxas of the Basilidians, the other a Medal of the Emperor now mentioned, are not of sufficient antiquity to prove, that they were an Expression of the Sentiments of the Egyptians. Plutarch, in the learned Treatise which we have so often quoted, asserts, that he was thus represented in Egypt; not that they believed he had been born of the Flower of Lotus, as Tristan thought (1); but to inform us that the Sun was nourished by Vapours. The Finger which this God holds to his Mouth, in both those Figures, was always an indication that the Mysteries of Religion and Philosophy were to be conceal'd from the People.

(1) Apud Aug. de Civ. Dei, l. 18. c. 5. (2) See Plut. de Isid. & Osir.

(a) Velificia primum invenit Isis; nam dum quærit Harpocratem filium suum, rate velificavit. Fab. æt.

(3) Var l. 5. c. 17.

The learned Author from whom I have borrowed this Article, adds a world of other Reasons to prove, that Harpocrates was the Sun, which the learned Reader may see in the Work itself. I would only observe, before I have done, that there are Figures of this God truly Egyptian, where he appears to have his Head covered with Rays or with Horns: Some, where he has Wings; others, where he holds a Whip in his hand; others, in short, where he carries a Cornucopia; Symbols, which all denote that he was taken for the Sun, and that he was the same as Orus or Apollo. The Owl too which accompanies him in some of those Attributes, and which is behind the Figure, signifies, according to M. Cuper, that the Sun turns his back upon Night, represented by that Fowl. The Poppy which sometimes accompanies him, was, according to Porphyry (1), the Symbol of Fertility, which the Sun produces. The Cornucopia has the same Signification: His Quiver and Arrows represent the Rays of the Sun; and the Serpent, which winds his crooked Folds around a Pillar, that is at the foot of some of those Figures, images the Obliquity of the Ecliptick. All the Monuments that we have remaining of this God, may be seen in the Work of M. Cuper, and in the second Volume of Montfaucon's Antiquity explain'd.

(1) Tom. i. p. 604.

ARTICLE IV.

. Macedo, Anubis.

Osiris, in his Expedition to the Indies, had taken with him Persons of the greatest distinction in Egypt, and left others to be Isis's Privy-Council during her Regency. Diodorus Siculus (2), who instructs us in this part of Osiris's History, says, that Macedo, Anubis and Pan, accompany'd him in his Expedition. The same Author adds, that he appointed Busiris Governour of the Provinces that were upon the side of Phenicia, and Antæus Governour of those that lay towards Æthiopia and Libya.

There are Authors who alledge that Macedo was Son to Osiris; but Diodorus Siculus says, that he was only one of his Generals, and that he wore for his warlike Attire, a Wolf's Skin, and Anubis that of a Dog; and this he gives for the Reason why the Egyptians had so great a veneration for those Animals. This is all that we know of Macedo; but Mythology informs us in several Particularities with regard to Anubis, which are not to be omitted.

This God, whose Worship was propagated to Greece, Italy, and even thro' the whole Roman Empire, was in those different Countries the same as Mercury, and accordingly you see him with his Caduceus in his hand, in one of the Figures of him which Boissard has preserved

(1) Apud Enf. Præp. lib. 3. c. 11.

(2) Lib. 1.

served to us. Plutarch (1) is of the same mind, when he says, he was called Herm-Anubis, that is to say, Mercury-Anubis. Servius, interpreting the Verses where Virgil terms this God Latrator Anubis (2), tells us, that Prince was so named, because he is represented with the Head of a Dog, and that he was taken for Mercury, because of all Animals the Dog has most Sagacity (a).

Apuleius calls Anubis, "the Interpreter of the Gods of Heaven, and of Hell. His Face, continues that Author, is sometimes swarthy, sometimes of a golden Complexion. He lifts on high his large Dog's Head, carrying in his left hand a Caduceus, and in the right brandishing a green Branch of the Palm-Tree."

Ille Superûm Commentor & Inferûm; nunc atrâ, nunc aureâ facie sublimis attollens canis facies arduas Anubis, leva Caducæum gerens, dextrâ palmam virentem quatens.

Thus it is that the Greek Mythology has often confounded every thing. Never was Anubis the Egyptian Mercury, the famous Trismegistus, so celebrated in the History of that Country for his glorious Discoveries, for the Invention of Characters, and for the prodigious number of Books which he composed upon all sorts of Science; which we shall have occasion to examine more fully in the History of Mercury (3). We ought not to lay much stress upon the Figures of this God which carry the Caduceus; they are incontestably Greek or Roman, as well as the Medals of Gorlay, where Anubis appears with the Symbol of Mercury; the other Representations which are Egyptian, give him no such thing. To be short, if Anubis is always imaged with a Dog's Head, 'tis either because he wore the Skin of that Animal in the Expedition to the Indies, or to represent by the Symbol of that Animal, that having been Captain of Isis and Osiris's Guards, as Diodorus

M m 3

has

(1) De Is. & Osir. (2) Æn. l. 8. v. 698.

(a) Latrator Anubis, quia canino capite pingitur. Hunc volunt esse Mercurium ideo, quia nihil est cane sagacius.

(3) Vol. II.

has it (1), he had discharg'd that Office with remarkable Fidelity.

Plutarch (2), who has handed down to us ancient Traditions about the Family of Osiris, tells us, that Anubis was believ'd to be the Son of Nephthe, who was deliver'd of him before her time, by the Fright which she got from Typhon her Husband ; and that it was he, tho' yet very young, who first informed Isis his Aunt of the News of Osiris's Death.

But whatever be in that, Anubis was in the number of the great Gods of Egypt ; this is the Idea of him which Isias had, who dedicated to him the fine Statue which we have said is in Boissard. This Isias, it would seem, was not of Plutarch's opinion, since he took Anubis for Osiris's Brother. Accordingly we read in the Inscription which is over that Statue, Θεοί Ἀδελφοί, the Brother Gods, and you see on the left of Anubis, who has the Head of a Dog, that of Osiris ; and upon his right, that of the Bull Apis with its Horns, both of them with the Calathus of Serapis : These then are the three Brother-Gods, Serapis or Osiris, Apis and Anubis. The Inscription which is below his Figure, with the Name of the High-Priest Isias, calls these Gods, the Synthronian Gods of Egypt ; that is, who shared the same Throne, or the same Honours.

We may take notice by the by, that some Mythologists take for Anubis's, all the Figures Cynocephali, that is, with Dog's Heads ; wherein they are mistaken ; for the Cynocephalus, of which Herodotus (3) and some Naturalists make mention, was a kind of savage Animal, which was believ'd to have Eyes upon the Breast,

ARTICLE V.

Canopus.

Canopus had been the Pilot, or rather Admiral of Osiris's Fleet, in the time of his Indian Expedition ; and upon his Death having been rank'd among the Gods, they gave out, as Plutarch has it (4), that his Soul

(1) Loc. cit.
(4) De Is. & Osir.

(2) De Is. & Osir.

(3) Lib. 4. c. 194.

Soul was removed into the Star which bears his name (a). This is what frequently happen'd, as we have remarked before, that the same God was both an animated God, that is to say a deified Man, and a natural God, whether a Star, or some other part of the Universe. And this is what we are to think, especially of most of the Egyptian Gods. Mythologists are persuaded, that Canopus was in Egypt the God of the Waters, at least of the Waters of the Nile; the bare Figures of this God are enough to prove it. For he is always represented in the Egyptian Monuments that now remain, under the form of one of those Vases wherein the Egyptians kept the Water of that River till it refined. From these Vases, whose surface is full of hieroglyphical Figures, comes out the Head of a Man or Woman, sometimes with two Hands, and frequently with nothing to be seen but the Head. Such are the Representations which we have of Canopus, as may be seen in Boissard, and in the Cabinet of M. de la Chausse.

Rufinus, in his ecclesiastical History (1), relates a Story, which would be a good proof of what the Mythologists alledge, had he given us any Authority for it. The Chaldeans, says he, who ador'd the Fire, carried their God into several Countries, to try his Power over the Gods of other Nations. He baffled the Images of Brass, Gold, Silver, Wood, or whatever other Materials they were of, by reducing them to Dust; and thus his Worship was almost every where established: But the Priest of Canopus thought upon a Stratagem, which made the God whom he serv'd, superior to that of the Chaldeans. The Pitchers, in which the Egyptians used to refine the Water of the Nile, having been perforated on all sides with small imperceptible Holes, he took one of them, and stop'd all those small Holes with Wax, painted it of different Colours, and having filled it up with Water, he fitted to the Mouth of it the Head of an Idol. The Chal-

M m 4

deans

(a) This is the Star named Canopus.

(1) Lib. 2. c. 26.

deans having arrived in Egypt, kindled Fire near this Vase, whose Heat having melted the Wax, made way for the Water to run out, which extinguish'd the Fire. Thus Canopus vanquish'd the God of the Chaldeans. Among the Abraxas, which Chifflet gives account of, we find a Vase bored with several Holes; thro' which the Water that is pour'd into it runs out: This is a Canopus whose Head and Feet rise out of the two extremities of the Vase; which might confirm the story we have now related. That the Egyptians paid a religious Worship to Water in general, or at least to that of the Nile, is what appears to be out of doubt. In their Philosophy, Water was the Principle of all Beings, as they taught Thales, who made this the foundation of his System. But I shall examine this Subject more thoroughly in the History of the Sea-Gods.

We have seen in the preceding Articles, that among the Egyptians, Osiris, Orus, and Harpocrates, were the Sun, Isis the Moon, and Canopus the Element of Water; we are now going to prove that they honour'd Universal Nature, and her fruitful Influence, under the name of Pan.

ARTICLE VI.

Pan.

If ever the Greeks corrupted ancient History, it was especially in the Fable of Pan: We shall be told by them, as Herodotus judiciously remarks (1), that Hercules, Liber or Bacchus, and Pan, were the last of all the Gods: But yet among the Egyptians, Pan was look'd upon as one of the eight great Gods, who in their Theology form'd the first Class, and were the most powerful, and most antient of all. Hercules was but in the second, which was made up of twelve Gods, who only came after the other eight whom we now mention'd, and generated those of the third, in which they placed Bacchus. From Bacchus to Amasis, continues Herodotus, the Egyptians computed fifteen thousand Years, and supported this Computation by a Series of well-distinguish'd Years. Between Hercules and that Prince they reckon'd a far greater number of years; and consequently a considerably longer period between him and Pan, who was much ancients than the other two. Whereas according to the Greek History, there was from Bacchus the Son of Semele, and the time when Herodotus lived, but about sixteen hundred Years; from Hercules the Son of Alcmena, but nine hundred; and from Pan, the Son of Penelope and Mercury, but about eight hundred.

rics

(1) Lib. 2, c. 146.

After so positive a Testimony, we are not to lay much stress upon what the Greeks related of the God Pan, but 'tis in Egypt we are to search into his original.

“ The Egyptians, says the Author, whom I have “ now quoted, sacrifice neither He-goats nor She-“ goats, because they represent the God Pan, and paint “ him with the Face and Legs of a Goat; wherein “ the Greeks have also imitated them: Not that it “ was believ'd in Egypt he bore any resemblance to “ them, but for reasons which it would not be agree“ able to repeat. Those of Mendes, continues the “ same Historian, hold the He and She-goats, the for“ mer especially, in singular Veneration, as likewise the “ Goat-herds who keep them; among whom there is “ one, who is more honour'd than the rest; and his “ Death causes great Mourning thro' all the Country.
 “ Pan and the He-Goat in the Egyptian Language are “ called Mendes.”

Diodorus Siculus (1) says that Pan was so much honour'd by the Egyptians, that his Statues were to be seen in all the Temples, and that to his honour they had built in Thebais the City of Chemmis, that is to say, the City of Pan. This Author, who takes no notice of Mendes in lower Egypt, where that God was in high veneration, adds, that he had accompanied Osiris in his Expedition to the Indies, together with Anubis and Macedo, which Herodotus says nothing of.

'Tis not to be doubted, whatever the Greeks may say,
 but

(1) L. i. p. 16.

but that the Egyptian Pan is the most ancient of all, and that it was by the Colonies they received the knowledge of him and his Worship. They fabled however that he was the Son of Mercury and Penelope, for whom that God transformed himself into a Goat upon Mount Taygetus, where she was keeping the Flocks of her Father Icarus; and of a God who originally represented Nature and Fertility, they made a God of the Woods and Fields, solely taken up about the Pleasures of a Country-Life, dancing continually with the Fauns and Satyrs, and running after the Nymphs, to whom he was a Terror.

It was he, according to them, who invented the Flute with the seven Pipes (a), and upon this occasion they deliver'd the Fable, which I am going to relate. That God one day pursuing a Nymph named Syrinx, the Daughter of the River Ladon, with whom he was in love, the Nymphs of that River transform'd her into a Reed. Pan fetch'd many a deep Sigh near those Reeds, and they gently moving by the Zephyrs, repeated his Complaints; which suggested to him the thought of pulling some of them, whereof he made the Flute with the seven Pipes, which was called after the name of that Nymph (1). But this is a meer Fable invented by the Greeks; which may import, that some one of those to whom they gave the name of Pan, had employed the Reeds of the River Ladon, to make that sort of Flute: I say, of those to whom they gave the name of Pan, for in reality there were several of them; Nonnus reckons up no less than twelve.

Herodotus durst not tell the reason why the Egyptians represented the God Pan under the figure of a Goat; ancient Mythologists however assure us, that what induc'd them to it, was, that Pan having found the Gods in Egypt, whither they had fled from the Giants, advis'd them, as a means to prevent their discovery,

(a) *Pan primus exlamor cerâ conjungere plures
Instituit.* Virg. Eccl. 2.
Est mihi disparibus septem compacta cicutis Fistula. Id. Ib.

(1) Met. L. 1. v. 689.

covery, to clothe themselves with the figures of different Animals ; and as an example he himself assum'd that of a Goat. They tell us, that he even fought very resolutely in their behalf against Typhon ; and for his reward, these same Gods, whom he had so stoutly defended, gave him a place in Heaven, where he forms the Sign of Capricorn (1).

Be that as it will, there was no place in all Greece, where the Divinity of Pan was more honour'd than in Arcadia. This is even thought to have been the place where he deliver'd his Oracles. Sacrifices were offer'd to him of Honey and Goat's Milk, and the Lupercalia were celebrated to his honour. This Festival in later times became very famous in Italy, where Evander the Arcadian had introduced the Worship of Pan. The Greeks, besides the Fable of Syrinx, which I have mention'd, broach'd several others in relation to this God, as his having discover'd to Jupiter the place where Ceres had concealed herself, after the Rape of Proserpine ; upon which information they tell us, that Jupiter dispatch'd the Destinies to console her, and to prevail upon her by their Prayers to put an end to the Barrenness, which her Absence had brought upon the Earth (2).

'Tis the Greeks too, who have attributed to their God Pan, the original of that sort of sudden Consternation which seizes upon People, without knowing whence it proceeds ; 'twas by such an unaccountable Terrour, that the Army of Brennus, the Leader of the Gauls, was put to flight : But Plutarch and Polyenus refer the source of it to the God Pan of the Egyptians. The first of these Authors says, that the Pans and Satyrs affrighted with the Death of Osiris, whom Typhon had inhumanly murder'd, made the Banks of the Nile to resound with their Howlings and Lamentations ; and ever since, they have called that vain Fear which surprizes People unawares, by the name of Panick Terrour. Polyenus (3) ascribes the Origin of those

(1) Hygin. Coel. Poet. Astr.

(2) Paus. in Arcad.

(3) In his Strat.

those Terrors to the Stratagem which Pan, Osiris's Lieutenant-General, made use of to extricate the Army of that Prince, when it was surprized in the night-time by the Barbarians in a Valley; he order'd them to raise Shrieks and terrible Howlings, which put the Enemy into such a consternation that they fled. But Bochart (1) pretends that there is no other reason for making Pan the Author of those Terrors, but that the Hebrew word Pan or Phan denotes a Man under Consternation.

Here 'tis proper to remark by the by, that several learned Men confound Pan with Faunus or Sylvanus, and believe it was but one and the same Divinity worshipped under these different Names. Father Thomasassin proves it by several Authorities, fetch'd from the Ancients; to which he might have joined that of Probus in his Commentaries upon Virgil, of Fenestella, and several others. The Lupercalia too were equally celebrated in honour of those three Divinities, who were indeed different in their Original, tho' in time they came to be confounded.

It must be own'd however, that the Fable of Pan came at length to be greatly allegorized; and that this God was look'd upon as the Symbol of Nature. His very Name in Greek (1) signifies All; accordingly he was imaged with Horns on his Head, to represent, say Mythologists, the Rays of the Sun, as the Vivacity and Ruddiness of his Complexion mark the Brightness of the Heavens: the Star which he wears upon his Breast, is the Symbol of the Firmament; and his Feet and Legs overgrown with Hair denote the inferior part of the World, the Earth, the Trees, and Plants.

The Egyptians, after having ador'd the Sun under the name of Osiris, and the Moon under that of Isis, made all Nature the Object of their Adoration under the Symbol of Pan, who is to be considered as one of the most ancient Divinities of the Pagan World. We find him in Egypt at the time when the Gods, attack'd by the Giants,

(1) Chan.

(a) Παν, Omne; according to Plato, Verbum, the word

Giants, fled thither for refuge ; and, according to Plutarch (1), the Pans and Satyrs were the first who deplored the Death of Osiris. Diodorus adds (2), that Pan accompanied Bacchus in his Conquest of the Indies, as has been said : now the Bacchus who made that Conquest was an Egyptian, since it was Osiris himself.

I have been obliged to repeat the Greek Fables relative to Pan ; but at bottom the whole amounts to this, that he was one of the greatest Gods of Egypt ; that he was honoured especially at Mendes ; that his Worship was brought into Greece by the Egyptian Colonies ; that he became more remarkably famous in Arcadia ; that Evander made him be known in Italy, where he came and settled with his Colony some Years before the Trojan War ; and that at last the Worship of this God was received at Rome, with the Festivals which were celebrated to his Honour.

I shall conclude, after I have briefly taken notice of that extraordinary Voice, which, according to Plutarch, was heard towards the Echinades Isles, in the Ionian Sea, and which pronounced these Words, The great Pan is dead. The Astrologers of that time, consulted by Tiberius, upon the Credit of a Pilot named Thamus, who aver'd that he had heard it, told that Prince, that it meant Pan the Son of Penelope. 'Tis probable, that Thamus had been suborned to terrify the Emperor ; unless we will rather chuse to say with Eusebius, that this Voice was supernatural, and that God was pleased by it to intimate to the World the Death of the Messiah, which happened under the Reign of that Emperor.

The Worship paid to the He-Goat, as representing the God Pan, leads us naturally to an important Article of the Egyptian Religion ; I mean, that of Animal Worship in general. Here we have two things to examine : 1. What were those Animals for which the Egyptians had a particular Veneration. 2. What was the 542 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book VI.

the Nature of that Worship which they ascribed unto them.

CHAP. III.

Of the Worship given to Animals by the Egyptians.

THAT the Egyptians honour'd Animals with a publick Worship, such as was authorized by the Laws of the Country, is a Fact which cannot be called in question ; and they have been so reproached with it, that the Satire, which they have suffered upon that account from Greeks and Romans, is known to all the World.

Quis nescit, Volusi Bithynice, qualia demens Ægyptus portenta colat (1) ?

The same Poet rallies them for not daring to eat either Leeks or Onions :

*Porrum & cepe nefas violare, & frangere morsu (a) ;
O sanctas gentes, quibus hæc nascuntur in hortis Numina (2) !*

Lucian, in his Dialogues, often ridicules this foolish Superstition. And yet were it only Poets and satirical Authors who rally them upon this account, it might be thought that they had not so much consulted Truth, as their own satyrical Humour ; but the gravest and most judicious Historians have loaded them with the same Reproaches. Herodotus, Diodorus Siculus, and several others speak of the different Animals which the Egyptians worshipped, as shall be said afterwards. Elian (3) gives some particular Instances thereof, with no other view but to expose so foolish a Superstition. Plutarch (4), who has endeavour'd to excuse the Egyptians, allows however, that a Worship which has meer Animals for its Object, appears at first sight to be quite absurd and ridiculous. And indeed, what can we think of a People, whose Temples were filled with almost all the Animals which their Country produc'd ? What other

(1) Juv. Sat. 15. ab init.

(a) Pliny has the same Thought with Juvenal. Allium cepasque, says he, inter Deos jure jurando habet Ægyptus. Lib. 19.

(2) Id. ibid. v. 9. (3) De Anim. L. 12. c. 5. (4) De Is. & Os.

other Notion could one have but that those Animals were the Objects of a truly religious Worship, which he saw nourished and lodged with particular care, as were the Ox Apis at Memphis, the Crocodile at Arsinoë, the Cat at Bubastis, the Goat at Mendes, &c. Add to this, that the sacred Birds and Animals were embalm'd after their Death, in order to be deposited in the Catacombs, which were set apart for them; and we shall be constrained to say with Cicero, that the Egyptians had more Respect and Veneration for Animals, than the Romans for their Temples and the Statues of their Gods (a).

In fine, when we know that they punished with Death those who killed any of those sacred Animals, who can help believing that they carried this Superstition to the greatest Excess? That they did so, is certain matter of Fact; and tho' we had not the Authority of Diodorus Siculus to depend upon, who tells the Story of a Roman Soldier, who for slaying a Cat was torn in pieces by the furious Mob, in spite of all that Ptolemy could do to rescue him, as he inclined to have done, knowing how much it was his Interest to keep in good terms with the Senate; tho' we had not this, I say, yet the Testimony of Moses would be sufficient to prove it. That sacred Legislator, asking Pharaoh's permission to go and sacrifice in the Wilderness, tells him, that if they sacrificed in Egypt the Animals which were worshipped there, they would be stoned (b).

Thus Josephus disputing against Apion (1), had good reason to say to him, that if the World had embraced the Egyptian Religion, it would soon have become destitute of human Inhabitants, and wholly peopled by Animals. But in order to set this Article of the Egyptian Theology in a better light, 'tis necessary that we come to Particulars.

We

(a) Firmiores apud Ægyptios opiniones esse de bestiis quibusdam, quam apud Romanos de sanctissimis Templis & Simulachris Deorum. De Nat. Deor. L. 1.

(b) Quod si mactaverimus ea quæ colunt Ægyptii, coram eis, lapidibus nos obruent. Ex. viii. v. 26.

(1) L. 2.

344 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book VI.

We have already seen in what manner the Egyptians worshipped the Oxen Apis and Mnevis, Symbols of their Osiris; Anubis with a Dog's Head, and Pan under the Figure of a Goat. 'Tis likewise known, that at Arsinoë, a Town situated near the Lake Mæris, they had a great Veneration for the Crocodiles, nourished them with care, embalm'd them after their Death, and interr'd them in the subterraneous Cells of the Labyrinth; that at Bubastis in lower Egypt, the Cats were in such Veneration, that it was forbid, under pain of Death, to kill them. Herodotus (1) remarks upon this occasion, that when any Fire happens, the Cats are actuated by a divine Commotion, and that the Egyptians, who have the keeping of them, neglect the Fire to observe what those Animals are then a doing; and he subjoins, that in spite of all their Efforts to hold them, they get away, and throw themselves into the fire. Then, continues that Author, the Egyptians put on Mourning, and deplore the Loss which they have now sustained. The same Historian farther remarks, that when a Cat dies a natural Death, all the People of the House where this Accident happens, shave their Eye-brows in token of Grief; and if it is a Dog that dies, they shave their Head and whole Body. When the Days of Mourning are over, they embalm the Cats, and attend them to their Place of Interment at Bubastis.

The Dog, the Lion, the Ichneumon, the Hawk, the Monkey, and other Animals, were the Objects of the same People's Veneration; which makes Herodotus say, that the Egyptians looked upon all the Animals as sacred, that their Country brought forth; the number whereof however was not very considerable, tho' they were in the Neighbourhood of Libya, which produc'd them in such great plenty. Hence so many monstrous Figures of Egyptian Divinities, which we meet with in the Antiquaries, with the Heads of a Cat (a), a Dog, a Wolf, a Lion, a Monkey, &c. One

(1) L. 2. c. 66.

(a) Here we see what the Egyptian God Cat, or Ælurus was, whereof

One very infallible Proof of the Respect and Veneration which they had for those Animals is, that the Towns which honour'd them, were called by their Names. Such was Bubastis, Mendes, Crocodilopolis (b), Leontopolis, and several others, which were thus denominated, from their having a singular Veneration for the Cats, the Goats, the Crocodiles, the Lions, &c. Several Nomes in the same Country were design'd by the Names of the Animals that were worship'd there. The Oxyrinchian was so called upon account of the Fish Oxyrinchus; the Lycopolitan, from the Wolf; the Cynocephalus, from the Dog, &c. I shall not dwell longer upon a Subject so well known; but I cannot forbear remarking with Herodotus (1), that while one City rank'd certain Animals among their Gods, another held them in Abomination. Thus the Inhabitants of Mendes, who worship'd the Goat, sacrificed to him the Sheep, which were the Objects of Veneration to those of Saïs, who in their turn offered the Goats in Sacrifice to their Jupiter Ammon. Just so the Crocodiles, so highly honour'd at Arsinoë, were look'd upon with horror and detestation in the rest of Egypt, where they believed the Soul of Typhon had passed into that amphibious Animal. Hence those religious Wars mentioned by Plutarch, of one Province against another, which took their rise at first from a political Contrivance of one of their Kings; who, as we learn from Diodorus Siculus, seeing his People somewhat intractable and inclined to revolt, distributed them into different Prefectures, in each of which he established the Worship of some Animal, and forbid the whereof several Representations are to be found in the Antiquaries, sometimes under the Figure of that Animal, as one of them occurs in Fabretti; more frequently under that of a Man, with the Head of that Animal; and the Ornament which ordinarily accompanies that of Osiris; sometimes with a Scepter in his Hand, which was the Symbol of Isis.

N n

Use

(b) This City was called Arsinoë. Among the Crocodiles which were honoured there, the Priests had always a tame one, which they named Suchus. Him they adorned with Gold and Jewels; and they who came to see him, made him an Offering of Bread and Wine.

Use of it for Food, that each of those Provinces, bigotted to its own Worship, might contemn that of its Neighbours, and insensibly come to hate them ; which proved the Source of endless Wars.

The Egyptians could not possibly take more care than they did of the sacred Animals. They had public Parks, where they were maintained at vast expence. They who had the charge of them, fed them with fine Paste, diluted in Milk mixed with Honey; with Duck's Flesh, which was well dressed ; or with other Meat such as was proper for them. They were bath'd, they were perfum'd. The Apartments to which they retir'd, were both commodious and adorn'd. Upon the Death of one of those Animals, after the Mourning which the Law prescribed, they were first embalm'd, and then interr'd in the Catacombs. It even frequently happen'd, that the Funerals of those Animals were so expensive, as to exceed the Ability of those whose Office it was to solemnize them. Diodorus Siculus observes, that they who had this Charge, laid out an hundred Talents in one Year. Farther, those Guardians of the sacred Animals were well received every where ; and far from being ashamed of their Employment, they wore characteristick Marks to distinguish the several sorts of Animals that were committed to their trust. Sometimes they even fell down upon their knees to them, when they saw them passing by.

They who were engaged in a foreign War, brought back with them upon their Return the Cats and other Animals which had died, in order to bestow upon them an honourable Burial ; but what is yet a stronger Proof of their high Veneration for the sacred Animals, when Egypt was extremely distressed with Famine, so that the People were even reduced to the hard necessity of eating human Flesh, no body durst touch that of those Animals.

But is it possible, that a People so enlighten'd and refined as the Egyptians were, whom the most learned Men of Greece visited, in order to be instructed in Philosophy lophony and Matters of Religion, whose Laws were so wise and so well observed ; that such a People, I say, carried Superstition so far as to worship Animals, Insects, and the very Plants of their Gardens? Ought we not to disbelieve the Authors who have insulted them upon this account? Are Strangers fit Persons to inform us of the Religion of a Country, where the Priests were so solicitous to keep its Mysteries conceal'd? If the Egyptians have met with Criticks, who turned them to ridicule, have they not also found Patrons to defend them? Let us examine this Question to the bottom : let us see what was the nature of that Worship, which Egypt paid to Animals, and weigh the Reasons whereby they were induced to pay them divine Honour.

C H A P. IV.

What was the Nature of that Worship which the Egyptians paid to Animals.

TH O' 'tis not my design to defend the Egyptians, yet I hope by searching into the Original and Causes of their superstitious Regard to Animals, to shew that it was not so extravagant as we are apt to believe ; that it was a natural Consequence of their Principles, and that their Blindness in this matter ought rather to be an Object of our Compassion, than a Subject of our Railery.

Diodorus Siculus (1), who is not satisfied with giving the History of so singular a Worship, has endeavour'd to assign several Reasons for it ; the first of them is the Benefit that accrues from those Animals. This Herodotus had touched upon before him (2), when speaking of the Veneration which the Egyptians had for the Ibis, he says, the Cause of it was that in the Spring-time, there came from Arabia Swarms of Flying-Serpents, which over-spread Egypt, and would have done infinite execution there, had it not been for those Birds,

(1) L. 1.

(2) L. 2.

which banish'd or entirely destroy'd them. Cicero is of the same mind with Herodotus (1). "The Egyptians, says he, whom we are apt to ridicule so much, conferred Honours however upon Animals, only in proportion to the Advantage which they derived from them; thus their Reason for worshipping the Ibis, was because it destroy'd the Serpents. I might take notice, continues he, of the Advantages they reap'd from the Ichneumon, from the Crocodiles, and the Cats; but I have no mind to be tedious." Ipsi qui irridentur Ægyptii nullam belluam, nisi ob aliquam utilitatem quam ex ea caperent, consecrarunt; velut, quod Ibes maximam vim serpentium conficiunt: Possum de Ichneumonum utilitate, de Crocodilorum, de Felium dicere; sed nolo esse longior.

I readily grant, that the Progress which the Worship of Animals made in Egypt was owing to this Consideration; but I don't believe that it was the Foundation of it. I know indeed, that Gratitude and Fear introduc'd Gods into the World. I am far from disowning the great Advantages that are derived from several Animals; nor am I ignorant of what Vossius, in his excellent Treatise of Idolatry, says upon this Subject; but would this single Consideration have been sufficient to raise Monsters and Insects to Divinities? Let us not rely too much upon Greek and Latin Authors, who were not always well instructed in the Egyptian Mysteries, which the Priests concealed from them as from profane Persons, who came into their Country out of meer Curiosity. They are not perhaps to be more believed upon this Subject, than as to the Calumnies with which they loaded the Jews, accusing them of having worshipped Swine, from whose Flesh they abstain'd; and of paying devotion to an Ass, whose Figure, according to them, they preserved in massy Gold, in the Temple of Jerusalem (a).

Judæus licet & porcinum numen adoret,

Et cilli summas advocet auriculas (2).

Let

(1) De Nat. Deor. L. 1.

(a) See Josephus against Apion, Tacitus, Plutarch, Suidas, &c.

(2) Petr. Sat.

Let us endeavour to unfold the Egyptian Myſteries, and ſee if the odd Figures of their Divinities, which provoked the Raileries and Contempt of Cambyſes, will not help us to find out the true Reaſons of the Worſhip which they paid to them. Firſt, I ſuppoſe, that all Worſhip is not a religious Worſhip, and that all religious Worſhip is not a Worſhip of Latreia. I don't think it neceſſary here to ſettle that Diſtinction, which is ſufficiently agreed to. This being laid down, I take the Worſhip which the Egyptian Priests aſcribed to Animals, to have been purely relative, and that it was ultimately directed to the Divinities, of whom they were the Symbols. But to ſhew that I am not advancing this Propoſition without foundation, I ſhall prove it by unqueſtionable Teſtimonies. We know, that the Ox Apis was among the Egyptians the Symbol of Osiris, and that Osiris himſelf was the Sun. Hence the Adoration of the Oxen Apis and Mnevis; the firſt of them conſecrated to the Sun, and the other to the Moon (a), who were the great Divinities of that Country (1). Herodotus enquiring into the Reaſon why the Egyptians repreſented Jupiter with a Ram's Head, alledges, it was owing to that God's having appear'd under that form to Hercules, who was deſirous to ſee him. The ſame Author ſpeaking of the Worſhip which the Inhabitants of Mendes paid to Pan, ſays, they repreſented him under the figure of a Goat, for myſterious Reaſons, though they well knew that he reſembled the other Gods. Diodorus Siculus diſcovers this Myſtery, which Herodotus probably had no mind to unfold: That under the Symbol of that Animal, the People adored the proliſick Principle of univerſal Nature, which was repreſented by the God Pan. We ſee then it was Osiris and Isis, Jupiter and Pan, and by no means the Oxen, the Rams, and the Goats that were the true Objects of Worſhip to the Inhabitants of Memphis, Heliopolis, Thebes and Mendes.

N n 3

Plutarch

(a) Porphry, Ælian, Amm. Marcel. and others.

(1) That is, Isis and Osiris.

Plutarch (1) judiciously remarks, that Vigilance, a Quality common in Dogs, led the Egyptians to consecrate them to the most cunning and vigilant of all the Gods; or, in other words, the only Reason why they imaged Mercury with a Dog's Head, was, as Servius has it, because this is one of the most vigilant of Animals (a). We see from this Example the true Reason of the Doctrine of the Consecration of Animals, and that this sort of religious Worship terminated not in them, but in the Gods they represented. Herodotus decides the Question, when he says (2), “The Egyptians offered their Vows to those Animals, when they addressed their Prayers to the Gods to whom they were consecrated.” And if we would know what were those Vows which were addressed to Animals, this judicious Author informs us, that it was an Offering of Money, which was given them for their Maintenance. Diodorus Siculus says the same thing, and explains this Mystery more clearly (3): “The Egyptians, says he, offer'd to the Gods Vows for the Cure of their sick Children; and when they were out of danger, they conducted them to the Temple; and having cut off their Hair, they put it into a Balance with a Sum of Money of the same weight, which they gave to those who had the care of feeding the sacred Animals.”

Lucan, after having rallied the Egyptians who served up, says he, several of their Gods upon Cæsar's Table (b), subjoins however that the Priests being interrogated by that Prince about the Worship which they paid to those Animals, gave him to understand, that in them they worshipped the Divinity of whom they were the Symbols. Accordingly, when we learn that they placed in their Temples amidst all their Idols that of Harpocrates, with the Finger upon its Mouth, this plainly lets us see that therein they included Mysteries, which none were permitted to dive into, but only to meditate upon them in silence. But

(1) De Iside.

(2) Servius upon the Eighth Book of the Æneid. (2) Lib. 2. (3) L. 1.

(3) Non mandante fame, multos volucresque ferasque

Ægypti posuere Deos. Phars. Lib. 10.

But why make choice of Animals in order to represent the Gods? For what reasons were some prefer'd to others? Plutarch answers in general (1), "'Tis upon account of the Affinity which those Animals have with the Gods whom they represent. For, to make use of his Comparifon, the Image of God fhines forth in fome of them, as that of the Sun is reflected in the drops of Water which are ftruck with his Beams: Thus, the Crocodile having no Tongue, is confider'd as the Symbol of the Divinity, who, by his filent Influence, imprints the Laws of Equity and Wisdom on the filent Recesses of our Minds. And indeed, adds this learned Author, if numbers, which have neither Body nor Soul, were thought by the Pythagoreans to be proper Types of the Deity, is it not more reasonable, that Beings which are endued with both, should be confidered as Images wherein he has been pleas'd to make himself vifible to our eyes? And if Nature itfelf be but a Mirror, in which the Divinity, that glorious Sun, paints himfelf with his various Attributes, does not this ftill hold truer of the animate Creatures; and what Statue, even of the moft exquisite Workmanfhip, was ever capable of re-prefenting the fupreme Being to better advantage, than the fmalleft organized Body."

To this excellent Reason of Plutarch, I fhall fubjoin four others, which I fetch from the Aftrology, History, Theology of the Egyptians, and from the Benefit which accrued to Egypt from certain Animals.

"Lucian (a), after having faid that the Egyptians had calculated the courfe of every Star, and divided the Year into Months and Seasons, regulating the one by the courfe of the Sun, and the other by that of the Moon, fubjoins, that having divided the Heavens into twelve parts, they represented each Conftellation by the figure of fome Animal." Here then, in the firft place, we have the twelve Signs of the Zodiack represented by fo many Animals, fubftituted in place of

(1) De Ifid.

(a) Treatife of Judicial Aftrology.

the Stars, which were, as I have said, the first Divinities of the idolatrous World. The same Author after this adds, “ that the Egyptians revered the Ox Apis, “ in memory of the Celestial Bull, and that in the Oracle which was consecrated to him, they drew Predictions from the nature of that Sign, as the Africans “ from that of the Ram, in memory of Jupiter Hammon, “ whom they adored under that Figure.” It was then the Stars that they really worshipped; and if they paid a religious Worship to the Animals which represented them, this was nothing but a relative Worship.

’Tis true, the Vulgar did not always carry their views heaven-ward, there to adore those primary Gods, but frequently terminated their Worship in the Symbols themselves; but the question is not about the Religion of the Vulgar, but about that of the Priests and Egyptian Sages: And I don’t believe there ever was a Religion in the World that was exempt from Reproach, if regard was to be had only to popular Usages, which are frequently nothing but Superstition somewhat enlightened. The second Reason is taken from the ancient History of Egypt, which informs us, as has been already said, that the Gods having been once pursued by Typhon, had concealed themselves under the figures of different Animals, as we read in Ovid, in Manilius, and Diodorus Siculus. Nothing was more proper to found the Worship we are speaking of, than this History; for whether they believed that in reality the Grandees and Princes of Osiris’s Party, whom his Brother Typhon persecuted, had been in after-times deify’d, or rather, that this mysterious Transmigration of the Gods into the Bodies of Animals, was an ingenious Allegory, holding forth that the celestial Gods came down sometimes to dwell in those Symbols which represented them, still they were obliged to have a high veneration for the Animals, and a dread of violating the sacred Shrine of the Divinity itself.

The only reasonable Objection that lies against this Conjecture, is, that this Fable is originally Greek, and that we have it only from Greek and Latin Authors:

But

But not to insist here upon what I have proved already, that most of the Fables of both these People came from Egypt, and that in particular that of the Combat of the Giants is nothing but a distorted Tradition of the History of Typhon and Osiris, are there not Monuments to be seen in Egypt ancients than the Fables of the Greeks; Cities founded, a publick Worship established in honour of the very Animals, whose Figures, they tell us, the Gods had assumed? For in fine, if Ovid gives out that Jupiter had borrowed that of a Ram (1);

Duxque gregis dixit, sit Jupiter, unde recurvis

Nunc quoque formatus Libys est cum cornibus Ammon:

Was he not adored under that Form, in the famous Temple which he had in Libya? That Diana put on that of a Cat, Fele soror Phæbi, was not the City of Bubastis, whose name, according to Stephanus, was that of the same Goddess, and in which Cats were worshipped, was it not an authentick Monument of this Tradition? That Bacchus, or, according to others, Pan, took the figure of a He-Goat; Proles Semeleia Capro: Does not the Town of Mendes give an assured Testimony thereof? That Juno or Isis had assumed the Form of a Cow; Niveâ Saturnia Vaccâ: Was she not honoured at Memphis, under the Symbol of that Animal? That Venus disguised herself under the Scales of a Fish, Pisce Venus latuit, or as Manilius has it (2).

Inseruitque suos squamosis piscibus ignes:

Did not the Syrians abstain for this very reason, from eating Fish? In fine, that Mercury had assumed the figure of an Ibis; Cyllenius Ibidis Alis: Is it not well known that the Egyptians ascribed Worship to that Bird? Is it credible that the Egyptians learn'd both this Fable, and the Worship whereof it was the Foundation, from the Greeks and Romans? That it was upon their Ideas they founded the System of their Religion, and gave to their Cities Names conformable to the Worship which was therein practised? Or rather, was it not from those ancient Cities that the Authors I speak of, brought their Religion and Fables?

The

(1) Met. l. 5. v. 327. (2) Ast. l. 4.

The third Reason, which is likewise a consequence of the other, is drawn from the Doctrine of the Metempsychosis, or of that eternal circulation of Souls into different Bodies.

Morte carent Animæ, semperque priore relicta

Sede, novis domibus habitant, vivuntque receptæ (1).

'Tis not necessary to insist upon the Origin of this Doctrine. It suffices to say, that Pythagoras taught it in Greece and Italy, towards the LXI, and following Olympiads; but whether he inculcated it in the natural sense, or, as M. Dacier ingeniously thinks; in a moral and allegorical sense, 'tis certain that he was not the Inventor of it. He himself had learn'd it from the Egyptian Priests, among whom, if we credit Diogenes Laertius (2), he resided a long time, in order to be instructed in their Mysteries, into which he was initiated. Hercdotus (3) leaves no room to doubt of what I have advanced. "The Egyptians, says he, are the first who " maintained that the Soul of Man is immortal; that af" ter Death it passes successively into the Bodies of Ani" mals terrestrial, aquatick, and aërial, whence it re" turns to animate the Body of a Man, and finishes this " circuit in three thousand years. There are Greeks,
" says he, who have delivered the same Doctrine, some
" sooner, some later, as if it had been theirs originally;
" their Names I know, tho' I forbear to mention them." Hence undoubtedly, their care to embalm the Bodies after Death, and to appropriate to them lasting Monuments for Burial.

'Tis therefore certain, that this Doctrine was originally from Egypt; and it was certainly attended with these two great Advantages. First, it served as a Foundation for the Doctrine of the Immortality of the Soul: Secondly, by teaching that Souls passed into other Bodies, noble or ignominious, according to the Merit of the Actions that had been done in them, they render'd Vice odious and Virtue amiable; but then it naturally led to the Worship and Veneration which was afterwards paid to Animals, since it taught to consider them

as

(1) Ov. Metam. l. 5. 158. (2) Life of Pythagoras. (3) L. 1.

as the Receptacles not only of great Men, but of the Gods themselves. Accordingly, Diodorus Siculus asserts (1), that they were persuaded in Egypt that the Soul of Osiris had passed into that of an Ox ; and we learn from Ælian (2), that the aversion which the Inhabitants of Heliopolis had to the Crocodile, was founded upon their Belief that Typhon had put on the figure of that Animal.

In fine, the fourth Reason is drawn from the Benefit which the Egyptians received from certain Animals. Thus they had a veneration for the Ibis, because it destroy'd the flying Serpents that infested Egypt at a certain Season of the Year : For the Ichneumon, because it sought out the Crocodile's Eggs, which it broke without eating them, as if it had been led by its own Instinct to deliver Egypt from an Animal that was so destructive to it, &c.

After having laid open the Reasons which induced the Egyptians to pay to Animals a religious Worship, this would be the proper Place to examine, at what time this sort of Idolatry began ; but all I shall say, is, that it was in vogue thro' all Egypt in Moses's time, as is proved, 1. From the permission which he ask'd to go to sacrifice in the Wilderness, lest his offering up Victims for which the Egyptians had a veneration, should have caused them to stone him. 2. From the Idolatry of the golden Calf, which, as we have said, was an Imitation of that of the Ox Apis. What happened before the sojourning of the Israelites in Egypt, is so little known, that I shall not carry my Enquiries farther upon this Subject.

C H A P. V.

Of some other Egyptian Gods.

YOU are not to imagine that we have comprehended in this Treatise all the Gods whom Egypt adored ; this is a thing impossible : We have only spoke of the principal ones, and such as are most known.

The

(1) Loc. cit.

(2) L. 10. Hist. of Ani. c. 21.

The others, whose Worship was propagated to Greece and Italy, shall be the Subject of the third Volume, since, except Neptune and some others, all the Gods of the Greeks and Romans came to them from Egypt. I must take notice however, before we close this Head, that there have been, and daily are discover'd, by opening the Pits of the Mummies, a world of Idols, which represent the Egyptian Gods. Some of those Idols have the Head of a Dog, some of a Lion, others of a Wolf, or Cat, and then 'tis easy to see that they are either Anubis's, or Diana-Bubastes, &c. But then they sometimes present Figures so odd, and of so extraordinary a nature, that they appear to be rather Monsters than Gods, as they are to be seen in the Antiquaries who have given us Representations of some of them.

Father Kircher, who has discoursed of those Idols, in his Œdipus, says, they were interr'd with the Corpses, to be Preservatives against the bad Genii, who were believed to disturb the Manes of the Dead ; and I don't know a more probable Account can be given.

In fine, that nothing might be wanting to the Idolatry of the Egyptians, they had several Oracles, which they consulted upon all Occasions. Herodotus (1) speaks of those of Jupiter, Minerva, Latona, Apollo, Diana, Mars, and Hercules: Other Authors name those of Apis, of the Lion, the Goat, and the Crocodile.

C H A P. VI.

Of the Pageants and publick Ceremonies of the Egyptians, and some other Nations.

NEVER was Religion more encumbered with Ceremonies than that of the Egyptians, and nothing was ever accompany'd with more outward Splendor than their Festivals and Processions. An infinite Concourse of People, Licentiousness, Jollity, all combined in the Celebration of their Festivals ; and if the Priests made preparation for them by Fasting, Continence, and other

(1) L. 2.

other burdensome Ceremonies, the People longed for them, as the most proper days of their Life for Riot and Debauchery.

Among those Festivals, they reckon'd six principal ones. The first was celebrated at Bubastis, in honour of Diana; the second, at Busiris, for the Goddess Isis; the third, at Saïs, for Minerva; the fourth, at Heliopolis, in honour of the Sun: The fifth, at Buthos, was the Festival of Latona; the sixth was celebrated at Papremis, in honour of Mars.

I have already said that the Festival of the God Apis had this singularity, that after the People had passed some days in Grief and Mourning, to bewail the loss of this God of theirs, whom they drowned in the Nile, they gave themselves up to intemperate Mirth, so soon as the Priests intimated the Appearance of another, distinguished by the same Marks; and if they appeared to be greatly afflicted before, they were now no less elated with sincere Joy. The Feastings, Dancing, and all the other Demonstrations of publick Festivity, succeeded to the Tears which they had shed, and all Egypt joined in this Solemnity.

Nothing was so glittering, nothing so pompous, as the Processions which they made in honour of Isis and Osiris: There they solemnly carried about the Statues of those two Divinities with their Symbols. The Priests, to assist therein, had their Heads shaved, while the Priestesses preserved their Tresses. White Vestments made of the finest Linnen, Crowns, and Garlands, distinguish'd these Priests and Priestesses from the numberless Crouds who were present at those Processions; and the Sound of Sistrums or Citterns, Tabrets, and Cymbals, filled the Spectators with a tumultuous Joy, which 'tis difficult to express. Herodotus (1) speaks of a Festival of Isis, where her Statue was carried upon a four-wheel'd Chariot, drawn by the Priests of that Goddess: And Clemens of Alexandria (2) describes another Egyptian Procession, wherein were carried about two Dogs of gold, a Hawk, and an Ibis. The same

Author

(1) L. 4. (2) Strom. l. 5.

Author reports in another place (3), the Words of Menander, who rallied those rambling Divinities, who could never settle.

The Festival of Bubastis in lower Egypt was still more solemn. Thither they came from all parts, and the Nile for several days was overspread with Barges, which they who filled them had deck'd with all the Ornaments they could devise: And as every Barge had its Musicians and Concert, the Air resounded on all hands with the Harmony of their Instruments. The Banks of the River were crouded on either side with Spectators to see those Barges as they passed: Those who were in them, according to a very antient Custom, and which lasts almost every where at this very day, lashed the spectators in Satirical Jests, and frequently in scurrilous Ribaldry; while the others in their turn paid home their Compliments with large interest. The Women who were upon the Water, presented themselves to those curious Eyes, in a manner too immodest to be here described. Care was taken to prepare upon the Banks of the River numbers of Inns, where they came to refresh themselves, and there great plenty was to be had of every thing conducive to good cheer. The number of Spectators at this Festival was computed to be seven hundred thousand, without including Children, who accompanied their Parents. When they arrived at Bubastis, they abandon'd themselves intirely to Mirth and Revelling; and more Wine was consumed in that City during the stay they made there upon account of this Solemnity, than thro' the whole Year besides.

As nothing is more difficult to be abolished than Ceremonies where Rioting is intermixed, this Festival lasts at this very day, though the Object thereof be changed; and every Year the Egyptians, together with the Turks who govern them, fall down the Nile at a certain time of the Year, from Cairo as far as Rosetto, with such a vast confluence of People, that the

• River

River resembles a floating City (a). The musical Instruments, the Inns, and the scurrilous Gibes that pass between those that are on the Water, and the Spectators on the Banks of the Nile, all bear a resemblance there to the ancient Festival of Bubastis. But nothing was ever so pompous and magnificent as the solemn Procession made by Ptolemy's Orders, whereof we have the Description in Theocritus and Athenæus, who has taken it from an ancient Author.

At the Festival of Busiris, which was celebrated in honour of Isis, the Sacrifices were followed with a Flagellation, from which neither Men nor Women were exempted ; but the Carians especially, who inhabited Egypt, were the Persons who drubb'd themselves most heartily, and they added even to this Ceremony, that of stabbing themselves in the Forehead with the point of a Sword.

What distinguished the Festival of Minerva at Sais, was the great number of Lamps they burnt there during the Night ; and they who could not be present at this Festival, kept them burning in their own Houses. The whole Ceremony in the Festival of Heliopolis, and that of Butbos, was to offer Sacrifices upon that occasion to the Sun and to Latona.

But that which they celebrated at Pampremis in honour of Mars, was attended with a remarkable Singularity. The Priests bore upon a four-wheel'd Chariot the Statue of that God, which was inclosed in a small Chapel of gilt Wood ; and while they endeavoured to force the Chariot and Statue into the Temple of that Divinity, Men armed with Clubs stood in the way to hinder it : And as the Priests who accompany'd the Procession, had likewise Arms, there ensued an Engagement, where naturally many People must have lost their lives. The Egyptians, however, maintained that no body died of the Wounds they received upon that occasion.

That People had besides, several sorts of Processions, but less solemn than those which I have been describing.

Macrobius

(a) See Paul Lucas's third Voyage.

Macrobius (1) informs us, that they led about in a Litter, the Jupiter of Heliopolis, born upon Men's shoulders, much in the same manner that the Romans carry'd about their Gods in the Pageantry of the Circensian Games, and as we, upon like occasions, bear about the Shrines of our Saints.

The Hebrews, who derived from the Egyptians that fatal Propensity which they had towards Idolatry, imitated them but too often, not only in the Solemnity of the golden Calf, as has been said, but also in the Ceremony of their Processions. The Prophet Amos upbraids them for having led about in the Wilderness the Tabernacle of the God Moloch, the Image of their Idol, and the Star of the God Remphan (a). St. Stephen, in the Acts of the Apostles (2), taxes them with the same piece of Idolatry.

These are the Gods carried about in ceremonious Procession, lodged in a Tabernacle; the Figures of a Star, and a Divinity acknowledged to be the King of those who adored him; that is, the Gods of Egypt, the Sun or Osiris, and others whom that superstitious People believed to have rescu'd them from Bondage, and who said: Behold thy Gods, who have brought thee out of Egypt (3).

Several other People practised the same Ceremonies, whether they had learned them from the Egyptians, as is very probable, or had invented them themselves. Philo of Byblos, speaking of Agrotes, the famous Divinity of the Phenicians, relates, according to Eusebius (4), that he was carried in procession in a cover'd Niche, upon a Chariot drawn by Animals. Servius (5) informs us, that the Carthaginians had Gods, represented by very small Images, which they bore about in cover'd

(1) Sat. l. 2.

(a) The Hebrew Text says. "You have carried the Tabernacles of your King, and the Base of your Figures, the Star of your Gods;" or, according to another Reading, Chium your Image, and the Star your God, whom you have made to yourselves. Amos, ch. 5. v. 26.

(2) C. vii. v. 43. (3) Ex. xxxii.. (4) Præp. Evan. l. i. N. 10.

(5) Ad Æn. 6.

covered Chariots, and which gave Oracles by the Motion which they impressed upon their Vehicle. Quintus Curtius (1) asserts, as we have said elsewhere (2), that the Oracle of Jupiter Hammon was deliver'd much in the same way. The ancient Germans, as we have it in Tacitus (3), had a Goddess who resided in a sacred Grove, in an Isle of the Ocean, and that Author adds, that there was in the same Grove a cover'd Chariot, to which no body durst approach but her Priest. This Priest observed the time when the Goddess enter'd thither, and then with great Reverence he accompany'd the Litter, drawn by two Heifers, in the Procession which was performed upon this occasion. Tacitus says farther, that wherever the Chariot pass'd, the Goddess was received with Festivals and publick Rejoicings; that after the Procession, the Goddess re-enter'd into her Grove, as tired with the commerce of Mortals; and that then the Chariot, the Veil that covered her, and the Goddess herself, were plunged into a Lake, and washed by Slaves who were drowned after this Ceremony.

Sulpitius Severus says, that the Peasants of Gaul had a Custom of carrying their Gods thro' the Country, covered with a white Veil. Simulachra Dæmonum candido tuta velamine, miserâ per agros suos circumferre dementiâ.

C H A P. VII.

Explanation of the Isiack Table.

TH O' this Monument belongs more properly to the Antiquaries than Mythologists, yet I judge it will be of use to give a short Explication of it, because there we have Isis and Osiris, and almost all the other Gods of Egypt, represented with their Symbols. Thus the Explanation which I am to give of it, will conduce to our understanding what has been said of these Deities. The Isiack Table, so term'd, because it appears

(1) L. 4. (2) Chap. of Oracles. (3) De Mor. Ger.

appears to contain the Mysteries of Isis, was a Plate of Copper, whereon were engraved only the rough Outlines of Figures, representing most of the Egyptian Gods ; but especially Isis and Osiris, who are there repeated several times, with all their Symbols.

This Copper or Brass Ground was overlaid with a black Enamel, artificially intermixed with small Plates of Silver. When, in the Year 1525, the Constable of Bourbon took the City of Rome, a Locksmith bought it from a Soldier, and then sold it to Cardinal Bembo, after whose death it came into the hands of the Duke of Mantua ; and was kept in that Family, till it was lost at the taking of that City by the Imperialists, in the Year 1630, nor has it been ever heard of since. By good luck it had been engrav'd in its full Proportion, and with all possible Exactness, by Æneas Vico of Parma. This Tablet was divided into three horizontal Compartments, in each of which were different Scenes, which contained different Actions. Those Compartments are as it were different Cartouches, distinguished sometimes by single strokes only, but oftner by a very large Fascia, which is full of Hieroglyphicks, that is, of that mysterious Writing, consecrated by the ancient Egyptians to the Mysteries of Religion. The four sides of the Table were inclosed with a Border, fill'd up as the Ground, with several Figures of the Egyptian Gods, and with a great number of Hieroglyphicks.

'Tis a question not easy to determine, whether this Table only represents the Mysteries of Isis, whose Figure, placed in a sort of Niche, is in the Center ; or if it contains the principal Points of the Egyptian Theology, since all their Gods are there represented.

Every thing about it has a mysterious and enigmatical Appearance, according to the Genius of that Nation. Pignorius being intreated by his Friends to explain this Monument, yielded, even against his own Inclination, to their importunate Sollicitations. Accordingly, there is always to be seen an air of Diffidence in all the Conjectures which he offers. His Work, intitled Mensa Isiaca, was printed in 4to at Amsterdam, An. 1669. F.

Kircher

Kircher followed him pretty near, and treated the same Subject in his Œdipus, with that air of Assurance wherewith he was inspired from the superiority of his Genius, and that deep knowledge which he had in the Religion of the Egyptians. Lastly, Chifflet added new Conjectures to those of the learned Jesuit (1). A short Sketch of what has been delivered with relation to this Monument, by those three learned Antiquaries whom I have now named, will serve for a Supplement to what I have said of the Gods of Egypt, and shew their Symbols more particularly.

In the upper Partition, beginning at the left*, you see Osiris, holding in one hand a Ring, where appears a well-form'd Cross, and in the other a Staff, or rather a Scepter, terminating in a Bird's Head. That the Cross is to be found among the Symbols of the Egyptian Divinities, is evident, whatever Justus Lipsius may say to the contrary (2), not only from the Figures which we have now remaining, but also from Obelisks which time has preserved to us. The Bird is, without doubt, the Hawk, consecrated to Isis. After this, you see a Priest sacrificing a Roe-Buck to that Goddess, who is opposite to him, the Altar in the middle. Isis is there represented, holding in one hand a Ring, with its Cross, and in the other her Scepter, terminating in the Flower of Lotus, which was her ordinary Symbol. The Ornament of her Head is somewhat different from what she wears in other Figures; we shall speak of it afterwards. Next appears Osiris, with the Scepter in his hand, presenting a Bird to Isis, who in her turn presents him with a Vase, in form of a Goblet. Behind the Goddess is a Man, who holds in one hand a Vase, like that which Isis has in hers, and in the other a crooked Knife, not unlike a Lopping-Knife. Between Isis and Osiris, in the upper part of the Compartment, is a He-Goat, and in the lower, a kind of Ape called

O o 2

Cerco-

(1) In notis ad Mallarium.

* In the Print of it which I have now by me, you begin at the right. Vid. Montfaucon, V. 2. B. 2. ch. 1.

(2) De Cruce.

Cercopithecus. The Personage who comes next, is also an Isis; upon her Head a Serpent with a Bird's Head, in one hand she holds a Branch, and in the other a Staff, crooked at the head in form of a Crozier. Osiris, with the Symbols which he wears in the other Figures, comes after, and is fixing his eyes upon another Isis, who holds a Flower in her hand: The Griffin, an Animal consecrated to the Sun, is in the middle. The Compartment is terminated by three Figures, one of whom is also an Osiris, the other an Isis, and the third, who is in the middle, a Priest holding a Staff in one hand, and some kind of Offering in the other, which we cannot distinguish.

The middle Compartment, which appears to be the principal one, represents different Scenes: That in the Center, is the principal Figure. 'Tis first Isis upon a Throne, whose Cornice is supported by two Columns. The Goddess wears a singular Ornament upon her Head; 'tis a Bird couchant, whose Wings display'd, reach as far as her Shoulders. This Bird, which appears all speckled, is, according to Pignorius, the Numidian Hen, which Martial calls, Numidica guttata (1). Above the Bird are two Stalks, probably of the Lotus, which instead of Flowers, have nothing yet but Buds: The whole is surmounted by two great Horns, closed by a Line; with a Discus in the space which is left between them. The Ornaments of the Head, which the Goddess wears in the Statues we have of her, are always very high, and of an extraordinary nature. She appears sometimes even with an Ox's Head, with large Horns; but more frequently with the Flower of Lotus, forming a Crescent; with a Globe in the middle. As she represented the Moon, 'tis easy to see, that both the Horns of the Ox, and the Lotus placed as we have now said, were intended to image the Crescent of that Planet; and by the Globe, the World, round which it revolves.

In the same Scene are six Figures, three on each side of the Throne, with their Faces turned towards the Goddess;

(1) L. 3. Epig. 58.

Goddeſs. The two ſtanding with great Staves, may be reckon'd her two Life-Guards; the two that are ſitting are two Oſiris's, the one with the ordinary Plume, the other with an Ibis's Head. Below the Seat of him who is on the right, is the Ox Apis, and under him who is on the left, is a Crocodile.

The two laſt Figures of this Compartment, which are placed at the two extremities, are pretty ſingular. They are two Women, who entirely reſemble one another, both in their Apparel, and in the Symbols which they bear. Their Head-Attire is compoſed of a great Plume, with Horns and a Diſcus; they have buſhy Hair, and Wings upon their Haunches. They hold a ſort of Knife, brandiſh'd towards two Vaſes, which are upon two little Pillars, and ſeem to be offering a Sacrifice to Iſis, which makes it probable, that they are two of her Priſteſſes, and not the Goddeſs herſelf, as Pignorius reckons.

At the two extremities of this Fascia, are two Compartments, ſeparated likewise into two, which are entirely ſimilar. Above, is the Ox Apis, with two Priests, who have their Eyes intently fix'd upon him. Pignorius will have it, that they are obſerving if he has the proper Marks that were required in the Representative of Oſiris; but as the Priest who is before the Ox, holds in the one hand a Vaſe, and in the other, ſome Meat which he preſents to him, 'tis evident, that they are both of them attentively obſerving if he takes what is offered him to eat: For, as has been ſaid, they drew a good Omen from his eating; and a bad one from his rejecting the Food that was offer'd him: Infomuch that I am ſurprized how Pignorius, and after him very able Antiquaries, could miſtake as to this Article. The lower part of thoſe two ſmall Compartments, repreſents two Iſis's, or rather two of her Priſteſſes, who are offering to her a Sacrifice.

The loweſt Fascia contains thirteen Perſonages, and may be divided into ſeveral Actions. The firſt, beginning at the left, conſiſts of three Figures. That in the middle is an Orus, ſwath'd, yet ſo as to have both his hands disengaged, and holding a long Staff which terminates in a Hawk's Head, resembling that of Osiris; and another smaller one, which probably is design'd for a Whip. This God represented the Sun, as well as his Father, as has been said in his Article; accordingly, he had the proper Symbols of that Luminary. On each side of Orus are two Figures, which some have taken for two Isis's; but I am persuaded that they are two Priestesses, with the Habit of that Goddess, offering a Sacrifice. Accordingly, one of them presents a Cup to the young God, and the other a small Tablet, on which are five Vases.

The second Scene of this Fascia represents Isis sitting between two Osiris's, one of them presenting a Bird to her. The third exhibits an Osiris with an Hawk's Head, and two Figures of Isis, of whom the one appears to be offering to him a Vase. The fourth contains five Figures, whereof the principal is an Isis, with a Lion's Head. Hard by her is an Anubis, then an Osiris, who holds his Staff in one hand, and in the other the Marks of his Castration. Then comes another Orus, swath'd, who has a Cat by him, or the God Ælurus, with a Sistrum. Lastly, you see another Osiris, with a Spear terminating in the form of a Crosier, having upon his Head a Serpent surmounted with a Sun; which no doubt denotes the Obliquity of the course of that Luminary.

As the Border is full of the same Figures, tho' with some variety, we shall content ourselves with referring to Pignorius, who has explained it.

Such is the Description of this Table, upon which I thought fit to enlarge, because of the extraordinary Symbols which are there given to the Gods of Egypt. But what the Person had in his view who caused it to be engraved, is not easy to conjecture. F. Kircher (1) thought he discovered therein, the darkest Mysteries of the Egyptian Theology, and enters into a detail which I have no mind to copy. Pignorius seems to have apply'd himself only to the mechanical Description

(1) Oed. Synt. i. p. 89.

tion of this Table, without attempting to unfold its Design. For my part, I am of opinion it was a votive Table, which some Prince, or private Person had consecrated to Isis, as an acknowledgment for some Benefit which he believed she had conferred upon him. That Goddess occupies the principal Place in it, and the design of varying her Attitudes and Symbols, must have been to point out to us, in how many different manners she was represented, as also the different Sacrifices that were offered to her. Accordingly, three sorts of them are there to be observed, one of Animals, another of Plants, and a third of Libations: Perhaps he who consecrated this Table to Isis, had offered to her all those sorts of Sacrifices, either for having been cured of some severe Disease, or for having been delivered from some great Danger, to which he had been exposed by Sea: For that Goddess was equally invoked in Diseases, and when People were entering upon a long Voyage; hence the Epithets of Salutaris, and Pelagia, were added to her Name.

For what remains, nothing was more common than the votive Tables, consecrated to Isis. All the Temples of this Goddess were full of them, and Works of that sort procured a Living to great numbers of Painters, as it is in Juvenal:

*Et quam votivâ testantur fana tabellâ
Plurima, Pictôres quis nescit ab Iside pasci (1)?*

C H A P. VIII.

Of the Gods of the Arabians.

THE History of the Egyptian Gods leads us naturally to that of the Arabians, their Neighbours. This People, whose way of Life was always rambling and unsettled, frequently changed their State and Religion. As they were descended from Ishmael, Abraham's Son, 'tis reasonable to believe, that they had at first no other Creed but that of their Founder; but Idolatry, latry, which diffused itself at that time over all the Earth, doubtless penetrated very soon into Arabia. We are ignorant, however, as to the time when the Arabians embraced the Worship of false Gods: Only this we know, that as Sabism was the predominant Religion of those early times, so it is probable that this was the Religion which they followed, 'Tis even not to be doubted, but the Sabeans, an Arabian Nation, had derived their Name from that sort of Worship. But whatever be in that, here is what Herodotus says of that ancient People (1). “ There is no People in the “ World that has a stricter regard to their plighted “ Faith, than the Arabians; and they come under Engagements in this manner: Some one of them sets “ himself between the two Parties who are to make a “ Treaty with one another, holding a sharp Stone, with “ which he makes some Incisions in the Palm of their “ Hands: Then taking a piece of their Clothes, he “ dips it in the Blood which issues from those Wounds.

 “ He anoints with it seven Stones which he has placed “ between them, invoking, in the time of this Operation, Dionysius or Bacchus, and Urania. The Arabians, continues this Author, believe there are no “ other Gods but those two. They shave their Temples, and cut their Hair round, because they believe “ Bacchus wore it so. They call Dionysius, Urotal (a);
 “ and Urania, Alilat.” Upon which 'tis proper to make two Remarks. First, that this Author, who here names that Goddess Alilat, had called her in the second Book, Mylitta. Secondly, that tho' he gives in one place the name of Apbrodite to this Venus, and in another that of Urania, yet 'tis evident that he does not distinguish the one from the other.

Strabo, who likewise speaks of the Arabian Gods, says (2), they adored only Jupiter and Bacchus, without making any mention of Urania; and Arrian, who gives them no other Divinities but Uranus or Heaven,
 and

(1) L. 3. c. 8.

(a) See in Vossius de Idol. l. 1. c. 8. the Etymology of this Name.

(2) L. 10.

and Bacchus, seems to favour the Sentiment of this Author: But 'tis probable that these two Authors were not so well informed as Herodotus, in the Religion of that ancient People, or we must allow that it had undergone some Alteration; perhaps at bottom they don't contradict one another. Bacchus incontestably was the Sun; and Urania, or the Celestial, named by the Arabians and some other People, Alilat, was the Moon; and it was, in reality, those two Stars or Luminaries they adored.

Tho' the only Objects of Idolatry at first were the Sun and Moon, yet it did not long continue in that primitive Simplicity, so that we need not be surprized that other Authors of less antiquity than those whom I have now cited, have given the Arabians a greater number of Gods. Thus, Stephen of Byzantium says, their God was called Dusares, and that it was he who gave his Name to a high Mountain and to its Inhabitants, who were denominated Dusarenians. He likewise relates a Fact, which, as it shews us the Vanity of Alexander, so it proves at the same time, what Herodotus says of the Religion of the Arabians: For that Hero being inform'd that they worshipped only two Gods, proposed that they would make himself the third; since he was comparable to Bacchus, whose Conquests and Expeditions he had equall'd.

'Tis true, that Author says, the two Divinities adored by the Arabians, were Uranus or Heaven, and Dionysius or Bacchus; but the Learned justly give the preference to Herodotus. Tertullian, in his Apologeticks, and in the XIth Book against the Gentiles, mentions that Dusares, and reckons him in the number of the Arabian Gods, with Obodan, who was a King of the Country, whose Tomb was to be seen among the Nabathæan Arabs.

Philostorgus, in Photius, asserts that the Homerites, a Nation celebrated among the Arabians, sacrificed to the Sun, to the Moon, and to the Demons. Maximus Tyrius says, they paid a divine Worship to a square Stone; and when some one of them embraced the Christian Religion, he was obliged to anathematize that Stone which had been the Object of his Worship. Other Authors alledge, that the Tower named Acara, or Alquibila, built of old by their Patriarch Ishmael, had become amongst them an Object of Religion. St. Jerom, in his Commentary upon the Prophet Hoseab, informs us, that they adored also Baal-Peor, of whom the sacred Books speak, and reckons him to have been the same as Priapus; but as in the best Mythologists, Priapus is the Sun, as we observe elsewhere, we must still return to the Sentiment of Herodotus.

Christian

To these ancient Authors, it will not be amiss to add the Authority of some Moderns, who had taken their Accounts of the Arabian Religion from their own Books; I mean Herbelot, who speaks thereof in several Places of his Dictionary, and Pocock in his History of Arabia. The last names seven of those celestial Gods; Dzobl, whom he takes to be Saturn; Dzobara, or Venus; Moschtara, or Jupiter; Aikarid, or Mercury; Abdabaram, or the Bull's-Eye; Sobail, or Canopus; and Aichcera, or Sirius. The Reader may consult the learned Dissertations of that Author, where he will see that he makes the number of the Gods, whom the Arabians worshipped, amount to more than forty.

Beger names five of them, who, he says, held the first Rank among the Gods of that People; Vuodd, among the Kelibites; Scurac, among the Hadeilites; Nesv, among the Duikelaits; Jagut or Jaug. 'Tis also known, that about the Kaaba (a) were three hundred and sixty Statues. But the question is, whether they represented the Gods, or only the great Men of the Nation? However this much at least is certain, that several of those Statues were respected, or rather adored. The Testimony of Arabian Authors, as M. Fourmont has it (b), suffers us not to doubt of it. According to those Authors, adds this ingenious Academic, the Idolatry of the Arabians is older than the Deluge.

(a) Temple of Mecca.

(b) Reflexions upon ancient Nations.

Deluge. The five last Gods, whom we have named after Beger, were, according to Budauvi, virtuous Men who had lived before the Deluge, and whose Worship after that Event, had been established among the Arabians.

I shall not dwell any longer upon the Gods of that People; a List of them may be seen in Pocock, and in M. Fourmont, and I am the more willing to suppress that Catalogue, as it is not very instructive. I shall only observe, that such of those Gods as had no relation to the Stars and Planets, were some illustrious Men, whom they thought entitled to a religious Worship, among whom doubtless were Abraham and Ismael, from whom the Arabians descended. But be that as it will, it appears, that the Arabians at first had only two natural Gods, Dionysius and Alilat, that is, the Sun and the Moon, as Gerard Vossius fully proves; but in after-times they join'd to those two Divinities, the animated Gods, their Kings and illustrious Men; and at length they adopted the Gods of their Neighbours.

To conclude, none of the Authors, whom I have cited, mention either the form of the Arabian Sacrifices, or the Victims which they offered up. Strabo only informs us, that they made a daily Offering of Incense to the Sun, or to Dionysius, upon an Altar which was in a covered Place: and Theophrastus long before him had said, that the Sabeans carefully collected Myrrh and Incense, to offer it in the Temple of that God: which was common to them with the Ethiopians, as shall be said in the following Chapter.

We shall not farther insist upon the Venus Urania, nor upon Dionysius, who was the ancient Bacchus, or rather Osiris, whose Worship had passed from Egypt into Arabia, because we shall have occasion to speak of them elsewhere.

The Arabians continued Idolaters till the time of Mahomet, under whom they abandoned the Worship of Idols, and have always been since his most faithful Disciples.

C H A P. IX.

Of the Gods of the Ethiopians.

FROM the Gods of the Egyptians and Arabians, 'tis natural to proceed to those of the Ethiopians. Here then, in the first place, is what we learn of them from Strabo (1). “The Ethiopians, says that learned Geographer, acknowledge an immortal God, who is the Principle of all things, and a mortal God, who has no Name; but commonly they look upon their Benefactors as Gods, and those who are distinguished by their Birth. Among those who inhabit the torrid Zone, there are some who pass for Atheists, because they actually hate the Sun, and curse him at his Rising, because he scorches them with his Heat, to such a degree, that they are forced to shelter themselves in moist and marshy Places.

“Those of Meroe adore Hercules, Pan, and Isis, with another foreign God. Some among them throw their dead into the River, while others keep them in their Houses in great Glass-Vessels; others in short put them into Coffins of bak'd Earth, and interr them about the Temples.”

We see from this Passage, that the Ethiopians, after the example of other Nations, had Gods natural, and Gods animated: That they took the last from among their great Men, whom they deified; and that they had borrow'd the former from the Egyptians their Neighbours, since, like them, they worshipped the Moon under the Name of Isis, and universal Nature under that of Pan.

As for the Sun, 'tis certain, that they adored him so highly as to repute those to be Atheists, who did not acknowledge him for a God, as has been now said after Strabo. However, they did not stile him Osiris as the Egyptians, but Assabinus; and because he was their great Divinity, the Greeks and Romans gave him the Name

(1) L. 1.

Name of Ethiopian Jupiter; and that with so much the more reason, remarks the learned Vossius, that in all the East, and among the Nations of Africk, Jupiter not only represented Heaven, but also the Sun.

But let that be as it will, the Ethiopians consecrated to the Sun the Cinnamon-tree, an odoriferous Shrub which grew in their Country. The singular manner how they gather'd it, is told, tho' with some variation, by Theophrastus, Pliny, and Solinus; it amounts to this. The Priests, and none but they, were allowed to gather that Harvest, which was always ushered in with Sacrifices; and they were not to begin this Work till after Sun-rising, and it was to be finished before his setting. The Crop being gathered, they divided it into three parts, with a Spear, which was never used but upon that occasion. They carried away two Portions of it, and left on the same place that which fell to the Sun, and forthwith, say they, if the Division had been performed with Equity, the Sun's Portion took fire of itself, and was consumed. Theophrastus justly reckons this last Circumstance to be a meer Fable (1); but Pliny and Solinus subjoin no Reflection to their Recital, as is to be seen in the two Passages of those two Authors, which run thus:

Metitur non nisi permiserit Deus: Jovem hunc intelligunt aliqui, Assabinum illi vocant. Quadraginta quatuor boum caprarumque & arietum cæsis, impetratur venia cædendi; non tamen aut ante ortum Solis, aut post occasum, licet. Sarmenta hasta dividit Sacerdos, Deoque partem ponit; reliquum mercator in nassas condit. Est et alia fama, cum Sole dividi, ternasque partes fieri: dein sorte cremia discerni; quodque Soli cesserit, relinqui, ac sponte conflagrare (2).

Æthiopes legunt Cinnamum; verum legitur per Sacerdotes, hostiis prius cæsis: quæ cum litaverint, observatur ut messis, nec ortum Solis anticipet, nec egrediatur occasum. Quisquis principatum tenet Sacerdotum, acervos hasta dividit, quæ sacrata est in hoc ministerium:

Atque

(1) Οὗτος μὲν ἐν τῷ ὄντι μῦθος.

(2) Plin. L. 12. c. 19.

Atque ita portio manipulorum Soli dicatur ; quæ si juste divisa est, sponte incenditur (1).

For my own part, I am apt to believe that the Priests secretly convey'd some Coals under the Heap that was allotted to the Sun ; and that those Coals kindled some moments after, precisely at the time of their retiring.

This, in short, is all that we know from the Ancients of the Religion of the Ethiopians ; nay, we are not able exactly to determine what Ethiopians they mean ; and in all probability, it was the Orientals, and not those of Africk. And indeed what Theophrastus tells us of the care which the Sabeans, an Arabian Nation, had to gather Incense and Cinnamon, to offer it to the Sun, is the same with what Strabo says of the Ethiopians.

As the Ancients were unacquainted with the interior Parts of Africk, I shall say nothing of the Idolatry of those Nations. The case was quite otherwise, as to the maritime Parts of that Continent ; these were very well known to the Ancients, who make frequent mention of the Religion of the Inhabitants of those places : but this shall be the Subject of the following Chapter.

C H A P. X.

Of the Gods of the Carthaginians, and some other People of Africk.

THAT the Carthaginians were a Colony that came from Phenicia, under the Conduct of Elisa, surnamed Dido, is a Fact to which all are agreed ; and consequently it is not to be denied, but that the first Gods of Carthage were the same as those who were adored at Tyre and Sidon. Dido, no doubt establish'd in her new Colony the Worship of the Gods of her Ancestors : her Subjects would never have been reconciled to a sudden Change in Religion, it being natural for Mankind to have a strong Attachment to what they have, as I may say, drank in with their Mother's Milk.

(1) Solin. c. 31.

Milk: 'Tis our Unhappiness, that the little we know of the Religion of the Carthaginians, is transmitted to us by Greeks and Romans, who have given the Names of their own Gods to those of that People; thus we find at Carthage Saturn, Jupiter, Neptune, Apollo, Venus, Mars, Mercury, Hercules, Ceres, Proserpina, Juno, and Esculapius; all of them Gods worship'd in Greece and Italy. We are not however to think, that those two Countries had themselves received them from the Carthaginians, since the Egyptian and Phenician Colonies, which brought the Knowledge of them into Greece, were many Ages before Dido's time. 'Tis more credible, that first the Greeks, and then the Romans, in the time of the Punick Wars, communicated their Gods to the Carthaginians, a thing by no means improbable. But the question is about the first Gods of that People, who unquestionably were the same with those of the Phenicians.

What might then have led the Greeks and Romans into the Mistake is this. In the Commerce which they had with the Carthaginians, they were informed, that they sacrificed Children to one of their Gods, and hence they made no doubt but that God was Saturn; whereas had they known the Original of their own Gods, they had seen that their Saturn, as well as that of the Carthaginians, was Moloch, the great Divinity of the Ammonites. In like manner, they understood that the Carthaginians had a God to whom they address'd their Oaths; and as themselves swore by Jupiter, so they made no doubt but that God was the same; whereas at Carthage it was the Baal-Berith of Phenicia, of whom we shall speak in the following Book. The same thing may be said of most of the other Gods, who were worshipped at Carthage. We now come to particulars.

All Antiquity agrees, that the Carthaginians worship'd Saturn; who, as we have now said, was the same with Moloch, and that they sacrificed to him their Children. Was I inclin'd to enlarge upon this Article, I might quote the Passages from Diodorus Siculus (1),

from

(1) L. 10.

from Plutarch (1), Dionysius of Halicarnassus (2), Quintus Curtius (3), and several other Ancients. The detestable Custom of sacrificing every year human Victims to that God, lasted even after the Overthrow of that People, notwithstanding all that their Conquerors could do to abolish it.

*Urna reducebat miserandos annua casus,
Sacra Thoantæ ritusque imitata Dianæ* (4).

Justin relates (5), that Darius the Son of Hystaspes had commanded them to lay aside those barbarous Sacrifices; but his Orders were but ill executed. Plutarch adds (6), that Gelon the Tyrant of Syracuse, did not make peace with them, till he had laid them under the same Prohibition, as the first Condition of the Treaty; and, according to Tertullian (7), Tiberius gave Orders to hang all the Priests who exacted those barbarous Sacrifices.

We have already said, that the God whom Carthage adored was the same as Moloch; all the Learned, among whom may be consulted Bochart, Vossius and Selden, agree to it, and M. Fourmont has put this Fact beyond doubt (a). The Verse in Silius Italicus, where Melicus is mentioned, can, according to him, be understood of none but Moloch. And indeed he is treating in that Verse, and in the two others which we have now cited, of the Carthaginians and their Religion. The Names of Amilcar, of Bomilcar, and Imilco, according to the same Author, carry plain Allusions to those of Moloch, Milcom, and Melech, Phenician Divinities: but I cannot be of his mind as to this last Article. Those three Names belong to three illustrious Persons, whom the Carthaginians adopted into the number of their Gods; Herodotus expressly asserts it of the first. “Amilcar, says he (8), “having been vanquished by Gelon, vanish’d, and could

(1) Treatise of Superstition. (2) Rom. Ant. (3) L. 3. c. 3.
(4) Sil. Ital. (5) L. 19. (6) De Sera Num. Vin. (7) In Apol.

(a) Critical Reflections upon ancient Nations. Tom. 1. p. 144, & sequ.

(8) L. 7.

“ could never more be found either alive or dead, what“ ever pains his Vanquisher was at in causing search to be “ made for him. The Carthaginians, who have a great “ veneration for him; say, that during the Engagement “ between the Barbarians and Sicilian Greeks, Amilcar “ having staid in the Camp, there offered Sacrifices of “ all sorts of Animals, and, seeing the rout of his “ Army, threw himself into the Fire; but whether “ he died in that way; as the Phenicians say, or in the “ other, as the Carthaginians and Syracusans assert, 'tis “ certain that the former offer Sacrifices to him, and “ have erected Monuments to his Honour, wherever “ there is any of their Colonies, and principally in Car- “ thage.”

We may judge the same way of Bomilcar and Imilco, tho' the Ancients tell us nothing of them. For in fine, there is no denying, after what we have now quoted from Herodotus, that the Carthaginians, like other Nations, rank'd their great Men in the number of the Gods, and joined the animated Gods to those who are called natural: The Example of the two Phileni, is a proof of it. These two Brothers, as we have it in Sallust (1), Pomponius Mela (2), and Valerius Maximus (3), having been sent by the Carthaginians to make peace with the Cyrenians, who were at war with them, sacrificed themselves for their Country, which in gratitude raised Altars to them, and conferred upon them divine Honours.

As to Neptune, the Carthaginians had received the Worship of him from the Libyans, as well as the Greeks and Romans; for that God; as we learn from Herodo- tus (4), from whom we have quoted the Passage elsewhere, was originally from Africa. Appian says (5), that the same People paid adoration to Apollo, who had a Temple at Carthage; and Plutarch adds (6), that the Statue of that God was brought to Rome.

Juno and Venus were two of the greatest Carthagi- nian

(1) De Bel. Jug. c. 79. (2) L. 1. c. 8. (3) L. 5. c. 6.
 (4) L. 2. (5) De Bell. Pun. (6) Life of Flav.

nian Divinities. St. Augustine (1) speaking of the last of those two Goddesses, says, Carthage was the Place where she had established her Reign; and Virgil informs us, that Juno preferred that City to all others, even to Samos itself:

*Quam Juno fertur terris magis omnibus unam
Posthabitâ coluisse Samo* (2).

As for Mars, we have the Testimony of Silius Italicus (3), who tells us, that Annibal invoked him. We know also that the Carthaginians honoured Mercury, under the name of Sumes. Would ever that People, who supported themselves chiefly by Commerce, have neglected the Worship of the God of Merchants and Thieves? We have two Authorities which prove, that they likewise paid Homage to Ceres and Proserpina. The Poet whom I now quoted, tells us (4), that the Statues of those two Goddesses were in the Temple of Dido, and Virgil lets us know, that this Princess sacrificed to Ceres (5).

Nothing is more celebrated in ancient History than the Tyrian Hercules, whose Worship was brought to Carthage by Dido, and diffused itself afterwards over all the Coasts of Africk, and as far as Gades or Cadiz, where he had a magnificent Temple (6): But as I am to speak of that God fully, in one of the following Volumes, I shall say nothing of him here.

Silius Italicus (7) reckons likewise Dis, or Pluto, or Erebus, among the Gods of the Carthaginians, and Polybius informs us (8), that he was invoked by them as the God of Hell. Æsculapius, as we are told by Strabo (9), Apuleius (10), and Appion (11), was likewise in great veneration at Carthage, and had there a magnificent Temple. Vossius (12) proves by good Authorities, that the Worship of that God came to them from Tyre; but I would not aver that they had not likewise known the Greek or Messenian Æsculapius.

Such

(1) De Civ. Dei, l. 4. c. 10. (2) Æn. l. 1. (3) Pun. l. 1.
(4) Ibid. (5) Æn. l. 4. v. 58. (6) Diod. Sic. l. 4. (7) Loc. cit.
(8) L. 7. (9) L. 17. (10) In Flor. (11) In Libycis.
(12) De Idol. l. 1. c. 32.

Such were the Gods, whose Worship the Carthaginians received first from the Phenicians, then from the Greeks and Romans. Not content with the Religion of their Fathers, they would needs imitate the other Nations in deifying their great Men. Dido their Foundress, received this Honour, which she herself, according to Ovid (1), had conferr'd upon Sicheus her Husband, and became one of the great Divinities of Carthage (2). Anna, according to the same Poet, shared divine Honours with her Sister (3); as also Amilcar, as we have observed from Herodotus (4): For tho' that Author does not say positively, that he was ranked among the Gods, yet he tells us, he was honoured at least as a Hero, since he says, Sacrifices were instituted to his Honour, and those sorts of Monuments which he calls μῆματα, consecrated to Heroes, as shall be said when we come to the Worship which was paid to them.

If, after having spoke of the Gods of the Carthaginians, we proceed to other parts of Libyans. Africk, we shall find that Ammon was worshipped by the Libyans, in the place where was that famous Oracle, of which we have discoursed in the IVth Book. The Learned have enquired who this Ammon was, and they all agree that it was Ham himself, whose Name, soften'd by cutting off the first Letter, was pronounc'd Am, or Ammon, upon which Vossius may be consulted (5).

And indeed, 'tis certain that Ham, or at least Mizraim his Son, came and settled in Egypt; and as the Scripture calls it almost always the Land of Mizraim, so it sometimes makes mention of the Name of Hàm, or Ammon, as may be seen in those words of the Prophet Nabum, who thus makes an Apostrophe to the City of Niniveh: Art thou better than the City of Ammon (6)? The Vulgate, I know, has understood this Passage of the City of Alexandria: Art thou better than the City Alexandria? And St. Jerom (7) says, that his Master in the Hebrew; told him that this Passage might be so interpreted;

P p 2

(1) Heroid. 7. (2) See her History. (3) Fast. l. 3. (4) L. 7.
(5) De Idol. l. 1. c. 32. (6) C. 3. v. 8. (7) In 3 e. Nah.

terpreted; but still this is certain, that in the original Text it is No-Amon.

The Egyptians, according to Herodotus (1), gave to Ammon the Name of Jupiter: Ἀμμὼν Αἰγύπτιοι καλέεσι τὸν Δία; which ought not to surprize us, since most of the ancient Princes, or Gods, bore the same Name. If we take Diodorus Siculus's Authority (2), Ammon had been King of a part of Libya, and he had married Rhea, the Daughter of Uranus, and Sister of Chronos or Saturn; but as Vossius judiciously remarks (3), all this agrees to Ham: for if the young Saturn is the same with Noah, his Son's Wives may well enough be called his Sisters, since they descended, like him, from the old Saturn, that is from Adam. And if the Greek Historian makes Ammon reign only in Libya, tho' his Empire comprehended the Country of Canaan, Arabia, Egypt, Æthiopia, and a part of Libya, the reason might be, that he thought he had reign'd only in the Country where his Oracle was established.

Let us then conclude with Vossius, that Ammon was the same with Ham, who, after his Death, was number'd with the Gods, and adored under the Name of Jupiter Ammon.

Gods of the Augilites. The Augiles, or rather Augilites, People lying between the Garamantes and the Trogodytes, according to Pomponius Mela (4), had no other Gods but the Manes. It was by them they swore; they consulted them as their Oracles, and received their Responses by sleeping near their Tombs: Augilæ Manes tantum Deos putant; per eos dejerant; eos ut Oracula consulunt; precatique quæ volunt, ubi tumultis incubuere, pro responsis ferunt somnia.

Pliny (5) differs from Mela, only in so far as he calls those infernal Gods whom the Geographer had called Gods Manes: Augilæ inferos tantum colunt; and both the one and the other have only copied Herodotus, with this difference, that they ascribe to the Augilites what what the Greek Historian had said of the Nasamones; but these People were so near to one another, that it was easy to confound them (a); or possibly they had both the same Gods, that is, the Souls of their Ancestors. Pomponius Mela speaks in the same Chapter, of the Religion of the Catabathmi, a small Nation lying between Libya and Egypt; but, as he says only that this People adored the Gods of their own Country, after the manner of their Fathers, Et cultu Deum quos patrios servant ex patrio more venerantur (1), 'tis not possible to divine whether those Gods were the natural Gods, such as the Stars, and other parts of the Universe, or the Souls of their Ancestors, as we have been now saying of the Augilites and Nasamones.

(1) L. 2. (2) L. 8. (3) Loc. cit. (4) L. 1. c. 8.
(5) L. 5. c. 8.

We learn from Herodotus, that the Inhabitants of the Cyrenaica paid divine Honours to Battus, to whom they built Temples. 'Tis known that Battus came from the Island of Thera, had led a Colony into that part of Africk, and had there founded the Kingdom of Cyrene. Demonax, who upon account of an Oracle at Delphos, had been sent to Cyrene by the Mantineans his Countrymen, was he who there established the Worship of Battus.

The Diviner Mopsus was also honoured as a God, in Africk, properly so called, or in the part of that Continent on the west Side from Cyrenaica to Mauritania. There were two of that Name, the one the Son of Manto, and Grandson of Tiresias, the other the Son of Ampycus. The first had an Oracle, and was worshipped in Cilicia; the second was a famous Argonaut, who died in Africk, and there received divine Honours, as we learn from Apuleius, who was born in Africk: Pro Numine postea ab hominibus prodicti, fanis & ceremoniis vulgo advertuntur; ut in Bæotia Amphiaraus, in Africa Mopsus, &c.

(a) They who are curious to see the Error of Pomponius Mela and Pliny, in its full light, may consult the learned Remark of Abraham Gronovius upon the 8th Chap. of the 1st Book of Pomponius Mela.

(1) Gronovius's Edition.

&c. But as I shall have occasion to speak of this Mopsus, in the History of the Argonauts, I shall say no more of him here.

The Emperor Severus; if we credit Spartian, received likewise divine Honours in that same part of Africk which had given him birth: Horum igitur tantorum, & tam illustrium virorum Intersector, ab Afris ut Deus habetur.

The Africans had likewise Neptune, whose Worship; according to Herodotus, had passed from Libya into Greece; Tritonian Minerva; Hercules, who signalized himself so much in Mauritania Tingitana, and was so highly honour'd at Gades; not to mention the Titan Princes, who were deify'd by the same People; but we have said enough of these last in the Theogony of the Atlantidæ (1): As for the three former, I shall give the History of them in the following Volumes.

The Moors; if credit may be given to the Ancients, had no other Gods but their Kings; this is what we learn from Lactantius, Tertullian, and St. Cyprian; and as the two last were Africans, their Testimony ought to be of great weight: The first of them thus delivers himself upon the Subject. It was for this reason, says he, that the Moors deify'd their Kings; hoc scilicet ratione consecraverunt, ut Mauri, Reges suos (2). Tertullian alledged to the Pagans, that every Country and every Town had its particular Gods: Syria, says he to them, has its Astarte; Arabia, its Disares; the People of Noricum, their Belenus; the Africans, their Celestis; and the Moors, their Kings (a). Among those deify'd Kings was the famous Juba, as we learn from Minutius Felix (b).

Tertullian reckons also in the number of the Gods of the Moors, the Goddess Versotina, who is quite unknown: She was probably one of their Queens, or some

(1) B. 2. (2) Lact. l. 1. c. 15.

(a) Unicuique etiam Provinciæ & Civitati, suus Deus est; ut Syriæ Astartes, ut Arabiæ Disares, ut Noricis Belenus, ut Africae Cælestis, ut Mauritaniæ Reguli sui. Apolog. c. 24.

(b) Nisi forte post mortem Deos fingitis, & pejerante populo Deus Romulus, & Juba Mauris volentibus Deus est. In Oratione.

some other Woman signalized by her glorious Actions. As for that Cælestis of theirs, of whom that Author takes notice, it was the Venus Urania so well known in Syria; that is, the Planet of that Name: For it is certain that almost all Nations worshipped the Stars, and had Gods natural and Gods animated.

To conclude, If I say nothing in this Chapter of the Religion of several other People of Africa, the reason is, that they were not known to the Ancients, and 'tis only the ancient Religions we have to do with in this Mythology. The modern Travellers, who speak of the present Idolatry of some of those People, do it in a manner so little instructive, that nothing certain can be learned from their Relations, concerning the Origin and true Object of the religious Worship of each of the People they give account of. We see in general, that there are still a great many Nations in that part of the World, which ascribe a religious Worship to vain Idols of different kinds: But whether those Idols represent animated Beings, or the Ancestors of those Idolaters, as among some other People of Africa, is what the Travellers don't determine. Thus, after having examined what the Ancients have left us about the Gods of the Egyptians, and of the Africans, who were known in their time, we shall see in the following Book, what Account they give of those of the Asiatick Nations.

End of the First Volume.

Books printed for A. MILLAR.

1. THE Works of Mr. Thomson, in 2 vol. 8vo.—Vol. I. Containing Spring, Summer, Autumn, Winter; a Hymn on the Seasons; a Poem sacred to the Memory of Sir Isaac Newton; Britannia, a Poem; and Sophonisba, a Tragedy.

Vol. II. Containing Ancient and Modern Italy compared, Greece, Rome, Britain; and the Prospect, being the 5 Parts of Liberty, a Poem; a Poem to the Memory of the late Lord Chancellor Talbot; and Agamemnon, a Tragedy.

* Either Volume is to be had separate.

N. B. There are a few Copies remaining of those printed on a superfine Royal Paper, in 2 vol. 4to.

2. A Compleat Collection of the Historical, Political, and Miscellaneous Works of John Milton, correctly printed from the original Editions; with an Historical and Critical Account of the Life and Writings of the Author; containing several original Papers of his, never before published; and a large Alphabetical Index, by Thomas Birch, A. M. F. R. S. in 2 vol. folio, beautifully printed on a fine Paper, and adorned with a curious Head of the Author, engraven by Mr. Vertue, from a Drawing by Mr. Richardson.

3. The Oceana, and other Works of James Harrington Esq; collected, methodized, and review'd; with an exact Account of his Life prefix'd, by Toland. To which is added, an Appendix, containing all the Political Tracts wrote by this Author, omitted in Mr. Toland's Edition.

N. B. There are a few of the last Two printed for the Curious, on large Paper.

4. Eurydice, a Tragedy: Acted at the Theatre-Royal, in Drury-Lane.

5. Mustapha, a Tragedy: Acted at the Theatre-Royal, in Drury-Lane.

The above two by Mr. Mallet.

6. An Enquiry into the Nature of the Human Soul; wherein the Immateriality of the Soul is evinced, from the Principles of Reason and Philosophy. In 2 vol. 8vo.

“ He who would see the justest and precisest Notions of God and the Soul, may read this Book; one of the most finished of the kind, in my humble Opinion, that the present times, greatly advanced in true Philosophy, have produced.” Warburton's Divine Legation of Moses demonstrated, p. 395. in the first Edit.

7. The World Unmask'd: To which is added, the State of Souls separated from their Bodies; being an Epistolary Treatise, wherein is proved, by a variety of Arguments, deduced from Holy Scripture, that the Punishment of the Wicked will not be eternal; and all Objections against it solved. With a large Introduction, evincing the same Truths from the Principles of Natural Religion. In 1 vol. 8vo.

8. Letters concerning the Religion essential to Man; as it is distinct from what is merely an Accession to it. In two Parts. By the Author of The World Unmask'd, &c.

THE MYTHOLOGY
AND FABLES
OF THE
ANCIENTS,

Explain'd from

HISTORY.

By the Abbé BANIER,
Member of the ROYAL ACADEMY of INSCRIPTIONS and BELLES-LETTRES.

VOL. II.

Translated from the Original FRENCH.

CONTAINING

- | | |
|---|--|
| I. The History of the Gods of the Chaldeans, Babylonians, Syrians, Persians, &c. | historical Explanation of all the poetical Fables relating to these several Divinities. |
| II. Of the Divinities of the Greeks and Romans , divided into three Classes, viz. the Celestial Gods, the Gods of the Waters, and those of the Earth. | Under the second Class is the History of Demogorgon, Cybele, Vesta, Terminus, Flora, the Satyrs, &c. |
| The first contains the History of Jupiter, Juno, Saturn, Minerva, Mars, Venus, Vulcan, Mercury, Apollo, Diana, Bacchus, &c. together with an | The third contains the History of Neptune, Amphitrité, Nereus, Proteus, the Nymphs ; with a curious Enquiry into the Foundation and Nature of that Worship which was paid them. |
-

L O N D O N :

Printed for A. MILLAR, at Buchanan's-Head, against St. Clement's-Church in the Strand. M.DCC.XL.

CONTENTS

OF THE

SECOND VOLUME.

O F the Gods of the Chaldeans, Syrians, and Phenicians	Page 1
A Preliminary	ib.
Chap. I. Of the Gods of the Chaldeans and Babylonians	2
Chap. II. Astarte, or Astaroth, Thammus, or Adonis	6
Chap. III. Derceto or Atergatis, and Semiramis	30
Chap. IV. Dagon	36
Chap. V. Marnas	38
Chap. VI. Of some other Syrian and Phenician Gods, no where mentioned but in Scripture	39
Art. I. Of the Teraphim	ibid.
Art. II. Of Moloch the God of the Ammonites	48
Art. III. Baal, or Bel, Baal-pehor, or Baal-phegor	52
Art. IV. Chamos	55
Art. V. Beelzebub	57
Art. VI. Berith, or Baal-Berith	58
Art. VII. Kiun, or Rempham	60
A 3	Art.

C O N T E N T S.

Art. VIII. Of other Gods less known, of whom there is also Mention made in Scripture	61
Chap. VII. Of the Gods of Tadmor or Palmyra	64
Chap. VIII. Of the Gods Cabiri	70
Chap. IX. Of the Anaces, or Anaëtes	83
Chap. X. Of the Gods Pataici	87
Chap. XI. Of the Gods Palici	89
Chap. XII. Of the Gods of the Persians	94
Art. I. Mithras	102
Art. II. Of some other Gods of the Persians ; of those of the Parthians, Cappadocians, and Armenians	128
Chap. XIII. Of the Gods of the Scythians, and some other northern Nations	135

Of the Gods of the Greeks, Romans, and other Western Nations	149
---	-----

B O O K I.

O F the celestial Gods	160
Chap. I. The History of Jupiter and his Ancestors	ibid.
Art. I. The History of Jupiter, according to the more common Opinion	165
Art. II. The History of Jupiter and the Titan Princes, according to a second Tradition	170
	Art.

C O N T E N T S.

Art. III. The Explanation of the poetical Fa- bles intermixed with the preceding History	179
Art. IV. Of the different Names of Jupiter	216
Art. V. After what Manner Jupiter used to be represented, and what Sort of Worship was paid him	227
Chap. II. The History of Juno	235
Hymen, or Hymenœus, Thalaffius, and other Gods of Marriage	249
Chap. III. The History of Saturn	253
Chap. IV. The History of Janus	261
Chap. V. The History of Atlas, of the Pleiades his Daughters, of Hesperus and the Hesper- rides	272
The Pleiades	276
The Hyades	278
Chap. VI. The History of Japetus, Prometheus, Epimetheus, and Pandora	279
Chap. VII. Of the other Titans	289
Chap. VIII. An Examination into the Time when Saturn, Jupiter, and the other Titans lived; and when Men began to pay them divine Ho- nours	292
Chap. IX. The History of Minerva, or Pallas and Bellona	295
Chap. X. The History of Mars and Victory	315
Chap. XI. The History of Venus, Cupid, Psy- che, and the Graces	324
Chap. XII. Of Vulcan	354
Chap. XIII. The History of Mercury	361
Chap. XIV. Apollo, the Sun, Phaeton, the Muses, &c.	378
	Art.

CONTENTS.

Art. I. The Sun named Helios by the Greeks	ibid.
Art. II. The Explanation of the Fable of Phaeton, of the Heliades his Sisters, and of Cygnus.	384
Chap. XV. The History of Apollo and Diana	392
Chap. XVI. Of the Muses	429
Chap. XVII. The History of Bacchus	436

BOOK II.

O F the Gods of the Sea, of the Rivers and Fountains	473
Chap. I. Of the Worship paid to the Water, and the Causes of its Institution	474
Chap. II. Of the various Sacrifices that were offered to the Gods of the Waters	483
Chap. III. Of Oceanus and Tethys	486
Chap. IV. Neptune and Amphitrite	490
Chap. V. Nereus, the Nereids, Doris and Triton	507
Chap. VI. Proteus	513
Chap. VII. Phorcys, Saron, Portunus, Matuta, Glaucus and Egeon	522
Chap. VIII. Of the Nymphs, Dryads, Hamadryads, Napææ, Oreades, &c.	527
Chap. IX. Of Eolus and the Winds	532
Chap. X. Of the Sirens	539

BOOK

C O N T E N T S.

B O O K III.

OF the Terrestrial Gods	547
Chap. I. Demogorgon	549
Chap. II. Of the Earth adored under different Names	551
Chap. III. Of Cybele, or the Mother of the Gods	557
Chap. IV. Of Vesta and the Vestals	568
Chap. V. Of the God Terminus.	571
Chap. VI. The History of Flora, Pomona, Vertumnus and Priapus, Gods of the Gardens and Orchards	575
Chap. VII. Of Pales, and some other rural Divinities
Chap. VIII. Of the Satyrs, Fauns, Ægypans, &c.
Chap. IX. Of Faunus and Sylvanus
Chap. X. Of Silenus and Midas	602
Chap. XI. Of the Gods Lares	609
Chap. XII. Of the Gods Penates	613

M Y T H O.

MYTHOLOGY and FABLES

Explain'd by

HISTORY.

BOOK VII. * VOL. III.

Of the Gods of the Chaldeans, Syrians, and Phenicians.

A PRELIMINARY.

THE inspired Writers frequently reproached the Israelites for worshiping the Gods of their heathen Neighbours; and from their Writings we have the Knowledge of many of those Gods, and can give the Names of several Idols that were adored in Syria and the adjacent Countries. Thus from the Book of Genesis (1) we learn that the Teraphims were worshiped by the Chaldeans. Isaiab (2) gives Bel a Place among the Gods of the Babylonians: Jeremiah adds Nebo and Sesak; the second Book of Kings (3) takes in Nefrock and Succoth Benoth. The same Book informs us that Ashima was the God of the Hemathians; Adrammelek and Anammelek the Gods of Sepharvaim; Nergol, the Idol of the Cuthians; Nibbaz and Tartak, those of the Hiveans. The Syrians in general worshiped

Vol. II. B Rimmon,

* Here begins Vol. III. of the Original.

(1) C. xxxi.

(2) C. xlvi.

(3) C. xvii.

Rimmon (1), Baal, Gad (2), and the Gods of the Mountains (3), Dii montium sunt Dii eorum. We read in the Book of Numbers that Baal-Pegor was the great Divinity of the Midianites and Moabites: That the latter worship'd also Peor, or Chamos. The Ammonites acknowledged for their Sovereign the God Molok; and the Sidonians, Astaroth or Ajlarte.

The Idolatry of the Philistines was not uniform, and tho' Ajlartoth was their great Divinity, yet they had others peculiar to each City. Thus those of Ajotb worship'd Dagon; those of Ascalon, Derceto or Atergatis (4); those of Accaron, Belzebub (5); those of Gaza, Alarnack, as we learn from Bochart (6); in fine, those of Byblos and their Neighbours, Adonis or Thammus, of whom the Prophet Ezekiel makes mention (7).

We read in Scripture, of several other Gods of the Nations bordering upon Judea; such as Kium (8), Baal-Zepbon (9), Baal-Berith (10); the Gods of the Inhabitants of Mount Seir (11); and in general of all the Abominations that brought on the Ruin of the Amorites. All these and other Gods whom I have not named, shall be the Subject of this Book: Those of the Chaldeans shall have the first Place.

C H A P. I.

Of the Gods of the Chaldeans and Babylonians.

HOWEVER we may be unable to determine the precise Time when, and the particular Country where Idolatry commenced, this much is certain, that Chaldea was infected therewith from the earliest Ages. That Country was peopled, at the very Time of the Dispersion which succeeded the Confusion

(1) 2 Ki. v. 18.

(2) Jos. ii.

(3) Ki.

(4) Diod. Sic.

(5) 2 Ki. i. 2.

(6) Can. i. c. 16.

(7) C. viii. v. 14.

(8) Amos. v.

(9) Ex. xiv.

(10) Jud. viii. 33.

(11) 2 Chro. xxv.

Chap. I. explain'd by HISTORY. 3

Confusion of Babel; and Nimrod, the first King in the World, established there his Monarchy. We have proved elsewhere that Idolatry commenced with the Worship of the Stars (1): Now 'tis certain, that the Chaldeans were the first who observed their Motions; and this makes it not improbable that they were likewise the first who made them the Objects of religious Worship. It was also in the same Country that the Adoration of Fire was established, and that Sabism, the first Religion of the Pagan World, had its Rise: The City Ur was infected therewith, even in the Time of Abraham, who was obliged upon that Account to relinquish that Place, as has been already said (2). We are likewise to reckon in the Number of their most ancient Divinities the Teraphims, whom we shall speak of afterwards.

Such was the first Idolatry of the Chaldeans: But they did not stop there. The Observation of the Stars led them to the Invention of judicial Astrology; and by Consequence, to the Belief of a fatal Necessity determining all that happens in the World, or of that kind of Fate which goes under the Name of Fatum Mathematicum, or Chaldaicum, from the Country where it was invented. Hence their Credulity towards Astrologers and Sooth-sayers, who amused them with vain Predictions, as they are upbraided by the Prophets (a).

Besides the natural Gods, such as the Stars, the Fire, &c. the Chaldeans had also animated Deities, that is their first Kings, and great Men. Babylon, the Capital of Chaldea, was the most idolatrous City in the World: This is the Character the Scripture gives of it. The Prophet Jeremiah paints it with one Stroke, when he calls it a Land of Idols, terra sculptilium (3); and 'tis highly probable that it had adopted most of the Gods of its Neighbours, even

B 2

the

(1) See Book III. Vol. I. (2) Ibid.

(a) See what has been said above from the Prophet Isaiah.

(3) Jer. i. 21.

4 MYTHOLOGY and FABLES Book VII.

the Monsters of Egypt; & in portentis gloriantur. Thus what is said in this Book, concerning the eastern Gods, might suffice to our understanding the idolatrous Worship of that City; but in Regard it has likewise some Gods peculiar to itself, I must give some short Account of them.

Belus was the great Chaldean Divinity; and the Temple he had at Babylon was incomparably rich and magnificent, as has been observed. But was this Belus the same with Bel or Baal? was he the same whom Virgil mentions (1) Quam Belus, & omnes a Belo Soliti, &c? Was he the Founder, and first King of Babylon? This is what we shall examine in one of the following Books under the Article of Jupiter Belus.

Jeremiab reckons among the Gods of that City, Merodach, “ Declare ye among the Nations, and “ publish, and set up a Standard, publish and conceal not: Say, Babylon is taken, Bel is confounded, “ Merodach is broken in Pieces, her Idols are confounded, her Images are broken in Pieces (2)”
Annunciate in Gentibus . . . dicite, confusus est Bel, victus est Merodach; confusa sunt sculptilia ejus, superata sunt idola eorum. Here is a Prediction that foretells the greatest Calamities and an entire Desolation to come upon Babylon.

Is this to be understood of the Sacking of that City, and is Merodach the King under whom it was taken? That he was is not at all probable, since Historians give another Name to that Prince who was conquered by Cyrus, when he made himself Master of Babylon.

Some Interpreters alledge that this Name was common to the Babylonish Princes (a); and accordingly some of them, they observe, have their Names compounded of Merodach; such as Merodach-Baladan, whom the Prophet Isaiab speaks of (3); Evil-Merodach

(1) Æn. l. 2.

(2) Jer. l. 2.

(a) See Calmet upon the 50th Chap. of Jeremiab.

(3) Is. xxxix. 1.

dach mentioned in the second Book of Kings (1). In Ptolemy's Canon we find a Mardc-Campanus, and Messi-Mordachus: But the Manner in which the Prophet expresses himself, leaves us no Room to doubt, but that in the Passage now quoted he means a Divinity worship'd at Babylon, as Belus was: Their Statues are broken in Pieces, their Idols are confounded. Selden, who treats of the Gods of Syria with so much Erudition, owns he has found nothing in Antiquity to clear up the History of Merodach; for it seems he laid no Stress upon what the Rabbi's say of him.

In order to reconcile the different Opinions of the Learned, I shall follow that of Theodoret, who says Merodach had been an ancient King of Chaldea, and that he was deify'd for his Merit, as well as Belus. This gives us the Reason why his Name was commonly joined to that of the Princes who reigned afterwards; as Nebo, or Nabo, another God of the Babylonians enter'd into that of Nabuchodonosor, Nabopolassar and others.

Nebo, I say, or Nabo, was likewise one of their Deities; and my Authority is the first Verse of the Forty-Sixth Chapter of Isaiah: Confractus est Bel, contritus Nabo; Bel is broken in Pieces, Nabo is reduced to Ashes, &c. For 'tis Evident, whatever Interpreters may say, that the Prophet in this Place is speaking of two Divinities, whose Worship was one Day to be entirely abolish'd, and their Idols overthrown.

I know there was in the Country of the Moabites, near Jericho, a Mountain, and a Town, that went by the Name of Nabo; but neither the one, nor the other, is meant in the Passage I have quoted. Farther, it is probable that the Worship of this false Deity, having been transported into the Country of the Moabites, they therefore gave his Name to one of their Towns, and to the Mountain where he was worship'd. For it was commonly upon high Places that they had their Temples and sacred Groves, as appears from a hundred Passages of Scripture, and from profane Authors.

B 3 that

(1) 2 Ki. xxv. 27.

C H A P. II.

Astarte or Astaroth, Thammus or Adonis.

A STARTE was the great Divinity of the Syrians; and from several Places in Scripture it appears, that she was equally worship'd by the Phenicians and Philistines. All the Learned agree that she is the same with Venus, as shall be said in the History of the Gods of Greece. Cicero, speaking of the several Venus's acknowledged by the Pagan Theology says, the fourth (1), whom they called Astarte, was born at Tyre in Syria, and was married to Adonis: Quarta Venus Syria, Tyroque concepta, quæ Astarte vocatur, quam Adonidi nupsisse tradunt. His Account had been truer, had he made her the same with the first, whom he calls the Daughter of Heaven and of the Light; for as Astarte among the Syrians was the same with the Moon, as shall be said, so that Original was most suitable to her. We may even affirm, that all the four Venus's of whom he speaks, may be reduced to Astarte alone. This we have seen as to the First, nor is it difficult to prove it with regard to the Second, who was likewise believed to have been born in the Sea, from the Blood which flowed from the Wound of Cælus; but the discussing of this, I refer to the next Volume (2).

But to proceed, the Scripture frequently mentioning this Goddess calls her Astaroth (3), and sometimes the God (4), or Abomination of the Sidonians (5). Where 'tis proper to remark, First, that altho' the Word Astaroth be plural, yet it does not signify a Number of Divinities. Secondly, Nor is the masculine Name, God of the Sidonians, a Proof of Astaroth's

(1) De Nat. Deo. L. 3.

(3) 2 Sam. xxxi. v. 10.

(5) 2 Ki. xxiii. 13.

(2) History of Venus.

(4) 1 Ki. xi. 5.

Astaroth's being a God ; for besides that the Hebrews have no Word to signify a Goddess, 'tis certain that the Goddess of the Sidonians was worship'd under both Sexes, as well as several other Gods. Accordingly the Ancients make mention of the God Lunus, which was the Moon ; and Virgil, speaking of Venus, calls her a powerful God ; Pollentemque Deum Venerem (1). Thirdly, that Astaroth properly signifies Flocks of Sheep and Goats. The Prophet Jeremiah calls that Goddess the Queen of Heaven : The Children, says he, gather Wood, the Fathers kindle the Fire, and the Women mix Fat with Flower, to make Cakes to the Queen of Heaven. Upon which I make these two Remarks : First, that the Title of Queen of Heaven is what best agrees to Astarte, who among the Syrians was the same as the Moon. Secondly, that from this Passage we learn one Part of the Worship that was paid to that Goddess, and with what Zeal all Sorts of People had used to prepare Sacrifices to be presented to her. In other Places of the sacred Books, she is designed merely by the Words Asera, or Asero, or Aserim ; the Woods, or the Idol of the Grove, because she was really worship'd in the sacred Groves, which served for her Temple. The Septuagint makes no Scruple to put sometimes Astarte, instead of Aserot, since these two Terms do indeed denote the same Divinity.

When I say Astarte represented the Moon among the Syrians, I mean that she was become the Symbol thereof, and consider her only as a physical Divinity. For, with Respect to this Goddess and her Spouse Adonis, we are to observe the same Distinction that has already been made as to Isis and Osiris. Astarte and Adonis reigned in Syria, and endeared themselves so much to their Subjects by their extensive Beneficence, that after Death they were raised to divine Honours. And it being the received Opinion of those early Times, that the Souls of great Men, and above all of such as had taught the necessary Arts of Life, were gone to reside in the Stars ; hence they were easily persuaded, that the Souls of that Prince and of his Spouse had taken the Sun and Moon for their Mansion ; and accordingly they were adored as those Luminaries themselves, whose Worship was already establish'd : For we must always take this along with us, that the Stars and Planets were the first Gods of the Pagan World ; and that the same Divinity might be a natural or physical God, and an animated one.

B 4 of

(1) See all Æn. 2. 632.

This is not to say, that History has transmitted to us a particular Account of the Actions of those ancient Princes, who rose to the Rank of Gods ; the Monuments that contained them being lost ; but 'tis easy to see that the Fables handed down to us carry an Allusion to the History of those famous Men. What the Greeks and Romans have fabled concerning Venus and Adonis, was undoubtedly founded upon some ancient Traditions they had learned from the Phenicians : The Ground of those Traditions was historical ; but these People had embellish'd it with several Fictions, to render their Gods the more venerable.

According to Ovid (1), Adonis sprung from the Embraces of Cinyras with his Daughter Myrrha. That Princess, constrained to fly from her Father's Anger (who had lain with her without knowing who she was, at a Time when the Queen had gone from her Husband to celebrate a Festival) retired into Arabia ; where the Gods, touch'd with her Misfortunes and Repentance, transform'd her into the Tree which bears the precious Perfume called after her Name. It was in that State she brought forth the young Adonis, whom the neighbouring Nymphs took into their Care at his Birth, and nursed in the Caves of Arabia. Adonis, grown up, repaired to the Court of Byblos, in Phenicia, where he became the brightest Ornament. Here the Poets have given themselves

(1) Met. l. 10.

selves an unbounded Freedom. Venus, say they (a), became desperately in love with the Youth, prefer'd the Conquest of him to that of the Gods themselves, and abandon'd the Mansions of Cythera, Amathus, and Paphos, to follow Adonis in the Forests of Mount Lebanus, where he used to go a Hunting. Mars, jealous of the Preference given by the Goddess to that young Prince, in Revenge had Recourse to the Assistance of Diana, who rais'd a Boar that destroyed Adonis. Venus, coming to the Knowledge of this sad Accident, expressed all Demonstrations of the deepest Sorrow :

— Pariterque sinus, pariterque capillos

Rupit, & indignis percussit pectora palmis (1).

In the mean Time the young Prince descended into Pluto's Kingdom, and inflamed Proserpine with the soft Passion. Venus ascends to Heaven to procure his Return from her Father Jupiter ; but the Goddesses of Hell refused to give him back. The Father of the Gods, puzzled with so nice an Affair, referred the Decision thereof to the Muse Calliope, who hoped to satisfy the two Goddesses by delivering him up to them alternately : The Hours were sent to Pluto to bring back Adonis ; and from that time he continued every Year six Months upon Earth with his beloved Venus, and six Months in Hell.

Here, no doubt, is a Fable full of Allegory ; and an Enigma, which one would be sufficiently puzzled to explain in every Point ; but we may easily see it is intermix'd with History and Physiology : And this is what we shall endeavour to unravel as we go along.

M. le Clerc, after Selden and Marsham, having been more inclined to take this Fable from Phurnutus, and other Mythologists, than from Ovid, relates
and

(a) There is another Tradition, which imports, that the Boar was rais'd by Apollo, to be avenged of Venus, who had put out the Eyes of Erimanthus, the Son of that God, for making a Jest of her Gallantries.

(1) Ovid. Met. Lib. 10.

and explains it thus (1): Cimyrus, or Cinyras, the Grandfather of Adonis, having drunk one Day to excess, fell asleep in an indecent Posture. Mor, or Myrrha, his Daughter-in-law, Ammon's Wife, accompanied with her Son Adonis, having seen him in this Posture, apprized her Husband of it: He, after Cinyras was become sober, informed him of what had happened, which so provoked him, that he poured out Imprecations on his Daughter-in-law, and his Grandson. Here, without going any further, says M. le Clerc, is the Foundation of the pretended Incest of Myrrha, which Ovid speaks of; the Poet having represented the indiscreet Curiosity of that Princess, as a real Incest. Myrrha, loaded with her Father's Curses, retired into Arabia, where she abode for some time; and this again is what gave the same Poet occasion to say, that this was the Country where she was delivered of Adonis, because that young Prince happened to be educated there. Some time after, continues M. le Clerc, Adonis, with Ammon his Father, and Myrrha his Mother, went into Egypt, where, upon Ammon's Death, that young Prince applied himself wholly to the Improvement of that People; taught them Agriculture, and enacted many excellent Laws concerning the Property of Lands. Astarte, or Isis his Wife, was passionately fond of him; and they lived together like a Lover and a Mistress. Adonis having gone into Syria, was wounded in the Groin by a Boar, in the Forests of Mount Lebanus, where he had been Hunting. Astarte apprehending his Wound to be mortal, was so deeply affected with Grief, that People believed he was actually dead, and Egypt and Phenicia bewailed his Death: However he recovered, and their Mourning was turned into Ecstasy of Joy. To perpetuate the Memory of this Event, an annual Festival was instituted, during which, they first mourned for the Death of Adonis, and then rejoiced as for his being again returned to Life. Adonis, according to the same

Author,

(1) Bib. Univer. T. 3.

Author, was killed in Battle ; and his Wife procured his Deification. After the Death of Adonis, Astarte governed Egypt with peaceful Sway, and acquired divine Honours. The Egyptians, whose Theology was all symbolical, represented them both afterwards, under the Figure of an Ox, and of a Cow, to inform Posterity that they had taught Agriculture.

As to the Flight of Myrrha, which Ovid mentions, it means no more, says M. le Clerc, but the Curse which she had brought upon herself, and her Retreat into Egypt with her Husband ; and the Story of her Transformation into a Tree, owed its Rise only to the equivocal Meaning of her Name Mor, which among the Arabians imported Myrrha.

From this Explanation we see, that the learned Author, whom I have been abridging, was persuaded that Adonis and Astarte were the same as Osiris and Isis ; nor is he alone in this Opinion, which wants not some Probability : Lucian and Plutarch, among the Ancients, Selden, Marsham and several others, among the Moderns, had advanced it before him. M. le Clerc brings several Arguments in Proof of his Opinion, which may be seen in the third Volume of his Bibliothèque Universelle. The chief of them are these : That while the Festival of Osiris was celebrated in Egypt, another like to it used to be kept in Phenicia for Adonis. There was Mourning for them both as dead, and then rejoicing as though they had been risen again : . But what is still more decisive, we are assured by antient Authors, that the Egyptians, during the Celebration of their Festival, used to set down upon the Nile an osier Basket, wherein was a Letter, which, by the Course of the Waves, was conveyed to Phenicia, near Byblos, where it was no sooner arrived, than the People gave over their mourning for Adonis, and began to rejoice for his return to Life. The Festival must therefore have been the same ; and as there is no doubt but it was celebrated in Egypt in Honour of Isis

Isis and Osiris ; so we may conclude that the Syrians celebrated it for them too.

To these Proofs we may add, that Adonis and Astarte, among the Phenicians, were the Symbols of the Sun and Moon, as Osiris and Isis were in Egypt ; and that Astarte was represented upon Monuments, with a Cow's Head, or at least with the Skin of that Animal, as Isis was among the Egyptians : In fine, that in the Festivals of Adonis and Astarte, obscene Emblems were carried in Procession, as in those of Osiris and Isis. These are the Arguments of those who maintain this Opinion, set forth in their whole force. I am, however, persuaded that those four Personages are to be distinguish'd, of whom two reign'd in Egypt, and the other two in Phenicia, though both the one and the other became the Symbols of the Sun and Moon, upon account of the Blessings they had conferr'd upon their People. I am far from denying, that there was a great Affinity in Religion between two People, so near Neighbours, as the Egyptians and Phenicians ; but this Affinity proves not the Sameness of their Kings and Gods ; and if there are some Passages in their History resembling one another, there are likewise many more that are quite different : For, in short, what is there in the Story of Isis analogous to what we are told of Cinyras and his Incest ; a Piece of History plainly borrowed from what the Scripture tells us of Noah and his Son ? Do we find in the History of Isis, that she was oblig'd to fly from her Father's Wrath, and retire into Arabia, like Myrrha and Adonis ? Besides, all Antiquity agrees (a) that Osiris was the Brother and Husband of Isis ; and M. le Clerc is obliged to own that Adonis was only the Son of Astarte. Osiris is slain by Typhon his Brother, in the manner that has been said ; Adonis is slain either by a Boar,

(a) Cic. in the Passage quoted, Theocr. Id. 3. and Bion in the Epitaph of Adonis, not to mention other ancient Authors who say the same.

Boar, or in a Battle : Isis collects the scattered Remains of her Husband's Body, and erects sepulchral Monuments to them in all the Places where she finds them : Is any Thing parallel to this told of Astarte ? The Return of Adonis from Hell, was a symbolical Representation of his Cure, as shall be said afterwards : That of Osiris signify'd nothing else but that an Ox had appeared with Marks like the one that was drowned. In Egypt the Rejoicing is at finding again a young Bull, distinguish'd by certain Marks : In Phenicia it is because Adonis, whom they believed dead, is really cured by means of Cocytus the Physician (a). Adonis, according to Jupiter's Decree, remains six Months in Hell with Proserpine, and six Months upon Earth with Venus ; nothing like this is related by the Egyptians concerning their Osiris. Venus could not be one Moment separate from her beloved Adonis : Osiris left Isis to go into the Indies, and several other Countries. Isis and Osiris reign'd in Egypt, as all the World allow ; Astarte, Adonis, and his Grandfather Cinyras, were Kings of Phenicia, the Capital whereof, according to Strabo and Lucian, was Byblos, where these two Authors say the Events happened that are the Subject of this History. In fine, the one was a warlike conquering Prince, the other a peaceful King, who delighted only in Hunting. But what I am going to say of the Worship paid to Adonis and Astarte, compared with that of Isis and Osiris, will prove yet more convincingly that they were different from one another.

Though I have treated this Subject in a particular Dissertation (b), yet I hope the Reader will not be ill-pleased to find here an Abstract of it.

Adonis was passionately fond of the Chace; and as he was one Day hunting in the Forests of Mount Lebanus, a Boar wounded him in the Groin ; the News were quickly brought to Astarte of the Death of that Prince : Her Affliction, upon this Occasion, was inex-

(a) See the Sequel of this History.

(b) See the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres, Tom. 11.

inexpressible, as has been said: She fill'd the whole City with her Complaints and Groans, and all her Kingdom went into Mourning. In order to immortalize the Memory of that Prince, and in some sort to sooth the Anguish of the Queen, divine Honours and solemn Festivals were instituted to Adonis: This was the ordinary Resource of Flatterers, and most of the Gods of Antiquity are owing to Mens officious Zeal to honour the Dead, in servile Complaisance to the Living.

There was, according to Lucian, a River near Byblos, that bore the Name of Adonis; there, undoubtedly it was, they wash'd the Wound of that Prince; and as its Streams were stained red by the Sand blown into it from Mount Lebanus, at a certain Season of the Year, as Lucian learned from an Inhabitant of the Country, hence People were induced to believe, that this Change proceeded from the Blood of Adonis; and they even chose that Season of the Year for celebrating his Festivals. First of all, the whole City went into Mourning, and gave publick Signs of Grief and Affliction: Nothing all around was heard but Groans and Lamentations; the Women who ministered in this Piece of Worship, were obliged to shave their Heads, and to beat their Breasts, running through the Streets; and such was the Impiety of that superstitious Usage, that those who would not join in the Ceremony, were obliged to prostitute themselves for a whole Day (1), and to apply what Money they earned by that infamous Trade, to the Service of the new God. On the last Day of the Festival, their Mourning was turned into Joy, and every one made merry as if Adonis had risen to Life. The first Part of this Solemnity was called Ἀφανισμός, the Disappearance, during which they mourned, or bewailed the Prince's Death; and the second, εὐρεσις, the Discovery, when Joy succeeded to Grief.

This

(1) Lucian, Loc. Cit.

This Ceremony continued eight Days, and was celebrated at the same Time in Lower Egypt. Lucian (1) observes, upon this Occasion, a Thing very singular, whereof he himself was an Eye-witness; namely, That the Egyptians exposed upon the Sea a Basket of Osier (a), which being carried by a favourable Wind, arrived of it self upon the Coasts of Phenicia, where the Women of Byblos, who waited for it with Impatience, carry'd it into the City; and then it was that the publick Sorrow ended, and the Festival was concluded with Transports of universal Joy. Simulatione luctus peracta, says Macrobius, celebratur lætitiæ exordium (2).

This Circumstance has not been omitted by the Sacred Writers, since, according to Procopius of Gaza (3), and S. Cyril (4), we are thus to understand that Passage in Isaiab, where it is said, Mittens per mare legatos, & in vasis juncis per superficiem aquarum. The seventy Interpreters, who were themselves at Alexandria, and consequently must have been well informed about this Fact, leave no room to doubt of it; they even add, as St. Cyril remarks, that there were to be Letters in that small Vessel, which they call Επιστολὰς βυβλίνας.

The Worship of Adonis was not confined to Syria, but spread it self very soon into the neighbouring Countries. Theocritus (5) describes the Ladies of Syracuse, embarking for Alexandria, where they were to keep the Festival in honour of Adonis. Nothing was so noble and grand as the Apparatus of this Ceremony. Arsinoe, the Sister and Wife of Ptolomy Philadelphus, bore the Statue of Adonis herself. She was accompanied with the Women of greatest Distinction in the City, holding in their Hands Baskets full of Cakes, Boxes of Perfumes, Flowers, Branches of

(1) Loc. Cit.

(a) Lucian thinks it was made of that Wood which they made use of in the Composition of Paper, and he calls it κεφάλην βυβλίνην.

(2) Sat. Lib. 2. cap. 2.

(3) In Is. cap. 18.

(4) Ibid.

(5) Id. 15.

of Trees, and all sorts of Fruits. The Solemnity was closed by other Ladies, bearing rich Carpets, whereon were two Beds, embroider'd with Gold and Silver, the one for Venus, the other for Adonis. Then was exhibited the Statue of that young Prince, with a ghastly Paleness in his Looks, which yet did not quite deface the Charms that had rendered him so amiable. The Procession march'd in this manner along the Sea Coasts, to the Sound of Trumpets, and all Sorts of Instruments, that accompanied the Voices of Musicians. The same Ceremony was diffused throughout all Assyria, as we are informed by Macrobius (1), Inspecta religione Assyriorum, apud quos Veneris Archiditis & Adonidis maxima olim veneratio viguit.

'Tis undoubtedly to the same Festival celebrated at Babylon, that the Prophet Baruch alludes (2), when he says, The Priests of that City sat in their Temples with their Heads uncovered and shaved, their Vestments torn, and mourning as at a Feast for the Dead. The Interpreters of Scripture are persuaded that Moses, when he forbids the Israelites to shave their Heads for the dead (3), is alluding to the Mourning and Festivals of Adonis; and that in the Counsel which Balaam gives to Balac, King of the Moabites, to entice the Hebrews to the Festivals of his Gods, wherein, after the Feast, all sorts of Disorders were committed without controul, he has an Eye to those of the same God, whose Worship was propagated to the Dominions of that Prince. This Ammianus Marcellinus (4) tells us of the City Antioch in particular. Evenerat autem iisdem diebus, annuo cursu Adonia ritu veteri celebrari; and that Author shews at the same time, that the Ceremonies practiced in that City, were the same as those at the Funerals of Persons of Distinction, comparing the Funeral Pomp of a young Prince slain in a Combat, to that of the Festival of Adonis, which the Women celebrated with so many Tears, and heavy Lamentations.

Judea

(1) Sat. l. i. c. 21. (2) Chap. vi. 30, 31. (3) Lev. xvi.
(4) Lib 19. 22.

Judea was too near Assyria and Egypt, and the Jews had too strong a Bias towards strange Superstitions, not to have celebrated the Festivals of this false Divinity in their turn. The Prophet Ezekiel (1), in one of those divine Transports, wherein God revealed to him the Abominations of Israel, saw, near the Gate of the Temple that faced to the North, the Women sitting and mourning for Thammus (a). As to the Signification of this Name, Interpreters are divided, and the Rabbins have vented a thousand ridiculous Fables upon this Occasion; but we ought to rely upon the Authority of St. Jerom, and some other Fathers of the Church, who have render'd the Word Thammus by that of Adonis, & ecce sedebant ibi mulieres plangentes Adonidem, and were of Opinion, with a great deal of Reason, that those Women of Judea mourned the Death of that Prince, and celebrated his Festival much the same way as the neighbouring Nations, of whom we have been speaking. The Author of the Chronicle of Alexandria confirms this Sentiment, translating the same Word by that of Adonis.

To know now why the Prophet calls Adonis, Thammus, is no easy Matter. However, I shall offer two Reasons for it; the first, that Adonis having been taken for the Sun, as I shall shew afterwards, the sacred Text has given him the Name of the Month when that Luminary entring into the Sign of Cancer, diffuses Heat and Fruitfulness over our Hemisphere, which happens in the Month of June, called Thammus by the Hebrews; and what proves this Conjecture to be not without Foundation, the Jewish Astronomers named the Entrance of the Sun into that Sign, Tecupha Thammus, Periodus Tammus: The second is fetch'd from the Tradition of Adonis's having been slain in the Month of June, as we learn from St. Jerom (2), which, according to that learned Father of the Church,

C

was

(1) Chap. 8.

(a) The Septuagint calls him Thammos.

(2) Comm. in Ezek.

was the Reason of giving that Name to the Prince we are now speaking of: Quia tamen Mense Junio Amasius Veneris, pulcherrimus Juvenis, occisus, eundem Junium Iuensem eodem appellant Nomine, & anniversariam ei celebrant Solemnitatem. This Reason to me appears the best, because I am persuaded that the Ground of the Fables, and of the Ceremonies of the pagan Religion, was for the most Part historical, and that Allegories were only introduced afterwards, to Support the Ignorance or Avarice of the Priests.

From Syria and Palestine, the Worship of Adonis was propagated to Persia; to the Island of Cyprus, and at Length to Greece, especially to Athens, where the Festival of Adonis was celebrated with a great deal of Magnificence; for which my Dissertation may be consulted.

When the Time of the Festival of Adonis was come, they took care, as Plutarch remarks, to place in several Quarters of the City, Representations of dead Bodies, resembling a young Man who had died in the Flower of his Age. Then came Women dressed in mourning Robes, and carried them off to celebrate their funeral Rites, weeping and singing doleful Songs expressive of their Affliction. Their Tears were accompany'd with Shrieks and Groans, as we are told by Aristophanes and Bion; all which Ovid expresses very happily (1)

. Luctus Monumenta manebunt
Semper, Adoni, mei; repetitaque Mortis Imago
Annua plangoris peraget simulamina nostri.

Plutarch adds farther, that the Days whereon this Festival was celebrated, were reputed unlucky, and that the Athenian Fleet's setting sail at that Season for Sicily, was taken for a bad Omen; and Ammianus Marcellinus makes the same Remark upon Julian, the Emperor's Entrance into the City Antioch.
Et visum est Triste, quod amplam Urbem, Principum Domicilium, introeunte Imperatore nunc primum, ulu-labiles

(1) Met. l. 10. 725.

labiles undique planctus & lugubres sonitus audiebantur.

We find among the other Ceremonies of the Festival of Adonis, that they carried Corn in earthen Vessels which they had sowed there, together with Flowers, springing Grass, Fruits, young Trees and Lettices. Suidas, Hesychius (1) and Theophrastus (2), inform us of these Circumstances, and add, that at the End of the Ceremony, they went and threw those portable Gardens, either into a Fountain, or into the Sea, when they were near it, as is remark'd by Eustathius (3) and the Scholiast on Theocritus (4). This was a Kind of Sacrifice which they made to Adonis, as we learn from Hesychius.

For what remains, 'tis easy to account for these Ceremonies: They carry'd an Allusion to the Circumstances of the Life and Death of Adonis, and I know not why they should be thought a Mystery. The sprouting Grass, the new sprung Corn which soon withered, were Emblems of that Prince's having died in the Flower of his Age, and that he had been mowed down by the cruel Hand of Death, like a young and tender Plant.

I have said they carried Lettices at the same Festival; for which Usage the Ancients have assigned various Reasons. Some alledge it was owing to a Tradition, that Venus had concealed her dear Adonis among Lettices after his Wound, as we learn from Hesychius. We have even a Fragment of Eubulus, preserved to us by Atheneus (5) which gives the same Reason of it. "Don't serve me with Lettices, says
" one of the Speakers to a Woman, for they say Venus
" concealed her dear Lover after his Death among " Lettices." And the same Author calls that vegetable the Food of the dead. Nicander of Colophon, as may be seen in the same Atheneus (6) was also of this Opinion, since in relating how Adonis, to escape the
C 2 Boar

(1) In Adωνιδος κήποι.

(2) Hist. plan. l. 6. c. 7.

(3) Upon the 10. of the Il'ad.

(4) Loc. cit.

(5) Lib. 2.

(6) Loc. cit.

Boar that pursued him, had concealed himself behind a Plant which the Cyprians called Brentim; he has translated this barbarous Word by that of Lettice. M. le Clerc happily corrects that Author, alledging (1) it ought to be read Βέγαρι, a Word which in the Phœnician Language signifies a Fir-tree, a more secure Sanctuary to shelter Adonis than Lettices; which Ovid seems to insinuate in these Verses:

. Trepidumque & tuta petentem
Trux aper insequitur (2).

Nothing further remains for finishing the Explanation of all the Circumstances of the Worship of Adonis, but to examine the Reason why in his Festivals they used to make Joy succeed to Sorrow. Phurnutus, Lactantius (3) Macrobius (4) and some others, have attempted to prove, that Adonis being no other than the Sun, the Mysteries celebrated to his Honour, ought to be referred to that Luminary; so that the Death of Adonis, according to them, denoted the Sun's Distance in the Winter Time; as the Joy for his being risen again figured the Return of that Luminary, which having travelled thro' the southern Signs, and descended, as we may say, into the Kingdom of Pluto, signified by the Pole that is opposite to us, returned at the End of six Months towards those of the North, and brought back Mirth and Gaiety with the fine Days.

These Authors add that this was the Reason of its being happily imagined that Proserpine would needs detain Adonis with whom she was enamoured (5), and that Venus being desirous likewise to have him in her Possession, Jupiter had referred the Decision of the Controversy to Calliope, as has been said. They added that a Boar had caused the Death of Adonis, because that Animal is the Symbol of the Winter, as we are told by Macrobius (6) Hyems veluti vulnus est

(1) Bib. Univ. T. 3.

(2) Loc. cit. 714.

(3) De Diis & Mundo.

(4) Sat. L. 1. c. 2.

(5) Hyg. Poet. Astron.

(6) Loc. cit.

est Solis, quæ & Lucem ejus nobis minuit & calorem, quod utrumque Animantibus accidit Morte.

Others alledge that Adonis denoted the Grain, which is lodged for six Months in the Bowels of the Earth, as if it were in the Arms of Proserpine, who is the Goddess thereof; whence it came to visit its dear Venus, when it began to grow.

But is not this to allow too great Refinement to the first Inventors of the Ceremonies and Festivals, who had no other Aim but to perpetuate the Memory of Events which had given Rise to them? Does the Sun descend to the internal Regions, because he is at some Distance during the Winter? Does he abandon Men, especially in Syria and Phenicia where the Winters are so short, and sometimes more supportable than the Summers? Had they been Laplanders or Siberians who instituted that Festival, we might indeed think the total Absence of the Sun had led them to it; but this we can never believe of the Inhabitants of Syria, who always enjoy a serene Sky, and where the Inequality of Days is not even very considerable. Besides, were this Hypothesis true, the Festivals of Adonis ought to have been celebrated at different Times of the Year, and at six Months distance from one another; whereas they were celebrated only once a Year, and in a Month remote from the two Equinoxes, which would have better denoted the precise Time when the Sun begins to withdraw, or to approach our Pole.

I am therefore more inclin'd to think, that the Foundation of this double Ceremony, was built upon the Tradition, that Adonis did not die of the Wound he received upon Mount Lebanus, but was cured by Cocytus the Physician contrary to all Probability. For 'tis in this Sense that Ptolomy, the Son of Ephestion, understands a Greek Verse of Euphorion's Hyacinth, which says, that Physician alone, the Disciple of Chiron, washed the Wound of Adonis; that is to say, he alone was employed in so difficult a Cure: Otherwise this Verse would have no rational Meaning. This Case was looked upon as a Kind of Miracle, and in their Transports of Joy, no doubt they would say the Prince was restored to Life, that he was come back from Hell and the Grave; metaphorical Expressions common enough on such Occasions.

'Tis true, most of the Ancients, especially the Latins, were of Opinion that Adonis died of his Wound (1); but some Greek Authors inform us that he did not die of it, which however they have expressed in a poetical Manner, saying, as we may see in Theocritus, (2) that the Hours brought back Adonis from Acheron, after he had dwelt there twelve Months; which undoubtedly imports, that that Prince recovered only at a Year's End, and that the Hours, that is the Times and Seasons, for this is the proper Signification of the Name given by the Greeks to those Goddesses, gave him back at Length to his beloved Venus: And tho' we don't take the Verses of Theocritus in this Sense, the System of the Mythologists must still fall to the Ground, since it is inconsistent with the Idea of the Sun's dividing his Influences equally to the two Hemispheres, by making Adonis remain a Year with Proserpine, that is, in plain Language, in the Arms of Death. Thus to return to our Hypothesis, we may with good Reason believe, that Venus's Grief, upon the first News of the Wound of Adonis, was so great that the Report spread thro' all Phenicia of that Prince's being dead. They mourn'd for him as such, while he was in Danger, nor did they begin to rejoice till he was perfectly recovered: Of which double Circumstance the Memory was preserved in the two Parts of the Ceremony instituted upon that Occasion: For we know that great Events gave Rise to the Institution of Festivals, as we learn both from sacred and profane History.

But if any be tenacious of the Opinion that Adonis died of his Wound, I shall Account for that Joy which

(1) Ovid. Hygin. &c.

(2) Idyll. 15.

which succeeded the Mourning on the last Day of the Festival, by saying it imported that that Prince was promoted to divine Honours, and left no longer any Room for Sorrow, but that having mourned his Death, they were now to rejoice at his Deification. The Priests, who would not have found their Account in a Tradition importing that the God whom they served was subject to Death, made it their Business afterwards to conceal the original thereof from the People, and invented the allegorical Explications which I have been refuting.

I grant there are Authors who contend that the Worship of Adonis had a Reference to the Sun, whose Symbol he was become ; but as 'tis my Design to trace the Fable back to its Source, I can find nothing in it but the Monuments which Love and Gratitude had consecrated to the Honour of a beloved Prince.

Ovid elegantly describes this Festival of Adonis (1), and his Transformation into a Flower. Venus, disconsolate for the Death of her Paramour, thus addresses herself to cruel Destiny : “ No, my dear “ Adonis shall not be wholly subjected to thy Power ; “ Posterity shall at least preserve an eternal Monument of his Disaster, and my Distress. The “ Festival that shall be celebrated yearly in Memory of so dismal an Accident, shall continually keep “ up the Remembrance of my Grief whereof he is the Cause, and from the Blood of my darling “ Youth shall spring a Flower. After this Speech
“ she poured Nectar upon the Blood that flowed “ from the Wound of Adonis In less than “ an Hour, there sprung from thence a crimson Flower, like that of the Pomegranate. This Flower “ is short lived, since the same Winds, whence
“ it derives its Name, soon blow it away”.

'Tis easy to see that the feigned Original of this Flower is an Episode invented for adorning the History. This Flower, according to Pliny, was the

(1) Met. l. 10. v. 725.

Anemone, so called because it is the Wind, ἀνέμος that makes it blow: Which the Latin Poet happily expresses in this single Verse:

Excitiunt iidem, qui præstant nomina Venti.

After the Death of Adonis, Astarte, having governed the Kingdom with a great deal of Mildness and Equity, was deify'd and honour'd with a particular Worship as he had been before. This Worship at first was pure enough; but it was blended afterwards with infamous Rites, which I have no Mind to describe. This Goddess was chiefly worship'd in the sacred Groves, which holy Writ calls Aserim, as has been said; and S. Jerom always renders that Word, by Priapus, to denote the Abuses that were committed there.

Besides the sacred Groves, this Goddess had her Temples. Herodotus (1) mentions that of Ascalon, which was dedicated to her, being, according to that Author, the most ancient of her Temples. She had others likewise in the Islands of Cyprus and Cythera, and doubtless in many other Places.

Astarte having become the Symbol of the Moon, as Adonis was of the Sun, the inspired Writings join always the Worship of Baal, who represented that Luminary, with that of Astaroth or Astarte.

To shew in a few Words, to what Excess their Superstition towards these two Idols was carried, it suffices to mention that Abab had four Hundred and fifty Prophets, or Priests of Baal, and that Jezebel his Spouse, who introduced into Israel the Worship of Asera or of Astarte, had four Hundred belonging to that Goddess (2), whose high Priest was her Father Itobal the King of Tyre, as we learn from Menander of Ephesus quoted by Josephus (3).

We may further Remark that the Groves consecrated to this Divinity, were always near the Temples of Baal, and while bloody Sacrifices were offered to him, and even human Victims, she was presented with

(1) Lib. 1.

(2) 1 King. xviii. 19.

(3) Contra App.

with nothing but cakes, Liquors and Perfumes; but in Honour to her they abandon'd themselves to the vilest Prostitutions, in Tents made on purpose, or in Caverns that were in her consecrated Groves. The Worshipers of this false Divinity, caused the Figure of a Tree to be imprinted upon their Flesh, and were therefore called Dendrophori, Tree-bearers; which wonderfully agrees to what the sacred Scripture says of Astaroth, whose Name Asera, given her by the Prophets, signifies Trees, or a Grove.

It was usual likewise to set up Tables to her upon the Tops of Houses, at the Gates, or in the Vestibles, as also in the Cross-Streets; and on the first Day of each Moon, a Supper was prepared for the Goddess; and this, by the by, is what the Greeks called the Supper of Hecate; the same Repasts were prepared for Adonis.

The Manner of representing these two Divinities was different, according to the Places which had adopted their Worship; and sometimes Baal, or the Sun, was dressed like a Woman, while Astarte or the Moon appeared armed and with a Beard; but more frequently under the Figure of a Woman having for her Head-dress, an Ox's Head with the Horns, either to denote her Royalty, as Porphyry has it in Eusebius (1), or to represent the Crescent of the Moon, just as Isis in Egypt who was the Symbol of the same Planet (2).

Macrobius (3) gives us the Description of the Venus Architis, who was worship'd upon Mount Lebanus. She was, according to him, in the Posture of a disconsolate and afflicted Woman, having her Head covered and leaning upon her left Hand, insomuch that you would have thought you saw her Tears flowing; a lively and expressive Image of the Distress in which Astarte was upon the first News of Adonis's being wounded. In Fine, the Medals of
of

(1) Præp. L. 1. c. ult.

(2) Herod L. 2. c. 41.

(3) Sat. L. 1. c. 41.

of the City Tyre (a) struck in Honour of Demetrius, the second King of Syria, represent Astarte, or the Tyrian Venus, dressed in a long Habit, over which she wears a Mantle tuck'd up on the left Arm. She has one Hand stretch'd forth, as it were commanding with Authority, while with the other she holds a crooked Staff made in Form of a Cross. Among the Flowers, the Rose was consecrated to her, because it had been tinged with the Blood of Adonis, whom one of its Thorns had prick'd. They added that this Flower, formerly white, had become red from that Moment, as we see in Ovid (1).

We shall close this Article with one or two Remarks. First, That the celestial Goddesses whom Sanboniathon, and after him Porphyry, calls Baltis (2), the Mistress or Queen; the Venus of Ascalon; the Alilat of the Arabians; the Isis of the Egyptians, all represented the Moon, among the various Nations which adored that Planet, whose Worship was very much propagated thro' the East. Secondly, That possibly Astarte, or Venus, the same whom the Greeks stiled Venus Urania or celestial, represented the Planet of that Name: But 'tis certain from Herodotus, and other Ancients, that she was most frequently taken for the Moon, or, which is the same Thing, for the Queen of Heaven. Thirdly, That the Name of Adonis, which is much the same with that of Adonai, or Κύριος, the Lord, which was given to that same Prince, are all of them applicable to the Sun, who is as Master and Lord of Heaven. Fourthly, That with Respect to Adonis and Astarte, as well as Isis and Osiris, we must always distinguish two Sorts of Divinities, Gods animated, and Gods natural. To the former Class belong the Kings of Egypt and Phenicia, who by their Virtues acquired divine Honours: To the latter, the Sun, the Moon and the Stars; whose Worship, prior to that of the great Personages,

(a) See Vaillant's History of the Kings of Syria, p. 272, and 273.

(1) Met. L. 10.

(2) Ap. Euf. præp. L. 1. c. 10.

ages, has been confounded with that which was ascribed to them ; either from a Belief that their Souls after Death had chosen those Luminaries for their Residence ; or for some other Reason, which we know not. This Distinction, so necessary in the present Subject, is the Foundation of Mythology, without which it would be quite unintelligible ; for I reckon none will deny that the four Persons I speak of had a real Existence, since History speaks of their Birth, their Actions, their Death, and fixes the Place of their Abode ; nor that they were deify'd and honoured with a particular Worship ; far less that, in that Worship, Circumstances occur, which can only refer to the Sun, the Moon and other Planets.

Astarte in Process of Time was stiled the Assyrian Juno, as we are assured by Lucian (1) ; but according to that Author, this was not her Name, nor was it given her till the Time when they began to celebrate the high Mysteries in her Honour. We learn from the same Author, that of all the Towns in Syria, Hierapolis, or the sacred City, was that wherein Astarte was most honoured : And as he was a Native of Syria, and advances nothing, as he says himself at the Beginning of his curious and learned Treatise upon that Goddess, but what he had either seen or learned from her Priests, his Authority here ought to be of great Weight. “ Of all the Temples of Syria, says he, the most celebrated, and most august one, is what belongs to that City : For besides the Works of great Value, and the Offerings which are there in great Number, there are Marks of a Divinity who presides there. There you see the Statues sweat, move themselves, deliver Oracles ; and there Sounds are frequently heard, while the Gates are shut : it is also the richest of any that I have been acquainted with.”

After having delivered the various Opinions about the Founder of that stately Temple he thus proceeds

(1) De Dea Syria.

ceeds to the Description of it. “ It fronts, says he,
 “ to the East, and rises two Toises (a) above
 “ the Ground, whereon it stands, and the As“ cent to it, is by a Stone Stair. First, There is “ a grand Portico of an admirable Structure. The “ Gates of the Temple are of Gold, as is also the “ Roof, not to mention the Inside which shines
 “ all around with the same Metal. The Edifice is “ divided into two Parts, the one whereof is for the “ Sanctuary, and is higher than the other; but “ none are permitted to enter thither except the “ Priests, and but the Chief of them too. In this “ Sanctuary are two golden Statues; the one of “ Jupiter supported by Oxen; the other of Juno, “ by Lions: The last is a Kind of Pantheon, that “ bears the Symbols of several other Goddesses (1),
 “ and holds in one Hand a Sceptre, and in the other “ a Distaff, the Head encircled with Rays, and “ crown’d with Turrets. In the same Temple are “ likewise to be seen several other Statues, of Apol- “ lo, Atlas, Mercury, Lucina, &c.”

Such, according to Lucian, was the Inside of the Temple. “ On the Outside was a large Altar
 “ of Brass, accompanied with several Statues made “ by the best Masters. There were upwards of “ 300 Priests, employed in nothing but the Care “ of the Sacrifices, besides Numbers of other sub“ altern Ministers. The Priests were cloathed in “ White, and the high Priests in Purple, with a “ Tiara (b) of Gold. Sacrifices were offered in “ this Temple twice a Day; and there were festival “ Days when Sacrifices were offered with more So“ lemnity than on ordinary Days.”

I shall subjoin two Reflexions to what I have now quoted from Lucian. The first, that the Temple he describes was not the ancient one, which, as he says himself, Time had destroyed; but that which had

(1) Of Minerva, Venus, the Moon, Rhea, Diana, Nemesis and the Destinies.

(a) About twelve Feet.

(b) Like the Pope's Triple Crown.

had been built by Stratonice, the same whom Antiochus resigned to his Son who was deeply in Love with her: Accordingly it bore all the Marks of a Temple built by the Greeks, since it had in it the Statues of Jupiter, Juno, and the other Gods of Greece.

A second Remark is, that it appears evidently, both from the Construction of the Temple, and from the Service of the Goddess who was worship'd in it, that they had borrowed many Things from that of Solomon. For First, that of Syria was divided into two Parts, the one of them the Temple properly so called; the other the Sanctuary, whither none but the chief Priests were permitted to enter: And we know that the High Priest alone had Permission to enter once a Year into what was called the Sancta Sanctorum. Secondly, Each of these Temples was encompass'd with two Courts. Thirdly, There was at the Gate of either of them a brazen Altar. Fourthly, The Ministers of the Syrian Goddess were divided into two Orders, namely the High Priest, and the Priests; it was the same at Jerusalem. The Priests of Hierapolis were cloath'd in White, and the High Priest in Purple with a Tiara of Gold; such was also the Habit of the Jewish Priests. Fifthly, Lucian adds that besides these Priests, there was in the Temple of the Syrian Goddess a Multitude of other Ministers who served in the Ceremonies, and a vast Number of others who played upon Flutes and several other Instruments; these were the Functions of the Levites, who served the Priests, sung, and blew the Trumpet in Time of the Sacrifices. Sixthly, Sacrifices were offered twice a Day at Hierapolis, Evening and Morning; it was the same at Jerusalem. Seventhly, In the Ceremony of one of the Festivals of Hierapolis, they used to draw Water from the Sea, to pour it out in the Temple, in Honour of the Goddess; and what was this but an Imitation of that Effusion of Water at Jerusalem as was the Custom at the Feast of Tabernacles? Eighthly, According to to Lucian, the Animals sacrificed in the Temple of Hierapolis, were the Ox, the Sheep and the Goat, but no Swine were to be offered there; 'tis plain that this Usage was taken from the Jews, who sacrificed no four footed Animals, but those now mentioned. Nintbly, The greatest Festival of Hierapolis, according to the same Author, happened in the Spring, and they who joined in it sacrificed a Sheep, dress'd and ate it: They did not offer it in the Temple, but after having presented it at the Altar and made Libations, they brought it Home to their own Houses, where after some Prayers they offered it up in Sacrifice: Nothing sure bears a greater Resemblance to the Feast of the Passover, which was also celebrated in the Spring Time. Tentbly, There was at Hierapolis, says the same Author, another Sort of Sacrifice, where the Victim was crown'd, then let loose, and it threw itself down from the Top of the Rock, whereon the Temple was built: This, no Doubt, is an Imitation of the Feast of Atonement, on which Day they carried the Goat Azazel (a) into the Wilderness, crowned with a Fillet of Scarlet, and threw him down from the Top of a Rock.

This Parallel might still be carried farther. But here is enough to satisfy us that the Syrians, at least as to the Time whereof Lucian speaks, for he says nothing of the ancient Temple of their Goddess, had borrowed from the Jews several Ceremonies that were practised at Jerusalem.

C H A P. III.

Derceto, or Atergatis, & Semiramis.

TH O' Persons of very great Learning are determined by solid Reasons to think that Derceto or Atergatis is the same with Astarte, of whom I have been speaking; I am however induced from the Authority of Lucian, who appears to be thoroughly instructed structed in the Religion of the Syrians, to believe that they are to be distinguish'd. This Author having delivered their Opinion, who alledged that the Temple of Hierapolis, we have been now upon, had been built by Semiramis in Honour of Derceto her Mother, tells us, he was persuaded that Princess had built it; but he did not believe it was for her Mother. "I have seen, says he, in Phenicia the Figure of Derceto, which represents a Woman from the Waist upwards, and the lower Parts terminate in a Fish's Tail; but the Statue in the Temple of Hierapolis bears the Resemblance of an entire Woman." Nothing is more distinct than this Passage, and 'tis plain the Author was persuaded of the Distinction we are to make between those two Goddesses.

(a) The Scape-Goat.

To the Authority of Lucian, I join that of Diodorus Siculus, who thus relates the History of this Goddess (1). "There is in Syria a City call'd Ascalon, nigh to which is a large and deep Lake, abounding with Fishes, and a Temple dedicated to a famous Goddess, whom the Syrians call Derceto, she has the Head and Face of a Woman, but all the Rest of the Body is of a Fish. As for the Reason of this Form, the more ingenious of the Nation say that Venus having been offended by Derceto, infused into her a violent Passion for a young Priest who was very handsome. Derceto having had a Daughter by him became so ashamed of her Frailty, that she put the young Man out of the Way, and having carried the Child into a Desert full of Rocks, threw herself into the Lake, where her Body was transform'd into a Fish: Hence the Syrians to this very Day abstain from that Food, and revere the Fishes as Gods."

From these two Authorities we see that Astarte, of whom no such Account is given, was quite different from Derceto, whose Body was that of a Nereid, and must have resembled the Goddess Eurynome
Daughter

(1) L. 2. c. 5.

Daughter of the Ocean, who was worshipped in Arcadia, and had a Temple in the City of Phigale (1), which was opened only once a Year. This Goddess, who was there fastened with Chains of Gold, was represented half Woman, half Fish.

But we must examine more narrowly into the Mythology of the Syrians, with Respect to Derceto, and enquire what were the Reasons of their having such Veneration for the Fishes.

All the Antients are unanimously agreed, that they abstained from eating them: They are not, however, all of one Mind, as to the Motives of this Abstinence. Xenophon (2), Diodorus (3), Clemens of Alexandria (4), and some others, believe it was because they adored them as Gods. Antipater, and Mnaseus, quoted by Athenæus (5), relate, that a Queen of Syria, named Atergatis, loved Fish to such a Degree, that she forbade her Subjects to eat them, as has been already said. Hence, says Athenæus, the Custom of consecrating in the Temples of that Goddess, Fishes of Gold and Silver, and of presenting real ones to her every Day. Other Authors are of Opinion, that this Veneration for the Fishes, was owing to their having saved Derceto when she fell into the Lake we mentioned. In fine, there are some who, upon Menander's Authority cited by Porphyrus (6), say, the Syrians abstain from the Use of Fish only for fear of contracting certain Diseases in the Liver and Bowels, wherewith they believe the Goddess to whom that Animal was consecrated, punished those who eat of them.

But, without examining these several Reasons, I am of Opinion that this Custom took its Rise from a Persuasion that formerly the Gods, to escape the Persecution of the Giants, had assumed the Figure of various Animals, as has been said in the History of the Gods of Egypt. Now from this Fable they learned, that Venus, the same as Atergatis or Derceto, had transformed herself into a Fish: Pisce Venus latuit,

(1) Pauf. in Arc. (2) Cyrop. (3) Lec. cit. (4) Proscript
 (5) Lib. 8. cap. 8. (6) De Abst. Lib. 4.

tuit, as Ovid has it (1). The same Poet asserts that this was the Opinion of the People of Babylon and Palestine. The Inhabitants of Palestine, says he, believe that the Babylonian Derceto is transformed into a Fish, and inhabits the Lakes.

— *Et dubia est, de te, Babylonia, narret, Derceto, quam versâ squammis velantibus artus,
Stagna Palæstini credunt coluisse figurâ* (2).

We have just now been told that Derceto exposed her Daughter: This was the famous Semiramis. Some Shepherds having found her, carried her to Simma (3), Wife to the Master-Shepherd of the King of the Country, who gave her the Name of Semiramis, signifying, in the Syrian Language, a Pigeon. Hence, probably, came the Fable of her having been nursed by Pigeons, and transformed into that Bird, which, since that time, was in high Veneration among the Assyrians (a).

I shall not farther enlarge upon the History of that famous Heroine, who, after the Death of her Husband Ninus, the Founder of the first Assyrian Monarchy, made so many glorious Conquests, and raised those celebrated Gardens, which have pass'd for one of the seven Wonders of the World; as also the Walls of Babylon, whereof so many Historians have given a Description. As I am to speak of her only in so far as her History has a Relation to Mythology, I shall only say here, in order to explain the Fables that have been intermix'd with her History, that her Son Ninias having a mind to put her to Death, she made no Resistance, calling to mind the Oracle whereby she had been foretold, that while that Prince laid Snares for her, she should

VOL. II. D disappear,

(1) Met. Lib. 5. (2) Met. Lib. 4. (3) Diod. Lib. 2.

(a) Luther, on these Words of Jeremiah, Facta est terra eorum in desolationem a facie columbæ, says the Prophet is here alluding to the History of Semiramis, and of the Pigeons that were in great Veneration among the Assyrians: As also in that other Passage of the same Prophet, who, when he would foretel the Jerus that the Assyrians should come and lay their Country desolate, says, Fugite a facie gladii columbæ.

disappear, and afterwards be adored as a Goddess. Accordingly, whether it was that Ninias, to favour that Error, had concealed the Body of his Mother; or that some Pigeons had been seen to fly out of the Palace while they were assassinating her, it was given out that it was she had flown away under that Figure, and from that time the Pigeons were consecrated among the Assyrians, who bore them in their Ensigns. To this Veneration for those Birds, painted on the Standards of the Assyrians, the Scripture alludes, in that Passage which says, Fugite a facie gladii Columbe, Fly from the Face of the Sword of the Pigeon.

The Inhabitants of Ascalon had a profound Reverence for the Pigeons: They neither durst kill nor eat them, for fear of feeding upon their Gods themselves. Pbilo assures us, he had seen, in that City, a prodigious number of Pigeons, which were maintain'd, and held in peculiar Veneration. Tibullus has very happily express'd that Respect of the Syrians for the Pigeons, in these two Verses:

Quid referam, ut volitet crebras intacta per urbes, Aiba Palestino sancta columba Syro.

Semiramis died at sixty years of Age, after having reigned forty-two. Lucian (1), speaking of a Statue of that Princess, which was in the Court of the Temple of the Syrian Goddess at Hierapolis, says, she was there represented in the Attitude of a Person stretching forth the Hand, and pointing to the Temple; whereof, says he, the Reason was, that having appointed a Day when she alone was to be worship'd in all her Dominions, she was plunged into deep Calamities; which having brought her to wise Reflection, she commanded her Subjects to worship Juno instead of herself: and that therefore she stretches out her Hand to intimate that Religious Worship is to be paid only to the Goddess who is in the Temple. One thing more we are not to omit, that Vossius is of Opinion there were three Semiramis's; the Wife of Ninus, the Daughter of Belochus, and another; and that that their being confounded together in After-ages, had introduced so much Confusion into this History.

(1) De Dea Syria

I have observed, that learned Men were persuaded, that Derceto or Atergatis was the same as Astarte; and the Arguments they rely upon are these. Stabo (1), speaking of the Changes that have happened to Names, observes, that of Atergatis, or Atergata, they had made Athera; and that this Goddess is the same as she whom Ctesias calls Derceto: Now Ctesias having dwelt long in Persia, must needs have known the Gods of Syria. Artemidorus assures us, that the Syrians eat Fish, except those who worship Astarte; a Proof that this Author confounds that Goddess with Derceto, since he applies to the Worshippers of Astarte, what would agree only to those of Derceto, were the one distinct from the other. The Author of the second Book of Maccabees, seems to suppose what I say here, since speaking of Astaroth-Carnain, he tells us, there was in that City a Temple to Atergata. Pliny appears to be of the same Mind, when he says Atergatis was reckoned to be the same Goddess whom the Greeks named Derceto: Ibi prodigiosa Atergatis, Græcis autem Derceto dicta videtur (2). In fine, Selden, who has thoroughly considered the History of those Divinities of Syria, adds new Proofs besides those which I have now mentioned, as may be seen in his Work. This Author likewise proves the Fable of Derceto, or Atergatis, to be the same with that of Dagon, the God of the Philistines, who was represented under the Figure of a Fish, since, according to him (3), the Name of Atergatis is compounded of Adir-dagon, Great Fish, or Magnificent Fish. S. Jerom seems to favour the Opinion of this learned English Writer, when he says Dagon signifies Piscis maroris, the Fish of Sorrow: But as to this last Article, I prefer the Opinion of Vossius, who takes the Name Atergatis to import, quasi sine piscibus, without Fishes, because the Worshippers of that Goddess abstained

D 2

from

(1) Synt. 2. cap. 3. (2) Lib. 16. (3) De Dea Syria.

from eating them as has been said ; and consequently we distinguish her from Dagon, as we shall see in the following Chapter.

C H A P. IV.

D A G O N.

DAGON was one of the most celebrated Divinities of the Philistines, and one of those whom the Scripture most frequently mentions. If we may believe Sanchoniathon, the Original of this God is very ancient. Cælus, says that Author (a), had many Sons, and among the rest Dagon, so called from the Word Dagan, which in Phenician signifies Wheat. As he was the Inventor of the Plough, and taught Men the Use of Corn for Bread, he, after his Death, was surnamed Jupiter Agrotæ, or the Labourer. Saturn, continues that Author, when at War with Cælus or Uranos, having made one of his Wives Prisoner, caused her to marry Dagon. According to this Opinion, Dagon is no longer a God half Man half Fish, as the Rabbi's imagined : Nor yet is he the Atergatis or Deceto, I have been speaking of ; he is the God of Corn, the Inventor of Agriculture, who, upon that Account, was deify'd after his Death. His Name comes not from the Hebrew Word Dag, a Fish, but it is a Phenician Name, Dagan, which in that Language imports Wheat.

Bochart, persuaded that 'tis to the Phenician Author we must have Recourse for the Origine of the Gods of his own Country, is consequently in the right to look upon all that has been delivered about the Figure of Dagon, as so many rabbinical Fables. And indeed, some of those Doctors of the Law, confounding that God with Atergatis, or Deceto, say he was represented as a Man, in the upper Part of his his Body, and as a Fish from the Waist downward (1), while others, on the contrary, will have it, that he had the Form of a Fish above, and a human Figure from the Thighs down (2). Some again alledge (3), that he was all Fish: Others, that his Figure was that of a Man from Head to Foot; and these, doubtless, have most Reason. This is the Account given of him in Scripture, when it tells us (4), that at the Presence of the Ark of the Lord, which the Philistines had placed in the Temple of that God, after the Defeat of the Israelites, his Idol was overthrown, and that his Head and his Hands were found upon the Threshold of the Gate of the Temple, while the rest of the Body remained upon the Pedestal. Caput Dagon, & duæ palmæ manuum ejus abscissæ erant super limen. Porro Dagon solus truncus remanserat in loco suo. Here then is a Head, Hands, and a Trunk; and if we add Feet, as the Septuagint have done, saying, “The Head, the Hands and the Feet of the “Idol, were found together, apart from the Body”, we shall then have a human Figure in all its Parts.

(a) See the Fragment of that Author, which we have given in the Article of the Theogonies.

But be that as it will, the Philistines had a high Veneration for Dagon, and his Temples were magnificent. That which he had at Gaza must needs have been vastly large, since Sampson (whom they conducted thither, after taking him out of Prison, to insult that formidable Enemy, imagining he had lost all his Strength by the Treachery of Dalila) having pulled down the Pillars that supported it, buried in its Ruins more than threethousand Men. The Temple which this God had at Azoth was no less famous, there was the Ark of the Lord deposited, and there the Miracle happened which I have related. The Head of Saul was also placed in one of the Temples of the same God, as we see from the Book of Samuel (5), and his Arms in that of Astaroth; a new Proof, to mention it by the way, that Dagon and Astaroth were two distinct Divinities.

D 3

C H A P.

(1) Rabbi Kimchi.

(2) Aburbonel.

(3) Rabbi Silom.

(4) 1 Sam. Ch. v.

(5) Chap. xxxi.

C H A P. V.

M A R N A S.

THE Philistines had another Divinity, of whom S. Jerom gives us no high Idea, since he says this God, shut up in his Temple, was in continual fear of its downfall. Marnas Gasæ luget inclusus, & everisionem templi pertimescit; but 'tis probable that holy Doctor had a Mind in this, as in many other Passages, to rally the Pagans upon their false Gods. For in truth, Marnas was look'd upon by the Inhabitants of Geza, as one of their great Gods, since, among them he was Jupiter himself. His Name, in the Syriac Language, imports Lord; which is very applicable to the Father of Gods and Men (a). But who was this Jupiter, who had the Surname of Marnas? This is no easy Matter to determine. The Learned, however, are of Opinion, that it was the Jupiter of Crete (the same who carried off Europa, and this is the Sentiment of Stephanus) that is to say, Minos, the first of the Name. Some Authors will have this Marnas to have been Secretary to that Prince, who employed him to digest the Code of his Laws, as shall be said in his History (1). They who carried off Europa to convey her into Crete, probably brought Marnas with them; for to be sure he must have been born in Syria, as his Name demonstrates. The same Name became famous in the Island of Crete, and it was given to the young Women, who were called Marna, as much as to say Madam.

But passing that, Marnas was highly honoured in the City Gaza: There he had a Temple, and Games and Chariot-races were celebrated to his Honour. Gaza joined sometimes the Name of that God in her Medals together with her own.

C H A P.

(a) See Bochart, Can. Lib. 1. cap. 15.

(1) Vol. IV.

C H A P. VI.

Of some other Syrian and Phenician Gods, which are no where known but in the sacred Scriptures.

WE find in the sacred Books the Names of some Gods concerning whom we can learn nothing from profane Authors. Selden in the curious Treatise he has compos'd upon the Gods of the Syrians, divides them into two Classes (1). In the first he reckons those who are mentioned in the Pentateuch, such as Gad, or good Fortune, the Teraphims, Baal-Zephon, the golden Calf, Baal-Peor and Moloch; and in the second, those who are spoken of by the Prophets, as Baal or Bel, Astarte or Astaroth, Dagon, Miphlötzeth, Beel-Zebut, Succoth-Benoth, Nergel and Thammus; among the Gods of these two Classes, says he, are comprehended the Sun, the Queen of Heaven, the Host of Heaven, and the Planets, with whose Worship the Pagans are so often taxed by the inspired Writers.

I shall endeavour to give an exact Idea of such of these Gods, as I have not hitherto described. I should have begun with Fortune, or Gad, the first of the Pagan Divinities whom Moses names; but of this I said enough, when I was enquiring into the Origin of Idolatry.

A R T I C L E I.

Of the Teraphims.

The Hebrews gave the Name of Teraphims to the Idols, which Rachel had stolen from her Father Laban (2); and 'tis beyond Doubt that these were his Gods, since in complaining to Jacob, he tells him: (3) Cur furatus es Deos meos? Why have you rob'd me of

D 4 my

(1) Synt. 2. c. 1.

(2) Gen. c. xxxi. v. 19, and 20.

(3) v. 30.

my Gods? The Scripture Interpreters, and the Rabbis, have offered a great many Conjectures about the Nature of those Teraphims, and Selden has hardly omitted any Thing material upon the Subject: My Readers will not expect that I am to crowd into this Article all the eastern Learning that is to be found in that Author; but they would have Reason to complain, if I did not give them some short Account of what we are to think of these Gods (a). In the first Place then I say the Teraphims were very ancient Gods, since their Worship was establish'd in the Time of Jacob and Laban. Secondly, Their Idols were of a human Figure, and some of them must have been great, others small; so small, that altho' Rachel had stolen several of them, Deos meos, she concealed them from her Father, under the Pannel of a Camel, by sitting above them: Others of them were larger, since Michol put one of them into David's Bed, that his Keepers might believe it was David himself asleep. Aben-Esra the most celebrated Divine among the Jews, and at the same Time a great Astrologer, says, these Idols were represented under a human Figure, that they might be capable to receive the celestial Influences; as if, supposing those pretended Influences to act upon Bodies, the Animals and other Beings were not as capable to receive them as Men. But not to insist on that, as those Idols, in the Opinion of the Rabbins, served for Divination, Rachel, according to them, had no other Intention in stealing them but to hinder Laban by their Means from knowing the Way they had taken at setting out from his House, and consequently to prevent his pursuing them. S. Augustin seems to favour the Opinion of those Rabbins, when he says (1): Qued Laban dicit, quare furatus es Deos

(a) We say nothing of the various Etymologies which the Learned give of the Word Teraphim; the Variety and Uncertainty of their Conjectures renders it quite unnecessary, you may consult M. Furmont, Ref. Critiques, T. I. p. 318.

(1) Quæst. In. Gen. 94.

Deos meos ; hinc est illud fortasse quod & augurari se dixerat. Accordingly Laban had said to Jacob before ; I have divined that God hath blessed me for thy Sake : Auguratus sum quod benedixerit mihi Deus propter te. Some Interpreters are of Opinion that Rachel, tho' instructed by her Husband in the Worship of the true God, had yet some Byass towards Idolatry ; but there are others, and those by far the more numerous, who judging more favourably of Rachel's Piety say, she carry'd away her Father's Idols, only to take from him the Object of a criminal Worship.

Thirdly, Authors are not agreed as to the Notion People had of the Teraphims. Some alledge they had a religious Worship paid them, while others will have it that they were looked upon as so many Talismans, which were used in Divination ; but as the Scripture calls them Gods, 'tis probable they were honoured as such.

Fourthly, But in what Manner were the Teraphims used for discovering Futurity ? Were they consulted as Oracles ? How were the Responses given to the Requests that were offered to them ? These are all Questions which I find not decided by the Authors who have treated of these Idols. As for the Conjectures of Interpreters and Rabbins, I shall not repeat them. Ezekiel tells us only that they used to be interrogated. That Prophet (1), relating how Nebuchadnezzar, having stop'd in a Place where two Ways met, had Recourse to Divination, that he might be determined to which Side he should turn his Arms, tells us he interrogated the Teraphims. Stetit Rex Nabuchodonosor in bivio, capite scilicet duarum viarum, Divinationem quærens ; commiscuit sagittas & interrogavit Teraphim (2). But he does not inform us how those Idols answered him ; and as he adds that, after this Operation of the Arrows, and Teraphim, the Lot fell upon Jerusalem, which determined him to go against that City ; and as we know

(1) C. xxi. v. 21.

(2) The Vulgat says only Idols.

know farther, that Divination by Arrows (a) consisted in mixing them after a certain Manner, it would seem that the Teraphims being a Kind of Talismans, on which perhaps were engraved the heavenly Signs and Constellations, they thought by applying them in a certain Manner to the Aspects of those Constellations and Signs, they might divine what Events they were curious to know. We also find in the eighteenth Chapter of the Book of Judges, that the Teraphims were consulted for the Knowledge of some future Event, since the Deputies sent by the Tribe of Dan to spy out the Land, having come to the House of Micha, who had the Teraphims and a Levite to serve them by Way of Priest, pray him to consult them that they might know whether their Journey would be prosperous.

Onkelos, the Syriack, the Rabbins, and after them Grotius and several other Interpreters, had therefore good Reason to believe, that the Teraphims were Talismans, that is to say, Figures of Metal, melted down and engraved under a certain Aspect of the Planets, to which several Virtues were ascribed, and by Means whereof they thought they had a Power of divining. Maimonides (1), says they were anciently molten of Gold and Silver; that the first were consecrated to the Sun, and the second to the Moon: And that they attributed to them the Virtue of averting Evils and foretelling what was to come. We are assured that the Ancients had some of those magical Figures, that were self-moved and delivered Oracles; a Thing likewise common among the Egyptians

(a) This Sort of Divination was very ancient in Chaldea, and it consisted in writing upon those Arrows the Names of the Places whither they would go, or some Words denoting their Intention. Upon which they mixed the Arrows, drew one of them at a Venture, and what they found written upon it was taken for a Declaration of the Will of the God whom they adored. Thus Nabuchodonosor having found the Name of Jerusalem inscribed upon that which he first drew, went to lay Siege to that City, instead of carrying his Arms against the Ammonites, whose Name was written upon another Arrow.

(1) More Rub. L. 3.

Egyptians and Arabians, who boasted of having the Secret of confining in those Figures the Demons and Gods; and of forcing an Answer from them when they were consulted: Doubtless 'tis to this Usage that the Prophet Zechariah alludes, when he says, as it is in the Hebrew Text (1) Teraphim locuta sunt Vanitatem, & Divini viderunt Mendacium. Further the Author of the second Book of Kings says, Josias entirely destroyed in his Kingdom, the Spirit of Python, the Fortune-tellers, and the Teraphim; which leaves no Room to doubt of their having served for Divination.

The whole East is still infatuated with this vain Superstition; and as it is one of the most ancient, since it subsisted in the Time of Laban, so it is one of the most general. There is not a Man to be seen in Persia and the neighbouring Countries, who does not bear about with him Talismans, and sometimes they have vast Numbers of them. These Amoulets, consist in some mysterious Words, written upon Paper, or engraven upon Wood or precious Stones, with some Signs, or celestial Constellations, under which they have been made. The Basilidians made great Use of them; and the Mahometans who have no Statues, bear about with them these Talismans engraven upon Stones, or written upon Parchment: But I am not to enlarge upon this Subject, which has been handled by several Authors (a).

Could we give credit to the Rabbins, we must allow that the Manner of making the Teraphims was equally impious and cruel, since they tell us that when one of these Figures was to be melted down, it was usual to kill a Man, and after cutting off his Head, they embalmed him and shut him up in the Heart of a Wall. Under his Tongue they put a Plate of Gold, whereon was inscribed the Name of some God; and these same Authors add that when they had a Mind to make it speak, they lighted Wax-tapers

(1) C. x. v. 2.

(a) See Scaliger, Gaffarel, Selden, &c.

tapers before it, and prostrated themselves, upon which it delivered its Oracles. But what Resemblance had these Teraphims to those which Rachel stole from her Father Laban? In fine, in what Manner did the Teraphims answer those who consulted them, since it is certain from the Passage in the Prophet Zechariah now quoted, that they did deliver Oracles? Here we are to reflect upon what has been said (1) as to the different Manners in which the Oracles made their Responses be known, since probably it was in one of them that the Teraphims instructed those who consulted them; for I am not at all of Cardinal Bellarmin's Opinion, that those Idols assumed a human Voice in revealing Futurity. 'Tis true we find in Fable, and even in History that there were Statues which sometimes spoke, accordingly we are told that at the Time of sacking Veii, they interrogated a Statue of Juno, to know if it would go to Rome, and it answered I will; that the Statue of Fortune which was consecrated to the Women, and especially to the Mother of Coriolanus, pronounced these Words, rite me Dicastis, nothing has been omitted in my Dedication; that that of Cybele which Attalus had refused to the Romans, declared she would be transported to Rome, as Ovid tells the Story:

Mira canem; longo tremuit cum murmure Tellus,

Et sic est adytis Diva locuta juis:

Ipsa peti volui, ne sit mora; mitte volentem;

Dignus Roma Locus, quo Deus omnis eat (2).

But most of these Facts are acknowledged to be fabulous by those very Persons who relate them: Accordingly Titus Livius considers the first of these Examples now quoted as a mere Fiction. Plutarch, in his Life of Coriolanus overthrows, by judicious Reflections, the other as to the Fortune of the Women, which was said to have spoke; and nothing can be inferred from the Example in Ovid, since he only says the Voice that was heard to declare the Pleasure

(1) B. 4.

(2) Fast. l. 4. v. 265.

sure of the Goddess to be transported to Rome, arose from the inner Part of the Temple ; which is no Proof that it was formed by the Statue itself. The Testimony of the Prophet whom I have quoted, would seem to favour the Opinion which I impugn, since he plainly says the Teraphims spoke ; but provided it be granted that they revealed future Events in any Manner whatsoever, the Passage will have all its Force.

The Author of the critical History of ancient Worships, is of Opinion that in every House where there were Teraphims, they were placed at the two Extremities of a Cenotaphy, much the same Way as the Cherubins were set upon the two Ends of the Ark of the Covenant, and that near to this Kind of Tomb they prostrated themselves, and offered Sacrifices and Prayers to those Idols : But whence had he this Circumstance ? The Teraphims were known long before the Building of the Ark and the Tabernacle, since we read of them in the History of Jacob and Laban, some Ages before Moses ; and it is of no Service to the Author to say that the Idols worship'd in the more early Times, did not become Oracles till after the Entrance of the Israelites into the promised Land ; for upon what Authority can that singular Opinion be grounded ?

We may conclude from what hath been said, that the Teraphims derived their Origine from Chaldea, and that they were of great Antiquity. That some of them were of Wood, some of Metal (a) ; that the Pagans consulted them, to come at the Knowledge of Futurity : That these Figures were of a human Form, since the Scripture tells us that Michol put one of them in David's Bed, to make it be believ'd that he was asleep : Otherwise it would have been ridiculous to put in that Prince's Bed any other Figure than that of a Man, that she might deceive the Keepers ; for they must needs have thought they saw somewhat at a Distance, that resembled a Man

(a) This Circumstance we learn from the Book of Judges upon Occasion of Micha's Teraphims.

Man asleep. I presume it may likewise be reasonably concluded from that History, that there must have been Teraphims of a Bigness not much short of the Ordinary Size of a Man. To be sure, had they been all of a little Pigmey Size, David's Keepers could never have been deceived by them: In fine, that sometimes the Term of Teraphim is taken in Scripture in a good Sense; as in the Prophet Hoseab (1), where it seems they looked upon them as Oracles, and called by that Name the Image of Truth which the High Priest wore when he consulted the Lord: Quia dies multos sedebunt Filii Israel sine Rege & sine Principe, & sine Sacrificio, & sine Altari, & sine Ephod, & sine Teraphim; without Altar, without Ephod, and without Teraphim. 'Tis obvious to remark that this Passage is very obscure, as is the whole Prophecy of Hoseab. For in short if the Teraphims were Pagan Idols, is this a threatening to the Jews, to foretel them that they shall be long without them?

The Interpreters not knowing what to make of so difficult a Passage, explain it variously, as may be seen in their Commentaries; but S. Jerom (2), from the Authority of the Septuagint, seems to have reduced it to its true Sense. The Ephod was the ceremonial Vestment of the High Priest, with the Stones of the Breast-plate, and the Urim and Thummim, by Means whereof he delivered Oracles to those who consulted him; and as the Septuagint have understood by the Word Teraphim, this Oracle of God, and by the Ephod, the Priesthood; 'tis plain the Prophet intended to foretel the Israelites, that if they continued to be Transgressors of the Law of God, the Day should come when they should neither have Sacrifice, Altar, Priesthood, nor Oracles. But at the same Time we must allow with that holy Father, that except in this Passage of the Prophet Hoseab, the Word Teraphim is always taken in Scripture in a bad Sense; and that if in the Passage

(1) Ch. 3. v. 4.

(2) In Hof. c. iii. v. 3.

sage now quoted it signifies the Urim and Thummim of the High Priest, it is used every where else to denote vain Idols, only the Objects of Pagan Veneration (a).

From what we have said it appears, that the Teraphims were private Gods, resembling those that have been since named Lares or Penates, and that every one had of them in his House for the Preservation of himself and Family. Had they been publick Gods, Laban would not have said, why have you stolen my Gods? Nor would he have been alone in the Pursuit of Jacob; the whole People having concern in that Theft, would have seconded him. This Example of Nabuchodonosor proves that they used to bear them about in Journeys and military Expeditions, since it was in the Way that he consulted them. In fine, we may prove the same Truth from that of Micha, who had Teraphims in his House to interrogate them upon Occasion. But whether these were natural Gods, such as the Stars; or animated Gods, that is the Souls of their Ancestors, is what we are not able to determine. Some learned Men contend they were animated Gods; and the Author of the critical History of Dogmes and Worships, is so fully persuaded of this, that he will have Laban's Teraphim to have been Noah and Shem: But on what Proofs can such an Allegation be establish'd? Upon this Foundation the Author is obliged to say there were in every House but two Teraphims, to represent the two Patriarchs; but as the Scripture mentions these Gods without specifying their Number, I don't think it can be restricted to two. This much we know, that if the Gods Penates derive their Original from those ancient Teraphims, as is very probable, it was free to every one to have as many of them as he had a Mind.

ARTICLE

(a) The Example of Micha is perhaps an Exception to the Rule establish'd by S. Jerom. For 'tis commonly thought that he had made his Teraphims to consult the true God; and that however he was a Transgressor, yet he was no Idolater.

ARTICLE II.

Moloch the God of the Ammonites.

Moloch, one of the principal Gods of the East, was worship'd by the Ammonites, who represented him under the monstrous Figure of a Man and a Calf. There were contrived about the Feet of the Statue, several Furnaces into which they threw the Children whom they offered up to that God; and while those unhappy Victims that were roasted in the Furnaces, sent forth most doleful Cries, the Priests beat Drums, to hinder their Wailings from being heard. From this Noise the Valley, where those Abominations were committed, was denominated the Valley of Tophet, as much as to say, the Valley of dreadful Sounds.

The Interpreters of the Bible, and some other learned Men have endeavoured to find out who this Moloch was. Some have been of Opinion, with Antonius Fonseca, that he was the same as Priapus: Gerard Vossius has attempted to prove that he was the Sun; but the most common Opinion is that this God was the same with Saturn: And this Opinion is supported by the Conformity of human Sacrifices, which were offered equally to Moloch and Saturn; and as this last is Abraham, there is no Doubt but that the former had been formed upon what the Pagans had learned of the History of that holy Patriarch. Thus Selden (1), Father Kirker (2), Beger and several others have reasoned upon the Head; but no Body has proved this Opinion with more Force than M. Fourmont (3). Moloch, says he, was a Furnace according to the Opinion of all the Orientals. Now this Idea was taken from the Furnace that was said to have been kindled in Ur, a Town of the Chaldeans, therein to consume Abraham, as we are told by the Rabbins; and as the Name of that City

is

(1) De Diis Syr. (2) Oed. Ægypt.

(3) Ref. Crit. T. I. p. 357.

is the same with that of Fire, instead of saying that Holy Patriarch had come out of Ur of the Chaldeans, they fabled that he had been taken out of the Fire or Furnace.

In the Sacrifices of Moloch, Infants were offered up; is not this an Imitation of the Sacrifice of Isaac, which the Pagans always thought to have been performed according to the Letter? In the Sacrifices of Moloch, together with the human Victims, others were offered, namely, Turtle Doves or Pigeons, a Sheep or a Lamb, a Ram or a Goat, a Calf or a Bull, to which they added Flower, Simila: The Author puts the Question whence those Circumstances had been derived? To which he answers, that the History of the Patriarch exhibited all this Apparatus. Take, says Abraham, a Heifer of three Years old, a Ram of the same Age, a Turtle Dove and a Pigeon (1): Sumite mihi vaccam triennem, & arietem annorum trium, Turturem quoque & Columbam. Besides these there was the Ram offered up in Place of Isaac, the Flower, or rather Loaves baked under the Ashes, which we read of in the History of the same Patriarch, and the Calf he slew for the Entertainment he gave the Angels; and it can hardly be refused that all the Circumstances of the Sacrifices offered to Moloch, were expressive of Abraham's Adventures.

To all these Proofs we might add another, the Names Moloch and Melchon, that were given to the same God, signify King. Now profane Authors believed that Abraham had been a King (2): We may also observe that the Name of Baal or Bel, who, according to Scripture, was the same with Moloch, as we shall prove in the following Article, signifies Lord, a Title given to Sovereigns.

In order to understand what I have been advancing as to the different Sorts of Victims that were offered up to Moloch, 'tis proper to remark that the Moderns have taken up this Opinion upon the Authority of the Rabbins: I shall give you from Paul-Fagus what they have deliver'd as to this Subject. The Statue of Moloch was a hollow Figure, in which were contriv'd seven little Cells or Presses. One of them was opened to receive the Flower for the Offering, another for the Turtle-Doves, a Third to offer up in it a Sheep, a Fourth to sacrifice a Ram, the Fifth for a Calf, the Sixth for an Ox, and lastly the Seventh to inclose a Child who was therein burnt alive.

(1) Gen. xv. 9.

(2) Strabo.

These seven different Chambers, contrived within the Statue of Moloch, have too manifest a Resemblance to what is said of the seven Gates of Mithras (thro' which all were obliged to pass before they could be initiated into his Mysteries) not to believe that it was upon the Model of that God the Jewish Doctors formed their Description of the Statue of Moloch; whether this God was really the Sun among the Ammonites, as Mithras was among the Persians, a thing very probable, as we shall prove concerning Baal, the same God with Moloch; or whether he represented Saturn, as the learned Authors I have mentioned will have it; that is to say, the Planet that goes under his Name. For we must never forget that Idolatry commenced among the eastern Nations with the Worship of the Stars.

But whatever be in that, they who take Moloch and Saturn to be all one, want not Proofs to support their Opinion. And indeed the Saturn adored by the Carthaginians, had a great deal of Resemblance to the God of the Ammonites, since, according to Diodorus Siculus (1), he was represented by a Figure in Bronze, the Palms of whose Hands were turned up and sloping towards the Earth, insomuch that when they put a Child into his Arms to consecrate it to him, it fell down that Moment into a Fire kindled at the Feet of the Idol, where it was very soon consumed.

Nothing

(1) Ap. Euf. Præp. Ev. lib. 4.

Nothing is more celebrated in Antiquity than the human Sacrifices offered to Saturn, not only at Carthage, and in several other Places of Africa, as Minutius Felix remarks (1), but also in Phenicia; tho' that God was represented there in a Manner different from what we have been now speaking of, since to his Statue were added Eyes and Wings, as has been said in quoting the Fragment of Sanchoniathon (a): And this barbarous Custom of offering those Sorts of Victims to that God, lasted till the Time of Tiberius, as Tertullian relates (2).

They who will have Moloch to be the Sun, have yet stronger Arguments for their Opinion, as may be seen in Vossius's second Book concerning the Origin and Progress of Idolatry (3). Father Calmet alledges that Moloch represented the Sun and Moon promiscuously.

I think I have found out a Way to reconcile these various Opinions, by saying that Moloch was one of those Divinities whom the Greeks called Panthees, and that among the Ammonites he represented the seven Planets. The Proof of my Opinion is taken from the seven Cells that were framed within his Statue, and from the seven Sorts of Sacrifices that were offered to him. And indeed had he been only the Sun, or Saturn, for what Design would those seven little Chambers have been made, and why would so many Victims have been offered to him? It must therefore have been the seven Planets which the Ammonites worship'd in the single Idol of Moloch, to each of which they offered such Victims as Superstition had consecrated.

The impious Worship of Moloch was propagated into several Countries, and the Jews themselves adopted it in the Time of Moses, since that sacred Legislator prohibits them to consecrate their Children to that Divinity: De semine tuo non dabis ut consecre-

E 2 tur

(1) In Octavio.

(a) See the Chapter of the Theogonies.

(2) Apolog. (3) Ch. 3.

tur Idolo Moloch (1); and God threatens to extirpate the whole Race of those who should commit that Abomination (2). The Israelites must needs have been addicted to this cruel Superstition before they came out of Egypt, since the Prophet Amos (3), and after him St. Stephen (4) reproach them for having born the Tabernacle of that God, as has been already said.

ARTICLE III.

Baal or Bel, Baal-Pehor, or Baal-Phegor.

I asserted in the preceding Article, that the Scripture seems to confound Bel or Baal with Moloch, and now it remains to be proved. Jeremiah Taxes the Tribe of Judah and the Inhabitants of Jerusalem, with having built a Temple to Baal, there to burn their Children in the Fire; and then that Prophet subjoins: Wherefore the Time cometh when this Place shall no more be called Tophet, nor the Valley of the Sons of Hinnom, but the Valley of Carnage. It was to Moloch they offered up those innocent Victims, and the Valley of the Sons of Hinnom was the Place where that Abomination was committed: Consequently Bel or Baal was the same God with Moloch. The same Conclusion may be drawn from the Similitude of their Names, which signify both of them, the King, the Lord, as I have already said; Titles applicable to the Sun, worship'd promiscuously under the Name of Baal, or of Moloch.

In order fully to comprehend this ancient Mythology, 'tis necessary to observe, First, That the same God was frequently worship'd by different People, but almost always under different Names, and with different Ceremonies; and this is what has thrown a great Obscurity upon this Subject. 'Tis certain, for Instance, that the great Divinity of the

(1) Lev. c. 18. v. 21.

(2) Ib. c. 20. v. 2, 3.

(3) 5. 26.

(4) Ac. vii. 43.

the eastern Nations was the Sun : And yet under how many Names was he adored ?

Secondly, That as several Princes have born the Name of Belus, Mythologists are at a loss to determine which of them was the first who received divine Honours. Did we follow the Opinion of Berosus, preserved to us by Syncellus upon the Authority of Polyhistor, we should find Princes and Gods of that Name even before the Deluge ; but not to insist upon this Opinion, which I take to be without Foundation, 'tis certain, that most of the People of Syria and Phenicia acknowledged a Divinity of that Name. The Syrians adored him under the Name of Baal-Pehor ; the Moabites, under that of Baal-Phegor, that is to say, Baal worshipped upon Mount Phegor, as Theodoret remarks (a) ; the Affyrians under that of Baal-Gad. The Worship of this God was propagated even into Africa, probably with the Colony of Dido, and the Carthaginians called him Bal or Bel, as we learn from Servius (b) : Hence undoubtedly, came their Custom of adding, by way of Honour, the Title of Bal to the Names of their great Men, as in those of Anni-Bal, Astru-Bal, and others.

The Worship of this false Divinity was often forbid the Jewish People by the Prophets. The impious Abab built a Temple to him at Samaria, and the Prophet Elijah destroyed four hundred and fifty of his Priests ; which shews us the Magnificence of the Worship of this Idol, before whom almost the whole Earth had bowed the Knee, as we are told in Scripture. Among the Ceremonies of the Worship of this God, we may remark that of serving Meat every Day before his Idol, which the Priests took Care to carry off, entring into the Temple by Passages under Ground, as the Prophet Daniel discovered to the

E 3

King

(a) Phegor quidem Simulachri locus vocabatur, Beel vero Idolum. Theodoret in Psal. cv.

(b) Lingua Punica, Bal Deus dicitur ; apud Affyrios autem Bel dicitur : says Servius upon these Verses in Virgil.

Implevitque mero pateram, quam Belus & omnes

A Belo soliti — &c.

Æn. Lib. i.

King of Babylon, to the Confusion of those wicked Impostors (1).

They who made it their Business to enquire into the Original of this Divinity, were divided in their Opinions. Servius, Eusebius, Theophilus of Antioch, and some others, have taken him for Saturn. Vossius and Selden, as has been said, thought he was the Sun ; and the latter confirms his Opinion by several very plausible Arguments ; among others, what he draws from the Name of Heliogabal, Priest of the Sun, is not the weakest ; since that Emperor seem'd to have joined the two Names which the Greeks and Syrians gave to that Luminary, called by the Greeks Helios, and by the Syrians, Bel, or Belus. Others have fancied that Baal was the same with Stygian-Jupiter, or Pluto ; and they found their Opinion upon a Passage of Scripture, where the Holy Ghost calls the Sacrifices of Baal-Phegor, the Sacrifices of the dead (a). For, as St. Augustin remarks (2), by the Sacrifices of the Dead, we are to understand those that were offered to the Manes, or infernal Gods.

Some Authors, among whom is Eusebius, confound Baal with Belus, the first King of the Assyrians, who was deify'd after his Death : But probably the Worship of this Divinity was ancients than that Prince, who was also honoured with the Name of Belus, which imports Lord ; a Name which the Jews, as Grotius judiciously remarks, would never give to the God of Israel, because it was profaned by the Application which the Idolaters made of it to their false Divinities.

As S. Jerom, Rufinus, and some others, were of Opinion, that Beel-Phegor imports a naked God, or an Idol of hard Stone, which has a considerable Affinity with Priapus ; they confounded these two Divinities, for Reasons which I am going to recite.

Forni-

(1) Bel and the Dragon. c. 2.

(a) Et copulati sunt Beel-Phegor, & comederunt sacrificia mortuorum. Psalm. cvi.

(2) In Psalm. cvi.

Fornication, as we see in the Book of Numbers, was consecrated to Beel-Phegor; is not this the Character of the infamous Divinity of Lampsacus? * The Vulgar translates the Word Mipheletzeth, which is of the same Import with Beel-Phegor, by Priapus; and as that Hebrew word signifies Terror, nothing is more suitable to that God, whose Figure was set up in Gardens to serve for a Scare-Crow, as we learn from Horace and Tibullus. These Authors add several other Reasons to confirm this Opinion, which may be seen in Vossius (1); but, accurately speaking, it would be better to say, that the Priapus of the Greeks and Romans was a Copy of that ancient Divinity of Syria, whose abominable Worship was adopted by the Greeks. For I would intimate once for all, that when we shall say in the Sequel, that Authors confound such a God of Phenicia, or Egypt, with Jupiter, or some other Greek Divinity; the meaning is, that that God of the Greeks had been formed upon the Model of the God of the Egyptians or Phenicians.

I said the Vulgar renders the Word Mipheletzeth, which is in the Hebrew Text, by that of Priapus. This is in the Case of Maaca, the Mother of Asa, who honoured that God with a particular Worship, being his Priests, and was deprived upon that Account of her Authority by the wise Prince her Son. Sed & Maacham matrem Asa Regis ex augusto imperio deposuit, eo quod fecisset in luco simulacrum Priapi: quod omne contrivit, & in frusta comminuens, combussit in torrente Cedron (2). The same Fact is recorded in the Books of the Kings.

ARTICLE IV.

C H A M O S.

According to St. Jerom (3), Chamos, whose Name comes from an Arabick Root, that signifies

E 4

* A famous Town near the Hellepont, where Priapus was worshipped.

(1) De Orig. & progr. Idol. Lib. 1. (2) 2 Chro. Chap. xv. ver. 16. (3) Upon the 51st Chapter of Isaiab.

fies, to hasten, to go quickly, was the same as Beel-Phegor; and the Moabites worship'd him sometimes under that Name, as may be seen in the Book of Kings (1), where this Idol, whose Worship Solomon establish'd, is stiled the Abomination of the Moabites, whom the Scripture calls the People of Chamos: Wo to thee Moab, thou art undone, O People of Chamos; he hath put his Sons to flight; saith the Lord by the Mouth of Moses (a).

Solomon, I say, establish'd the Worship of this God, Tunc ædificavit Solomon fanum Chamos Idolo Moab, in monte qui est contra Jerusalem (2). This Temple, which that Prince built to please one of his Wives, was afterwards destroyed.

The Ammonites likewise worship'd this Divinity, as appears from the Words of Jephtha to the King of that People: What your God Chemosh, says that Judge of Israel, has given you, belongs to you: Why would you have us not to possess what our God hath given us (3)?

To know now who this God of the Moabites was, is no easy Matter. The Resemblance of his Name to that of Ammon, has induced several learned Men to think they were the same; and as the last, according to Macrobius (4), was the Sun; Chemosh must also have represented the same Luminary, since his Worship was propagated from Egypt and Lybia, to Arabia, where the Moabites lived (b). To be sure the Name Chemosh, importing, as has been now said, to make haste, to go fast, perfectly well agrees to the Sun, of whom the Scripture says, Exultavit ut Gigas ad currendam viam. I adopt the Opinion of St. Jerom, who says, as we have seen, that this God is the same with Beel-Phegor, and that he was worship'd under those two Names by the Moabites. I adopt

(1) 1 Kings xi. 7.

(a) Væ tibi, Moab, peristi popule Chamos; dedit filios ejus in fugam, & filias in captivitatem regi Amorreorum Sohon. Numb. xxi. 29.

(2) 1 Kings xi. 7. (3) Jud. xi. 24. (4) Sat. Lib. i. cap. 21.

(b) Quamvis Æthiopium populis, Arabumque beatis

Gentibus, atque Indis unus sit Jupiter Ammon. Pharf. l. 9.

adopt likewise the Conjecture of Vossius, who alledges that the Chemos of the Moabites and the Κῆμος of the Greeks and Romans, or the God of Revels, are the same (1).

ARTICLE V.

Beel-Zebut.

Beel-Zebut, the God of the Accaronites, is one of those whom the Scripture most frequently mentions. This Name signifies either the God Fly, or as S. Augustin will have it (2), the Prince of the Flies: But we know not, as Selden and Grotius remark (3), if this was the Name which the People of Accaron gave to that Idol, or if the Jews called him so by Way of Derision, much after the same Way as the Prophets changed the Name of Bethel, which signifies the House of the Lord, into Beth-aven, which imports the House of Iniquity, because there Jeroboam had set up one of his golden Calves. 'Tis probable however, that that People called their false God by this Name, either because his Temples were exempt from flies, or because he had Power to drive them away from Places they frequented. Accordingly we learn from Pliny, that the Cyrenians offered Victims to the God Achor, for their Deliverance from those Insects, which sometimes occasioned contagious Distempers in their Country. This Author remarks (4) that they died after offering Sacrifice to that Idol: Quæ protinus intereunt, postquam libatum est illi Deo. These two were not the only People who acknowledged a Fly-destroying God, since the Greeks, the most Superstitious of all Men, had likewise their Jupiter and their Hercules Myades, or Myagron, or Fly-Hunter. If we believe Pausanias (5), the Origine of the Worship they paid to that Divinity was this; Hercules, being molested by those Insects while he was about

to

(1) De Idol. l. 2. c. 8.

(2) Tract. in Joan.

(3) De Diis Syriis.

(4) L. 10. c. 18.

(5) In Eliac.

to offer sacrifice to Olympian Jupiter in the Temple, offered a Victim to that God under the Name of Myagron, upon which all the Flies flew away beyond the River Alpheus. Pliny even asserts that it was the constant Practice as often as they celebrated the Olympic Games, to sacrifice to the God Myodes lest the Flies should disturb the Solemnity.

Be that as it will, Beel-Zebut is called in Scripture, the Prince of Devils, which shews us that he was one of the principal Divinities of the Syrians. When Abasias sent to consult him, the Prophet Elias thus expostulated with his Servants: Is there not a God in Israel? Why then go to consult Beel-Zebut the God of the Accaronites (1)?

ARTICLE VI.

Berith, or Baal-Berith.

This God would be wholly unknown were it not for a Passage in the Book of Judges (2), where it is said, that after the Death of Gideon the Israelites forsook the Lord, and made a Covenant with Baal, that he might be their God: Percusseruntque cum Baal fœdus, ut esset eis in Deum; the Hebrew Text imports, and they set up Baal-Berith over them, that he might be their God. We read also in the same Book (3), that this God had a Temple in Sichem, whence the Inhabitants of that City took seventy Pounds of Silver and gave to Abimilech the Son of Gideon. The Interpreters of Scripture have offered many Conjectures to help us to the Knowledge of this God. Father Calmet (a) thinks he was the same as Derceto, or Dagon, or Diana-Britomaris, and that his Worship passed from the Island of Crete to the Philistines, and from thence had been propagated to Sichem: But this is not the Course the Fables took. The Worship of the Pagan Gods, as has been so often said, having taken its Rise
in

(1) 2 Ki. iii. (2) C. viii. ver. 33. (3) C. ix. 4.

(a) See his Dissertation upon the Gods of the Philistines.

in the Eastern Countries, passed into the Islands of the Mediterranean, and from thence into Greece and the adjacent Countries. Thus we shall once more have Recourse to Sanchoniathon: That Author, or rather Philo of Byblos, his Interpreter, tells us, that Elion and Berith, were two Divinities of Phenicia. The first of these Names imports the most High, and is sometimes attributed to the true God, by the sacred Writers: Bel or Baal, signifies the Lord: Beruth, which has a very plain Affinity with Berith, signifies the Covenant; thus Elion-Beruth, or Baal-Berith, will be the true God, or the Goddess of the Covenant: Accordingly, we are told in Scripture, that the Israelites made a Covenant with that God, as we have seen in the Passage which I have quoted.

The Ancients, we know, had several Gods who presided over Covenants, and it seems every one was free to choose whom he pleased, to be the Guarantee of what he was going to promise. However, the Greeks and Romans commonly made choice of Jupiter, who was therefore surnamed Jupiter over Oaths (1). Pausanias (2) informs us that in the City of Olympia was to be seen Jupiter brandishing the Thunderbolt in his Hands, ready to discharge it against those who violated their Oaths. Nothing was more noted among the Romans, than the Form of swearing by Jupiter Stone: Quid igitur jurabo? says Apuleius (3); per Deum Lapidem, Romano vetustissimo more.

But who then was this God of the Covenant? this is impossible to find out: For Bochart does not satisfy us, when he says (4) Berith is the same with the Goddess Beroe, of whom Nonnus makes mention, calling her the Daughter of Venus and Adonis, or according to others, of Tethys and Oceanus. We shall be but little wiser for knowing that this God or Goddess gave her Name to the City Berith, where she resided.

ARTICLE

(1) Dion. Hal. l. 4.

(2) In Eliac.

(3) De Deo Jove.

(4) Can. L. 2. c. 17.

ARTICLE VII.

Kiun, or Rempham.

All the Knowledge we have of Kiun, or Rempham, is owing to a Passage of the Prophet Amos, where it is said: You have born the Tabernacle of your God Moloch, and Kiun your Images, and the Star of your Gods whom ye have made (1). Saint Luke, rehearsing a Discourse of St. Stephen, calls this God, after the Septuagint, the Star of your God Rempham. This Passage has put Interpreters to the Rack, upon Account of the Difference there is between the Hebrew Text and that of the Septuagint. I shall not enter here into a Discussion of their Arguments, but leave the Reader to consult themselves: Nor shall I examine whether this Star Rempham was the same with that of Venus; with worshipping whom the Prophet upbraids the Moabites, as S. Jerom alledges (a), in Regard that the Saracens always worship'd that Planet, which they called Cobar; or if it was the Moon, as some Authors maintain; or lastly Saturn, which is more probable; since Kaiwan, which is much the same Word with Kiun, signifies Saturn among the Persians; and Ram, whence comes Rempham, imported among the Phenicians, High, exalted; which agrees to Saturn, who is the highest of the Planets (b). Where we may make this transient Remark, that when I alledge the Prophet Amos speaks here of Saturn, I mean, in so far as he was a natural Divinity, representing the Star since called by his Name, and whose Worship was very ancient.

ARTICLE

(1) Amos v. ver. 26.

(a) Sidus Dei vestri, quod Hebraice dicitur Cobab, id est Lucifer, Saraceni nunc usque venerantur. S. Jerom upon the 5th Ch. of Amos.

(b) See Selden, Grotius, and the other Interpreters, and Thomassin, Leç. des Poët. Tom. 2. Liv. 1. c. 13.

ARTICLE VIII.

Of other Gods less known, whereof mention is likewise made in Scripture.

The better to understand what I have to say in this Article, we must know that the Cutbeans, whom Salmanazar sent to re-people Samaria, after the Dispersion of the Tribes, brought thither several of their Idols, whose Worship the Israelites frequently embraced, as they are taxed by the Prophets upon several Occasions. A Passage from the second Book of Kings (1), makes us acquainted with a vast Number of them; as follows.

“ Every one of those Nations (whom Assaradon had sent to people the Cities of Samaria) “ made “ Gods of their own, and put them in the Houses of “ the high Places which the Samaritans had made, “ every Nation in their Cities wherein they dwelt.
“ The Men of Babylon made Succoth-Benoth, the “ Cutbeans Nergel; and the Men of Havath made “ Ashima; and the Avites made Nibhaz and Tartak:
“ but those of Sepharvaim burnt their Children in
“ the Fire to Adramelech and Anamelech.” A short Commentary on this Place; will bring us to the Knowledge of all these Divinities.

First, The Terms Succoth-Benoth, signify the Tents of the Virgins; which made Selden (2) think the Scripture in this Chapter had an Eye to the Temples of Venus, or Astarte, that were at Babylon, and in which the Virgins, according to Herodotus and Strabo, prostituted themselves to Strangers (a). The Prophet Jeremiah speaks of this detestable Custom, in the Letter which he wrote to Babylon, and he informs us that these young Virgins repaired thither with Garlands on their Heads, and retired into little Chambers

(1) C. xvii. v. 29.

(2) De Diis Syriis.

(a) The Syrians represented that Goddess under the Figure of a Hen with her Chickens.

bers, or sat in the high Way, severely reproaching those whose Beauty did not allure the Embraces of Passengers (a).

Secondly, The Nergel of the Cutbeans was probably the sacred Fire worship'd by the ancient Persians; which corresponds to his Name, the Import whereof is a Fountain of Fire.

Thirdly, Cbamanin was also an Idol that represented the Sun, whose Worship, as has been said, was abolished by Josias.

Fourthly, The Asima of the People of Emath, was represented under the Figure of an He-goat, and was probably the same with the God Pan of the Egyptians.

Fifthly, The Nibbaz of the Avites was Nebo, that great Divinity of Babylon, who, according to Grotius (1), had been some Prophet of the Country, conform to the Etymology of his Name, which, as we learn from S. Jerom, signifies one who presides over Prophecy. Could the Caldeans, a People entirely devoted to Astrology, fail to deify one who had excelled in that Art? most of the Babylonish Kings bore the Name of that God, joined to their own, Nabo-Nassar, Nabo-Polassar, Nabu-chodonosor, &c.

Sixthly, Tartak, according to some Authors, was the same with the Typhon of the Egyptians: The Syrians honoured him with a peculiar Worship, and his Festival bore the Name of Sacred.

Seventhly, As to Adramelech and Anamelech, if they were not ancient Kings of the Country, as their Names incline me to believe, since the former signifies (2) a powerful King, and the Latter a magnificent King, I would be inclined to think they were the Sun and Moon; for I cannot be of their Opinion who take Adramelech for Juno, because that God was represented under the Figure of a Peacock, a Bird consecrated to the Spouse of Jupiter; for (a) This Letter is at the End of the Prophecy of Baruch.

(1) In 2 Ki. c. xvii.

(2) Grotius in 2 Ki. c. xvii.

for to say it once more, it was very late before the Syrians received the Divinities of the western Nations, and long after the latter had adopted those of the East.

Eighthly, In fine, the Syrians and their Neighbours worship'd several other Divinities, of whom we hardly know any Thing certain; for we must not give Ear to the Rabbins who have devised thousands of Conjectures on this Occasion, all of them frivolous and ridiculous, such was one Nibbas, who is thought to be the same with the God Anubis. The Emperor Julian, after having renounced Christianity, was zealous for restoring the almost neglected Worship of this ancient Divinity: He even caused his Image to be engraved upon his Coin, holding a Caduceus in one Hand, and an Egyptian Scepter in the other.

Such also was Moazin, whose Worship the wicked Antiochus restored. Daniel is the only one who speaks of this God, and what he says of him is very obscure. That Prophet in one of his Visions, where he foretells what was one Day to befall the Kings of Syria, speaks of a Prince, who is thought to be Antiochus Epiphanes, who was to forsake the God of his Fathers, and to substitute in his Room a God whom they did not know: Deum autem Moazim in loco suo venerabitur, & Deum quem ignoraverunt patres ejus colet Auro & Argento, & Lapide pretioso . . . Et faciet ut maneat Moazim cum Deo alieno quem cognovit (1). The Version of Theodotion has kept the same Name given to that God by the Vulgate, but other Versions have only the God of Forces or Fortifications, which has made several Interpreters believe Moazim was the same with the God Mars, since his Name is compounded of Dazas, which imports Strong; which perfectly agrees to the God of War, whom the Jews called Modin, by a Change of Letters, which is common enough with them.

The Author of the critical History of Worships, after having delivered the Opinion of Interpreters upon

(1) Ch. xi. v. 37, 38 and 39.

upon this Passage, thinks for his own Part that Mozim means the Romans, whom Antiochus appeased by Gifts, and by resigning to them the Provinces which he possessed on this Side Mount Taurus; and that the Roman Eagles were that God unknown to his Fathers, whom he worship'd, that is to whom he was obliged to submit by a Treaty of Peace, whereof the Romans reap'd all the Advantage. This Opinion, which that Author supports by solid Reasons, is not without Probability (1).

To conclude, the Scripture makes mention of several other Gods, which are only known by the Names of the Cities where they were worship'd; such as the Gods of Emath, Arphad, Sepharvaim, Avia, Seir, Eva, and several others, whose Worship made a Part of those Abominations with which the Nations are so often reproached, and sometimes the Jews themselves, especially the Israelites who followed the Superstition of Jeroboam, and afterwards adopted most of the Divinities of their Neighbours. M. Fourmont has omitted none of all those Gods, on whom I shall not farther enlarge, that I may not fill this Work with Etymologies, frequently controverted, and always of but little Use. The Author I now quoted has however some very happy ones, which may be seen in his Work (2).

C H A P. VII.

Of the Gods of Tadmor or Palmyra.

AS the celebrated City of Palmyra was in Syria, I shall here subjoin the History of the Gods who were worship'd therein. The City Tamor or Tadmor, so called upon Account of the Palm-trees which the Soil produces (3), was built, as we learn from Josephus, by Solomon, in the most northern Part

(1) P. 4. C. 3. p. 705.

(2) T. 1. L. 2. Sect. 4.

(3) Tamar in Hebrew a Palm.

Part of Syria (a). The Greeks and Romans, not knowing its ancient Name, have always called it Palmyra. 'Tis not my Design to give a History of this City, which frequently changed Masters, and was at Length entirely subjected to the Romans by the Emperor Aurelian, in the Time of the famous Zenobia. At this Day nothing of it remains but Ruins; but from these same Ruins one can judge what its Magnificence must have been; and it may be affirmed that there is no City in the World where are to be seen more Remains of ancient Grandeur, and at the same Time a more frightful Picture of Desolation. As William Hallifax, an English Lord, had carefully examined all those Ruins, you may consult what he says of them in the Philosophical Transactions for the Year 1695. and in the Letter he wrote to Edmond Barnard, which Camille le Brun has inserted in his Travels (b).

Tadmor, which, doubtless, at the Time of its Foundation, followed the Jewish Religion, suffered itself to be drawn away at Length by the Superstitions of Paganism; but we cannot mark out the Time when it became idolatrous: We can only say it worship'd at first the Gods of the Syrians, especially Belus or the Sun, for whom it had a magnificent Temple, whereof Lord Hallifax gives the Description to this Purpose: “ The whole Compass of this Edifice is “ a Space of Ground of 660 Feet Square, each Side
“ being inclosed with a high and beautiful Wall, “ adorned with Pilasters within and without, to the “ Number of 62 on each Side, as may be judged
“ from what of it is yet remaining; for the Turks,
“ who have been long Masters of that Country,
“ have destroyed or mangled almost all, whether “ Sculpture, Bas-reliefs, Inscriptions, &c.”

VOL. II.

F

The

(a) The Scripture tells us only that Solomon built a City without giving its Name.

(b) Tome II. of the Rouen Edition, p. 281. You may also consult the Dissertation of Abbe Renaudot, printed in the second Volume of the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles-Lettres. p. 509.

The Author now quoted, tells us that this Temple was destroyed by Jebu, and converted into a Draught-House, as we read in the second Book of Kings (1); and if all that Place, continues he, was the Temple of Jupiter Belus, the Comparison which the Scripture uses is very just.

But the English Traveller is not accurate in what he says on this Head, as I have observed in the Edition I have given of Corneille le Brun's Travels. The Scripture makes use of no Comparison upon this Occasion; it is only said there: Et protulerunt Statuam de fano Baal, & combusserunt, & comminuerunt eam. Destruxerunt quicque ædem Baal, & fecerunt pro eo Latrinas usque in Diem hunc. Besides there is nothing said in that Chapter of the City Tadmor, we are only told there that Jebu persecuting the Remains of the House of Abab, went to Samaria, where after having feigned a Design to worship Baal, he gathered together all the Priests to celebrate a Feast to him, and ordered them to be slain in the very Temple of their God. 'Tis true the sacred Text adds, that after this Expedition his Soldiers went into the City of the Temple of Baal: Et ierunt in Civitatem Templi Baal, whence they brought forth the Statue of that God which they burnt, and made a Draught-house of his Temple; but it remains to be proved that this City was Tadmor; for Baal was worship'd in several other Cities of Syria. And what Appearance is there that Jebu would send his Troops to the Distance of more than 60 Leagues, and into a Country which did not belong to him, to destroy a Temple which the Inhabitants would have defended with the Hazard of their Lives? Vatablus maintains that the City whither Jebu sent Troops, was not far from Samaria; which is very probable, and there is Reason to think that this City was Balba, which, according to Herbelot, is the Heliopolis of Syria,

(1) 2 Ki. x. 27.

Syria, where Belus, that is the Sun, had a magnificent Temple (a).

But waving this, the Palmyrians adored Belus, or the Sun and Moon, after the Manner of the other Syrians, but they gave particular Names to these two Divinities, as appears from a fine Monument that was formerly in the Gardens called Horti Car-penses, and is at this Day in those of the Princes Justi-niani, near Saint John of Latran.

This Bas-relief was publish'd in 1685. by M. Spon (1) with the Inscription that accompanies it, which is in Palmyrian, a Language we don't understand, and also in Greek, probably to the same purpose. Gruter before had quoted the Inscription (2), without adding the Figures to it, but as Montfau-con got a more exact Copy of it, with better Fi-gures than those that are in the other Antiquaries, that is the one we shall make use of, tho' it differs a little from that of Spon: The Translation of it is as follows:

“ Titus Aurelius Heliodorus Adrianus of Palmyra son to Antiochus, offered and consecrated at his own Expence, to Aglibolus and Malachbelus, the Gods of his Country, this Marble and a Sign or small silver Statue, for the Preservation of himself, his Wife and Children, in the Year five hundred and forty seven, in the Month Peritius.”

This Bas-relief, which is what they call an ex voto, represents the Frontispiece of a Temple, supported by two Columns, on which are two Figures of young Persons, between whom is a Tree which some Anti-quaries take for a Pine; but I am persuaded that 'tis rather a Palm-tree, which suits better with the City Palmyra, whose Name was taken from it. On the right Side of that Tree is the God Aglibolus, under the Figure of a young Man habited in a Tunick tuck'd up from the Waist, so that it reaches only down

F 2

(a) See the Travels of M. de la Roque, and the Dictionary of M. Bruzen de la Martiniere, upon the Word Balbe.

(1) Miscel. Erud. Ant. p. 1.

(2) p. 86.

down to the Knee ; and over it he has a Kind of Cloak ; holding in his left Hand a little Stick made in form of a Roller. The right Arm, wherein he probably held some other Thing, is broke off. On the other Side is the God Malachbelus, representing likewise a young Man, dressed in a military Habit, with a Cloak about his Shoulders, a radiant Crown upon his Head, and having behind him a Crescent, whose two Horns jut out on each Side.

The Inscription sufficiently informs us indeed that Aglibolus and Malachbelus were two Syrian Divinities, since they are called Gods of his Country who had consecrated to them that Monument, Πατέροις Θεοῖς, and Palmyra was in Syria ; but what Gods did they represent ? Let us hear the learned Spon, whose Opinion has not been contradicted. Some Authors, says he, will have it, that those two Figures represented the Summer and Winter Sun ; but as one of the two has a Crescent behind him, 'tis more credible they are the Sun and Moon. Nor is there any thing strange to find the Moon represented by a young Man, since 'tis certain that frequently both Sexes were given to the Gods, and there was the God Lunus, as we have already observed, after Spartian and other Authors (a).

As to Aglibolus, there is no Doubt but he was the Sun, or Belus, for the Syrians might very probably pronounce this Name so, as others called Baal, Belenus, Bel, or Belus ; the Change of the e, into o, is but a small Matter in the different Dialects of a Language ; but the Word Agli is unintelligible, unless we admit the Conjecture of the learned Malazal, who makes this Word to signify the Light sent from the Sun ; which he confirms by the Authority of Heſychius, who reckons among the Epithets of the Sun, that of Ἀγλαπτός : Now 'tis no Wonder that the Greeks pronounced Aglibolos, instead of Egletes Belos.

Farther

(1) Among Seguin's Medals, there is one representing the God Lunus, with the Armenian Cap.

Farther, that the Palmyrians worship'd the Sun, is a Fact not to be doubted. Herodian, after describing the happy Success of Aurelian, who made himself master of Palmyra, tells us he built at Rome in Memory of that Victory, a stately Temple, where he put the Spoils of the Palmyrians, and among other Things the Statues of the Sun and of Belus.

As for Malachbelus, as this Word is compounded of two others, viz. Malach which signifies King, and Baal which imports Lord, and as this God is represented with a Crescent and Crown, 'tis certain he represents the Moon, or the God Lunus. The Scripture frequently Designs the Moon by the Epithet of Queen of Heaven; the Prophet Jeremiah, condemning the Custom of offering Cakes to that Goddess, expresses himself thus: Placentas offert Reginae Cæli; or as he says in another Place: Sacrificemus Reginae Cæli, & libemus ei libamina; Let us sacrifice to the Queen of Heaven, and offer Libations to her.

We may see in the same Author, that the Date of the Inscription, being according to the Era of the Seleucidæ, falls towards the End of Severus's Reign, the Year of Christ 254, and that the Macedonian Month called Peritius, answers to our Month of February: But these Discussions belong not to Mythology.

According to the Abbé Renaudot, there is among the Inscriptions of Palmyra the Name of Jupiter the Thunderer; but these perhaps are only of the Time when the Romans were Masters of it. In fine, that People, superstitious to the last Degree, doubtless received all the Gods whom their Conquerors worship'd, and carried Flattery so far as to pay divine Honours to Alexander and Hadrian when they came to Palmyra.

C H A P. VIII.

Of the Gods Cabiri.

TH O' these Gods were known in Greece from the earliest Ages, yet as their original is Pbenician, I thought it proper to give them a Place in the Class of the Syrian and Pbenician Gods.

Nothing is more celebrated in Antiquity than the Cabiri and their Mysteries; tho' at the same Time nothing is more uncertain than the Origine of these Gods. If we credit Herodotus (1) it was the Pelasgi who, having settled in Samothracia, introduced thither the Worship of the Cabiri and their Mysteries, which they taught afterwards to the Athenians, among whom they pitched their Residence after quitting that Island. But that Author does not inform us from whom these same Pelasgi had got the Knowledge of these Gods, and of their Mysteries; there is even somewhat unintelligible in his Account (a). For, according to him, those Pelasgi being in Greece, as yet were ignorant of the Names of the Gods, about whom they went to consult the Oracle of Dodona, who answered them they were to learn their Names from the Barbarians, that is, the Egyptians. And yet he says in the same Place, that they had taught the Samothracians, and then the Athenians to worship the Cabiri and to celebrate their Mysteries; and he speaks upon this Occasion, of the Obscene Manner in which the Athenians, conformably to the Samothracians, represented Mercury.

But whatever be in that, the Pelasgi, an unsettled and vagrant People, had learned from Strangers the Worship of the Gods we are now speaking of: But whether was it from the Egyptians or Pbenicians they had

(1) L. 2.

(a) See the Beginning of the sixth Book, whence I quote this Passage.

had this Knowledge? What Sort of Gods were the Cabiri; how many were they in Number; what were those Mysteries, so celebrated in Antiquity? Were the Cabiri the same with the Corybantes, the Dactyli, &c? These are so many Questions we must examine. If we may believe Sanckeniaton, the Cabiri were Natives of Phenicia: That Author speaks of them in two Places of the Fragment we have quoted; he makes them to be descended from Sydik, and confounds them with the Dioscouri, the Corybantes and the Samothraces. From Sydik, says he, came the Dioscouri, likewise called Cabiri, Corybantes, Samothraces. In the second Place where he mentions the same Gods, he tells us that Chronos gave two of his Cities, namely Byblos to the Goddess Baalit, and Beryta to Neptune and the Cabiri, &c. It appears therefore from that ancient Author, that the Cabiri were the Sons of Sydik (a), and that they dwelt at Beryta of Phenicia; and as the Descendants of this Sydik, whoever he was, were deify'd, 'tis highly probable the Cabiri were so too, and that it was in the City now named, they first received religious Worship. 'Tis therefore certain that the Cabiri were Phenician Gods; their very Name is a Proof of it, as I shall shew by and by. Damascius (1) speaking of Esculapius, one of the Sons of the same Sydik, expressly says: Esculapius, who was at Beryta, is not an Egyptian, but Phenician by Birth; for among the Sons of Sydik, who were stiled Dioscouri or Cabiri, the Eighth was called Esminus or Esculapius.

In the mean time, however probable this Opinion may be, I judge it necessary to insert here what ancient Authors have thought about the Origine of these Gods. If we may credit Heredotus (2), the Cabiri were Sons of Vulcan, the most ancient of the Egyptian Gods. As the Passage where that Author says so has been ill translated by Laurentius Valla, M. Altori, otherwise an able Antiquary, is mistaken

F 4 in

(a) See the Fragment, L. II. Article of the Theogonies.

(1) In Photius.

(2) L. 3.

in the Dissertation he has made upon the Cabiri, pretending from the Authority of that Historian to destroy the Opinion of Pberocydes, and of Nonnus, who made Vulcan the Father of the Cabiri. Cambyſes, ſays Herodotus, having enter'd into the Temple of Vulcan, paſſed ſeveral Railleries upon the Statues he found there, and ordered them to be burnt, then he adds according to Valla's Tranſlation; Sunt enim & hec illis Vulcani Similia, a quo ſe hi Homines aiunt eſſe Oriundos: Whereas it ought to have been render'd; cujus ipſos (id eſt Cabiros) eſſe Filios dicunt; from whom (Vulcan) they ſay the Cabiri are deſcended. M. de Ruyſer, was alſo miſtaken in this Place, by tranſlating from Valla's Latin Verſion.

Here then are three ancient Authors, Herodotus, Pberocydes, & Nonnus, who give Vulcan for the Father of the Cabiri: With this Difference however, that the two laſt aſſert it, while the firſt ſays only it was the Opinion of the Egyptians. Aceſilaus the Argive, whole Sentiment is quoted by Strabo (1), alledges that the Cabiri were not the Sors, but the Grandſons of Vulcan, and that Camillus, whom others reckon in the Number of the Cabiri themſelves, was their Father. The Authors whom I have now quoted tell us further, that their Mother was called Cabira, and Pberocydes adds that ſhe was the Daughter of Proteus.

Strabo, who has made a large Collection of the Sentiments of the Ancients about the Gods now in Queſtion, adopts none of them; and the Article where he ſpeaks of them, tho' otherwiſe curious, wants that critical Niceneſs which raiſes the Dignity of the Subject. But paſſing that, 'tis certain the Cabiri were Gods come from the Eaſt; and as Herodotus delivers the Opinion of the Egyptians, without ſeeming to adopt it, we may hold to what Sanctiathen ſays of them, and from him 'tis unconteſtable that Phenicia is the Place, and Beryta in particular, where we muſt ſearch for the Origin of theſe these Gods, and of the Worship that was paid them. The Phenicians, who settled in several Islands of the Mediterranean and Archipelago, brought with them the Mysteries of these Gods especially into Samothracia, where they became very famous afterwards ; and the Pelasgi, who dwelt there at that time, having come into Greece, made them known to the Athenians. Their Name is not originally Greek, it comes from the Hebrew and Arabick, since in those two Languages, as the learned Bochart remarks (1), Cabir imports great, powerful. Varro (2), and after him Tertullian (3), were undoubtedly acquainted with this Etymology, since they call the Cabiri, the powerful Gods ; Deos potentes ; which likewise agrees with the Epithet given them by Orpheus in his Hymn to the Curetes (4), and with that of great Gods, as they are commonly stiled (a).

(1) L. 10 324.

If we would know in the next Place how many Cabiri there were, and what their Names, we shall find great Diversity of Opinions among the Ancients. As the Sons of Sydik, according to Sanchoniathon, were denominated Cabiri, we must admit eight of them, if we follow his Opinion, since Esculapius was his eighth Son. Strabo reckons only three Cabiri, and tho' he subjoins three Nymphs Cabaridæ, that does not encrease the Number of these Gods, since they had either Sex indifferently given them. Tertullian likewise restricts their Number to three : Tres arcæ trinis Diis parent magis potentibus ; eosdem Samothracæ existimant. Some Authors admit only two Cabiri, to whom they also give different Names ; for some call them Jupiter and Bacchus, and others Cælus and Terra. The old Scholiast upon Appollonius (5) assures us that Mnaseas reckoned three Cabiri, which he call'd Ἀσχιερός, Ἀχιονερός & Ἀχιονερός. Lastly, Dionysiodorus adds

(1) Chan. L. 1. c. 12.

(2) De Ling. lat. l. 4.

(3) De Spect.

(4) ἐνδυνάτους

(a) Selden, Synt. 2. c. 4. derives the Origine of their Name, from Cabar, an Arabian God, whose Worship, according to Hornius, after Nonnus, pass'd from Arabia into Samothracia. See Hornius Hist. Phil. L. 2. c. 4.

(5) Upon the first Book of the Arg.

adds a fourth, namely, Camillus, or Mercury, wherein he agrees with Herodotus.

Bochart, who of all the Moderns has given the most happy Interpretation of these Names, derives them from the Phenician Language, and thinks the first denotes Ceres; the second Proserpine; the third Pluto; and the fourth Mercury: The Arguments he brings for his Opinion are in the XII Chapter of the first Book of his Canaan. Reland, who has made a learned Dissertation upon the Cabiri (1), admitting the Names of the four to be as I have given them, concludes they were the Gods of the Dead. That Ceres was the Earth, who receiv'd them; Pluto and Proserpine the infernal Regions, where they came to dwell; and Camillus or Mercury, the God who conducted them thither.

That the Reason why the Greeks seldom give the Cabiri any other Name than that of the Samothracian Gods, is because their Worship having been propagated from East to West, was especially establish'd in the Island of that Name, and in Imabros which is not far from it, as we learn from Stephanus, and as may be proved from its having been the Custom of those Times for most Princes to travel thither, and for themselves to be initiated into the awful Mysteries of these great Divinities. Accordingly we learn from Diodorus (2), that Cadmus went into that Country, and there married Harmonia or Hermione, after having participated in those Mysteries. Orpheus, Hercules, Castor and Pollux, and some of the Argonauts likewise made a Journey thither, to fulfill a Vow they had made in time of a great Storm, as shall be said in another Place (3). Agamemnon, Ulysses, and the other Heroes of the Trojan War, were desirous to receive the same Honour, as we have it from Historians (a). Macrobius informs

us

(1) Differ. Miscel.

(2) Lib. 5.

(3) History of the Argonauts.(a) See Diodorus, Apollonius, Plutarch in Alexander, Suidas, &c.

us (1), that Tarquinius, the Son of Demaratus the Corinthian, was also initiated into those Mysteries, as likewise Philip the Father of Alexander the Great, and several others. The Athenians who, according to Herodotus, were the first who receiv'd the Mysteries of Samothracia, sent their Children thither to partake of the same ; and in this they were imitated by the other People of Greece. Terence in his Phormio (2) alludes to this Custom. “ When the Mother is delivered, says he, how many Presents must be made which she appropriates to herself. One when the Child is born ; another on the Day of celebrating the Nativity ; a third at the Ceremony of Initiation, &c.” Donatus, expounding this Passage of the Poet, says he alludes to the Custom of sending the Children at a certain Age to Samothrace, there to be initiated, as we are told by Apollodorus.

What led them to this Practice was not only the Notion they had of receiving great Assistance from the Gods Cabiri in dangerous Expeditions, especially when expos'd to Storms, as we learn from the Scholiast on Apollonius, but likewise the high Reputation those were in who had participated in those Mysteries, as Diodorus Siculus asserts.

We learn from the Ancients what were the Ceremonies in use upon this Occasion. The Person to be initiated was seated on a Throne, had a Crown of Olive set upon his Head, his Belly bound with a purple Ribband, and the rest of the initiated danced around him (a).

The Mysteries of the Cabiri, and of the Samothracians, were in high Veneration ; and since those Islanders had learned the Worship of the Phenicians and Egyptians (b), 'tis not improbable that all were prohibited

(1) Sat. l. 3. c. 4.

(2) Ac. 1. Sc. 1. v. 15.

(a) See Plato Dial. of Enthydemus ; Dion Chrys. Orat. 12. Proclus l. 6. c. 13. &c.

(b) As the Greeks were unacquainted with their Original, they gave out that Jupiter had instituted those Mysteries in Honour of one of his Sons ; or of one Elion, as he is called by Clemens of Alexandria, Admonit. ad Gentes.

hibited to enter their Temple, at least their Sanctuary, except the Priests ; as Herodotus tells us it was with regard to that of the Cabiri in Egypt (1) ; and it seems they took particular Care not to expose the Images of those Divinities to the profane View of Spectators, as the Egyptians had done to Cambyfes. Accordingly Pausanias having mentioned the Cabiri of Greece, makes Apology for being obliged to be silent with Respect to their Mysteries. Stephanus (a) informs us that there was in the Island of Samothrace a Cave called Zerintbus, consecrated to the Cabiri, wherein, if we believe Lycophron (b) and Suidas, they offered up Dogs to Hecate. That Goddess, who was often confounded with Proserpine, Ceres or Terra, was of the Number of the Cabiri, as has been said. But what made those Mysteries still more venerable is, that the Priests in their Ceremonies used a strange obsolete Language, as we learn from Diodorus (c) ; and there is no Doubt but it was that of the ancient Phenicians who had settled in that Island, and brought thither the Worship of the Cabiri. Accordingly we read in Hesychius, that the Priests of those Gods were called Coes, a Word derived from the Hebrew Cohen, which imports a Priest.

This undoubtedly is the true Account of the Gods Cabiri and their Worship ; and I cannot be of Vossius's Mind (2), who thinks we are to understand by that Name only the Ministers of the Gods, as the Curetes and the Dactyli of Crete, and the Corybantes of Phrygia. And yet what that learned Writer says

(1) L. 3.

(a) Stephanus, de Urbibus. The Scholiast upon Nicander says the same, as also Nonnus in the Description of Samothracia, L. 13. of the Diorysiacks. Ovid speaks to this Purpose L. I. of his Tristia.

Inde levi vento Zerinthia littora nactis,

Threiciam tetigit fessa carina Samon.

(b) Zerintion Antrum immane Canicidæ Deæ. Lycopron in Cass. vers 77. ex Correctione Bocharti, loc. cit. See the Scholiast on that Poet, who proves the Canicida Dea to be Hecate.

(c) Habuerunt autem Indigenæ Linguam veterem sibi propriam, cujus in Sacrificiis hodieque multa Servantur. Diod. lib. 5.

(2) De Idol. L. 1. c. 57.

says is not without Foundation : For First, the Cabiri were frequently called Camilli, which imports Ministers. Secondly, The Priests of Cybele, or the Corybantes, were also denominated Cabiri, from a Mountain of that Name in Phrygia : But I could not but give into the Testimony of all Antiquity, which reckons the Cabiri in the Number of the most venerable Gods, and distinguishes them very plainly from the Ministers who had the Charge of their Worship ; nor could I help differing from Strabo (1) who is for confounding the Curetes, as some Authors have done, with the Corybantes and the Cabiri.

We are also to observe that they who reckon Castor and Pollux, Jasion and Dardanus, in the Number of the Cabiri, are certainly mistaken ; and what may have led them into this Error is, that these Heroes had got themselves initiated into the Mysteries of those ancient Divinities ; and the last had perhaps brought their Worship into Phrygia, with that of Cybele, who was the same with Terra, or Proserpine, and the Chief of the Cabiri, as we learn from Varro (2). The Worship and Ceremonies of that Goddess passed from thence into Italy, whither Eneas brought them with his Household Gods, who according to Macrobius and Varro, were the same with the Gods Cabiri (3) : And this Opinion wants not Probability, since, as shall be said when we come to the Pataici, the Figures of all those Divinities very much resembled those of the Penates.

Nothing was more celebrated in Antiquity than the Mysteries of Samothrace, or of the Cabiri, as appears from the Zeal that People had to be initiated into them ; but the Authors who were able to instruct us in the Ceremonies that were there practised, withheld by I know not what religious Awe, dare not enter particularly into the Subject. By good Fortune they have only concealed from us the Knowledge of those scandalous Rites that accompany'd

(1) L. 10.

(2) L. 10.

(3) See Macrobius, Sat. L. 3.

company'd those Mysteries, over which we should willingly draw a Veil, tho' they had discovered them to us: Herodotus gives us sufficiently to know the Nature of them, since, in that Passage where he says that the Pelasgi had brought the Mysteries of those Gods to Athens, he says they had taught the Athenians to represent Mercury, one of the Cabiri, in a Manner obscene and quite indecent. Accordingly the Night-time was chosen for celebrating those Mysteries, as Cicero has it: Prætereo Samothraciam, eaque quæ Lemni Nocturno aditu occulte coluntur (1).

The Ancients owned other Cabiri, some of whom, as shall be said immediately, were the Sons of Vulcan, and others the Sons of Mercury. Mercury himself, according to Herodotus (2), was of the Number of those Gods, as also Ceres, who was surnamed Cabiria, Proserpine, Cybele, Prometheus, &c. For the Greeks who reduced every Thing to their own Religion, had a quite different Opinion of the Cabiri from the Egyptians, from whom they had the Knowledge of them. The Tradition of the Thebans imported, as Pausanias has it (3): “ That “ there had once been a City among them, and “ Men called Cabiri; that Prometheus, one of them, “ and his Son Etnes, having had the Honour to “ lodge Ceres, the Goddess committed to them
 “ a Depositum, and let them know what Use they “ were to make of it: The Thing itself is what I “ am not at Liberty to divulge. But this much we “ may take for granted, that the Mysteries of the “ Cabiri are founded upon this present which they “ had from Ceres.”

“ When the Epigoni had taken Thebes, says the “ same Author, the Cabiri having been expelled by “ the Argives, the Worship of Ceres Cabiria was “ interrupted for a long Time. Sometime after “ Pelarge the Daughter of Potneus, and Ismlas her “ Husband restored it, but at the same Time they trans-

(1) De nat. Deor. L. 1.

(2) See below.

(3) In Beot. c. 25.

“ transferred it to a Place called Alexiars, without
 “ the ancient Limits where it had been instituted.
 “ Forthwith Telondes and the other Cabiri whom the “ War had dispersed, met together in this Place.
 “ To conclude, the Religion of the Cabiri and “ the Sanctity of their Ceremonies never have been “ violated with Impunity.”

Thus far Pausanias, who would seem to confound the Ministers of the Cabiri with the Gods themselves who bore that Name: But Greece is not the Place where we are to search into the true Original of those Gods. 'Tis to Egypt we must have Recourse, since we read in Herodotus (1) that they were the Sons of Vulcan, the eldest of their Gods, and that they had a Temple at Memphis. Accordingly, this Author having given an Account of Cambyse's Behaviour in the Temple of Vulcan, adds that he enter'd likewise into that of the Cabiri, to which none but the Priest was allowed to have Access; and that after having made a Jest of those Gods, he ordered them to be burnt.

The Pelasgi, who doubtless were acquainted with these Gods by Means of the Egyptians, or which comes to the same, by the Priestesses of Dodona, establish'd their Worship in Samothrace, and from thence among the Athenians; but no doubt they blended their Mysteries with several Obscenities unknown to the Egyptians, since the same Herodotus, in the Passage where he says the Greeks had received from the Egyptians most of the Ceremonies of their Religion (2), intimates that we were to except their scandalous Manner of representing Mercury, which they got from the Pelasgi, who after having put it in Practise in Samothrace, communicated it to the Athenians, whence it was afterwards propagated to the rest of Greece. “ They who are initiated, says
 “ he, into the Mysteries of the Cabiri, which the “ Samothracians celebrate, and which they have commu-

(1) L. 3. c. 7.

(2) L. 2. c. 51.

“ communicated to the Pelasgi, know well enough
 “ the Truth of what I advance.”

There was no Place in the World where the Worship of the Cabiri became more famous than in Samothrace, where the Pelasgi had establish'd it. There it was that those hideous Mysteries were celebrated, which got their Name from the same Island, and were called Orgies too. The Obscenities that accompany'd those Mysteries must needs have been very abominable, since, as we have already seen, the Ancients who were led to mention the Cabiri and their Worship, protest that they durst not reveal them. Pausanias (1), after having told us that the Temple which the Cabiri had in Beotia was only seven Stadia from the sacred Grove of Ceres, Cabiria, and Proserpine, subjoins, The Reader will pardon me if I don't satisfy his Curiosity about the Cabiri, nor as to the Ceremonies of their Worship, and of that of Cybele, &c. S. Clemens of Alexandria, in order to combat Paganism with more Advantage, thought fit to reveal a Part of those horrid Rites ; but as what he says can answer no such Purpose now, I cannot be blamed for suppressing it.

Arnobius informs us (2) that in the Celebration of those Mysteries, they slew one of the initiated ; probably to offer him in Sacrifice to the Cabiri: Oblivioni etiam Corybantia sacra donentur, in quibus sanctum illud Mysterium traditur ; Frater trucidatus a Fratribus. Firmicus seems to have copied Arnobius when he tells us that in the Mysteries of the Corybantes, Murther was honoured, it having once happened that one of the initiated was slain on that Occasion by two of his Brethren. Whoever, continues he in another Place, has a Mind to shed the Blood of his Brother, may participate in the Mysteries of the Corybantes.

(1) In Beot. c. 25.

(2) L. 5.

bantes (a). But without pretending to justify those Mysteries, I am of Opinion that the Fact related by Arnobius, and after him by Firmicus, refers to an Accident that had happened in the enthusiastick Fury of some of the initiated who had killed their Brother. And indeed there is nothing like this to be found in the ancient Historians. This only is certain, that Persons guilty of Homicide, went to Lemnos to be expiated from that Crime, as we learn from Hesychius (1). But waving this, the Festival of the Cabiri, instituted at first at Lemnos, was adopted by the Inhabitants of Imbros, and then pass'd into Greece, especially to Thebes, where it became very famous (b).

In fine, the last Question we are to examine is whether we are to confound the Cabiri with the Corybantes, the Curetes, the Idæi Dactyli, and the Telchines: And here we must freely own that many Ancients do not distinguish them from one another. Strabo, in the Passage I have quoted, gives the Sentiment of Scepsius and of some other Authors, who maintain it; and among the Moderns, Vossius and M. Alteri have followed the same Opinion. For my Part, I think we are to distinguish them, and my Reasons are these. First, Sanctioniathon, Herodotus, Pherecydes, and Nonnus, who speak of the Cabiri and give their Genealogy, make mention neither of the Corybantes, Dactyli, nor Curetes. According to all the Ancients the Cabyri were of the Number of the great Gods: Now, no such Thing is said of the Corybantes or of the others now mentioned. The Account which the best Authors give of the Dactyli is, that they were Natives of the Island of Crete; that they were the first who found out the

VOL. II.

G

Art

(a) In sacris Corybantium parricidium colitur; nam unus Frater a duobus interemptus est Qui Fraternalis desiderat Sanguinem, Corybantium sequatur institutum, Firmicus de cor. prof. Rel

(1) On the Word Κόνε.

(b) See Meursius, Græcia Fer. L. 4. on the Word KABEIPIA.

Art of forging Iron, after the burning of mount Ida: An Event which makes one of the Epochs in the Parian Marbles; in fine, that they were five in Number, as their Name, derived from the Fingers of the Hand, undeniably proves. Sure this Notion of them is nothing like what is given of the Cabiri by Sanchoniathon, Herodotus, and the other Ancients whom I have quoted.

The Account given of the Curetes, that they had the Care of Jupiter in his Infancy, who made it their Business to hinder his Cries from being heard, by clashing upon their Spears, and dancing about him, by no Means agrees with what Antiquity relates of the Cabiri.

As for the Corybantes, these were Priests of Cybele, who in the Mysteries of that Goddess leap'd and danced about her, and made a wild kind of Noise with their Arms. The Telchines were accounted a Sort of Wizards, who travelled the Country to tell Fortunes, and to attract the Admiration of the Populace, who are always apt to admire what carries an Air of marvellous.

But, it will be said, the Mysteries of Samothrace, or of the Cabiri, are frequently called the Mysteries of the Corybantes, as we have seen in the same Authorities I have made use of. This is the very Thing that possibly has misled the Authors I am now confuting. The Corybantes were the Ministers of those Mysteries, not only at Lemnos and at Imbros, but also throughout all Phrygia and elsewhere: What wonder then that they have been indifferently called the Mysteries of the Cabiri, or the Mysteries of the Corybantes? 'Tis therefore certain that we must not confound the Cabiri with the Corybantes, the Dactyli, &c. nor mistake for those Gods who were so highly respected in Antiquity, the Ministers of their Worship; Ministers who by their Conduct made themselves extremely despicable. We shall speak at more Length of these Corybantes in the History of Cybele, whose Ministers they were.

But

But what shall we think of an ancient Inscription quoted by M. Altari, whereby it appears that the Cabiri were confounded with the DioscURI? Caius, the Son of Caius an Acarnanian, who was made Priest of the great Gods DioscURI Cabiri, erected this Monument in the Year when Dionysius was Archon after Liciscus. I said, and 'tis another Question yet to be examined, that the Cabiri were sometimes confounded with the DioscURI, and with the Anaces or Anactes; a Sentiment adopted by the Antiquary now quoted, and which he endeavours to prove from the Passage in Cicero I have cited in this Chapter: But still I am of Opinion they are to be distinguish'd from one another, as their Genealogies prove. According to Cicero, the Anaces and the DioscURI were Sons of Jupiter the Ancient: The Egyptians gave those Gods Vulcan for their Father; and the Phenicians Sydik. I know that, according to several learned Moderns, this Sydik was the same as that ancient Jupiter; but what ground had they to think so? for my Part I know none. Besides the Author whom I have now quoted, names those three Anaces, Tritopatreus, Eubuleus, and Dionysius, but we see the Ancients give quite different Names to the Cabiri, as we shall shew at greater Length in the following Chapter.

C H A P. IX.

Of the Anaces or Anactes.

SEveral Authors, among whom are Plutarch (1) Theodoret (2) and others, reckon among the Gods of this Order, none but Castor and Pollux, the two Dioscorides or Sons of Jupiter (3), whose History shall be given when we come to the Argonauts, whom they accompany'd to the Conquest of the golden Fleece; But Cicero, more exact in

G 2

this

(1) In Thesco.

(2) Græcarum Affect. l. 8.

(3) Διοσκυροι.

this Matter, speaks of three Sorts of Anaces: The first were the Sons of an ancient Jupiter, King of Athens, and of Proserpine, their Names Tritopatreus, Eubuleus, and Dionysius; the second were the Sons of the Third Jupiter and Leda; these were Castor and Pollux. The last were Aleo and Melampus Emolus, the Sons of Atreus (a). Some Ancients reckon a much greater Number of them, since they confound them with the twelve great Gods. Accordingly Pausanias tells us that Hercules, after having pillaged Elis, to be avenged of Augias, set up six Altars to the twelve great Gods or Anactes, so that there were two of these Gods for each Altar. The ancient Scholiast upon Pindar names some of these Anactes; but the Passage where he speaks of them, is too much corrupted for one to draw any Certainty from it.

Authors are not agreed about the Etymology of the Name given these Gods. Plutarch thinks it was given to the Tyndarides, either upon Account of their having procured Peace (b), or because they had been placed among the Stars; which makes Horace say, Sic Fratres Helenæ lucida Sidera (1), or for other no better Reasons (c).

Take the Passage from Plutarch, according to Mr. Dacier's Translation. “ Castor and Pollux being Masters in Athens, demanded only to be initiated. “ They were therefore admitted into the Fraternity “ of the great Mysteries, after having been before “ adopted

(a) Διοσκύροι etiam apud Græcos multis modis numerantur. Primi tres, qui appellantur Anaces, Athenis ex Jove Rege antiquissimo & Proserpina nati, Tritopatreus, Eubuleus, Dionysius. Secundi, Jove tertio nati & Leda, Castor & Pollux. Tertii dicuntur a nonnullis Aleo & Melampus Emolus, Atrei Filii, qui Pelope natus fuit. Cic. de Nat. Deor. L. III.

(b) Sed hic, (Plutarchus) arbitratur posse etiam ex eo Nomen videri, quia procurarint ἀνοχάς sive inducias; vel ab ἄνω, hoc est super, quia in Cælis inspiciuntur. Vossius de Idol. L. I. C. xiii.

(1) L. 1. Od. 3.

(c) Putabat Eustathius in Odyss. L. I. ἀναχὰς vocatos, quia Græce ἀναχᾶς dicunt pro ἐφορτισιῶς, Curiose. Vossius. Loc. cit.

“ adopted by Aphidnes, as Hercules had been by Py- “ lius. They had divine Honours paid to them, “ and were designed Anaces, either from having put “ an End to the War, or because they had taken so “ great Care of the Athenians, that altho’ the City “ was full of Troops, yet no Body in it had received “ the smallest Injury ; for this Word is derived from “ a Term which signifies to protect, to be careful, and “ perhaps from thence Kings have been called Anaetes,
 “ as being Protectors, or Fathers of their People.
 “ There are some however who tell us, that this “ Name was given to the Tyndaridæ upon Account of “ their Constellations, which appear in the Heavens ;
 “ for the Athenians call Anecas and Anecathen, what “ others call Ano and Anothen, Above (a).” Whatever be in that, Castor and Pollux were indeed very justly taken into the Number of the Gods Anaetes, for the Reason which I shall give afterwards ; but they were not the sole nor the most ancient Gods of that Name, which was not known to the Greeks till the Arrival of the Phenicians, among whom the Descendants of Anak (who had reign’d at Arbè, or Hebron, as we see in Joshua (b), were famous, as we shall observe in the History of the Giants. Inachus was of that Race. There is even a great deal of Probability that Inachus was not the proper Name of him who conducted the first Colony into Greece, and that it was given him only in Allusion to Anak ;
 but we shall discuss this Point more particularly in another Place. Further, I am persuaded that Anaetes was not a Name given to all Kings in general (altho’ in the Greek Language that Word properly imports

G 3

(a) M. Dacier in his Note upon this Passage of Plutarch, adopts the Etymology which derives the Word Anaetes, from that which signifies to take Care, and proves it by some Authorities ; but it is more likely that it was a Foreign Word with Respect to Greece.

(b) Deditque eis Josue Urbem Arbè Patris Enac, ea est Hebron. Jos. xv. v. 13. And elsewhere he says: Nomen autem Hebronis olim fuerat Cariatharbe: Hic fuerat Homo inter Enacinos maximus. Jos. xiv. v. 15.

ports Kings (a); but to such of Inachus's Descendants as distinguish'd themselves by their illustrious Deeds.

Vossius is also firmly of Opinion, that the Name of the Gods Anaëtes was originally from Phenicia; but he thinks it had been brought into the West by Cadmus, or by the Canaanites, whom Joshua by his Conquests had obliged to quit Phenicia, and who had retired into Greece; and he adds, that the Spartians who called themselves Allies of Israel, as we learn from Josephus (1), were a Colony of the Canaanites, who were mostly descended from Abraham by Hagar and Keturah: And this is the Reason why the most famous of the Greek Anaëtes were Castor and Pollux, Natives of Sparta, the Lacedemonians having given them that Name to honour the Memory of Anak's Descendants, of whom they had heard so many wonderful Stories. 'Tis certain the Greeks had some Knowledge of this Anak, who is mentioned in the sacred Books, and knew he had been a Man of an extraordinary Stature, and the Father of the Giants. What Pausanias relates of the Giant Asterius, is a Proof of it. Over against Miletus, says that Author (2), is the Island Ladé, which separates itself into two other small Islands, one of them called, Asterius, because Asterius's Tomb is there. He was the Son of Anax who is said to have been the Son of the Earth. The Body of Asterius is no less than ten Cubits in Length. I shall only add, that it is no strange Thing to hear the Greeks giving out that Anak or as they called him Anax, was the Son of the Earth; this was the Original they ascribed to those of whom they had only an imperfect Knowledge. This, I think, is the most probable Account of the Gods Anaëtes, so noted among the Greek Poets.
We

(a) Anaces, Reges. Homer gives this Name to most of his Gods and Kings, to denote the Care which they took of their People; and we find it upon several Medals: It comes from the Word ἀνασσω. Regno.

(1) Ant. l. 12.

(2) In Att. c. 35.

We come next to the Gods Pataici, who have the same Original.

C H A P. X.
Of the Gods Pataici.

THE Pataici or Patæci, for this Name is either Way pronounced, were, according to Hesychius (a), Phenician Gods, whose Statues used to be set up upon the Sterns of Ships. If we credit Herodotus they had a great deal of Resemblance, as to their Figures at least, to little Pygmies; and they were so ugly that they provoked the Scorn of Cambyzes, when he enter'd into the Temple of Vulcan in Egypt. The Account given of them by that ancient Historian is as follows. “ Cambyzes having one “ Day enter'd into the Temple of Vulcan, offered
“ a thousand Insults and Indignities to the Image “ of that God, because it resembled those Gods whom
“ the Phenicians call Pataici, and which they set “ upon the Prows of their Ships. By the Way, I “ would inform those who have not seen them, that “ they are made like Pygmies. He enter'd also into “ the Temple of the Cabiri, to which none are al“ lowed Access, but the Priest; and he ordered all
“ the Statues that were there to be burnt, after hav“ ing made a Jest of them; for they resemble those “ of Vulcan, from whom they say the Cabiri are “ descended.” Upon which we may remark, First,
That the Statues of the Gods Pataici and of the Cabiri, had a great Resemblance to one another, and that among the Egyptians Vulcan, the most ancient of their Gods, was represented as they were, as were also, in latter Ages, the Gods Penates among the Greeks and Romans. Secondly, That He- rodotus is mistaken, when he says the Phenicians set up

G 4

(a) Παταίκοι, Dii Phænices, quos statuant ad Putres Navium.
Hesychius Verbo Παταίκοι, Suidas, Harpocration, and Phavorinus say the same Thing.

up their Gods Pataici upon the Prows of Ships, whereas it was upon the Sterns, as Hesychius, Suidas (a), and after them Scaliger and Bochart (b) agree ; and neither the Phenicians nor the Greeks, to whom this Custom was communicated, ever inverted that Order. Accordingly they always placed upon the Stern the Image of one of these Gods, who was reckoned the Patron and Protector of the Ship, which makes Perfius say (1), Ingentes de puppe Dei, and Ovid, Accipit & pictos Puppis adunca Deos (2).

Whereas they put nothing upon the Prow but the Figure of some Animal or of some Monster, which derived its Name to the Ship ; which is thus express'd by Ovid.

Navis & a picta Casside nomen habet.

For this reason they had a Custom of adorning the Stern with Flowers and Garlands, as the Place consecrated to the Divinity by whom it was protected, as we learn from Virgil :

Puppibus & læti Nautæ imposuere coronas (3).

Which was never practiced as to the Prow, where was only to be seen the Figure of some Animal which had no Title to such Homage.

If you ask the Origine of this Name, I answer, our most learned Authors derive it either from the Hebrew, or the Phenician. The learned Scaliger will have it to be from the Hebrew Word Patach, insculpere to engrave ; but Bochart (c) derives it from Batach, confidere to put trust or to confide in ; either of which Etymologies perfectly agrees to the Use which the Phenicians, and after them the Greeks made of the Gods Pataici.

I shall

(a) Παταίζου Pheniciis in Puppibus collocati.

(1) Sat. 6.

(2) Epist. Parid.

(3) Geor. Lib. 1.

(b) Aliud Tutela, aliud παρασπονία insigne Navis ; illius Locus perpetuus in Puppe, hujus in prora fuit. Bochart. Chan. L. II. C. iii. Scaliger says the same Thing. Can. Chron.

(c) Bochart, Chan. 1. 2. c. 3. proves that the Phenicians and Hebrews often changed the P into B, and pronounced Batach instead of Patach, and Bataici instead of Pataici.

Consult upon this Article Selden, de Diis Syriis. Synt. 2. c. 16.

I shall only add further, that the Usage of giving Ships the Names of Animals represented upon the Prow, was very ancient ; accordingly we see Virgil names those which composed Æneas's Fleet, the Centaur, the Whale, &c.

C H A P. XI.

Of the Gods Palici.

MACROBIUS (1), in that Passage of his Saturnalia, where he makes an Encomium on Virgil's Erudition, who had the Art of interspersing his Works with several Pieces of the Greek History, quotes among other Passages of that great Poet, the Verses in the ninth Book of the Eneid :

. Symetia circum
Flumina, ubi placabilis ara Palici (2).

And says no Roman Author has described these Gods so known in Sicily ; that Æschyles, the Sicilian Poet, in his Tragedy intitled Ætna, is the first who has given their Original, to this Effect (a).

It was near the River Symetba, in Sicily, that Jupiter fell in Love with a Nymph call'd Ætna, others name her Tbalia, who, to conceal from Juno the Knowledge of her Intrigue, and to escape her Vengeance, entreated her Lover to hide her in the Bowels of the Earth ; which Request she obtained ; and when the Time of her Delivery was come, there sprung from the Earth two Children, who were called Palici, as you would say, sprung from the Earth into which they had been convey'd (b). These two Children were afterwards deify'd.

But this is a mere Fable founded upon the Equivocations of the Name of these Divinities. This was the ordinary Resource of the Greeks, when they would trace

(1) L. 5. 19.

(2) Æn. 9. v. 585.

(a) Macrobius in this Chapter confirms all that is said of the Palici, by Testimonies not only from Æschyles, but also from Callias, Philemon and Xenagoras.

(b) Palici, ἀπο τῆ παλιν ἰκίσθαι Macrobius loc. cit.

trace the Original of their Gods, they invented Stories upon the frivolous Foundation of the Etymologies of a Language which they did not understand: And the Fable which we are here explaining, is a manifest Proof of it, since the Worship of the Gods Palici came from Phenicia, as their Name leaves no room to doubt. 'Tis very probable that it comes from the Hebrew Word Palichin, which signifies Venerable, as Bochart proves (a); which the Poet Æschyles, from whom Macrobius has borrowed the Fable, seems to insinuate, when he said Jupiter ordered the Gods Palici to have the Title of Venerable given them. Hesychius also confirms the happy Conjecture of Bochart, since he says Adranus, whose Name is likewise Phenician, was Father of the Palici; for I can hardly think the Reader will give into the ridiculous Error of some of the Learned, who are of Opinion that it ought to be read in Hesychius, Adrian instead of Adranus, as if that Roman Emperor, who was not deify'd till forty Years after the Coming of Christ, could be the Father of these ancient Divinities, whose Worship was celebrated in Sicily many Ages before he was born; and give his Name to the River Adranus, which went by it long before.

This Adranus, in short, whom Hesychius makes to have been the Father of the Palici, contrary to the Opinion of Æschyles, who asserts they were Jupiter's Sons, is a God unknown out of Sicily; thus there is reason to think that he was the same Adramelech, who is mentioned in the Books of Kings, and whose Name imports a Magnificent King, and that his Worship, as also that of the Palici, was brought into that Island by the Syrian or Phenician Colonies, who settled there; This is what we learn from Bochart (1); and his Conjecture appears highly probable. For, in fine, we are to prefer to the Opinion of Hesychius, who gives Adranus for the Father of the Palici,

(a) Chan. l. i. c. 28. This Word comes from Pelach, colere, venerari.

(1) Loc. cit.

Palici, that of Æschyles who makes them to have been the Sons of Jupiter, and must needs have known the Antiquities of his Country, better than the Greek Lexicographer whom I have quoted, as being a Sicilian by Birth.

But let that be as it will, the Palici were very much honoured in Italy, and Diodorus assures us (a) they had a Temple near the City Erice (b), revered both for its Antiquity, and for the wonderful Things that happened in it. Accordingly we are told by Macrobius (1), after Æschiles and Diodorus, that there were near this Temple two small Lakes of boiling and sulphurous Water, always full without overflowing, which were called Delli, and held in the highest Veneration by the credulous People, who imagined that they were the Brothers of the Palici, or rather that this was the Place whence they themselves had sprung, when their Mother delivered them. Nec longè inde lacus breves sunt, sed immensum profundum, aquarum scaturigine semper ebullientes, quos incolæ Crateras vocant, & Nomine Delloſ appellunt, fratresque eos Palicorum æſtimant, & habentur in cultu maximo (2). Ovid likewise describes them. It was near these two Pools that solemn Oaths used to be made, and there Controversies were determined that could not otherwise be easily decided. Those who were called to take this Oath, purify'd themselves; and after having given Security to pay, if the Gods condemned them, they approached the Pools, and swore by the Divinity who presided over them. If their Oath was sincere, they went off unhurt; but Perjurers were punish'd upon the Spot, as all Authors who have mentioned it, are agreed,

*Perque lacus altos & olentia Sulphure fertur
Stagna Palicorum, ruptâ ferventia Terrâ* (3),
*Et qui præſenti domitant perjura Palici
Pectora supplicio* (4). tho'

(a) Fanum hoc tum Antiquitate, tum religiosa Veneratione, quod in eo multa vera & stupenda eveniunt. Diod. Lib. 11.

(b) It stood upon a Mount of that Name, which is at this Day Traiano Vecchio.

(1) Loc. cit.

(2) Loc. cit.

(3) Ovid Me. 1. 5. 405.

(4) Sileus Italicus.

tho' they are not quite agreed as to the Nature of the Punishment. Macrobius will have it that they fell into one of the Lakes and were drown'd : Quod si fideliter faceret, discedebat illæsus ; si vero subesset jure jurando mala conscientia, mox in lacu amittebat vitam falsus Furator (1).

Polemon asserts that they died suddenly ; Aristotle and Stephanus say they were consumed by a secret Fire ; and according to Diodorus there were some of them that lost their Lives (a).

Whether these different Punishments were real, or only feigned to terrify Perjurers, as would seem from the Diversity of these Opinions ; 'tis certain that none approach'd those Pools and the Altars of those implacable Gods (b) without a great deal of Terror, and the Place was a secure Sanctuary for oppressed Slaves ; their Masters being obliged before they could get them back, to promise to treat them with more Humanity, which they religiously observed for Fear of bringing some terrible Punishment upon themselves. We must not omit to observe that the ancient Inhabitants of Sicily called these two Lakes Delli (2), from an Arabick Word, which imports to make Discovery ; because the Oaths taken there discovered the Truth ; or, as is more probable, from the Hebrew Word Daal to draw out. I am inclined to adopt this Etymology, because it seems to agree better with what Aristotle says upon the Oaths we have mentioned. According to that Philosopher, they wrote the Oath which they made to those Gods in the Form of a Note, which floated above if the Party swore to a Truth ; but they sunk to the Bottom of the Water, when he perjured himself. As the Custom of those Oaths came from the East, as also the Worship of the Gods Palici, 'tis very probable it was an Imitation

(1) Macrobius. ibid.

(a) Solinus, Priscianus, and Isidorus tell us the same thing of a Fountain in Sardinia ; but they have confounded that Island with Sicily, which is not far from it, as Salmasius judiciously remarks.

(b) So Macrobius calls them.

(2) See Macrobius from Callias.

tation of what is written in the Book of Numbers, concerning the Tryals of the Water that was given adulterous Women to drink; and the Punishments, mentioned by the Authors I have quoted, were nothing else perhaps but a Tradition of what befel those who were guilty of the Crime whereof they were accused (a).

But here we must add that the Temple of the Palici was not only venerable upon Account of all that I have been now saying, but also for the Prophecies that were deliver'd there from time to time. Macrobius, after Xenagoras, tells us that, Sicily being distress'd with Famine, they consulted the Oracle of the Palici, and were answer'd, that if they sacrificed a certain Heroe, whom Authors don't name, the Famine would cease; which accordingly happened. The Sicilians, in Acknowledgment of this Blessing, heap'd Fruits and Presents upon the Altars of those propitious Deities; and this, according to Macrobius, is what makes Virgil say:

————— Pinguis ara Palici (b)

Qua gratiâ Siculi omne genus frugum congesserunt in aram Palicorum. Ex qua Ubertate ara ipsa Pin-guis vocata est (1).

The Superstition was afterwards carried so far as to offer up to those Gods human Victims. But this barbarous Custom was at Length abolish'd; and the Palici contented themselves with common Offerings: 'Tis to this the ingenious Poet I have now quoted is alluding, when he says, ————— Placabilis ara Palici (c).

Stephanus mentions the City and Fountain of the Palici, and Forestus, a celebrated Historian of Sicily, informs us that the two Lakes, which we have spoke of, are at this Day called Nephti.

In

(a) Trials by Fire and Water were long in Use, especially in France, even after the Establishment of Christianity.

(b) Loc cit.

(1) Mac. loc cit.

(c) Ibid.

In this Article I have chiefly had recourse to Macrobius, who seems to have taken what he says of the Palici from the Sicilian Authors; for besides the Poet Æschyles, he cites likewise Xenagoras and Callias who had written the History of Sicily.

C H A P. XII.

Of the Gods of the Persians.

IF we may give credit to Thomas Hyde, a learned English Gentleman, who has composed a Treatise concerning the Religion of the ancient Persians (1); a Work full of the most profound Erudition, the Religion of that People, of whom he tells us some Remains are still to be found in Asia, under the Name of Pharxis or of Guebres, was much more refined than that of their Neighbours, nor did they worship vain Idols like them. They acknowledged only one supreme Being, of whom Fire was the Symbol; and tho' they gave a religious Worship to that Element, yet it was only relative to the Divinity whom it represented. This Religion, which is called Magism, is still subsisting in that Nation (2).

But however learned the Remarks of that Author are, 'tis certain that Antiquity has ever reckoned the Persians a People who adored, not only the Fire and the Sun, but also other Divinities. Herodotus (3) says the Persians believed the Fire to be a God, and that their Reason for not burning their dead, was that they would have thought themselves guilty of Sacrilege, if a dead Body had been consumed by a God. Plutarch (4), speaking of the two Principles Oromazes and Arimanius, the one good, and the other bad, adds that the Persians, according to the Law of Zoroaster, worship'd Mithras, and invoked him as the Mediator between those two Divinities. Besides,

(1) De Rel. vet. Pers. eorumque Magorum. Oxon. 1700 in 4to,

(2) See what has been said of it in the third Book.

(3) L. 5. c. 16.

(4) De Isid. & Osiri.

Besides, if this Mitbras was the Sun, as we shall prove hereafter, 'tis certain they adored that Luminary, to whom they offered Horses in Sacrifice, as Justin tells us from Trogus Pompeius: Solem unum Deum esse credunt, & Equos ei Deo sacratos ferunt (1). The same Author relates in what Manner Artaxerxes Mnemon obliged Aspasia, with whom he and his Son were both in Love, to become Priestess of the Sun. Herodotus, whom we have just quoted, says the same Thing of the Massagetes, a neighbouring People to the Persians. There is therefore no doubt but that the Fire, or the Sun was adored as a God by that ancient People. He who is invoked as a Divinity; the Object of religious Worship, of Vows, Supplications, and Prayers, is a God: Now the Persians invoked the Sun, offered Sacrifices to him, addressed their Prayers to him, and had Priests set apart for his Service. If the Authorities I have now quoted are not sufficient to prove it, I might join to them that of Quintus Curtius, who tells us that Darius, upon the Point of engaging with Alexander, to inspire his Troops with Courage, invoked the Sun, Mitbras, and the Fire. Solem, Mithram, sacrumque & divinum invocavit Ignem (2).

The Persians therefore worship'd the Fire as representing the Sun, who was their great Divinity: But in order to give an abstract of their ancient Religion, we must quote all that is said of them by Herodotus and Strabo, the two Ancients who seem to have been best acquainted with that ancient People. “ This, says the former of these Authors (3), is “ what I have learned concerning the religious Ce“ remonies of the Persians. They believe 'tis not law“ ful to have either Statues, Temples or Altars, and “ look upon those who use them as foolish; and “ that because they don't think, as the Greeks do,
“ that the Gods have a human Shape. They have “ a Custom of sacrificing to Jupiter upon the highest “ Mountains,

(1) L. 1. c. 10.

(2) Q. Cur. L. 4. c. 13.

(3) C. 131.

“ Mountains, calling Jupiter the vast Expansion of “ the Heavens. They sacrifice to the Sun, the Moon,
 “ the Earth, the Fire, and the Winds ; and these “ are the only Gods to whom they offered Sacrifices “ from the earliest Ages, besides these they have “ learned from the Assyrians and Arabians to sacri“ fice likewise to Urania : The first of those two Na“ tions call this Venus Mylitta, the second, Alitta, “ and the Persians call her Mitra (1). In their “ Sacrifices they erect no Altars, kindle no Fire,
 “ and use neither Libations nor Cakes ; But when one “ is to offer Sacrifice, he leads his Victim to a Place “ clean and pure, and implores the God to whom “ he is to offer, having upon his Head a Tiara en“ circled with Myrtle. None is permitted to offer “ Sacrifice for himself alone ; he must pray for “ all the Persians, and especially for the King.
 “ When the Sacrificer has offered the Victim, and “ cut it into pieces, he lays it upon the most tender “ Grass, especially upon what they call trefoil. The “ Parts of the Victim being thus disposed, the “ Magus, who assists in the Sacrifice, sings the “ Theogony, which the Persians look upon as a “ Sort of Incantation ; and they are not permitted “ to sacrifice without a Magus. Some Moments af“ ter, he who offered the Victim carries off the “ Flesh, and applies it to what Use he pleases. Of “ all the Days of the Year, that which they observe “ with most Solemnity is the Day of their Nativity.
 “ Then the Rich roast an Ox or a Horse, a Camel or “ an Ass, for a publick Entertainment ; but the “ poorer Sort content themselves with giving some “ paultry Sheep.”

The same Author adds in the 138th Chapter of the same Book, that the Persians have also a high Veneration for the Rivers, into which they neither durst spit, nor let fall their Urine. 'Tis, no doubt, for the same Reason they are forbid to extinguish Fire with Water, using nothing but Earth for that Purpose,

(1) Herodotus writes this Name without the Aspiration.

Purpose, as you may see in Mr. Hyde's Treatise, cited at the Beginning of this Chapter.

Strabo, who had travelled into Cappadocia, a Country pretty near to Persia, is very full upon the Religion of that ancient People (1); and what he says of them ought to have the more Weight with us, that he agrees in every Thing with the Author I have been copying. “ The Persians, says he, have neither “ Statues nor Altars, but offer Sacrifice in high “ Places. They believe the Heavens to be Jupiter;
“ they worship the Sun, whom they call Mithras, (2)
“ also the Moon, Venus, the Fire, the Earth, the “ Winds and the Water. The Place where they “ sacrifice must be pure, the Victim to be offered “ is crown'd (3), and they pray over it by Way of “ further Consecration (a). When the Magus has cut “ it into Pieces, each of the Company takes his “ Part of it, and they leave nothing for the Gods, “ believing that they require from them only the “ Soul of the Victim; we are told however, adds
“ he, that sometimes they throw a Part of the Fat “ into the Fire. They sacrifice chiefly to the Fire
“ and Water; to the Fire, dry Wood, whose Bark “ they take off, after having covered it with the “ Fat of Lard, and poured Oil upon it. They “ kindle it, not by blowing, but by making wind
“ with a Kind of Fan. If any one blew, or threw “ any Filth into it, he was to be punish'd with “ Death. Their manner of sacrificing to the Wa“ ter, continues Strabo, was thus. When they come “ near a Lake, a River, or a Fountain, they make “ a Ditch, and there strangle the Victim, taking “ great care that the Blood spurt not out as far as “ the Water; for then all would be defiled. After “ this mixing the Flesh with Myrtle and Laurel, VOL. II. H “ the

(1) L. 15. p. 732. (2) Herodotus gives the same Name, otherwise writ, to Venus Urania.

(3) A Circumstance not mentioned by Herodotus.

(a) Casaubon has restored the true reading, by substituting Prayers, Preces, for the Word Imprecations, which Xilander had used in his Translation.

“ the Priests order them to be burnt ; and after some “ Prayers they pour Oil and Milk mix’d with Honey, “ not upon the Fire nor the Water, but upon the “ Earth. While the Priests are saying Prayers, “ which last a considerable Time, they hold in “ their Hand a bundle of Tamarin. In Cappa- “ docia, where are to be found a great Number of the “ Persian Magi, who are called Pyretbi, they strike
 “ not the Victim with a Knife, but knock it down “ with a Club.” This Author, as we see, con-founds the Religion of the Persians, of whom he had heard, with that of the Magi of Cappadocia whom he had seen, and with whom he had conversed.
 What I am going to quote from him concerning the Fire-Temples, only respects the last.

• The Fire-Temples, which he calls πυρατρία, were,
 • according to him, large Inclosures, in the middle whereof was an Altar. There the Magi preserved the Fire with the Ashes, and went thither every Day to offer up their Prayers with the Bundle before mentioned in their Hands, and their Head covered with Mitres, whose Strings hung down over their Faces and Lips. This especially was the Practice in the Temple of Anaitis and Omanus; for these two Divinities had their Temples, and the Statue of the Latter was carried with a great deal of Pomp and Ceremony. This, says Strabo, is what I have seen myself (1). What he adds afterwards about the Veneration which that People had for Water, wherein they durst not even wash their Hands, far less the Bodies of the Dead, nor throw any Filth into it, this he owns he had from others.

But not to insist on this, we may observe by the by, that Strabo seems to contradict himself in the Passage we have now quoted; for after he had said in the Beginning, that the Persians had neither Temples, nor Statues, he mentions afterwards both the Temple, and Statues of Amanus and Anaitis; but we may

(1) See what is said of Omanus and Anaitis in the following Chapter.

may justify him, by saying that the first Part of his Narration is to be understood of the ancient and primitive Religion of the Persians, who had then neither Temples, nor Statues; and that the last Part respects the Times when they had altered the Purity of the ancient Worship. The first Part seems to be copied from Herodotus; in the Latter the Author delivers what he himself had seen four hundred Years after: Now 'tis no Wonder if in that Interval the ancient Religion of that People had undergone some Change. The Fact itself is not to be doubted, since Clemens of Alexandria (1) asserts, upon the Authority of Berosus (2), that the Persians, after a long Course of Years, had begun to pay divine Worship to human Statues; a Practise which was introduced by Artaxerxes the Son of Darius and Father of Ochus. It was he, continues that Author, who first erected at Babylon, Ecbatana, and Susa, the Statue of Venus Tanais, and by his own Example taught the Persians, the Bactrians, and the People of Damas and Sardes, that this Statue was to be worship'd as a Goddess.

'Tis true this Author seems to contradict Herodotus, who reports, as we have seen above, that the Worship of that Goddess was known in Persia in his Time, even when there were no Statues of the Gods in that Country; but 'tis very possible that this Worship had been introduced before, and that the Prince, whom Clemens of Alexandria names, added to it Statues of that Goddess, as Strabo has said of those of Omanus and Anaitis. But let that be as it will, I believe it was very late before the Persians had Temples and Altars: Hence doubtless the Fury which Xerxes exerted against the Temples of Athens which he burnt: 'Tis indeed very credible that he intended to revenge himself upon the Athenians, by destroying whatever they held most sacred; but would he not also revenge the Injury done to the Gods, whom he thought

H 2

(1) In Protrep.

(2) B. 5. of his Chald.

thought affronted by the Nature of that Worship which was paid to them in Greece?

The Greek Philosophers reasoned a great deal upon this ancient Religion of the Persians; and tho' I will not warrant their Allegories, yet I cannot choose but take some Notice of them. After this Manner then did Celsus discourse of it, as we learn from Origen (1). We see, says he, in the Doctrine of the Persians, and in the Mystery of their Mithras, the Symbol of two celestial Periods; namely, that of the fix'd Stars, and Planets, and that of the Passage which the Soul makes thro' the Latter. This Symbol is a high Ladder, which reaches even to the eighth Gate. The first of these Gates is of Lead, the second of Pewter, the third of Brass, the fourth of Iron, the fifth of mixt Metal, the sixth of Silver, the seventh of Gold. The Persians attribute the first to Saturn, Lead denoting the Slowness of that Planet in performing its Revolution: The second to Venus, to which they compare the Softness and the Lustre of Pewter: The third, which is firm and solid, to Jupiter: The fourth to Mercury, because Iron and Mercury are good for general Use, and of vast Service to the World: The fifth, which is of a mixt and unequal Nature, to Mars; The sixth, which is of Silver, to the Moon; the seventh of Gold, to the Sun. But is not all this too subtle and refined for the Genius of the ancient Persians?

According to the Doctrine which Zoroaster had taught, Plutarch, explaining the ancient Opinion of the two Principles, the one good, which was Light, the other bad, the Principle of Darkness, says, the ancient Persians added a third which they termed Mithras. They invoke, continues that Author, the God Pluto and Darkness, after this Manner. Having pounded in a Mortar the Plant called Omomi, they intermix with it the Blood of a Wolf just sacrificed, and carry this Composition into a Place of obscure Darkness, where the Sun never shines. Besides
this,

(1) L. 6. contra Celsum.

this, they have a Notion that some Trees and Plants belong to the good Principle, and others to the Bad ; and that among the Animals, the Dogs, the Birds, and the Hedge-hogs, are subject to the Dominion of the former of these two Principles ; and that all such Animals as live in the Water, belong to the latter. Oromazes, according to them, continues Plutarch, is sprung from the purest Light, and Arimanius from Darknefs ; and these two Principles have always been at War with one another.

Such are the Testimonies of the Ancients with Respect to the Religion of the Persians. We might add others to them, but these are sufficient. Only we are to remark, that, notwithstanding the Variety that we find among them, they all agree at least in this, that this ancient People paid Adoration to the Sun and Fire. This is even what the learned English Author, mentioned at the Beginning of this Chapter, allows ; but at the same Time he asserts, that all these Authors are mistaken, when they say that the ancient Persians had Temples and Statues ; but that learned Gentleman has not allowed himself to consider, that admitting the Worship of the Guebres at this Day to be as refined as he would have it, yet the primitive Religion of that ancient People may possibly have received several Changes, as we have proved, and may have been improved in after Ages by some of the Magi. The Changes that had befallen that same Religion from Herodotus to the Time when Strabo lived, fully prove that others may have happened to it. But this whole Persian Mythology will be better unfolded in the History of the God Mithras, whom I shall speak of at full Length.

ARTICLE I.

M I T H R A S.

Mithras, an ancient God of the Persians, was not well known in Europe, till his Worship was brought to Rome; which happened according to Plutarch (1) at the Time of the Piratick War. A. U. C. 687. 'Tis from this Epoch, but more especially from the Time of the second and third Century of the Christian Æra, that the Worship and Mysteries of this Divinity were celebrated at Rome. Van Dale, who contends that the Worship of Mithras was not known in Greece and Rome till after the Coming of Jesus Christ, had undoubtedly not considered this Passage in Plutarch's Life of Pompey.

'Tis beyond doubt that the Romans took Mithras for the Sun, and worshipp'd him as such; this is evident from the Inscriptions that are upon Monuments representing this Divinity; Deo soli invicto Mythræ: to the invincible God Mithras the Sun. This Epithet invincible is frequently given to the Sun upon other Monuments, and it denotes that Luminary to be the first and as the Lord of all the rest. It would be needless to cite the Greek and Roman Authors, who assert that this God represented the Sun: All of them agree to it; and their Sentiment being conformable to what we learn as to this from the Inscriptions transmitted to us by Antiquity, leaves no room to doubt of it. Herodotus however, whom we have quoted above, alledges that among the Persians, Mithras, whose Name he writes without the Aspiration, was Venus Urania, and subjoins that they had received his Worship from the Assyrians and Arabians, the former of whom called him Mylitta, and the latter Alitta. But we follow the common Opinion, which makes that God the Sun, which is incontestible, as to the Greeks and Romans at least.

'Tis

(1) Life of Pompey.

'Tis a Misfortune that the Monuments of Mithras we have remaining, and which are very numerous, were all done in Italy, and that we have no Persian Figure of that God: For I don't think he is to be found among those which Chardin, and after him Cornelle le Brun copied at Chilminear, which is reckoned to have been the ancient Persepolis. Some Antiquaries, however, think he is to be seen in three of those Figures, representing three Men with long Beards standing upright, having upon their Heads a kind of Bonnet, resembling a Turban  at the Top. These three Priests plunge a Dagger into the Belly of three Animals, thought to be a Lyon, a Griffin and a Horse; as to the two first there is no Dispute; as to the third, it appears plainly from the Head and Feet to be a Horse, but the Tail is different from that of that Animal.

If the God Mithras was thus represented by the Persians, the Romans, who derived from them his Worship and Mysteries, must needs have considerably changed the Manner of characterizing him; for we have now extant several Monuments of that Divinity; which bear little or no Resemblance to that which we have now describ'd. Those Monuments were mostly dug up at Antium, now Nettuno, and have been learnedly explained by Mr. Della Torrè, since Bishop of Hadria (1). We find some others in the Justinian Gallery, and in other Antiquaries; and together with these some Inscriptions in Gruter. All these Images resemble one another, only with this Difference, that some bear more Figures than others.

The first, which also appears the most compounded, was in the House of Octavio Zeno. It represents a young Man with a Phrygian Bonnet, a Tunick and a Cloak which rises out fluttering from the left Shoulder. This young Man holds his Knee upon a Bull that is stretch'd on the Ground, and while he holds him muzzled with the left Hand, with his Right he plunges a Dagger into his Throat (a).

HI 4 him

(1) Monum. vet. Antii, Romæ 1700 in 4to.

On the right Side of this Monument are two Youths, whose Habits and Caps are like those of Mitbras, who is upon the Bull. Each of these young Men holds a Torch, the one rais'd up, the other with the lighted End directed downwards to the Ground. A Dog comes up to the Throat of the Bull, as to lick the Blood that flows from the Wound. Near the Dog is a Serpent stretch'd at its full Length and without Action. A Lyon couchant by the Serpent, appears there likewise without any determined Action. Under the Belly of the Bull is a Scorpion grasping the Privities of the Bull in his two Claws. Before the Head of this Animal is a Tree, to which is fastned a lighted Torch, whence hangs the Head of an Ox. Behind Mitbras is a Tree with a Scorpion, and a Torch, whose lighted End is turn'd downwards. Higher up over against the Head of Mithras is a Raven.

The upper Part of this Bas-relief is also very singular. 'Tis a Series of Figures upon the same Line, whereof the first is a radiant Sun with Wings, in a Chariot drawn by four Horses, which appear in violent Agitation, and look towards the four quarters of the World: Near the Chariot is a naked Man, round whom a Serpent twines with four Wreaths from Foot to Head. After this you see, three flaming Altars, and between those Altars three large square Vials; then another naked Man, intertwined like the first, by a Serpent: This last has Wings, and a Pike in his left Hand: The next Thing is four Altars, with as many Vials. The Moon in her Chariot drawn by two Horses, that appear exceedingly fatigued, closes the Scene. She stands erect in her Chariot with Wings, and the Figure of a Crescent upon her Head.

I have

(a) See this Figure and the others in Montfaucon's Antiquities. Tom. 1. p. 373 of the French. And in the Work of M. Della Torre.

I have described this Bas-relief most minutely, because it contains almost whatever is upon the rest. In all of them you have a young Man cutting a Bull's Throat, with some Symbols, tho' in smaller Quantity ; only with this Difference, that upon one of the other Bas-reliefs, which is that of the Villa-Borghesa, upon the Thigh of the Animal we have this Inscription, Soli Deo invicto Mithræ, and near the Place where Mithras plunges the Dagger into him, these barbarous Words Nama Sebezio. Thus, by explaining this Figure, we shall come to an exact Knowledge of what is represented upon the rest, which may be seen in the Antiquaries.

The bare Description of the Figures, that represent Mithras, evidently declares that they refer to the Sun; to his Power, and to his Influences. Statius, in an Invocation which he addresses to that Luminary, and his learned Commentator, have very well comprehended this Mythology.

*Adsis, O memor Officii, Junoniaque arva
Dexter ames ; seu te roseum Titana vocari,
Gentis Achemenice ritu, seu præstat Osirim
Frugiferum ; seu Persei sub rupibus antri,
Indignata sequi torquentem cornua Mithram* (1).

“ O Sun, be propitious to me——whether “ you chuse to be invoked under the Name of “ refulgent Titan, or of fructifying Osiris, or under “ that of Mithras, when, in the Caves of Persia, “ he presses the Horns of the Bull, disdaining to “ follow him.”

Lucretius (2), explaining this Passage, says, the Persians were the first who worship'd the Sun in Dens and Caves, and that to denote the Eclipses of this Luminary : That the Bull, whose Horns Mithras holds with one Hand (which tho' it is, in some Monuments, yet it is not in that which we have described) denotes the Moon, who scorning to follow her Brother, goes before him, and hides his Light ;
but

(1) Theb. l. 1. in fin.

(2) In lib. 1 Th.

but the Sun, by that violent Action, shews his Superiority over that Planet : Some of the Ancients were of Opinion that the Bull signified the Earth, and that the Dagger which Mitbras plunges into his Throat, intimated that the Sun by his Rays penetrated the Surface of the Earth, and render'd it fruitful. That the Sun was look'd upon by the Ancients as the Lord and Ruler of all the heavenly Bodies, and that they believed he regulated their Courses, is a Thing undeniable, as we shall demonstrate afterwards by Testimonies from Cicero and Macrobius, if indeed there be any need of proving it. But that the Moon, upon Account of her Crescent, was represented by the Bull's Horns, is what cannot be proved ; far less that the Bull figured the Earth, and that the Action of the Sun, plunging a Dagger into her, is a Symbol of those Beams that diffuse Fruitfulness over all ; these are Allegories too forced and that have no Foundation. I know all that Thomas Hyde, M. Della Torre, and some Antiquaries have said upon this Subject, and think it quite unnecessary to copy them ; but when the whole is laid together I shall give my Sentiments of all these Monuments of Mitbras, who undoubtedly was the same as the Sun, not only among the Persians, but also among the Greeks and Romans.

The last, by whom the Worship of this God was carried farther than by others, had instituted Mysteries to his Honour, as shall be said afterwards ; and it was in the Celebration of these Mysteries, that Mitbras was honoured under the different Symbols which the Monuments represent. There is no doubt but they designed to figure thereby the Course of that Luminary, his Power and his other Operations. I consider therefore the Monuments that we have of that God, not as a Representation of the real Sacrifice of a Bull that was offered up to him, but as a kind of celestial Planisphere design'd to denote the Sun's Force, by painting him in the Attitude of a young Man, thrusting a Dagger into the Throat of one of the strongest and fiercest Animals. This, no doubt, is the Reason why they engraved upon Bas-reliefs the Signs and Constellations. We see, in the Work of Mr. Hyde, upon one of these Monuments, the Crab, the Scorpion, the Serpent, the Dog, the Dolphin, the Arrow, and the Dragon, several Constellations very well designed, and also the Lion and several other Signs of the Zodiack, as likewise the Planets, at least their Symbols.
the

Accordingly, the Arrow may there represent Mars; the Caduceus, Mercury; the Thunder and the Eagle, Jupiter; the Scythe, tho' somewhat less discernible, Saturn; and the Bird which resembles a Pigeon, Venus. These five Planets joined to the Sun and Moon, that are at the Head of the Bas-Relief, form the seven Planets; and indeed it is evident, that they were designed to be represented in this Planisphere, with the Signs of the Zodiack, and some of the Constellations. It was therefore the Heavens, over which the Sun Rules, with Regard to us, that were designed to be represented in the Bas-relief which I am now explaining.

But what is the Import of this Action of Mithras, who, under the Figure of a strong robust young Man, is killing the Bull, as appears in all these Monuments; or who, in another quoted by Mr. Hyde (1), stands upon that Animal, holding a Dagger in the right Hand, and a Globe in the other? My Notion of it is this. The Sun, after having run over the southern Signs, without Strength and Heat during the winter Season, recovers a new Vigour when he approaches our Tropick, at the Beginning of Spring; he first passes thro' the Ram, and entering into the Sign of the Bull begins to put forth his Strength which is mark'd by cutting the Bull's Throat. Then it is indeed that Nature assumes new Vigour; for, according to Macrobius, the true Spring is what Virgil describes, when the Sun enters into the Sign of the Bull:

Vernum.

(1) De Rel. vet. Pers. 113.

*Vernum tempus jam obtinet, cum, dicente Virgilio, Candidus auratis aperit cùm Cornibus Annum
Taurus, &c.*

This, to mention it by the by, is the Reason of putting upon the Leg of the same Bull, the Inscription, Deo Soli invicto Mithræ; an Inscription repeated upon the Altars of that God, and upon other Monuments that represent him, with some little Variation, as Soli invicto Mithræ, Numini invicto Soli Mithræ ara, &c. All this pointed out that the Sun who subdues that Sign, was from that Time to diffuse Heat and Fruitfulness over all, and to raise Mankind to the Hope of a plentiful Harvest, as James Gronovius observes in his Explication of these Figures. This Fruitfulness is designed yet more plainly upon one of these Marbles, where the Tail of the Bull has at its Extremity Ears of Corn. The other Figures that accompany these Monuments of Mithras are easy to be explained. The Crab, gnawing the Privities of the Bull, denotes his Eagerness, his Haste, to thrust out that Sign, the Sun being to travel thro' him very soon after. The Serpent stretched out below the Figure of the Lion, is Serpentarius, which occupies so great a Space in the Heavens. The other Signs of the Zodiack are there, to point out that the Sun is to run thro' them during the Summer. The Lion, which was one of the particular Symbols of Mithras, (as appears from an Antique, whereon he is represented under the Figure of a Lion, with his Star, and this Inscription, Leo Mithriacus) ought especially to be there, as he is indeed, because the Sun is in his greatest Strength when he enters into that Sign; and in the Marble which we are explaining he is above the Crab, because in Reality the Sun enters into that Sign when he leaves this. The other Stars and Constellations are there also, as they ought to be in a celestial Globe (a).

The

(a) Besides Mithras's Lion, we have now been speaking of, we find other Figures of that God with the Symbol of the same Animal, and one of them very singular, which Father Montfaucon has

The two young Men, whose Habit and Head-dress are like those of Mithras, the one of them holding his lighted Torch aloft, while the other turns his towards the Ground to extinguish it, are certainly, as Antiquaries are unanimously agreed, the Symbols of the Sun rising and setting, and 'tis needless to insist longer upon this. The same Way are we to explain the two Torches; the one lifted up, and the other lowered to the Ground, which in one of the Monuments of Mithras are fastened to two Trees, the one before, and the other behind the Bull slain. As little is it to be doubted that the two Stars that are upon the Head of the young Men, we have been speaking of, in a Marble explain'd by Gruter (1), are the Morning and Evening Star, as says that learned Antiquarian upon one of those Marbles quoted by Thomas Hyde (2). The young Man holding the Torch aloft, is standing, and he ought to be in that Attitude, since he is to carry Light over the Earth. He who is extinguishing his Torch, is sitting, and appears quite overcast with Sorrow, to signify that his Light is going to disappear; and that Men are in Pain and Uneasiness while the Earth is wrap'd up in Clouds and Darkness.

Of the two Trees, to which the Torches are fastened, the one upon the right Side of the rising Sun has only Leaves, while the other, by the setting Sun, is loaded with Fruits; by which are represented the Spring Time and Autumn.

The Sun in his Chariot, at the Top of the Marble, whose Horses appear panting, marks the Sun at Noon, and in all his Strength; as the Moon, likewise in her Chariot, (whose Horses seem so tired and spent that one of them is even lying down) signifies that has quoted in his Travels to Italy, representing Mithras under a human Form, with a Lion's Head, having four Wings upon the Shoulders, and holding a Torch in either Hand, one of them more elevated than the other. The Lion, in short, was so common in the Mysteries of that God, that they were sometimes nam'd Leontia.

(1) P. 24.

(2) Rel. vet. Pers. p. 113.

that she is eclipsed by the Sun, and obliged to hide her Head.

The two Figures entwined with Serpents, point out the Obliquity of the Ecliptick ; which may be confirmed by a singular Monument, whereof Montfaucon has given a Draught, on which you see the Signs of the Zodiack cut by a Serpent, which wreaths itself around it with many Spires (1).

The Altars and Vials, that form a Kind of Cornice at the Top of the Marble, informs us of what Use they were in the Mysteries of Mithras, that were always accompany'd with Sacrifices.

The Raven that is to be seen upon the same Monument, is to be considered as a Bird consecrated to the Sun, or to Mithras, as we are assured by all the Ancients it was. Even the Priests of Mithras were stiled Coraces, that is Ravens, and Hierocoraces, or sacred Ravens, because this Bird was consecrated to that God ; as also they were called Leontici, because the Lion was his particular Symbol, as has been now said.

The other Figures of Mithras, exhibited by the Antiquaries, may be easily explained. Montfaucon in his Travels through Italy has two of them very remarkable. The one, whereof something has been said in the preceeding Note, represents a Man with a Lion's Head, whom a Serpent, after having twined about his Neck and Shoulders, overtops by the whole Head : Superat Capite & cervicibus altis (2). This Figure has four Wings, two whereof fall down to the Earth, and the other two are raised towards Heaven. Out of the Lion's Mouth proceeds a long Fillet that hangs waving in the Wind. The other Figure is mounted upon a Globe ; the Serpent wreaths around it from the Bottom of the Globe, till it surmounts the Head, and then winding about to the Face, thrusts its Head into the Mouth of the Figure. This Figure has also four Wings disposed in like Manner with the Former, that is, two let down and two two elevated; but instead of Torches it holds two Keys in its Hands. These two Figures are unquestionably the God Mitbras. Several Authors assure us he was represented with a Lion's Head, as we learn from Tertullian (1) and from St. Jerom (2). Lactatius too, whom we have mentioned before, tells us that Mitbras in a Persian Habit, had a Lion's Head, adorned with a Tiara, and that he grasp'd the Horns of a Bull with his two Hands; upon which 'tis proper to remark by the by, that altho' we find Figures of this God with a Lion's Head, as are the two which I explain, yet he is not so represented on the Monuments where he is killing the Bull.

(1) Ant. Epl. T. 1.

(2) Virgil Æn. l. 2.

But to proceed, the other Symbols of these two Figures may be thus explained. The four Wings denote the Rapidity of the Sun's Course; the two that are lifted up to Heaven, point out his rising, and the two that are let down his setting: The Serpent entwining those Figures, signifies the Obliquity of the Ecliptick, whence that Luminary never deviates; the Keys in the Hands of one of the Figures, denotes that the Sun opens and shuts the Gates of Day, and is Lord of Nature: In fine, the Globe beneath its Feet marks the World, round which that Luminary revolves, scattering his Light and benign Influences over our whole System.

We may Remark, before we go farther, that upon a Marble in the Justinian Gallery, and upon two others, the one whereof is quoted in Mr. Della Torre's Work, and the other in Beger, the Figures of Mithras cutting the Bull's Throat are winged, as also the Figure of the young Man bearing a lighted Torch; which only confirms what we have advanced, that thereby was intimated the Rapidity wherewith the Sun makes the Round of the World. There are also some other Variations as to these ancient Monuments, which are perhaps owing to nothing but the Caprice of the Artist. Thus sometimes the young

(1) Apolog.

(2) Ep. ad lætam.

young Men who bear the lighted Torches, have them both turned up, sometimes again both turned downward: Sometimes too he of the two who we said represents the rising Day, is behind the Bull, while the other representing the setting Sun is before.

This I think is the most probable Explication of all the Symbols that accompany the Figure of Mithras (a); unless you will rather choose to say, that this God appears in the middle of the Figures, mounted upon a Bull whose Throat he is cutting, while the two other young Mithras's are there, the one before, the other behind, to denote the Rising, the Setting, and Mid-day or the Time when the Sun is in his greatest Strength: Which is very well expressed by his Action upon the Bull, one of the strongest and boldest Animals.

I shan't dissemble however that there are Mythologists who will have the Bull to point out the Moon, and the Sun holding that Animal by the Horns, his seeming to force that Planet to follow him; as Statius seems to have had in his Eye in this Verse.

Indignata sequi torquentem cornua Mithram.

Or, which comes much to the same, that by this Symbol were meant that the Sun is the Ruler of all the heavenly Bodies, and the Regulator of their Motions. Martianus Capella, speaking of the Sun, says:

Nam medium tu curris iter, dans solus Amicam

Temperiem superis, compellens atque coercens

Sydera sacra Deum, cum legem cursibus addis (1).

Cicero, speaking of the same Luminary, calls him the Conductor and prime Ruler of all the rest: Dux, Princeps & Moderator Luminum reliquorum (2): Which Macrobius thus explains, Sat. c. 20. “The “ Sun, says he, is called the Ruler of the rest, be“ cause by him their Courses are regulated; so that “ when

(a) You may consult the Work of M. della Torre, who explains all these Symbols of Mithras very learnedly.

(1) De nupt. Phil. l. 2.

(2) Somn. Scip.

“ when they are removed from him to a certain “ Distance, he forces them to return the Way they “ came, and approach towards him.”

Of all the Marbles that represent Mithras, there is only one, (that which is taken from the Borghese Vineyard) that has the Inscription Deo soli invicto Mithræ, wherein there is no Difficulty; but there are above it, upon the Bull's Neck, near the Place where Mithras is stabbing him with the Dagger, these two Words, Nama Sebesio, that have put all the Antiquaries to the Rack. The more reasonable own them to be quite unintelligible; however, that my Readers may not be deprived of the Conjectures of the Learned, I shall deliver some of their Notions upon this Subject. Gruter has only remark'd that they were two Persian Words, but has not explain'd them. Bulengerus (1) contends for our reading Nannæ Sebesio, and immediately after Deo Mithræ: And consequently he concludes that the Word Nanna, is a Persian Name of Mithras.

But allowing that it was easy to write an M instead of two NN, and that consequently Nama had been put for Nanna, yet it will not be a Name of Mithras, but rather one of Diana's Epithets, who was surnamed Nannea, and goes under this very Name in the Book of Maccabees: And as several Mythologists alledge that the Bull upon the Bas-reliefs, I am now explaining, designs the Moon, who was the same as Diana, the Inscription would consequently run thus, To Nannea, and to the Sun the invincible Mithras; But what shall we then make of the Word Sebesio, which was never given to Diana, but either to Jupiter, or more especially to Bacchus or Dionysius, who was the Sun?

The learned Bishop of Hadria whom I have so often named in this Article, and who was the first that publish'd this Inscription, after having owned it to be a profound Riddle, has however explained it very learnedly. Saint Epiphanius, says he, (2)

VOL. II.

I

observes

(1) De Mag. L. 1. c. 4.

(2) C. 4. p. 194.

observes (1), that the Pharisees had expressed in Hebrew the Names of the Gods of Greece, and he quotes by Way of Example that of the Sun, whom they called Hamma and Semes, wherein Father Pata-vius is agreed with him. Now 'tis easy to see the Resemblance of Hamma or rather Chamma to Nama, and that of Semes to Sebes, whence the Sebasius or Sebesius has been formed: Thus these two Words come out to be the Name of the Sun, with his Epithet Sebasius, written after the Manner of the Persians, and repeated upon the Thigh of the Bull, Deo soli, &c. The learned Prelate confirms his Conjecture from this, that the Basilidians had introduced into their Mysteries, whereof those of Mitbras made a Part, several barbarous and foreign Words: And 'tis indeed true, as shall be said afterwards, that the Mysteries of Mitbras were never more celebrated than in the Time of those Hereticks.

The Author of a Treatise upon the Cistophori (2), after having given the various Opinions of the Learned upon these mysterious Words, adheres to those who, by the Word Sebesius, thought we were to understand the same as Sabasius, an Epithet given to the Sun; but thereby he only explains half of the Inscription.

I should not mention the Opinion of Olaus Rudbek, which is altogether void of Probability, but that it gives Occasion at the same time for this Remark, that we must always be on our Guard against those, who upon embracing a System, use all their Endeavours to reduce every Thing to it. Accordingly this learned Man, who was fond of referring to Sweden his own Country, and to the Countries about, all the Antiquities of Greece, thought to find the Explication of the barbarous Words of the Inscription, in the ancient Language of the Scythians, and according to him they signify, the Name of the Ox is Goddess Earth (3). Those perhaps who fancied

(1) L. 1. Her. 16.

(2) Father Panel the Jesuit.

(3) Atl. 3. pat.

fancied that these two Words were the Name of him who consecrated to Mithras the Marble on which they are, are hardly more reasonable than this Swedish Author.

Some learned Men have taken these two Words to be Persian ; and, had they been pleased to explain them, they might have saved the Antiquaries no small Trouble ; for nothing is more suitable than Words of that Language, upon a Bas-relief representing the God of the Persians ; but Mr. Thomas Hyde, who has composed a very learned Treatise upon the Religion of that ancient People, and who was so skilled in the Knowledge of Languages, has not however ventured to give any Explication of this Circumstance.

Maffei, not satisfied with these Conjectures, offered a new one in the Academy of Belles-Lettres. First of all he remarks the Place where the Words in Question stand : They are not after the Inscription Deo soli invicto Mithræ, where however there was room enough to insert them ; they must not therefore be read continuedly, as if they were new Epithets given to the Sun besides that of Invincible. They are upon the Neck of the Bull, and just in the Place where the Blood flows plentifully from the Wound which Mithras gives him : Their Design who wrote them in this Place was therefore to point out, either the Name, or the Property of the Thing near which they are engraved. What then is their Meaning ? Nama Sebesion, in good Greek, imports August Spring, New Liquor, Sacred Fluid. Could any Thing be put there more suitable to figure the Action of Mithras, who is cutting the Bull's Throat ? It may be objected, says M. Maffei, that the last Letter is wanting in the Word Sebesion : But that is because there was not room enough for it, or that it is defaced ; or, in fine, that it was written upon the Knife itself, near which is the last Letter save one, but in so small a Character that it cannot be read. For, in fine, adds he, if it were there, the Word would incontestably be Greek. But, continues he, tho' it be true that the Word Nama is Greek, and signifies a Liquor that flows, can we in like Manner be assured that Sebesion, which is not to be found in any Lexicon, belongs likewise to the same Language, and signifies Sacred, August? May we not say, answers he, that this Word is form'd from the Verb $\Sigma\epsilon\beta\omega$, veneror, adoro, colo? From thence has come $\sigma\epsilon\beta\acute{\alpha}\sigma\mu\omicron\varsigma$, $\sigma\epsilon\beta\acute{\alpha}\sigma\iota\omicron\varsigma$. We find in Suidas, the Word $\sigma\epsilon\beta\acute{\iota}\sigma\alpha\varsigma$ cultus, perhaps we ought to read $\sigma\epsilon\beta\acute{\eta}\sigma\alpha\varsigma$, whence 'tis easy to derive the Sebesion. To admit the Verbs, and not to admit the Noun which is derived from them, would be to admit veneror, and reject venerabile.

Such is Maffei's Opinion as to this Inscription. For my Part, I am persuaded that these two Words, Nama Sebesio, belong not to the Greek Tongue; the latter especially is visibly the Epithet Sabastus, given to Bacchus, or Dionysius, who in the ancient Mythology was the Sun, whom the Persians named Mitbras. That this Name was given to that God, is a Fact not to be deny'd. To be convinced of it, we need but read Aristophanes, in his Play called the Wasps; Dicodorus Siculus, Book third; Lucian, in the Dialogue intitled the Counsel of the Gods; Suidas, in the Word Zaboi; Cicero, and a Number of other Authors. The same Epithet is also sometimes given to Jupiter, because that God, according to Macrobius, likewise represented the Sun. 'Tis not therefore from the Greek Language that this Word is derived: We must search for the Root of it in foreign Languages, and accordingly we find it in the Sabaoth of the Hebrews, which signifies Militia, exercitus. This Epithet is frequently given to God, who assumed to himself the Name of God of Hosts: $\kappa\upsilon\pi\iota\omicron\varsigma \Sigma\alpha\beta\alpha\omega\theta$, Domini Sabaoth, the Lord of Hosts, because he indeed is the Lord of the whole Armies in Heaven and Earth, and of every Creature. The eastern Nations, who worship'd Bacchus as a great Conqueror, or rather who looked upon that God as the Sun, who rules over the other Luminaries, minaries, and over the whole World, gave him the same Epithet, which belongs to none but the supreme God: And from thence it pass'd into Greece and Italy, either, as Gerard Vossius alledges (1), by Means of the Thracians, and by Orpheus who had himself learned it from the Egyptians or Syrians; or by Means of the Colonies that came from these two Countries into Greece and Italy.

That this Word was quite barbarous with Respect to the Greeks and Romans, is what cannot be doubted, after the Testimony of Aristophanes, who, in one of his Comedies, said they ought to banish out of their Cities the strange Gods, and among others Sebasius. This Comedy, 'tis true, is lost; but the Authority of Cicero who had read it, supplies that Loss; Here is what that Orator says of it (2): Aristophanes, the most facetious of all the Poets of the ancient Comedy, agreeably rallies the new Gods, and the Worship paid them by night, and would have Sabasius and some other strange Gods banish'd the City for ever. Novos vero Deos, &c, in his colendis, nocturnas pervigilationes, sic Aristophanes, facetissimus Poeta veteris Comediae, vexat, ut, apud eum, Sabasius, & quidam alii Dii, peregrini judicati, e Civitate ejiciantur. This doubtless is the true Signification of the Epithet (a) Sabasius. The Persians give it to their Mithras, who was the Sun, as the Greeks to Dionysius or Bacchus, who among them represented the same Luminary; and the Romans, who had received the Worship of that God from the Persians, and the Names which they gave him, made use of that of Sabasius or Sebasius which is found upon the Marble now in Question. And what tho' we find the Name differently spell'd in the Ancients, since it was derived from a Language they understood not? But if you chuse rather with the learned Bochart (3), to seek for the Root of Sabasius

I 3

(1) De ort. & progr. Idol. l. 2. p. 140.

(2) De leg.

(a) The same Name was also given to Jupiter as appears by this Inscription: Q. Nunnius Alexander donum dedit Jovi Sabasio.

(3) Chan. L. 1. & 18.

sus in Saboe, a Hebrew Word signifying to be drunk, and which consequently of right belong'd to the God Bacchus, I shall not oppose it: This Epithet will then have the same Signification as that of Methymnius which is also given to Bacchus, and it will make nothing for Maffei's Explication. As to the Word Nama, it is certainly one of the Names of Diana or of the Moon, who, according to Herodotus, was adored by the Persians, and by ancient Authors was named either Nana or Anaitis. We ought not to puzzle ourselves with the Fault of the Engraver, who has put Nama for Nana. Those Faults are common to Artists, and M. Maffei has also occasion for this Resource, for his Sebesion, where the last Letter is wanting.

What undoubtedly led him to frame this Explication is, that these two Words happen to be immediately adjoining to the Blood that flows from the Wound which the Bull has received; but, in order to give it some Probability, the Marble ought to have been the Expression of a real Sacrifice, whereas it is only the Emblem of the Sun's Power over the Earth; a celestial Planisphere, whereon are in part the Stars, the Constellations, and the Signs of the Zodiack, in the middle whereof the Sun presides, as the most powerful and the Lord of all the Rest, as has been already said. This is the Notion which the learned Mr. Hyde had of these Representations; it was, says he, designed to represent the System of the World, such as Zoroaster imagined it to be, and which the Greeks and Romans, from whom we have received these Bas-reliefs, had themselves taken from the Persians: Mitbræ figuræ quas exhibemus, videntur esse tales, quas Mathematicæ effinxerat olim Zoroastres, quæ non fuerunt cultus ergo, sed ut per eos Philosophicæ & Mysticæ repræsentaretur Systema hujus Mundi (1).

I know Cælius Rhodiginus, upon those Verses of Statius which we have quoted, ending with these Words, Torquentem cornua Mithram, seems to say the

(1) Hyde p. 115.

the Poet alludes to the Sacrifice of a Bull that was offered up to Mitbras, Mithræ simulacrum, says he, Leonis rictum præ se ferebat cum tiara, utraque manu bubula premens cornua, qui Bos mox immolandus.

But this Author is mistaken, since 'tis certain, from the Testimony of all the Ancients who have spoke of Mitbras, that they offered Horses to him, and not Oxen or Bulls (1). The only Example that can be cited in Favour of it, is drawn from Stobeus (2), after Agatharcides of Samos, who in his Pericks reported, that Agefilaus, the Spy of the Greeks, having slain Mardonius instead of Xerxes; and having been taken and carried before that Prince, while he was offering up a Bull to the Sun, he obliged him to thrust his Hand into the Fire that was upon the Altar: After it was burnt off, Agefilaus presented the other, but Xerxes, struck with this Instance of unshaken Courage and Resolution, would not carry his Revenge any further, but dismiss'd him. But besides that we may be sure the Religion of the ancient Persians was much changed in the Time of that Prince's Reign; this Example does not destroy the general Custom, of sacrificing only Horses to Mitbras, and far less proves the Action of that God, who is plunging a Dagger into the Bull's Throat, to be the Expression of a real Sacrifice, where the Blood of the Victim would have been shed. Are the Gods represented as themselves sacrificing the Victims which are offered to them? This itself may convince us that these Characters express not a real Sacrifice, but the Sun's Force that subdues the fiercest of Animals.

We have also in the Justinian Gallery a Bacchick Mitbras, of a very singular Nature, and quite different from the rest. It is a young Man naked, without Arms, with the Persian Bonnet, holding in his right Hand a Cluster of Grapes, towards which he turns his Eye. He is accompanied with two young Mitbras's, one of whom holds the Torch aloft, the other

I 4

(1) Philos. in Vita Apol. Thya.

(2) Pag. 7.

other lowers it towards the Ground. He has by him a Bow, an Arrow, a Quiver, and apart is the Dagger, wherewith in the other Bas-reliefs he slays the Bull, together with the Word Nama. Now in this Place sure it cannot signify Blood, nor any other Sort of Liquor.

Upon this Principle, I reckon we may explain the Nama Sebesio, by supposing First, That the Artists in transcribing the former have put an M, instead of two NN. Which may easily have happened to a barbarous Word, which was not understood even by those who ordered the Work on which it is, since Workmen have often given false Spelling to the Words of a Language that was in use in their own Time. Secondly, That to do the more Honour to the Gods, it was judged necessary to give them the same Name that they got in the Countries whence they came. Thirdly, We learn from the Ancients that Diana, who was the same as the Moon, had several other Names, as shall be said in the Article where we speak of that Goddess; among others that of Anaitis and Nanna. Fourthly, That there is to be seen, as hath been said, upon Bas-reliefs both the Figure of a Man, who is Mithras or the Sun, and that of a Woman, who is the Venus cœlestis or Diana, each of whom is plunging the Dagger into the Bull's Throat. These Things being supposed, nothing hinders us to be of Opinion that the barbarous Names of the Sun and Moon, were designed to be put upon the Marble I have been speaking of, and that the Inscription ought accordingly to be read: To Nanna, and to Sebasius, or Mithras, the invincible Sun, that is to the Moon and to the Sun. That from Anaitis or Nannea, they formed Nanna or Nama, is a Thing not very hard to believe. Greater Changes have yet happened to Sabasius the Epithet given to Bacchus or to the Sun, since this Name is found written by the Ancients, sometimes Sebesius, Sebasius, and even in Macrobius, Sebedius.

Further, this Explication is different from that of Bulengerus, which I have quoted, in so far as that

Author

Author supposes the Word Nama to have been one of Mithras's Names, whereas it is unquestionably that of the Venus cœlestis, mentioned by Herodotus, or of the Moon, who, as Strabo says, was worshipp'd by the Persians under the Name of Anaitis.

But be that as it will, 'tis proper to observe, that among the Bas-reliefs of Mithras, there are three; the one taken from the Justinian Gallery, the other from Beger, and the third quoted by M. della Torre, where, instead of the young Man slaying the Bull, is a Woman with Wings performing that Operation. In two of these Marbles, are the two young Men bearing Torches, to denote the Morning and the Evening; in that of Beger, there is but one Altar. These three Monuments don't represent Mithras, and I see there neither the Signs, nor the Constellations that are upon the others. We must therefore return to the Sentiment of Herodotus, who tells us that the Persians worship'd, under the Name of Mithras, celestial Venus, whose worship came to them from the Affyrians: For 'tis she undoubtedly, and not a Victory, as Beger was of Opinion, that is represented upon these three Bas-reliefs. Hence we may conclude that the Romans, who had received from the Persians the Knowledge and Worship of Mithras, used also in their Mysteries the Types and Representations of the celestial Venus, worship'd by that ancient People.

We are to observe in the first Place, that the Bas-reliefs we have been now explaining represent Dens and Caves, which are mostly very discernible, because it was in Dens and Caves they celebrated the Mysteries of Mithras, which we shall speak of immediately.

Secondly, That the Worship of Mithras, before it came to Greece and Rome, pass'd from the Persians into Cappadocia, where Strabo, who had travelled thither, says he had seen a great Number of Magi.

Thirdly, That the same Worship had also made its Way into Media, since Lucian, in his Dialogue of of the Counsel of the Gods, says Mithras was a Median God: This Mithras, says he, who wears a Candys (a) and a Tiara, who cannot speak Greek, nor understands even when you drink to his Health.

Fourthly, That when the Persians said Mithras was born of a Stone, they meant either the Fire that proceeds from two Flint-stones struck against each other; semina Flammæ abstrusa in venis Silicis, or that this was the Way they came by the First use of Fire: Which coincides with the Fable related by Plutarch (1), who tells us that Mithras, born himself of a Stone, and desiring to have a Son without the Commerce of Women, had lain with a Stone, whereof he had a Son named Diorphus, or Light.

Fifthly, The Fable importing that Mithras was a Stealer of Oxen which he led into Caves, signify'd, as Porphyry has it (2), that the Sun whom they look'd upon as the Author of the Fruitfulness of all Nature, produced this Fruitfulness in a secret Way. For as Robbers, says that Author, carefully hide the things they have stolen, just so the Heat of the Sun, the Source of Fruitfulness, effectuates it only in a secret and invisible way. But 'tis time to speak now of the Mysteries of this God.

Though his Worship had been brought to Rome in the Time of Pompey, yet the Mysteries of that God were not well known till about the second Century of the vulgar Æra. As the Persians had no Temples, but celebrated the Mysteries of Mithras in Caves, as they had learned from their Legislator Zoroaster, who first, according to the Testimony of Porphyry, chose for that Purpose a Den watered with Springs and cover'd with Turfs, so the Romans, after their Example, celebrated the same Mysteries of that God in Dens and Caves; and though this

(1) De Flum.

(a) Lucian Designs by this Word the Cloak that Mithras sometimes wears upon his Shoulders, in the Marbles we have explained.

(c) De antro Nymph.

this did not appear from the Marbles themselves which we have now remaining, where Mithras is represented in a Cave, with the Symbols I have explained; and though all Antiquity were not agreed about this Matter, as they really are (a), yet the Inscriptions now extant, would leave no room to doubt of it. Accordingly we still see the Names of some of those who had consecrated Caves to that God: Deo soli inuito Mithræ Sosimus spelæum constituit. Spelæum Tib. Claudius voti compos dedit.

The Priests who were initiated into the Mysteries of that God assumed several Names. Thus we find in the Writings of the Ancients (1), they were called Coraces, or Ravens, Hierocoraces, sacred Ravens, Leones, or Leontini, Lions; and the Priestesses Leænæ Lionesses; for Mithras had his Priestesses too, as appears from that Passage in the second Book of Justin, where 'tis said Artaxerxes consecrated Aspasia to the Worship of that God. All these Priests were the Figures of the Animals whose Names they bore: The Leontini alone, as Porphyry seems to insinuate, had a Right to assume the Figures of any Animal they pleased. Hence the Mysteries themselves were called Coracia, Leontica, Gryphia, Persia, Heliaca, &c.

There were stated Days for the Celebration of these Mysteries as for the other Festivals, as appears from an Inscription cited by Chifflet (2), where we are told that Nonius and Victor celebrated the Persica on the Day before the Nones of April (3); the Heliaca, on the 16th of the Kalends of May (4), and the Gryphia on the 8th of the Kalends of the same Month (5). Another Inscription informs us that the Leontica were celebrated on the 16th (6) of the Kalends of (a) Consult the Book of M. della Torre, who quotes many Authorities to this Purpose, among which we find those of Tertulian, S. Justin, Jul. Firmicus, S. Paulinus, saint Jerom, &c.

(1) See Porphyry de abst. c. 6. 18. Jerom. Epist. ad Lætan. c. 51.

(2) De Gemm. Abra.

(3) The fourth of April.

(4) Sixteenth of April.

(5) Twenty-fourth of April.

(6) Seventeenth of March.

of April, and the 5th (1) of the Ides of March; and the Coracia the 6th (2) of the Ides of April: Whence we are to conclude, not only that those Festivals had their stated Days, but also that the Ceremonies of them were different. For why would they have born different Names, on the different Days when they were celebrated? In the second Place, that it was the Priests named Coraces, who presided over the Coracia; the Leontini over the Leontica, and so of the Rest. Those Priests celebrated the different Mysteries, with the Habits that distinguish'd their Priesthood, that is to say, whereon were painted the Animals whose Names they assumed, or that were made of their Skins: Which must needs have presented a ridiculous Spectacle, and very becoming the Extravagance of the Mysteries of Paganism; as we are given to understand by Archelaus, Bishop of Mesopotamia, in upbraiding Manes, who had himself celebrated the Mysteries of Mithras, that he had there play'd the Part of a Buffoon (3).

'Tis almost inconceivable to think what Pains, Tortures and Hardships one was obliged to undergo in order to be initiated into the Mysteries of this God. He who aspired at this Honour was tryed by such severe Impositions that he often sunk under them, and died in the Execution. Nonnus says he was to pass through four and twenty Sorts of Trials. That they might not scare those who presented themselves to be initiated, says that Author, they began with such Pieces of Probation as had the least Difficulty. First of all they made them bath themselves, then they were obliged to throw themselves into the Fire; next they were confined to a desert Place, where they were subjected to a rigid Fast, which, according to Nicetas, lasted fifty Days. After this, continues the Author last quoted, they were whip'd for two whole Days, and for twenty more they were put into Snow: And
having

(1) Ninth of March.(2) Eighth of April.(3) See M. della Torre from whom I have taken all these particulars.

having undergone all these Trials, they were at Length admitted to the Mysteries of Mithras. Among the other Ceremonies of Initiation, they lodged a Serpent in the Person's Bosom who was to participate in the Mysteries of this God; and Arnobius tells us that this Serpent was of Gold. This Animal we know, that renews its Vigour every Year, by changing its Skin, was one of the Symbols of the Sun, whose Heat is renewed in the Spring, when he visits the northern Signs.

Farther, these Mysteries were no less impious than abominable, since human Victims were there offered up, as Porphry insinuates (1). 'Tis true the Emperor Adrian abolish'd the Custom of sacrificing Men, but Commodus restored it, since, according to Lampridius (2), he polluted the Mysteries of that God by Homicide: Sacra Mithriaca Homicidio vero polluit. 'Tis True we cannot conclude, from this Passage, that the Homicide was a real Sacrifice (a); but the Fact which Socrates relates in his ecclesiastick History (3), leaves no Room to doubt but that human Victims were offered up to Mithras, since that Author tells us that the Christians of Alexandria having discovered a Cave a long Time shut up, wherein, according to Tradition, had formerly been celebrated the Mysteries now in Question, as was confirm'd by the Name of the Place called Mithrius, there they found dead Mens Bones and Sculls which they convey'd

(1) L. 2. de abst.

(2) In ejus Vita.

(a) I say we cannot conclude from this Passage, that Commodus had offered up a Man to Mithras: Since among the other Tryals of the Initiated, there was one whereof I have made no mention, tho' Tertullian takes Notice of it, and that was to affright him who desired Admission into the Mysteries, by presenting to him the Point of a Sword, as if he was really going to be stabb'd, so that it might happen that Commodus actually put the Person to Death. This doubtless is what happened upon this Occasion, and what makes Lampridius add immediately after the Words I have quoted, cum illic, (that is in these Mysteries) aliquid ad Speciem Timoris, vel dici, vel fingi soleat.

(3) L. 2. c. 2.

vey'd thence, to show them to the People of that great City.

These Mysteries, I say, were no less impious than abominable. Accordingly, to gain them the more Credit in the first Ages of Christianity, the Time when they were most in Vogue, they would needs imitate therein the holy Rites of the Christians, chiefly Baptism, and the Mystery of the Eucharist; and for that Purpose they threw Water upon the Initiated, and presented them with Bread and Wine; in order, said they, to regenerate them, and give them a new Life. I shall cite in Proof of it Tertullian only, tho' we are told the same Thing by many other Authors: Per lavacrum, says he, Mithra signat illic in Frontibus Milites suos, celebrat Panis Oblationem, & Imaginem Resurrectionis induit, &c (1).

We may remark before we be done with this Article, on which I have been pretty full, that the principal Feast of Mithras was that of his Nativity, which a Roman Kalendar placed on the 8th of the Kalends of January, that is the 25th of December, a Day on which, besides the Mysteries that were celebrated with the greatest Solemnity, were likewise exhibited the Games of the Circus, that were consecrated to the Sun, or to Mithras. 'Tis true the Kalendar does not name this God, but only says, 8 Kal. Jan. n. Inviæti, that is to say, the Day of the Nativity of the Invincible; but the Learned have very well judged from the Epithet of Inviæti, so often applied to him in Inscriptions, that Mithras is here intended.

We must not however imagine from this particularity either that they affected to celebrate that Festival the same Day that the Church celebrates that of the Nativity of Jesus Christ; far less say with Father Hardouin that the Christians in the West, upon Account of that Feast, transferred to the same Day that of Christmas, which, according to him, they celebrated before in the Month of September. For the learned Bishop whom I have so often quoted in this.

(1) L. 1. de Baptismo, ch. 5.

this Chapter, demonstrates that the Feast of Jesus Christ's Nativity was always fixed by the Latin Church to the 25th of December. The only Reason the Romans had for fixing the Day of the Nativity of Mithras to the same Day, was taken from Physiology and Astronomy. They intended thereby to signify that the Sun, after having been at a Distance from our Hemisphere since the autumnal Equinox, approached towards it, and comes after the Winter Solstice to fructify and warm this other half of the Globe. For 'tis by no Means to be doubted, after what I have said in explaining the Bas-reliefs of Mithras, that there were many Physical and Astronomical Ideas intermix'd with the Attributes of that God.

In fine, we may observe that the Worship of Mithras made great Progress in after Ages, and pass'd into several Countries. This Strabo asserts as to Capadocia, as has been already said: It was also known in Greece, and Pompey brought the Knowledge thereof to Rome, whence after having spread thro' Italy, it was propagated to the other Provinces of that vast Empire. This is what the Marbles and Inscriptions that we find in so many different Places, undeniably prove. For not to mention those that have been discovered at Antium, at Naples, at Milan, and in several other Cities of Italy, as may be seen in Gruter; nor that, which according to M. Spon (1), was dug up at Lyons, others have been found among the Daci (2), in Pannonia, where Aurelius Justinianus rebuilt a Temple of that God; among the Norici, a People in the Neighbourhood of Carinthia. What we said, but a few Moments ago, from Socrates and Sozomen, proves that the Egyptians, and the People of Alexandria in particular, worship'd the same Divinity. S. Epiphanius speaks of a Priest of Mithras in the Island of Crete (3); Thus 'tis not to be doubted but that the Worship of this God was very extensive. It likewise continued very long, and was not destroyed when the Emperors

(1) Recher. d'ant, Diff. 3.

(2) Gruter. p. 34.

(3) Hær. 42.

rors embraced Christianity, since we have Inscriptions, where mention is made of those who celebrated these Mysteries in the Time of Valens, and of young Valentinian, Anno 376, as appears by the Consulates that are there specify'd (1). At Length this Worship was quite abolish'd by Means of Gracchus Prefect of the City Rome, the Year of Jesus Christ 378, as is proved by the learned Bishop of Hadria.

ARTICLE II.

Of some other Gods of the Persians; of those of the Parthians, Cappadocians and Armenians.

The Gods of the People now named, except those of the Persians, are very little known to us, and the Ancients speak of them only occasionally: It is even highly probable that these People had received their Religion from the Persians, wherein each of them had made some Changes of their own. Accordingly, the Goddess Anaitis, and the Gods Ananus and Anandratus, whom we shall speak of in this Chapter, and who were worship'd by the Medes, Lydians, and Armenians, came originally from Persia, as Sirabo asserts.

But before we enter into the History of these Gods, something must be said of the Goddess Sakea, because I take her to have been the same as Anaitis. Among the Divinities of the Pagans, there is none so little known as this Goddess. The Ancients make no Mention of her; but as they mention a Feast called Σακεία Sacea, celebrated both by the Persians and Babylonians, as shall be said afterwards, the Interpreters of Scripture think they have found the Name of that Goddess in Jeremiab (2): The Prophets Words are these. Thus saith the Lord, take the Wine Cup of this Fury at my Hand, and cause all the Nations to drink it. ————— And Sefack the King shall drink it with them. And he adds in another

(1) See M. della Torre, p. 244.

(2) Cap. xxv. v. 15, 26.

another Place : How is Sesak taken ? How is Babylon become the Astonishment of all Nations ?

All the Interpreters, who agree that in these two Passages Sesak denotes both the City and the King of Babylon, are persuaded that this Sesack was one of the Babylonish Divinities; and that Jeremiah designed to represent the City itself by the Name of that Divinity ; a Thing common enough with the Prophets, as we have proved from that Passage of Isaiab, where it is said (1) : Bel is bowed down, Nebo stcopeth : For there is no Doubt but the Prophet intended by these Expressions to point out the Fall of Babylon, and that of the Moabites. Grotius is even of Opinion that Mizak, or Mesback, the Name of one of Daniel's Companions, was compounded of the Name of this Divinity ; which appears probable enough, since it was pretty common, as was noticed before, to join the Names of the Gods to those of the Kings, and of private Persons too. This same Custom was in Use among the Jews, as appears from the Names of Jehonatas, Jehosaphat, Ezekiel, and some others.

This is all that can be said to prove the Existence of this Divinity : As for the Festival Sacea or Sakea 'tis better known. This Festival lasted five Days, and during the whole Time of its Celebration, the Masters served their own Slaves, as in the Saturnalia. Berosus and Ctesias, who had been a long Time in Persia, mention this Festival, as we learn from Athenæus. “ Berosus, says this Author, (2) tells us, “ in the first Book of his History of Babylon, “ that on the Sixth of the Month Lous, they celebrate “ in that City the Festival called Sakea, which lasts “ five Days, during which the Masters obey their “ Slaves ; one of them whom they call Zoganes, is “ dress'd in the Robes of a King, and acts as if “ he was really the Master of the Family.” Ctesias speaks likewise of this Festival in the second Book

VOL. II.

K

of

(1) C. 46. v. 1.

(2) L. 4

of the History of Persia. Chrysoſtom (1) undoubtedly makes mention of the ſame Feſtival, which he calls the Feſtival of Sackcloth. Don't you remember, ſays he, the Feaſt of Sackcloth celebrated by the Perſians; in which they take a Man condemn'd to Death, ſet him upon the King's Throne, and after having made him taſte all Sorts of Pleaſures, ſtrip him of his Royal Apparel, then ſcourge, and then hang him?

Strabo is the only Ancient who ſeems to lead us to the true Original of this Feſtival, and at the ſame Time teaches us to what Divinity it was conſecrated: And as he muſt needs have been fully inſtructed in the Cuſtoms and Religion of the People who celebrated this Solemnity, having himſelf been born in Cappadocia, I ſhall deliver what he ſays of it (2).

“ Among the Scythians who lived near the Caspian “ Sea, there were ſome called Sacæ. Theſe Sacæ
 “ made Excuſions into Persia, and penetrated “ ſometimes ſo far into the Country, that they “ came even to Bactria and Armenia, and made “ themſelves Maſters of a Part of that Province, “ which they called after their own Name Sacaſene,
 “ whence they advanced next into Cappadocia,
 “ which borders upon the Euxine Sea. One Day
 “ as they were celebrating a Feſtival, the King of “ Persia having attack'd them, gave them a total “ rout. The Perſians, to perpetuate the Memory “ of this Victory, raiſed a heap of Earth upon a “ Stone, whereof they formed a ſmall Mountain “ which they ſurrounded with Walls, and built in “ the adjacent Ground a Temple which they con-“ ſecrated to the Goddeſs Anaitis, and to the Gods “ Amanus and Anandratus, who are the Genii of “ the Perſians; and in Honour to them they inſti“ tuted a Feſtival called Saca, which is ſtill cele“ brated among thoſe who inhabit the Country of “ Zela; for this is the Name they give to that “ Place.”

The

(1) Orat 4. de Reg.

(2) L. 11.

The same Author, who compiled different Relations, gives another Account of this Fact a few Lines after, attributing to Cyrus this Victory, and the Institution of this Festival. They who contend for its having been celebrated by the Babylonians in the Time of Jeremiab; and before Cyrus, alledge that this second Account given by Strabo cannot be sustained; but is not this what we call begging the Question? I am rather of Opinion that the Prophet gives the Name of Sesak to the King of Babylon, and to the City, for some Reason whereof we are ignorant; that there never was a Divinity of that Name; and that she in whose Honour the Sakea were celebrated, was the Goddess Anaitis, whom we have mentioned at the Beginning of this Chapter. The Truth is, the Persians were hardly known before the Time of Cyrus, and therefore 'tis to that Heroe we must attribute the Victory over the Sacæ, mentioned by Strabo.

But in what class of Divinities are we to reckon Anaitis, Amanus or Omanus, and Anandratius, whom the Author I have now quoted makes mention of in several Places of his Work, and reckons in the Number of the Gods of the Persians and Cappadocians? There is no doubt but they were physical Gods, for we don't find that the Persians admitted any other at first. We have seen that their first Divinities were the Fire, the Sun, the Moon, the Water and the Earth, and that they knew no animated Gods in the earlier Times. Thus the most learned Mythologists have taken Omanus for the Sun, and Anaitis for the Moon. However, Gerard Vossius is not of their Mind. Omanus, says he (1), is always joined by Strabo with Anaitis, who is undoubtedly Venus or Diana; thus that God is not the Sun whom the Persians worship'd under the Name of Mithras; But the Symbol of that God, that is the perpetual Fire, which the Persians preserved with so much Care in their Fire-Temples,

K 2

(1) De Idol. l. 2. c. 9.

Temples, as the true Representation of the Sun, which is the Fire by way of Pre-eminence.

But with all due Respect to that learned Author, his Remark is not just: It proves, on the contrary, that if Anaitis is Diana or the Moon, as she really is, Omanus must be the Sun, who perhaps went under that Name, as well as that of Mitbras, among the old Persians, or rather among the Cappadocians, who had derived from them almost all the Tenets of their Religion. I add among the Cappadocians, for Strabo, as we have already observed (a), confounds the Gods of these two Nations. Plutarch makes it evident that Anaitis was the same with the Moon, since he says in the Life of Artaxerxes Mnemon, that Aspasia his Concubine was appointed by that Prince to be Priestess of Diana, whom the Inhabitants of Ecbatana call Anaitis, that she might pass the rest of her Days in Chastity and Retirement. Were there need of further Proofs in Confirmation of this Truth, I might quote Pausanias, who informs us (1) that the Lydians had a Temple to Diana under the Name of Anaitis.

'Tis true Strabo mentions some Things concerning that Goddess that agree better to Venus than to Diana, or the Moon; since he speaks of her thus: “ The “ Medes and Armenians have a high Veneration for the “ Gods of the Persians; and the latter especially “ worship Anaitis in a very peculiar Manner, to “ whom they have built a Temple in Acilisena, and “ in other Places. They consecrate to that Goddess “ their Slaves, both Men and Women; which is not “ very surprizing: But, which is much more so, the “ Chief of the Nation consecrate to her their Daugh“ ters; who, after they have prostituted themselves in “ Honour of that Goddess, enter into a married “ State, and no Body makes the least Scruple of “ wedding them.

This

(a) See the Beginning of this Chapter.

(1) In Lac.

This Custom has surely a great Affinity with what was the Practice in the Temples of Venus; but 'tis not surprizing that the Armenians and Cappadocians made some Alteration in the Worship of a Goddess, the Knowledge of whom they had from the Persians; far less that they confounded the Worship of Diana and Venus, that is, of the two Planets that went by these Names. Still 'tis certain that Omanus and Anaitis were natural Gods, as were all those of the primitive Idolaters.

But I must not finish this Article, without relating a Passage in History with respect to the Goddess we are now upon: I borrow it from Pliny (1). “ In “ an Expedition which Antony made against Arme- “ nia, the Temple of Anaitis was pillaged, and her “ Statue, which was of Gold, broke in Pieces by the “ Soldiers, which enrich'd many of them. One of “ them who had settled at Boulogna in Italy, had “ the good Fortune to receive Augustus one Day into “ his House, and to give him a Supper. Is it true, “ says that Prince to him during the Repast, that “ he who first struck the Goddess, presently lost his “ Sight, was disabled in all his Limbs, and expired
“ upon the Spot? If that were so, replied the Soldier,
“ I should not have had the Happiness to see Au- “ gustus with me now, since I was the Man who “ gave her the first Blow, which was an advantageous “ Blow to me; for all I possess in the World is ow“ ing to that Goddess; and 'tis upon one of her “ Limbs, my Lord, you sup at Present.”

After all these Reflections, as we have no Knowledge of Amanus and Anandratus but from Strabo, and are only told by that Author that they were Genii among the Persians, Περσικῶν Δαιμόνας, 'tis needless to make vain Enquiries, or to offer Groundless Conjecture about them.

The Goddess Bellona was also highly worship'd at Cappadocia, especially at Comana. There were two principal Cities of that Name; the one in

(1) L. 32. c. 23.

Cappadocia, and the other in the Kingdom of Pontus; they were both consecrated to that Goddess, and observed much the same Ceremonies in the Worship they paid her. The Temple which she had at Comana of Cappadocia endued with a great deal of Ground, was served by a vast many Ministers, under the Authority of a Pontiff, a Man of great Esteem, and of such Dignity, that he stoop'd to none but the King himself, and was commonly taken from the royal Family: His Office was for Life. Strabo, who mentions the Worship paid by the Cappadocians to that Goddess (1), tells us that at the Time of his travelling into that Country, there were more than six thousand Persons, Men and Women together, consecrated to the Service of the Temple of Comana.

As this Author adds (2), that Orestes and Iphigenia were thought to have introduced into Cappadocia the Worship that was paid to Diana in Tauris, whence they came, 'tis probable the Bellona now in Question, was the same as Diana. What confirms my Conjecture is, that the same Author, speaking of the City Castaballa in Cilicia, says (3) there was a Temple of Diana Perasia, where the Priestesses, said they, walk'd Bare-foot upon the burning Coals without receiving harm, and that this was believed to be the Scene of Orestes's Adventure with Diana, surnamed Tauropolis, and that she got the Designation of Perasia because she had pass'd the Sea at that Place (4). I shall not at present examine what Course Orestes and Iphigenia took, when they left Tauris, to return to Greece; but I believe we may take it for granted that they landed in Pontus, where they establish'd the Worship of Diana, chiefly in the City of Comana, whence it pass'd to the other City of that Name, in Cappadocia, and from thence into Cilicia and the neighbouring Provinces.

To confirm this Conjecture, the same Strabo asserts (5) that Apollo was worship'd thro'out all Cappadocia,
as

(1) L. 12. c. 135, & 137. (2) p. 525.

(3) p. 537. (4) See this History Vol. II. (5) p. 537.

as was Jupiter in a peculiar Manner by the People called Venafini (a), among whom was a magnificent Temple, three thousand Priests, and a High-Priest, whose Authority was almost as great as that of the Pontiff of Comana: But as the People now named, had received the Worship of those Gods from the Greeks, I reserve the Account of them for the rest of this and the following Volumes, where I shall discourse of the Gods of Greece and the other western Nations.

'Tis not known whether the Parthians, who succeeded the Persians, had the same Religion with them. 'Tis probable they borrowed several of their Tenets and added new ones of their own. We only know they used to deify their Kings; and Ammianus Marcellinus informs us, (1) that Arsaus, after Death, was placed among the Stars, that is to say, they, after the Example of other Nations, had their natural and their animated Gods.

The great Divinity of the Armenians, as of the Persians, was the Sun, to whom they offered, like them, a Horse in Sacrifice, as we learn from Strabo (2).

C H A P. XIII.

Of the Gods of the Scythians, and some other northern Nations.

TH O' the northern Countries were peopled by a great Number of different Nations, the Greeks who were but little acquainted with them, comprehended them all under the general Name of Scythians, or of Celto-Scythians. By the Former they understood

K 4

(a) These Venafini were, according to Strabo, in Morimene. Pomponius Mela probably speaks of these People under the Name of Morrani; and Isaac Vossius thinks they were the Mariandinyans. See the Remarks upon the 2d Chapter of his first Book of Geography.

(1) Lib. 23.

(2) p. 567.

understood all those who possess'd the northern Parts of Asia; and by the Latter, those who were in the North of Europe. The Religion of those People, who were mostly rambling and unsettled, would be quite unknown, were it not for Herodotus who teaches us some Particularities about it: But then we know not to which of the Scythians in particular we are to attribute what he says.

That Historian, after having spoke at some Length of those People and their Conquests, comes to their Customs and religious Ceremonies (1). “ They offer
 “ no Sacrifices, says he, but to the following Gods.
 “ First, to Vesta; then to Jupiter, and Terra whom “ they reckon the Wife of that God: After those they “ worship Apollo, Venus Urania, Mars, and Her- “ cules, whom all the Scythians take to be in the “ Number of the Gods. Those who are denominated
 “ the Royal Scythians, sacrifice also to Neptune.
 “ They call Vesta, in their Language, Tabiti; Jupiter, “ Papeus; the Earth, Api; Apollo, Etofyrys; Venus “ Urania, Artimpesa; and Neptune, Thamimasades.
 “ They have neither Idols, nor Altars, nor Tem“ ples, except for the God Mars. They offer all their “ Sacrifices in the same Manner, and with the same “ Ceremonies. They present the Victim having the “ two Hind-feet bound together: He who is to of“ fer it up stands behind; and after having taken “ off his Tiara, he strikes it; and while it is falling,
 “ he begins to invoke the God to whom it is offered.
 “ After this he puts a Cord about its Neck, which “ he twists with a Stick, and draws it till it be strang“ led; all this while the Fire is not kindled, nor “ yet has he made any Libation. After having head
 “ the Victim, he prepares himself to dress it; but as “ the Wood for that Purpose is very scarce among “ the Scythians, they separate the Bones from the “ Flesh, put it into Kettles that resemble the Lesbian “ Cups, only they are larger, and by the Help of “ the Bones they make it boil till it be thoroughly dress'd.

(1) L. 3. c. 51.

“ dress’d. When they have no Kettles they put the “ Flesh into the Belly of the Beast, and make it ready “ with the Bones. Then the Sacrificer throws upon
 “ the Ground a part of the Entrails, as the Firstlings “ of the Sacrifice. The Victims are of Oxen and “ other Animals, but chiefly of Horses.”

“ These Sacrifices were destined to the Gods I have “ named ; but there were peculiar Ceremonies for “ Mars. As he was the only God who had Temples “ among them, their Manner of building them was “ to pile Faggots of Vine-Branches one above the “ other. These Temples were three Furlongs in “ Length, and as much in Breadth ; but they were “ not very high. The Roof of them was very “ flat, and form’d a perfect Square. In three Sides “ of the Temple those Walls of Faggots were per“ pendicular, and on the other side the Wall was “ shelving, so that one could go up to it that Way.
 “ On the Top of this Edifice was placed an old “ Sword of Iron ; which served for the Statue of “ Mars, and to this Sword they sacrificed every “ Year Sheep and Horses in greater Numbers than “ to any of the other Gods. After these they sa“ crificed to him a hundredth Part of all their “ Prisoners of War : But this Sort of Sacrifice was “ different from the Rest. After pouring Wine upon “ the Heads of those who were to be offered up,
 “ they put them into a large Vessel, where they cut
 “ their Throats, and then carried them to the Top “ of the Temple, and poured their Blood upon “ the Sword which we have mentioned : This is “ what pass’d in that Place. Below, before the Temple, “ they cut off the right Shoulders with the Arms and “ Hands of those unhappy Victims, and toss’d them “ up in the Air. Then every one retired, leaving “ their Limbs in the Place where they chanced to “ fall.”

Such, according to Herodotus, were the Gods of the Scythians, and the Form of their Sacrifices.
Clemens of Alexandria agrees with this Historian,
 that

that these People offered religious Worship to a Sword (1); and Lucian, without naming the other Gods that Herodotus speaks of, only says (2) they worship'd that Sword, and Zamolxis who was their Legislator. But to illustrate what we have now been quoting, 'tis necessary to add some Reflections to it.

The Greeks, who were little acquainted with the Religion of foreign Nations, imagined the Gods worship'd by them to be the same with their own; and the smallest Resemblance either in the Name or in the Worship, sufficed to persuade them of it. Thus they heard that the Scythians, a warlike Nation, had a religious Veneration for a Sword; and therefore made no doubt but they worship'd their God Mars under that Emblem: They knew that they paid a religious Worship to the Fire; and they needed no more to convince them that they worship'd their Vesta. They probably found some Resemblance between the Worship which that People ascribed to a God they called Papæus, and their Jupiter; between that of Apia and their Goddess Tellus; between Etofsyrus, and Apollo; Artimpasa, and Venus; between Thamimasades and Neptune: And this was foundation enough for their believing them to be the same Gods.

We may say with a great deal of Probability, that the Scythians, after the Example of all the other Nations, had for their first Gods, the Stars, the Earth, the Water and the other Elements: For, to say it once more, these were the primitive Gods of the Pagan World. To these Gods they had given barbarous Names; but these Names are indifferent, and every Nation gave them such as they pleased. We may therefore conclude that they worship'd the Fire, the Sun, the Earth, the Air, the Water; Divinities which the Greeks called Vesta, Apollo, Tellus, Jupiter, Neptunus. Perhaps too that warlike Nation at first had no other God but the Sword;

(1) In Prot.

(2) In Conc. Deor.

Sword; but in Process of Time adopted those of her Neighbours. For in speaking of the Religion of ancient Nations we must always distinguish the Times. We know not well whence the Scythians derived their Original; for doubtless the Reader will not be satisfy'd with that which Diodorus gives them (1): “The Fables of the Scythians, says he, give Account that they had among them a Virgin, born of the Earth, who had the Head and half of her Body of a Woman, but from the Waist downward the Form of a Serpent. Jupiter fell in Love with her, and had a Son by her called Scythes, who having risen to great Reputation, communicated his Name to the whole Nation of the Scythians.” But still 'tis certain that this People was very ancient. They did not continue always shut up in the Extremities of the North; but departing thence spread themselves over the higher Asia, and having conquered the Medes in a pitch'd Battle, possess'd themselves of their Country, which they kept for eight and twenty Years, as we learn from Herodotus (2). During this their Abode in Media, the Scythians, no doubt, worship'd the Gods of the Medians; for what uses to be most regarded in conquered Nations is their Religion, which Politics forbid to meddle with. The Worship of the Fire especially was very diffusive: This was the great Divinity of the Persians and Cappadocians, and probably of the Medes too; thus 'tis not surprising that Herodotus has assured us, of their having worship'd Vesta.

True 'tis that learned Historian says (3) that the Scythians had a great Aversion to foreign Customs and Ceremonies, and that it cost Anacharsis his Life, who was slain by King Saulius his Brother, while he was celebrating the Feast of the Mother of the Gods, with the same Ceremonies that the Cysiceni used, to accomplish a Vow which he had made when he pass'd to Cysicum. 'Tis likewise true that Scyles
King

(1) L. 2.

(2) L. 1. c. 104.

(3) L. 4.

King of the Scythians lost his Crown, for having attempted to celebrate the Bacchanalia after the Manner of the Greeks, as we are told by the same Historian (1); but they were not perhaps always so scrupulous, and these same Attempts prove that Endeavours were used to introduce into Scythia, both the Customs and Ceremonies of the Neighbouring Nations.

As Idolatry was always accompany'd with several superstitious Rites, there is no doubt but the Scythians had a great Number of them, as well as other Idolaters; but History has only preserved those that concerned their Sooth-sayers. “ Besides, says Herodotus,
 “ there are among these People Numbers of Sooth“ fayers, who perform their Divinations by Rods
 “ of Willow, whereof they carry Bundles into a cer“ tain Place, and there unite them; then separating
 “ the Rods, they pronounce their Oracles, and there“ after put them together again. As for the Enarii
 “ and Androgyni, who practise the same Art, 'tis “ alledged, continues the Historian, that Venus taught “ them Divination, which they practise by mixing “ between their Fingers Leaves of the Linden Tree, “ which they cut into three Parts. When the King “ of the Scythians is sick, he sends for several of these “ Sooth-sayers, who tell him that some Scythian, “ whom they Name, has sworn by the King's Throne,
 “ and perjured himself. Upon which the unhappy “ Person, who is alledged to be the Cause of the “ King's Sicknefs, by taking a false Oath, is instantly “ brought. If he denies the Fact, other Sooth-sayers
 “ are called, and being convicted, his Head is cut off, “ and his Effects divided among the Accusers; but “ if he is declared innocent, they themselves are put “ to Death in this Manner. They fill a Chariot with “ Faggots, fasten the Sooth-sayers to it with an iron “ Chain; then after having kindled the Faggots
 “ they loose the Oxen that are yoked to the Cha“ riot,

(1) Ibid.

“riot, and leave the Calumniators to perish in the “Flames.”

The Reader may easily believe that we have now no Monument remaining of the Religion of the Scythians, who had no other Statues but the Sword that represented Mars, nor Temples but such as were made of Faggots. Some Antiquaries however think they have found out three Statues of the Gods of that People, in the three Busts born by three Camels upon Theodosius's Column, that is at Constantinople. But tho' it were true, which can hardly be proved, that that Column represents the Triumph of that Emperour over the Scythians, it could not be deny'd but their Religion had undergone some Change from the Time of Herodotus, a thing not without Example in other Nations, as has been observed with Respect to the ancient Persians.

The Scythians, as has been said, consist- The Religion
ed of a vast Number of different Nations; of the People but if we except those who inhabited the of Tauris.
Taurica Chersonesus, that is to say the Peninsula that is between the Euxine Sea and the Palus Meotis, which is at this Day called the Crimee, we are quite ignorant of their Religion. As for those we know they paid Adoration to Diana, whose Worship was performed by a Priestess; and to her they sacrificed all the Strangers who came into their Country; Circumstances we learn from Herodotus, Euripides and several ancient Authors: But I reserve a more particular Account of them for the History of Iphigenia, who was Priestess of the Diana Taurica, under the Reign of Thoas. As the Ancients make no mention of the Religion of the Scythians but upon Occasion of Iphi- genia, and of Orestes who came to Tauris to carry off the Statue of Diana, we know not if they worship'd any other Divinities.

There were also in the northern Countries another People called the Hyperboreans, with whose Religion the Greeks were acquainted by the Report of He- cateus, one of the most ancient Historians; but as I confine confine myself as far as possible, only to what belongs to Mythology, I shall not enlarge upon the History of that People. You may consult two Dissertations, the one by the Abbé Gedoyn, the other by my self, both of them in the seventh Volume of the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres (1).

The Hyperboreans were accounted the most religious People in the World. They paid a peculiar Worship to Apollo, who for that Reason was surnamed Hyperborean, and they sent every Year to Delos, an Island in the Egean Sea, Offerings that they made him of the first Fruits of the Earth. At first there were two or three Virgins chosen, accompanied by a hundred Young Men of approved Courage and Virtue, who carried these Offerings. Herodotus and Callimachus are our Vouchers for both these Circumstances. This Custom continued till the Laws of Hospitality were violated in the Persons of those Pilgrims, which made the Hyperboreans resolve to convey these Offerings from one Hand to another, as far as Delos, by Means of People that were travelling thro' their Country in their Way to that Island, as we learn from Pliny (a), who speaks of those young Virgins without naming them, but other Authors inform us of their Names. Herodotus mentions four of them, Opis and Erge or rather Heca-Eрге, as Callimachus calls her, Hiperboche and Laodice: Callimachus adds a fifth, whom he calls Loto.

After that Disaster had befallen those young Virgins, none of whom had the good Fortune to return to her own Country, as we are told by the Poet now named, the Hyperboreans took a Resolution to send their Offerings in the Manner as has now been said. They had two Ways of going from their own Country to Delos, and both of them are sufficiently described by the

(1) P. 113. and 127.

(a) Virgines ferebant eas frugum primitias, hospitii Gentium per Annos aliquot venerabiles, donec, violata fide, in proximis accolarum finibus deponere sacra eas, instituere, hinc ad conterminos decurrere, atque ita Delum usque, Plin. l. 4. c. 12.

the Ancients. Pausanias (1) says they gave their Offerings first into the Hands of the Arimaspes, that they deliver'd them to the Iffidons, who transferred them to the Scythians, who carried them to Sinope, where were always Greeks who conveyed them to Prasiæ, whence the Athenians took care to transmit them to Delos.

The other Course is described by Callimachus, who, addressing himself to Delos in one of his Hymns, says: To you the Hyperboreans send their First-Fruits: These First-Fruits that come so far, are first received by the Pelasgi of Dodona, who carry them over the Mountains into Melis, whence they are conveyed by Sea to Eubæa, and thence they are easily transported to your Ports. To conclude, these Offerings, which the Ancients call the Firstlings of the Fruits, were Sheaves and Bundles of Corn, and to this all Antiquity agree: In the Meantime, Salmasius (2) alledges it was what we call in Latin Partes Præcisæ, the Parts that are first cut off, as the Firstlings of a Victim; as to which you may consult Cremius who refutes him.

But be that as it will, it appears that the Hyperboreans had a very particular Veneration for Apollo, and if we credit Diodorus Siculus, the Boreades, the Descendants of Boreas, were in Possession of the Priesthood which was united to the Royalty. Where 'tis proper to remark that the Virgins, who were sent at first to Delos, were of the royal and sacerdotal Line, since Callimachus, who names three of them, Heca-ERGE, OPIS and LOTO, calls them the Daughters of Boreas. If it be ask'd now why the Hyperboreans were so devoted to Apollo, I answer with Diodorus Siculus (3), that Latona was born in their Country, and consequently it is no Wonder that they honoured her Son with a peculiar Worship. Accordingly, continues that Historian, not only had they instituted Feasts to his Honour, but also consecrated to him a whole City. “ Apollo again on his Part, as the Abbé Gedoyn has “ it

(1) In Att. c. 31.

(2) Animad in Sol.

(3) L. 2.

“ it (1), reckoning himself a Native of their Coun“ try, vouchsafed to honour them with his Presence,
 “ and took more Pleasure in being with them than “ any where else.

“ Hither he resorted, when banish’d Heaven for “ his Resentment against Jupiter, who had thunder“ struck his Son Esculapius, as we learn from Apollo- “ nius Rhodius, who for that Reason calls the Hyper- “ boreans a sacred People. The Opinion of Apollo’s “ sojourning in the Country of the Hyperboreans was “ so universal among the Greeks, that according to “ Eliau, or rather Aristotle, cited by that Author (2), “ Pythagoras, whose Wisdom and Virtue was admir“ ed by the Crotoniates, was taken by them for “ Hyperborean Apollo.”

The Greeks, who vented several other Fables in Relation to this Apollo, said he came from their Country to the Relief of Delphos, at the Time when that City was besieged by the Gauls, as Pausanias relates. Cicero, tho’ he mentions not the Motive which brought that God to Delphos, yet asserts that he came thither, since in giving the Genealogy of the Gods, as his Manner is, he says: “ The third Apollo was “ the Son of the third Jupiter, and he who is said
 “ to have come from the Hyperboreans to Delphos.”
Tertius Jove tertio natus & Latona, quem ex Hyperbo-reis Delphos ferunt advenisse (3).

As these pretended Demigrations of the Gods, like their Birth in certain Countries, denoted, according to Herodotus, the Institution of their Worship in those Countries, we may therefore infer from this Fable that the Worship of Apollo had been propagated from the Hyperboreans to Greece, perhaps before the Colonies that came thither from Egypt and Phenicia. But whence had the Hyperboreans themselves received the Knowledge of that God? I answer, as I think I have proved in the Dissertation quoted at the Beginning of this Article, that the Hyperboreans,

(1) In his Diff. p. 129.

(2) Var. Hist. l. 2. c. 26.

(3) De Nat. Deor. l. 2. c. 23.

Hyperboreans, who, in my Opinion, inhabited the Country about the Phasis, came Originally from the Colony which Herodotus tells us Sesostris left there; and consequently that 'tis not to be wonder'd if they themselves worship'd Apollo, one of the Gods of Egypt, and communicated the Knowledge of him to the Greeks, from whom they were at no great Distance. But as this is no more than Conjecture, tho' not without some Foundation, I willingly submit it to the Judgment of the learned World.

The Iffedons, in the Neighbourhood of the Hyperboreans, had probably no other Gods but their Ancestors, since Herodotus, who speaks of their Customs and Religion, says, when any one of them has lost his Father, all his Relations bring him a Number of Cattel; whose Carcases having cut into Pieces, they in like Manner cut the Body of the deceased Father, and having mixed all the Fleashes together, serve them up at an Entertainment, reserving only the Head of the Defunct which they set in Gold, and make it an Idol, offering to it solemn Sacrifices every Year (1).

The Sarmatians, after the Example of most other idolatrous Nations, had Gods Gods of the Sarmates. natural, and Gods animated. The first were the Sun and Moon; Pogwid, or the Air; Tessa, or Jupiter; Laeto, or Pluto; Nia, or Ceres; Marzane, or Venus; and Zicuonia, or Diana. But we are to observe that they are Polish Historians (2), who inform us that these Gods were Jupiter, Pluto, Diana, &c. And no great Credit is to be given to their Testimony, since they may easily be deceived by some slight Resemblance between those Gods and the Gods of Greece. This is what most of the Ancients did, when they were to speak of the Gods of other Nations, having, from the smallest Affinity, given them the Names of those of their own Country.

VOL. II.

L

But

(1) Herod. L. 4. (2) Alexand. Guaguinus. Sart. Evr. Paul. Oderb. Vide Voss. de idol. l. 1. c. 29.

But passing that ; besides these natural Gods, the Sarmatians had likewise animated ones, among whom were Lelus and Politus, whom the same Historians will have to be Castor and Pollux : And tho' the Worship paid by the Sarmatians to these two Heroes, was entirely abolish'd, when the Poles, who possess in Part the Country which belong'd to the Sarmatians, embraced Christianity, yet they still retain their Names, which they pronounce in Sign of Joy at their Feasts (1).

But, if you ask the Reason of their confounding these two Divinities with Castor and Pollux, I answer with Vossius, the Sarmatians might have been acquainted with them by holding Commerce with the People settled on the Banks of the Danube ; and since the Greeks had erected an Altar in Honour of Alexander, and the Romans another to Augustus, near the Boristhenes, as we learn from Ammianus Marcellinus, it was easy for either of them to make the Sarmatians acquainted with the two Heroes now mentioned. Thus reasons that learned Author : 'Tis true indeed, not quite satisfy'd with that Conjecture, he would needs insinuate that Lelus and Politus, among the Sarmatians might represent the Heavens and the Earth ; but as he gives no Proof of this, I take the first Account to be the best.

The same Author, upon the Authority of Paul Oderborne (2), says that the People who lived near the River Obi, worship'd a Goddess under the Name of the Old Woman of Gold, and he takes not upon him to determine whether it was Eve her self, or Terra, that was the Object of their Worship. But, however that be, the Historian now quoted tells us that Goddess delivered Oracles. Clemens Adamus (3) informs us as to their Manner of consulting that Goddess. “ When the Country, says he, is afflicted with “ any Calamity, such as War, Pestilence, or Famine, “ those Idolaters have Recourse to that Goddess:
“ They

(1) Loc. cit.

(2) In Vita Joan. Basilidis Mosc. ducis.

(3) In Anglorum Naviga.

“ They prostrate themselves before her Idol, and setting a Drum in the midst of the Assembly, with the Model of a Toad in Silver above it, they fall a beating the Drum ; and he of the Company nearest whom the Toad falls when it is made to leap to the Ground by the beating of the Drum, is put to Death : But they bring him to Life again by some Sort of Witchcraft, and then he lays open the Cause of the Calamity that affects the Country.”

Whether the Getes or Dacians had any Gods of the Physical Gods, is what we cannot determine ; but 'tis certain they paid divine Honours to their Legislator Zamolxis, as Getes, the Daci, and Thracians. may be seen in Plato's Dialogue, intituled Charmides, in Diogenes Laertius (1), in Strabo (2), and in Lucian (3).

The Thracians, besides the same Zamolxis whom they adored as a God, according to Lucian (4), raised to the same Rank Orpheus and Linus, as we learn from Tertullian (5.) By Orpheus, I mean that famous Argonaut, whom I shall speak of more particularly in the History of the golden Fleece. Let it not be said that Orpheus was worship'd only as a Demi-God, since Conon (6) positively asserts that after the Honours due to Heroes had been paid him (a), near the Tomb wherein his Head was contained, the Place grew insensibly into a Temple, where all the Ceremonies of the Worship of the Gods were performed ; a new Argument for what we have already said (7), that the Heroes sometimes became real Gods.

Temesius of Clazomenæ may perhaps be likewise reckoned among the Thracian Demi-gods, since He- rodotus

L 2

(1) In Pyth.

(2) L. 7. and 16.

(3) In Deor. conc.

(4) In Jove Trag.

(5) De Anima c. 2.

(6) Narr. 45.

(a) See in the Beginning of the sixth Volume, what is said concerning the Tombs of the Heroes.

(7) Book 5.

Herodotus tells us (1) that the Teians having led a Colony to Abdera, whereof he was reckoned the Founder, paid to him the Honours due to Heroes. The same Thing may be said of Ordrysus, from whom the Thracians, according to Saint Epiphanius (2), derived their Original; and of Plestorus, to whom, according to the Testimony of Herodotus (3), they sacrificed Oebazus the Persian who had fled to them for Refuge. Vossius (4), who grants that this Plestorus was of the Number of the Divinities worship'd by the Thracians, says he knows not whether he was an animated God or a natural God, but for my Part I take him to have been one of their great Men, of whom however we learn nothing particular in History.

Lastly, The Massagetes look'd upon the Sun as their great Divinity, and perhaps as the only one, and sacrificed Horses to him, as we learn from Strabo (5).

(1) L. 1.

(2) L. 1.

(3) L. 5.

(4) De Idol. L. 1. 49.

(5) P. 553.

MYTHOLOGY and FABLES

Explain'd by

HISTORY.

The Western Deities.

*Of the Gods of the Greeks, and Romans,
and other Western Nations.*

A PRELIMINARY.

AFTER having discoursed of the Religion of the Asiatics, among whom Idolatry commenced, 'tis Time to pass on to that of the European Nations to whom it was communicated by them; and as it made the greatest Progress among the Greeks and Romans, with them we are to begin.

Never was Religion encumber'd with a greater Number of Gods than that of these two Nations; since besides the Oriental, they admitted a World of others who owe their Original to them, and whose Names we have already seen in the Chapter where we have treated of the Progress of Idolatry (1): But before we enter upon the History of all these Gods, 'Tis necessary to make some Reflections, that will be useful in the Sequel of this Work.

L 3

That

(1) Vol. I.

That a Part of Asia Minor, the Isles of the Archipelago, and Greece, were peopled at first by Japhet's Posterity, known by the Ancients under the Name of Japetids, is a Fact not to be doubted. As I shall have Occasion to insist upon this Article, when I come to speak of the different Colonies that came into Greece (1), I shall take it for granted at present. But at what Period of Time did the Descendants of that Patriarch arrive there; what was the Religion they establish'd? These are Questions that cannot now be resolved. Any Accounts we have now extant of those ancient People of Greece, are but loose and confused. We only know from Diodorus Siculus, that the first Greeks were very rude, living without Laws, without Policy, and almost destitute of all Religion. A People straggling and unsettled, who had no other Habitation but the Dens and Forests, and no other Food but Acorns, or to speak more accurately, some wild Fruits and Herbs: This is the Picture given of them by that Author (2).

We may easily conceive that the Religion of those primitive Inhabitants of Greece, was, like themselves, not loaded with many Ceremonies, but consisting in rude Simplicity; and that they were unacquainted in those earlier Times with that Multiplicity of Gods whom they came afterwards to adore. Perhaps the first who settled there, even brought with them the Knowledge of the true God, which was not so soon corrupted in the Family of Japhet, as in that of Cham. These 'tis true are only Conjectures; but they are not without Probability. The primitive Worship however, which Noah had received from his Ancestors, was but of short continuance, and the most ancient profane Authors leave no Room to doubt that the first Inhabitants of Greece and the neighbouring Isles, were plunged into the thick Darkness of Idolatry.

To have a tolerable Notion of their Religion, we must view it under various Aspects: First, Such as it

(1) At the Beginning of the 6th Vol.

(2) L. 1.

it was in the Time of those first Inhabitants, or at least when the Pelasgi came and settled in Greece. Secondly, With Regard to the Alterations that were made in it by the Colonies from Egypt and Phenicia: Thirdly, With Respect to what Changes might be introduced into it by Homer and Hesiod: Lastly, With Regard to those it really underwent, from the Time of Pythagoras, and the Platonick Philosophers, till the Triumph that Christianity gained over it.

First, We know little or nothing about the Religion of the primitive Inhabitants of Greece. Herodotus is the only one has preserved to us some Knowledge thereof. That Author (1) says the Pelasgi, who came in old Times to settle in Greece, worship'd their Gods without knowing who they were, and without having any Names to them. “ They sacrificed to them, “ says he, and before the Sacrifice they had a Custom “ of making Invocations and Prayers, without giving “ their Gods either Name or Surname, because as “ yet they knew them not. Further, they called them “ by the general Name of Gods, because they be- “ lieved that they governed, and were Lords of all “ Things. They came to know a very long time “ after, that the Names of the other Gods had been “ brought from Egypt, but it was very late before “ they learned the Name of Bacchus.”

“ At length they went to consult the Oracle of “ Dodona, which is reckoned the most ancient one “ of Greece, and consequently was the only one in “ that Time. The Pelasgi therefore inquired at “ the Oracle, if they should receive the Names of “ the Gods that came from the Barbarians, and the “ Answer was that they should receive them and “ make use of them. Accordingly they sacrificed “ from that Time, invoking the Gods by their “ Names; and the Greeks afterwards took the same “ Names from the Pelasgi. But to know whence “ each of those Gods came, whether they were from

L 4

“ all

(1) L. 2. ch. 50 & seq.

“ all Ages, in short, what is their Form and how “ they came to exist, these are Things we are hither-
 “ to in the dark about.”

The same Author, immediately before the Words now quoted, had said that the same Pelasgi before they came into Greece, where they were intermix'd with the Athenians, had dwelt in the Island of Samothrace and had taught those Islanders to worship the Cabiri. “ Whoever, says he, is acquainted with “ the Ceremonies of those Gods, that were also ob“ served by the Samothracians, will certainly be of “ Opinion that they had learned them from the “ Pelasgi; for that People, who lived since that “ Time among the Athenians, had formerly inha“ bited Samothrace, and from them the Samothra- “ cians had learned the Orgies.”

The same Pelasgi, according to our Author, had also taught the Athenians their obscene Manner of representing Mercury; and they gave Mysterious Reasons for this Usage, which Herodotus has not told us.

The same Author, in the Book now cited from which I have taken these Passages, makes one Remark more with Respect to the Pelasgi. “ Almost “ all the Names of the Gods, says he, came from “ Egypt into Greece. I my self actually found it “ to be so, after I had examined the Matter for my “ own Information, having heard that they had them “ from the Barbarians. And for my Part I am “ convinced that they really came from Egypt:
 “ But if it be objected that neither the Names of “ Neptune, Castor, Vesta, Themis, the Graces, the “ Nereids, nor of other Gods are there to be found,
 “ I answer with the Egyptians, that they never knew “ those Gods. And indeed to me it would seem that “ those Names were given them by the Pelasgi them“ selves, except Neptune, whose Name that People “ borrowed from the Libyans; for none but the “ Libyans were formerly acquainted with Neptune, “ whom they have always held in Veneration.”

Here

Here then we see the ancient Pelasgi were instructed by the Barbarians, in the Names which they were to give the Gods ; who in their Turn instructed Greece, at that Time very ignorant, and taught her the Names of the same Gods, and the Mysteries of the Cabiri, which they had formerly taught the Samo-thracians. This is all we know of the Religion of Greece, at the Time of the Arrival of the Pelasgi and of their Settlement at Athens.

Secondly, The second Article we are to examine, namely, what Changes the Colonies introduced into the ancient Religion of Greece, is already determined by the same Author, as we have seen, since he assures us that all the Gods who were there worship'd, except those whom we have named after him, came from Egypt. The Colonies who brought the Knowledge of them into Greece, did not all arrive at the same Time, as shall be said in the 6th Volume ; and consequently the Changes that happened to the Religion of Greece, were gradual, and brought about only in different Ages. Herodotus (1), who seems to have carefully examined the Article I am now upon, after the Exceptions I have mentioned, concludes that except the Gods whom he has named, all the rest came from Egypt into Greece.

This Author comes next to some Particulars with Respect to Bacchus, whose Worship was brought into Beotia by Cadmus and Melampus.

“ 'Tis he, in short, speaking of Melampus the Son “ of Amythaon, who made the Greeks acquainted “ with the Name of Bacchus, and taught them the “ Ceremonies of the Sacrifices that are offered to “ him, and the Manner of representing that God.
 “ 'Tis true he did not explain to them the whole of “ this Mystery ; but the Sages, who came after him, “ gave fuller Insight into it. Melampus therefore “ invented the Representation of Bacchus, and the “ Greeks, instructed by him, perform the whole “ Ceremony, as it is now in Use among them, ac“ cording

(1) Loc. cit.

“ cording to his Precepts. For my Part therefore “ I look upon Melampus to have been a very knowing “ Man, skilled in the Art of Divination, and who “ taught the Greeks many Things which he himself “ had learned from the Egyptians, and especially the “ Sacrifice of Bacchus, into which however he intro“ duced some Alteration: For I would not affirm
 “ that whatever is performed in Egypt at the Feast “ of that God, resembles the Ceremonies that are “ observed upon that Occasion among the Greeks.
 “ As little will I say that the Egyptians borrowed “ from the Greeks either that Ceremony, or any “ thing else; but rather I am of Opinion that Me- “ lampus had learned every thing that concerns the “ Worship of Bacchus, from Cadmus and other Ty-“ rians who came with him from Phenicia, into the “ Country that is called at this Day Beotia.”

Here then we have the Worship of Bacchus, or Dionysius, introduced into Greece by Cadmus and Melampus. We know likewise from other Authors that Cecrops had brought to Athens, where he settled, the Worship of Minerva, who was worship'd in Sais, whence he came. The same Prince, if we believe Pausanias (1), regulated the Worship of the Gods, and the Ceremonies of Religion, with a great deal of Wisdom. He was the first who called Jupiter the supreme God, or rather the most high (2). He forbid the offering of any Thing to the Gods that had Life, and regulated the Ceremonies of Marriage.

We have not such Certainty about the Change that might be introduced into the ancient Religion of Greece, by the other Leaders of Colonies; but it is not to be doubted that Inachus, who planted the first Colony there, Danaus and others, likewise brought with them the Knowledge and Worship of their own Gods. Heads of Colonies, tho' they change their Country, don't therefore change their Religion; and when they become Masters of the Countries

(1) In Arcad.

(2) Ὁ πρῶτος.

Countries where they take up their Residence, they endeavour also to establish among them their own Religion and Forms of Worship. But if they meet with Opposition in this Attempt, as it happened to Cadmus, who by endeavouring to introduce the Worship of Bacchus into Beotia, kindled that War wherein Pentheus lost his Life, and which obliged himself to fly into Illyrium, they at least think of a Medium whereby to accommodate their Religion to that of the Country, till having made themselves absolute Masters, they are in a Capacity to establish it altogether.

'Tis therefore by no Means to be doubted, that the Egyptian and Phenician Colonies produced great Changes in the ancient Religion of Greece. I am speaking now of the Times before the Trojan War, not being design'd at present to examine into those that were occasioned in Times posterior to that Event, by the Introduction of several other Gods, whom the Greeks came to be acquainted with at different Conjunctions.

Thirdly, The third Period I consider in the Religion of the Greeks, respects the Time of Homer and Hesiod, who, according to Herodotus, made Theogonies: But this Article is fully explain'd in what I have said about the Theogony of the Greeks, where I have proved that these two Poets were not the Inventors of the Fables and Gods they mention, and that they only followed the establish'd Religion of their own Time (1). It would seem, that Herodotus has not expressed himself clearly, when he says that these two Poets had composed Theogonies. That Hesiod did so is indeed literally true; but as to Homer there is no Appearance of his having designed to reduce into a System what the Greeks thought of their Gods, he having contented himself with giving their received Names, and using them in such a Way as the Construction of his Poems required. But tho' these two famous Poets did not invent the Gods they speak of,

yet

(1). See the Article of the Theogony of the Greeks Vol. I.

yet 'tis certain they made them more generally known than they were before, and gave occasion, especially Homer, for enlarging their Worship; by using the Interpolation of those Gods upon all Occasions, and by representing them as warmly concerned for, and deeply interested in human Affairs; which naturally led Men to fear them, and seek to appease them, when they were thought to be incensed.

Fourthly, The fourth Period refers to the Pythagorean and Platonick Philosophers, who, to make the System of the Greek Theology the more supportable, introduced into it those ingenious Allegories, which abated of its Absurdity, an expedient upon which they especially laid the Stress of their Cause in the first Ages of Christianity, when the Fathers of the Church attack'd Paganism with so much Strength of Argument. These Philosophers indeed made great Alterations in the received Religion of their Time: But what I have said upon this Subject at the Beginning of this Work, and particularly in the general Reflections at the End of the fourth Book, Volume second, is sufficient to clear up this Article.

Besides these Changes that happened at different Times to the System of the Greek Religion, it suffered several others, whereof I shall examine the two principal ones. The first was when, upon receiving strange Gods, the Greeks gave them other Names, as has been already hinted in the first Chapter, which serves as an Introduction to Mythology. Ancient Authors have by good Fortune, given us Notice of those Changes; otherwise how could we have known at this Day the Origin of those Gods. We know from Herodotus that the Apollo of the Greeks was the Orus of the Egyptians; Bacchus or Dionysius, their Osiris; Hermes or Mercury, their Taautus or Tbot; Pan their Mendes; Diana, their Babastis; Demeter, their Isis; Zeus, or Jupiter, their Ammon; Venus or Aphrodite, their Astarte. Plato informs us that Minerva was their Neit: According to Sanchoniathon, their Pluto, or Dis was the Month of the Phenicians; unless we will chuse

chuse rather to say he was the Hephaistos of the Egyptians.

These Changes of Names were common in the Apotheoses, whence the Greeks and Romans came by so many new Gods. The Greeks not only changed the Names of the Gods they received from Egypt and Phenicia, but also their Functions, gave them another Rank than what they held in the Theology of the oriental Nations, and framed their Geneologies as they pleased. Of this I could give several Examples, but I shall content my self with those of Vulcan and Minerva. We learn from Herodotus that Vulcan had the first Rank among the Gods of Egypt: The Greeks however made him the Son of Jupiter and Juno, who, expelled Heaven for his Deformity, broke his Leg in the Fall, and was forced for a Livelihood, to work in the Island of Lemnos as a Blacksmith. In Egypt he was the Husband of Minerva; in Greece he had to Wife Venus, while Minerva pass'd among them for a Virgin Goddess. In Egypt he had a Share in the Government of the World; in Greece, he had only the Command of some Blacksmiths.

Secondly, I attribute to Poets posterior to Homer and Hesiod, the second Change that befel the Theology of the Greeks; and here we must call to mind that Source of Fable, where I proved that they had introduced a great Number of them that were not known before their Time. As it is the Character of Poetry to assume an unbounded License (1), so the Poets, according to their own Fancy, changed the Circumstances of the Fables, most of which had a Connection with Religion; sometimes invented new ones, gave new Attributes to the Gods, or palmed Adventures upon them never known before; and from the great Propensity which People had to believe their Fictions, the System of the establish'd Religion came in time to be stuffed with an Infinity of new Articles. The Examples of these Changes, which I shall give in the Sequel of this Mythology, will will justify what I have advanced upon another Occasion, that if we would explain the Fables right, we must take them from the most ancient Poets. But one of the most considerable Changes in Religion, tho' 'tis of all others the least known, is that which must needs have happened when the Greeks ceased to pay a religious Worship to the Stars. Tho' we are ignorant of the History of this Cessation, yet the Fact is not the less certain. We have proved in the first Book, Volume III. from the Authority of Plato, that the Greeks, after the Example of other Nations, worship'd the Stars and Planets; and at the Time of that Philosopher, this Worship was entirely abolish'd in Greece. Plato even laments that it did not subsist, and seems to wish it had continued for ever.

(1) Hor. de Art. Poet.

As to the Manner how this Change may have happened, I shall give my Opinion as follows. The Egyptians, who likewise worship'd the Stars from the earliest Ages, having deify'd some of their Kings, gave out, as has been said elsewhere, that their Souls were gone to Heaven to be Inhabitants of the celestial Luminaries, or to speak more accurately, to dwell in some of the Planets; as for Example, that of Osiris in the Sun, and that of Isis in the Moon. From that Time they address'd their Worship promiscuously to the Planet, or to the Heroe who resided in it. Cecrops, who brought about so many Revolutions in the Religion of Greece, probably taught them this Point of Theology, and I question not but the same Greeks, who paid a religious Worship to the Planets, for Example to Saturn or Jupiter, confounded it with that which they ascrib'd to the two Princes of the same Name. Then soon forgetting the physical and natural God, they came at length to address their Prayers only to the animated Gods, and that in Times so early, that there does not appear to have been any Vestige of that ancient Worship remaining in Pythagoras's Time. From all these Changes arose a new Religion, the History whereof shall be the Subject of this and the two following Volumes. Thus having before explain'd the Mythology of the Orientals, I shall now describe that of the Greeks and Romans, and some other European Nations, which is so different from the former, that one can hardly imagine the one to have been derived from the other. This Portion of my Work I divide into two Parts. In the first I shall speak of the Gods of the Greeks and Romans, and in the second of those of the other European Nations.

P A R T I.

Of the Gods of the Greeks and Romans.

HERE opens a vast Field and very difficult to survey. The Greeks have blended the History of their Gods with so many Fables, they have so disguised the Oriental Traditions, delivered so many Circumstances inconsistent one with another, that 'tis no easy Matter to find out what were their real Sentiments about their Gods. Sometimes they are physical Beings, the Stars, the Elements; sometimes real Personages that actually existed: Often the same God is either the one or the other. Here are Metaphorical Generations, there true and natural ones. Let us endeavour however to unfold so intricate a Subject the best Way we can.

As among the various Divisions of Pagan Gods, that which distributes them into the Gods of Heaven and Hell, of Earth and Sea is the most natural, this is what I shall follow, with the Addition of an inferior Class of subaltern Deities, as to whose settled Residence the Pagans had not a very clear Conception.

B O O K I.

Of the Celestial Gods.

TH O', accurately speaking, Love was the first of Gods, since Sanctoniathon and Hesiod give him a Place in the first Generation ; however as he was but a purely physical Divinity, namely, the harmonious and regular Union of Bodies blended together in the Chaos, whence sprung all the Productions of Nature ; and my Design being not to insist much upon the natural Gods, but only upon those that are called animated, I shall, in Imitation of the Poets, begin with Jupiter, whom the Greeks and Romans look'd upon as the greatest of Gods, and the Lord of Heaven and Earth : Ab Jove Principium, as Virgil has it, after the Poet Aratus.

C H A P. I.

The History of Jupiter and his Ancestors.

TH E R E appears something very wild in the Idea which the Pagans had of this God, when it is thoroughly examined.

The Philosophers, as we see in many Places of Cicero's Discourses upon the Nature of the Gods, take him only for the more purified Air or the Æther ; and Juno his Spouse for the grosser Air that surrounds our Earth. Those who look'd upon him to be an animated God, or one of those Men who for their illustrious Actions or useful Inventions were raised to divine Honours ; after having considered him as the Sovereign of Gods and Men, as an Almighty God,

God, who with the mere Movement of one of his Eye-brows makes Olympus tremble, degrade him afterwards by ascribing to him the most unworthy Actions, and the most enormous Crimes: He is, according to them, guilty of Incest and Adultery, an ungrateful Son, a faithless Husband, cholerick, passionate and revengeful. What Idea then of the Divinity had the Greeks and Romans, so famed for their refined Genius? They were only the Poets, say you, who gave such a Representation of their Jupiter; but whence had they borrowed it, but from the Theology of their Time, as is proved elsewhere? But another Thing that greatly perplexes the History of this God is, that there were several of the same Name, and the History of the one who was best known, that is, of him who had been King of Crete, was filled up with the Adventures of all the rest.

The Ancients are not even agreed about the Number of those who went by the Name of Jupiter. Diodorus Siculus (1) reckons only two. The one, who was the most ancient, was that Prince of the Atlantidæ whom I have spoke of in the Theogony of that People. The other, who was his Nephew, and who became much more famous than his Uncle, was King of Crete, and extended the Limits of his Empire to the Extremities of Europe and Africa.

Cicero (2) admits three of them. “ Those whom “ we call Theologues, says he, reckon three Jupiters.
“ There are two of them from Arcadia, the one
“ the Son of Æther, and Father of Proserpine and “ Bacchus: The other the Son of Calus, and Fa“ ther of Minerva, who is said to have invented “ War and to preside over it. A third the Son of “ Saturn, born in Crete, where his Tomb is still “ to be seen.”

Where we are to remark by the by, that among the two Jupiters of Arcadia, there was one very ancient. Born of obscure Parents, he raised himself,

VOL. II.

M

and

(1) L. 1.

(2) De nat. Deor. L. 3.

and acquired great Reputation by his Talents, and the Pains he took to civilize the Minds of the Arcadians, who till then led a savage Life, dwelling in the Woods and minding nothing but Hunting. This Jupiter gave them Laws, regulated the State of Marriage, taught them to adore the Gods, and instituted Priests to overlook their Worship. The Arcadians, full of Gratitude to their Benefactor, joined him to the Number of their Gods; and, to conceal his Original as much as possible, they fabled that he was the Son of Æther, that is, of Heaven.

But this was not the most ancient of those who bore the Name of Jupiter; the first of all is undoubtedly the Jupiter Ammon of the Libyans, since probably he was Cham, on whom his Son Misraim, or Meftraim conferred Deification. 'Tis well known, as was said in the first Volume, that this Patriarch and his Family came and settled in Egypt, called in Scripture the Land of Misraim, or of Ammon, No-Ammon. The Jupiter Serapis, worship'd in the same Country, is likewise very ancient, as we have proved in the History of the Gods of Egypt, against those who alledge he was not known till the Time of the Ptolemies.

In the same Rank we may reckon Jupiter Belus, whom we have likewise spoke of upon Occasion of the Temple he had at Babylon, who, according to Herodotus, was the Jupiter of the Assyrians (1). Celus, according to the same Author, was the Jupiter of the ancient Persians (2), wherein he agrees not with the Greeks, who made Cælus or Uranus, to be the Grand-father of their Jupiter.

The Jupiter of Thebes in Egypt, may also be reckoned in the Number of the most ancient ones, since, according to the same Historian, the first Oracle of Greece was founded by a Priestess of that God. But who was this Jupiter? Was he Ammon, one of whose Priestesses founded also the Oracle in

(1) L. 1. c. 181.

(2) L. 1. c. 13.

in Libya; or was he Osiris? This is what we are not told in History.

The Scythians (1) had also their Jupiter, whom they called Pappæus, and his Wife Terra; and hence it appears that they had borrowed the Idea of him from the Persians, and that he was the same with Cælus.

The Ethiopians named this God Affabinus, and the Gauls, not to mention other Nations, Taranus. We have a Passage of Nonnus that informs us in most of these different Names of Jupiter. That God, says he, is called Belus upon the Euphrates, Ammon in the Sands of Libya: He is surnamed Apis at the Foot of the Nile, Chronos among the Arabians, and Zeus among the Assyrians.

We don't pretend to give a compleat List of all who bore that Name, since, according to Varro, and Eusebius after him, they amounted to about three Hundred; which is no hard Matter to be believed, since we learn from the Ancients that in the earlier Periods of Time most of the Kings assumed that august Name; so that we know no Age before the Siege of Troy, at which Time this Custom ceased, when there is not to be found one or more Jupiters. Hence so many different Nations boasted that Jupiter was born among them, and shewed several Monuments to attest it, as shall be said hereafter.

But, what farther proves the Plurality of Persons who went by the Name of Jupiter, is that the Gallantries, which are ascribed to him of Crete, cannot agree to one and the same Person. The Poets make them last four hundred Years; for there is no shorter Interval between the first and the last of the amorous Adventures they relate, after which they make them quit the Stage altogether; upon which Lactantius rallies them agreeably (a). Diodorus Siculus makes these

M 2

(1) Herod. L. 4. c. 57.

(a) Quid ergo est, inquit, quare falacissimus Jupiter defierit Liberos tollere, utrum sexagenarius factus est, & illi Papia Lex fibulam these Gallantries last sixteen Generations, which make near five hundred Years. 'Tis true we have not now the History of those old Intrigues full enough to be able to apply them exactly to each of those Jupiters; but we know as much of them as is sufficient to prove that they belong not to the same Person. Accordingly the Adventure with Niobe the Daughter of Phoroneus, must refer to Jupiter Apis the King of Argos, Inachus's Grandson, who lived near eighteen hundred Years before Jesus Christ. He who committed the Rape upon Europa is Jupiter Asterius the King of Crete, who reigned about the Time of Cadmus, about 1400 Years before the same Era; he was the Father of Minas the first of the Name. He who, according to Diodorus Siculus, had by Electra the Daughter of Atlas, Dardanus, Jasion and Harmione, must have lived about 150 Years before the Trojan War, as shall be said when we come to Priam's Ancestors. He who broke into the Tower of Danae, who became the Mother of Perseus, is the Jupiter Prætus, that Princess's Uncle, who lived 50 or 60 Years after Asterius. He who carry'd away Ganimede, is Jupiter Tantalus, who reigned in the Year 1320 before Jesus Christ. He who was Hercules's Father, be who he will, lived 60 or 80 Years before the taking of Troy. In fine, he who had by Leda, the Wife of Tyndarus King of Sparta, the two Dioscuri Castor and Pollux, was not very remote from the same Epoch (a). Oftimes too it was the Priests of that God, who debauch'd the Women of whom they were enamoured: Thus altho' the true Jupiter had a great number of Children, having had several Wives and several Mistresses, as shall be said in the Sequel, yet we are not sibulam imposuit? An impetravit jus trium liberorum? An tandem illi venit in mentem, ab alio expectes alteri quod feceris: & timet ne quis sibi faciat quod ipse Saturno. Laët. l. 1. 16.

(a) We shall compute these Dates more exactly in the VI and VII Volumes, but at Present greater Precision was not necessary.

not to place to his Account all the Children that were fathered upon him.

These Things being supposed, I shall divide into five Articles all that belongs to the History of Jupiter. In the first, I shall relate his History according to the more common Account. In the second, I shall consider the Tradition which Diodorus Siculus and some others have followed. In the third, I shall explain the Fables that are intermixed with these two Traditions, and I shall especially enlarge upon that of the Giants and Titans. In the fourth I recount and explain the different Names that were given to Jupiter; and in the fifth the different Manners of representing him, and the particular Worship that was paid him.

ARTICLE I.

The History of Jupiter, according to the more common Opinion.

Almost all Antiquity agrees that he was the Son of Saturn and of Rhea. An Oracle delivered by Cælus and Terra, according to Apollodorus (1), having foretold his Father that one of his Sons should bereave him of his Life and Crown; or, according to other Authors, in Consequence of an Agreement made with Titan his elder Brother, who had resigned the Empire to him, but on Condition that he should destroy all his male Issue, that the Succession might one Day return to the elder Line; he devoured them, that is, he took away their Lives as they came into the World; already Vesta his eldest Daughter, Ceres, Juno, Pluto and Neptune had been devoured, when Rhea finding herself pregnant, and being desirous to save her Child, made a Voyage into the Island of Crete (2), where having hid herself in a Cave called Diçté, she was delivered of Jupiter, whom she gave to be nursed by two Nymphs of the Country, named Adrasté and Ida, who were called the Melissæ (3).

M 3

Apollodorus

(1) L. 1.

(2) Apollod. L. 1.

(3) The Bees.

Apollodorus (1) adds that Rhea recommended the Care of Jupiter in his Infancy to the Curetes (2), who dancing around the Cave Diète, and striking their Bucklers with their Spears made Noise enough to hinder the Cries of the Infant from being heard. In the mean Time that Goddess, to beguile her Husband who had heard of her being delivered, caused him to swallow a Stone which she had swath'd about, as if it had been his Son.

When he came to Years, he entered into an Association, says Apollodorus (3), with Metis (a), whose Name imports Foresight, to signify that he discovered a great deal of Prudence in the future Conduct of his Life. It was by the immediate Counsel of this Metis, that he gave his Father Saturn a Potion that caused him to vomit up first the Stone he had swallowed, and then all his Children he had devoured.

As Pluto and Neptune were among his Sons, Jupiter joined with them, made War upon his Father and upon the Titans his Relations. After this War had lasted ten Years, Terra foretold Jupiter that he should gain a compleat Victory over his Enemies, if he could deliver such of the Titans as his Father kept imprison'd in Tartarus, and prevail upon them to fight for him. He made the Attempt, and having slain Campè their Keeper, rescued them from Prison. In the mean while the Cyclops gave to Jupiter the Thunder, which since that Time has been his most common Symbol, to Pluto a Helmet, and to Neptune the Trident. With these Arms, they vanquish'd Saturn; and after Jupiter had used him precisely in the same Manner as he himself had used his Father Uranus, he threw him down to the Bottom of Tartarus with the Titans, under the Custody of the Hecatonchires, that is, of the Giants with the hundred Hands. After this Victory the three Brothers seeing themselves Masters of the World, divided it among them.

(1) L. I. (2) Or the Daëyli of Mount Ida. (3) L. I.

(a) The Poets have made a Person of this Virtue, and feigned that she was the Daughter of Oceanus.

them. Jupiter had Heaven for his Share, Neptune the Sea, and Pluto Hell. Xenophon (1) reckons Chiron in the Number of Jupiter's Brothers, since he too was the Son of Saturn, but by another Mother, whom he calls Nais, and Pliny and Ovid Philyra; but he is not mentioned neither in this Division nor in this War.

In the mean time the Giants, whom we are carefully to distinguish from the Titans, as shall be prov'd hereafter, resolved to dethrone Jupiter, attempted to besiege him in Heaven itself, or Olympus, and for that Purpose piled Mount Ossa upon Pelion. Jupiter, terrified at the Sight of these his Enemies, call'd all the Gods and Goddesses to his Assistance: And as the Goddess Styx, the Daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, was the first who arrived there with her Children, Victory, Power, Emulation and Force, Jupiter was so sensible of the Favour, that he ordained from that Time an Oath taken in her Name, to be the most inviolable of any (a).

After this Manner is the Enterprize of the Giants related from Hesiod (2); but Apollodorus (3) who seems to have compiled some old Chronicle, gives a Detail of Particulars which I cannot omit.

These Giants, says he, the Sons of Cælus and Terra, were of a monstrous Stature, and their Strength was proportioned to that Heighth. They had a wild and dreadful Aspect, long Hair, a great Beard, and appeared to have the Legs and Feet of Serpents. Their ordinary Abode was in the Phlegrean Plains, or according to others, near Pallene. In the Assault they made upon Heaven, they threw whole Rocks, burning Oaks, and other Trees. The most formidable of them was Porphyryon, and Alcyonæus. The latter was to have been immortal while he remained in the Place of his Nativity. He had already distinguish'd himself by other Enterprises, and he is thought

M 4

(1) De Venat. p. 973. (2) Theog. (3) L. I.
(a) See hereafter the History of the infernal Gods.

thought to have been the Person who brought from Erythia the Oxen of the Sun.

What threw Jupiter into the greatest Consternation was a Tradition importing that the Giants were invincible, and that none of the Gods could take away their Lives, unless he called some Mortal to his Assistance. Jupiter having enjoined Aurora, the Moon, and the Sun, not to discover his Designs, prevented Terra who sought to aid her Sons; and by the Advice of Pallas, sent for Hercules to assist him. This Heroe with his deadly Shafts overthrew several times the dreadful Alcyonæus; but like another Antæus, so soon as he touch'd the Earth, he resumed new Strength, and recovered himself. Pallas seizing him by the Middle, carry'd him above the Circle of the Moon where he expired.

In the mean Time Porphyryon attack'd both Hercules and Juno at once, when in order to conquer him with more ease, Jupiter used a Stratagem, which few Husbands would have thought of. He inspired him with Love to the Goddess, of whom he quickly became so desperately enamoured that he was going to offer Violence to her, when Hercules with Showers of Darts, and Jupiter with his Thunder put him to Death.

Ephialtes and Otus his Brother (a), the Son of Neptune and Iphimedia the Wife of the Giant Aloeus, thence named the Aloides, were two formidable Giants. They had a Design especially upon the God of War; but the Former had the left Eye put out by the Darts of Apollo, and the Right by the Arrows of Hercules, and thus was made useless for the Fight. Eurytus who attack'd that Heroe, was killed with a Branch of Oak, while Hecate, or rather Vulcan beat down Clyteus with a Bar of red hot Iron. Enceladus seeing the Gods victorious, took flight, but Minerva stop'd him short by opposing to him the Island of Sicily. Polybctes pursued by Neptune, flying over the Waves of

(a) I shall speak at more Length of those two Giants in the History of Mars and in the Article of Hell.

of the Sea, arrived in the Island of Coos, but the God having pluck'd up a Part of that Isle, buried the Body of the Giant under it, whence was formed the Isle Nisyros. Minerva on her Side having vanquish'd the Giant Pallas, flead him, and arm'd herself with his Skin. Mercury who had put on Pluto's Helmet, slew the Giant Hyppolytus; and Diana him who was called Gracion. The Destinies put to Death Agrius and Thaon. Terra enraged at this Victory, exerted her last Effort, and brought forth the dreadful Typhon, who alone gave the Gods more Trouble than all the other Giants together (a).

After the Overthrow of the Titans and Giants, Jupiter thought on nothing else but to make his Subjects happy. According to Hesiod he was seven times married, and wedded successively Metis, Themis, Eurynome, Ceres, Mnemosyne, Latona, and Juno, who appears to have been the last of his Wives. Not that the Mythologists are agreed about this Article, since some of them contend that the Reason of his marrying Metis, was because Juno was barren. Be that as it will, he had by his Wives and Mistresses, a great Number of Children; and I should forbear naming them, since as has been said, they don't all belong to the same Jupiter; but as they were all or most of them, raised either to the Rank of Gods or Demi-Gods, and as I shall have Occasion to speak of them afterwards, 'tis necessary to give a slight View of their Original. Jupiter having had Recourse to several Plots the better to carry on his Gallantries, this gave rise to so many Transformations mentioned by the Poets, for which I refer the Reader to the last Source of Fable (1), where I have given the Explanation of them.

Transform'd into a Swan he had Castor and Pollux by Leda the Wife of Tyndarus King of Sparta. Changed into a Bull he had Minos and Rhadamanthus by Europa the Daughter of Agenor. By Calisto, Arcas; by (a) See what has been said of this Giant in the 6th Book, Vol. I.

(1) Vol. I. L. I.

by Niobe, Pelasgus; by Lardane, Sarpedon and Argus; by Alcmena the Wife of Amphitryo, Hercules; by Antiope, Amphion and Zetes; by Danae, Perseus; by Jedamia, Deucalion; by Carné the Daughter of Eubulus, Britomartis; by the Nymph Schythinides, Megara; by Protogenia, Æthilius the Father of Endymion, and Memphis who afterwards married Lydia; by Toredia, Arcesilaus; by Ora, Colax; by Cyrno, Cyrné; by Elestra, Dardanus; by Thalia the Gods Palici; by Garamantis, Hiarbas, Phileus and Pilumnus; by Ceres, Proserpine; by Mnemosyne, for whom he had metamorphosed himself into a Shepherd, the nine Muses; by Juno, Mars; by Meia the Daughter of Atlas, Mercury; by Latona, Apollo and Diana; by Dione, Venus; by Metis, Minerva; by Semele the Daughter of Cadmus, Bacchus.

Such was the Tradition which most of the Greek Authors followed with Respect to Jupiter and his Family; but there was another, of no less Antiquity perhaps, and at least as well vouched, which 'tis necessary to relate. This Tradition which represented the Princes of Jupiter's Family, that is, the Titans, as Masters of a great Empire, is chiefly preserved to us by Diodorus Siculus (1), who had himself taken it from Eubemeres, and being conformable to Sanchoniathon, has been set in a fine Light by Father Don Pezron (2) who has, with great Art, drawn together in Support of it all the Passages that are scattered up and down in the Ancients.

ARTICLE II.

The History of Jupiter and of the Titan Princes, according to the second Tradition.

The Scythians descended from Magog, the second Son of Japhet, settled at first in the northern Provinces of the higher Asia; being divided afterwards into different Branches, some of them inhabited Margiana,

(1) L. 3.

(2) Ant. de la Langue des Celtes.

giana, Bactriana, and the most easterly Part of Sogdiana, while others fixed their Residence in Iberia and Albania, between the Caspian and Euxine Seas. Tho' these Nations have frequently been comprehended under the general Name of Scythians, yet they were most commonly called Sacæ. Being overstock'd with Multitudes of Inhabitants more numerous than their Country was able to maintain, they began to look out for new Habitations. Armenia, according to Strabo (1), was the first Province they fell upon; but not being satisfied with the Conquest of it, they advanced towards Cappadocia, and keeping still to the West, they settled in the Countries that are watered by the Thermodon and Iris, where, according to Stephanus (2), they built the City Acmonia, from Acmon the Son of Phaneus who was their Leader. The restless Disposition of Acmon, or rather the Desire of extending his Conquests prompted him to enter Phrygia, where he built another City which he likewise called Acmonia; and having made himself Master of Phenicia and Syria, he died by overheating himself in hunting, and was deify'd under the Name of the Most high: This is the Hypsistos of Sanchoniathon, whom we have spoke of in the Article of the Theogony of the Phenicians.

Uranus, whose Name in the Greek Language signifies Heaven, the Son and Successor of Acmon, married Titæa (a), or Terra his Sister, and had several Children by her, who got the Name of Titans from their Mother, a Name so celebrated in all the ancient Histories, and which has made them pass for the Sons of the Earth. As those Princes were bigger and more robust than their Contemporaries, or perhaps, as shall be said afterwards, because they led a more irregular Life, they were also called Giants; and from that Time the Name of Titans and Giants have been

(1) L. II.

(2) Verbo Acmonia.(a) Sanchoniathon calls her Gue, whence the Earth got her Name in Greek. See the Fragment, Vol. I. B. II.

been often confounded, tho' they ought to be distinguish'd (a).

If we take the Account which the Ancients have given of Uranus, he was so called for no other Reason, but because he had diligently applied himself to the Contemplation of the heavenly Bodies to know their Nature, with the Revolutions, and various Motions of the Stars. The Titans, his Descendants, who ingeniously improved every Thing that was capable of raising that illustrious Race, laid hold of the Advantage they had from the Names of Uranus and Titea, to pass it upon the World that they were the Sons of Heaven and Earth; thinking to make themselves as much respected for this Original, as they were formidable for their Strength and Valour.

Uranus so far surpass'd any Thing remarkable that his Father had done, that he seems to have almost quite defaced from the Minds of Posterity, the Names of those from whom he descended. This Prince pass'd the Bosphorus, carried his Arms into Thrace, and conquered several Islands, among others that of Crete, whereof he conferred the Government upon one of his Brothers, whose Sons were the Curetes. Not satisfy'd with so many Conquests, Uranus fell with Violence upon the other Provinces of Europe; made his Way into Spain, and passing the Straits which separate it from Africa, he over-run the Coasts of that Part of the World (1), whence returning back, he went to the North of Europe and subdued all that Country.

He had several Sons, Titan, Oceanus, Hyperion, Japetus, Chronos, or Saturn, who when they grew up combined against their Father. Uranus being apprized of their Plots, caused them all to be seized, except Oceanus who was always submissive to him. Saturn, either too young to be put in Prison with his Brothers, or rescued by his Mother Titea, set at Liberty his Brothers, who in their turn seizing upon their

(a) See the Reflections that follow this History.

(1) See Dio. l. 1.

their Father's Person, conferred the Empire out of Gratitude upon their Deliverer.

Some of those Tyrants made a vain Attempt to oppose the rising Power of Saturn: Every thing gave Way to him; and Uranus, reduced to the Condition of a private Man, died for Grief, or, if we rely on Sanhoniathon (a), in Consequence of a violent Operation which disabled him from having Children.

Saturn, become Master of a vast Empire, married his Sister Rhea, and, besides the Name of King, assumed the Royal Diadem and Crown. In one of those Imprecations which Wrath suggests to Fathers or Mothers against an ungrateful Son, Uranus and Titea prayed that Saturn's Children might serve him as he had served them; and that Prince looking upon this Imprecation as a Prediction, caused them all to be shut up without Distinction of Sex. Rhea enraged at this Cruelty, found a Way to save Jupiter, and to convey him secretly from Arcadia where she then was, into Crete, where the Curetes his Uncles brought him up in the Caves of Mount Ida. The Poets who have spoke of this Event, veiled it under a Fiction, and said that Saturn devoured his Children as fast as they were born, and that Rhea being delivered of Jupiter, had presented a Stone instead of him to her Husband, who swallowed it.

In the mean time the Titans who envy'd Saturn's Greatness, rebelled against him, and seizing upon his Person, shut him up in close Prison. Jupiter then young and full of Courage, having heard this piece of news, left Crete, defeated the Titans, delivered his Father, and having re-establish'd him in his Throne, returned victorious into the Place of his Retreat. Saturn reign'd thereafter many Years, without any Disturbance to his Tranquillity; but Age bringing on Jealousy and Distrust, he consulted an Oracle which declared that he was in Extremity of Danger from the youngest of his Sons. This was enough to put that Prince

(a) See his Fragment, Art. of the Theogony of the Phenicians, Vol. I. B. II.

Prince upon using all Means to rid himself of Jupiter. He laid Ambuscades for him which he luckily escaped; but seeing himself every Day exposed to new Dangers, he prepared to make a vigorous self Defence, in Case he should be openly attack'd. Accordingly Saturn came to Crete, but was betrayed by those who governed it in his Name, and was forced to make a hasty Retreat into that part of Greece, known since by the Name of Peloponnesus.

Thither Jupiter pursued him, and after having beat him a second Time obliged him to take Sanctuary in Italy, where he was received by Janus. The Titans, then dispersed thro' several Countries of Greece, jealous of the Power of the new Conqueror, as they had been of his Father's; or solicited, as 'tis thought, by Saturn himself, levied Troops and gave him Battle; but being defeated, they retired into the inmost Parts of Spain, where Saturn followed them. Jupiter having set his Brothers and Sisters at Liberty, fought out the Titans in their Retreat, and beat them for the last Time near Tartessos, and this Battle put a Period to that War, which had lasted ten Years. Saturn finding himself no longer secure in a Country where his Son was Master, pass'd into Sicily (1), where he died for Grief, or in Consequence of a cruel Operation, which he himself had performed upon his Father Uranus.

With this last Victory and the Death of Saturn, commenced the Reign of Jupiter. His true Name was Jou, that is to say Young, to denote not only that he was the youngest of Saturn's Sons, but also that he had exceedingly distinguish'd himself by his Exploits in his Youth. The Appellation of Father, Pater, was added afterwards, whence he was called Joupater, and with a little softening, Jupiter (a). Having become

(1) Philoc. apud Clem. Alex.

(a) Several other Derivations are given of the Name Jupiter; but there would be no End were we to insist upon all these Trifles. We shall only observe that Varro derives the Word from Juvon, become Master of a vast Empire, he married his Sister, whom the Latins name Juno, and the Greeks Hera, or the Mistress, and in this he only followed the Example of his Father and Grand-Father.

As it was no easy Matter for Jupiter alone to govern Dominions of so vast an Extent, he distributed them into different Governments. Accordingly we learn from Diodorus Siculus that Atlas governed the Frontiers of Africa. This Prince was the Son of Japetus, and consequently Jupiter's Cousin German, since Japetus was Saturn's Brother. Whether therefore Atlas had siezed upon those Provinces remote from the Center of the Empire during the War of the Titans; or that he had them by some other Title; 'tis certain that this was the Country where he settled, and became so famous that he gave his Name to that Ridge of Mountains that extend themselves to the Sea, and are called at this Day Mount Atlas; and that Part of the Ocean which washes it, is named the Atlantick Ocean: But we shall speak of this Prince at greater Length in another Place.

We likewise learn from the Ancients that Pluto was settled Governor of the western Parts of the Empire of the Titans, of the Gauls and Spain, as shall be said in the History of that God (1). After Pluto's Death his Government was given to Mercury, who therein highly signalized himself, and became the great Divinity of the Celtæ. We are ignorant of the History of the other Governors of so vast an Empire: All we know is that Jupiter reserved to himself the whole East; that is to say, Greece, the Isles, and that Part of Asia whence his Ancestors came (a).

Such

Juven, or Juven's Pater. The Greeks call this God Zeus, and frequently he is called Jovis, which is the Genitive of Jou. The Designation Father, that was given him, was designed to point out his Superiority over the other Gods, as also by the Epithets Optimus maximus, which came to be a Formula added to his Name.

(1) B IV. Of the infernal Gods.

(a) In this second Tradition there is not a Word of the Division of the World among the three Brothers, on the Contrary it appears

Such of the Ancients as had wrote the History of Crete, praised Jupiter highly for his Courage, his Prudence, his Justice, and other civil and military Virtues; and from those Historians, whose Works are now lost, the Greek Authors had taken the Accounts they give us of that Prince. Not content to pass for a Conqueror, we are told, he would needs be also a Legislator: Accordingly he made just and equitable Laws, which he took care to see observed during his Life, by punishing those who did not follow them. He rooted out the pilfering Vagabonds who were cantoned in Thessaly and in other Provinces of Greece; and, besides the Tranquillity which he procured to his Subjects, he laboured for his own Security, since he had fixed his chief Residence upon Mount Olympus, which is in Thessaly. There it was chiefly he kept his Court, when Affairs of State did not oblige him to be away. He very often made a visit likewise to Crete where he had been educated: Happy! had he not sully'd the Glory of his Actions by his too great Attachment to Pleasure. Hence so many amorous Intrigues, the History whereof is transmitted to us under the Image of his Metamorphoses. We have already observed how we are to conceive of those imaginary Transformations; but so far they are true, as he left no Stone unturned to succeed in his Amours.

As there were several Princes that went under the Name of Jupiter, as has been said, so 'tis certain that his History was filled up with all the Adventures that beset those who had usurped it; but 'tis no less true that he gave himself up entirely to Pleasure, and that the Modesty of the most virtuous Women could not screen them from his violent Assaults. These too frequent Pieces of Gallantry put Juno so much out of Humour, that she cheerfully enter'd into a Conspiracy that was formed against him. However he quelled it so soon as it came to light; and appears that Jupiter remained sole Master of the Empire, and gave only Governments to his Brothers and other Relations.

and this was the last of his Exploits. Oppress'd with Old-age he died in Crete, where his Tomb was for a long Time to be seen near Gnossus, one of the principal Cities of the Island, with this Epitaph: Here lies Zan who was called Jupiter. He lived to a hundred and twenty Years, whereof he reigned sixty two from the Defeat of the Titans and the Death of Saturn (1). The Curetes, whom Ennius in his sacred History calls his Sons, tho' they were really his Uncles, took care of his funeral Obsequies (2):

The Empire of Jupiter had the Fate of other great Monarchies, and was not able to support itself in the Splendor which it received from the Titan Princes, whom we have been now speaking of. After his Death his Dominions were divided into a great number of petty Kingdoms, where some of his Successors reign'd; but to them we are mostly Strangers. What we know of the Sequel of this History is of small Moment, and hardly worth the relating. Crete was the Portion of the Empire of the Titans, that subsisted longest. Cres, the Son of Jupiter, reigned there after the Death of his Father (3), and there the Curetes chiefly distinguished themselves by the Care they took of the Affairs of Religion.

However the Ancients have preserved two Facts to us, by which we learn, that some of the Successors of those Princes were still powerful after the Death of the Titans: The first is that Deucalion, the Son of Prometheus, and consequently of the Race of the Titans, settled in Thessaly, and that his Children reigned a long Time in different Parts of Greece: The second, that the Curetes founded in the same Country the Olympick Games that came to be so celebrated in after Ages.

Such is the History of the Titan Princes, and of Jupiter the greatest of the Gods of the Greeks and Romans: A History founded upon ancient Traditions,

VOL. II.

N

autho-

(1) See Suidas on the Word Πῑνος.

(2) Ennius apud Lact. divin. Inst. L. 1. c. 11.

(3) Ennius ibidem.

authorised by Hesiod who gives a full Description of the Generations of that Family (1), by Callimachus, Diodorus Siculus (2), Eubemerus, whose Work Emmius translated into Latin, by Sanctoniathon, Eusebius and Lactantius. We may also add, that Scripture gives us a high Idea of the Titans, since Judith (3) thanking God for the Death of Holofernes, says; 'Tis not one of the mighty Men has taken away his Life; 'Tis not one of the Sons of the Titans, nor of the Giants, but a Woman, &c.

This second Tradition, as we see, is much more probable, and better supported than the former; and Father Pezron, who has improved it so much, has done no more to it than barely to trace and connect together the several Authorities of the Ancients who mention the Power of the Titans; and if he has fallen into any Mistake, 'tis not for having so highly exalted the Power of those Princes, but from a Persuasion that the ancient Celtæ descended from them in a right Line, and that their Language is still spoke at this Day in the lower Brittany, and in some Counties of England.

As to what remains, I don't pretend that I have included in these two Accounts, all the Traditions that were dispersed thro' Greece concerning Jupiter and the Princes of his Family, but I have delivered those that seem'd to me to have most credit. For it appears that there were several others, and Pausanias (4) judiciously observes that it would be endless to recount all the Places that valued themselves upon their having given Birth to that God. The Messeni-ans especially disputed that Honour with all other Nations; they named the very Nurses who had educated him, one of whom had communicated her Name to the River Nedis, and the other hers to Mount Itbome. If we take their Word for it, says the Author now cited, the Curetes, having rescued the young Jupiter from the Cruelty of Saturn, committed

(1) Theog.

(2) L. 3.

(3) Ch. 16. v. 6.

(4) In Messen. c. 33.

ted him to the Care of those two Nymphs, who had the Charge of his Infancy.

They had a Custom of washing him in a Fountain, whose Name keeps up the Memory of the Care that was taken to conceal him (a). 'Tis in Commemoration of that Event, says the same Author, that Water is still brought every Day from that Fountain into the Temple of Jupiter Itbome.

But not to insist on that, as these different Traditions contain several Fables, I shall endeavour to explain them in the following Article.

ARTICLE III.

The Explication of the Fables which the Poets have intermix'd with the History now related.

The Poets, whose Business it was not simply to relate the ancient Traditions which were the Foundation of their Works, embellish'd them with several fabulous Circumstances, as we have fully proved in one of the Sources of Fable. This Principle being laid down, 'tis evident that the older a History was, the more was it susceptible of the Ornaments of Fiction. Accordingly this was the Case as to that now before us, and to this we may refer the Reflection of Philo of Byblos, who after having delivered the Fragment of Sanchoniathon (1), says very judiciously, “ that the Greeks, who in fine Genius excelled all “ other Nations, having apply'd to themselves all the “ ancient Histories, adorn'd and exaggerated them ;
“ who while they aimed at only giving Pleasure and “ Amusement by their Narrations, had composed “ entertaining Fables, whereby they had quite per“ verted ancient History. Hence, continues the “ same Author, Hesiod and the other so renowned

N 2

“ Cyclick

(a) Pausanias says, this Fountain was called Clepsydra, a Name composed of two Greek Words κλέπτω occulto, to hide, and ὕδωρ, aqua, Water.

(1) Apud Euf. Præp. L. i. c. 10.

“ Cyclick Poets have formed their Theogonies, Gigantomachies, Titanomachies, and other Works in which they have smothered the Truth ; that our Ears, accustomed from our Infancy to those Fictions, still retain the Impression, and so the Truth itself, when it comes to be discovered, appears to have the Air of Falshood, while those fabulous Narrations, how extravagant soever, pass for authentick Facts.”

This Reflection of Philo will be justify’d in the Sequel of this Article.

The first Fable intermix’d with the History now given, respects the Manner in which Chronos or Saturn is said to have used his Father Uranus, as the same Usage was also retaliated upon himself by his Son Jupiter. Thus ’tis delivered by Sanctoniathon, with Regard to Uranus. “ Eilus, that is to say, Chronos, in the thirty second Year of his Reign, having laid an Ambuscade for his Father Uranus, in a Kind of Valley, cut off his Privities with a Sabre: It was between Fountains and Rivulets—— The Place is to be seen at this Day where this Event happened.”

The Foundation of what gave rise to the Fable of the Castration of Cælus and Saturn. As these ancient Fictions were alter’d in Proportion as they pass’d from Hand to Hand, Hesiod relating the same Fact, alters the Circumstances of it. “ Uranus, says he, kept his Children close shut up without permitting them to see the Day ; which so afflicted Titæa or Terra their Mother, that she forged a Scythe, wherewith Saturn arm’d himself, and lying in Ambuscade, surprized Uranus while he was going to lie with his Wife, and castrated him.”

Those I know who are of Opinion that the History of the Patriarchs, tho’ exceedingly disguised, is to be found in the Fragment of Sanctoniathon now extant, and particularly Abraham in Chronos or Saturn, will have this Fable to allude to the Circumcision, whereby that Patriarch distinguish’d himself and his Family,

Family, from the other Nations that were about him, and perhaps their Conjecture is not without Foundation. But as I am persuaded that the Ground of the History of the Titans is true, that these Princes founded a vast Empire, and that they ruled over the Earth, to use the Scripture Expression (1), I choose rather to explain the Fable now cited by considering it as a Parable, under which we are given to understand that Saturn's Conduct towards his Father Uranus had killed him with Grief, as he himself died by Reason of his Son Jupiter's Behaviour towards him; or, if you please to take the very ingenious Conjecture of Mr. le Clerc (2), the Meaning of it is, that Saturn had debauched most of his Father's Council, and prevailed upon several considerable Persons, particularly his Brothers, to relinquish Uranus's Party, and join themselves to him. What makes the Conjecture of this Author very probable is, that the Word which Hesiod uses to denote the fatal Amputation which I have mentioned, may equally signify Concilium or Pudenda (3). Thus the Greek Poets reading the History of the Titans, in a Language which they did not sufficiently understand, took this Expression in another Sense than was intended. The Reason of their adding farther that the Scythe which Saturn used was made by Titea herself is, that she being dissatisfy'd with her Husband Uranus, whose repeated Breaches of Faith gave her extreme Uneasiness, had at length formed a powerful Conspiracy against him in Conjunction with Saturn her Son. This undoubtedly is what made Hesiod say, that she had put the Scythe, which she had forged, into the Hands of her Son.

As Saturn was used by Jupiter in the same Manner as he had used his Father; as he not only debauch'd his Troops and his best Friends, but confined himself Prisoner in Italy, so Hesiod makes him die the same kind of Death with his Father; which San- choniathon

N 3

(1) Judith c. 16.

(2) Remarks upon Hesiod.

(3) Μήδεα.

chroniaton does not say. To authorise the Fable which I have now explain'd, it was reported, that the Scythe wherewith Jupiter had castrated Saturn was found in Sicily where he died, and that from thence the Sea Port called Drepanum had taken its Name: But this is but a new Fiction, as is very well remark'd by the learned Bochart (1), having no other Foundation but that the Port now named being of an oval Figure, much like that of a Scythe, they had given it the Name of that Utenfil, which in the Greek Language is called Drepanon (a). The Reason why they represented Saturn with a Scythe in his Hand was either because that God was taken for Time, which wastes and mows down all, or to signify that he taught the Men of his Age the Art of Agriculture: But I take the former Explication to be the more natural, since his Greek Name Chronos, signifies Time.

What was meant by the Fables of Saturn's Prison, and of the Woollen Chains that confined him there.

In the History of the Titans I said that Saturn, to save himself from falling into the Hands of those who had form'd a Conspiracy against him, had retired into Italy where he lay concealed; and here I shall add that this Retreat gave rise to two Fables, which must be explained. The first is, that that Prince was there detained in Prison, but that he was only bound with Cords of Wool; the second, that he had been thrown down by Jupiter his Son into the Depth of Tartarus.

Macrobius, speaking of a Temple which Tullius Hostilius, after having overcome the Sabines and Albans, had built in Honour of Saturn, examines into the Reason why that God was said to have been bound with those Cords; and after he has told us

(1) Chan. L. 1.

(a) Apollonius Rhodius says, that it was near the Island of Corcyra, now Corfu, in the Adriatick Gulf, that the Scythe, now mentioned, was found; but it would be endless to recite all the various Traditions that occur upon each Fable.

us that Verrius Flaccus was ignorant of it, he adds, we learn from Apollodorus that that God was bound the whole Year with Cords of Wool, but that he broke them once a Year, in the Month of December, when the Saturnalia were celebrated (a).

Hence, according to the same Author, was the Origin of the proverbial Phrase, that the Gods had woolen Feet. This Author afterwards explains the Fable now delivered, by saying it figured that the Corns shut up in the Earth where they were detained by Chains soft and easy to be broke, sprung from it and arrived to their Maturity at the End of ten Months. For 'tis true, adds he, that while the Mythologists stuff the History of that God with Fables, the Naturalists reduce those Fictions to a rational Sense (b).

For my Part, without searching into this Fable for the Mysteries of Nature, I believe it teaches us simply, either that Saturn was really free in Italy, or that if he was detained Prisoner, he was so little confined, that 'twas in his Power to procure himself Liberty. Accordingly he did procure it, since we have seen in his History that he retired into Spain, where Jupiter pursued him. Virgil likewise says that Prince left Italy; and we may give credit to that Poet so well versed in the Antiquities of his Country. What we read in Statius is not however without Probability,

N 4

(a) Cur autem Saturnus ipse in compedibus visatur, Verrius Flaccus causam se ignorare dicit. Verum mihi Apollodori lectio sic suggerit: Saturnum Apollodorus alligari ait per Annum laneo vinculo, & solvi ad diem sibi festum; id est mense hoc Decembri: Atque inde proverbium ductum, Deos pedes laneos habere. Macrobius. Sat. lib. 1. c. 8.

The Place where Apollodorus said what we have now quoted, is not to be found in the Remains now extant of that Author, whose Work, no doubt, was more compleat in the Time of Macrobius.

(b) Significari vero decimo mense semen in utero animatum in Vitam grandescere, quod donec erumpat in Lucem, mollibus Naturæ vinculis detinetur. Est porro idem Χρόνος καὶ Τέρονος. Saturnum enim in quantum Mythici Fictionibus distrahant, in tantum Physici ad quandam verisimilitudinem revocant. Idem 16.

bability, namely, that Saturn remained his whole Lifetime in Italy, and that he left his Prison only once a Year : A Circumstance which gave rise to the Feast of the Saturnalia, during which the Masters set their Slaves at Liberty, to figure that Liberty which Saturn enjoyed on the Day he came out of Prison.

However that be, Olaus Rudbek, who in his Atlantick (1) attempts to reduce to the History of Sweden, his own Country, almost all the Antiquities of Greece, offers a Conjecture about the Chains of Wool we have been speaking of, pretty much resembling that of the Naturalists mentioned by Macrobius. He alledges, that Saturn was the same with Boreus, the ancient King of Sweden, and that he was called Saturn, because in the ancient Language of the Country, Sad or Sadar signified all Sorts of Productions. But the Reason why they said he was bound with Chains of Wool, which he only broke at a certain Season of the Year, namely in the Month of July, is that the Snows in Sweden confine the Grains in the Bosom of the Earth, till the return of the Sun, which by melting the Snows, breaks the Chains that held them bound, and procures them the Liberty to grow up and ripen. Then this Author censures Macrobius for saying, after Apollodorus, that Saturn broke his Chains in the Month of December, when the Sun has no Force ; as if he had been obliged to speak of Italy, in the same Way as this Author speaks of the northern Countries.

What Foundation there was for feigning that Saturn was thrown down to Tartarus. The second Fable which I proposed to explain, is taken from Hesiod (2), who says that Jupiter had precipitated his Father Saturn into the Bottom of Tartarus. Apollodorus adds, that Uranus had used the same Violence to the Giants and the Cyclops his Sons. “ Uranus their Father, says he, cast them bound into Tartarus, “ which

(1) Ch. 28.

(2) Theog.

“ which is the most gloomy Region of Hell, and “ is as far below the Earth, as the Earth itself is “ removed from Heaven. It was upon this Occa“ sion, adds the Author, that Titea outrageous at the “ unhappy Fate of her Sons, instigated the other Ti- “ tans to lay Ambuscades for her Husband, and “ gave Saturn the youngest of all her Sons that “ Adamantine Scythe with which he castrated his “ Father. After this Event, continues Apollodorus, “ Saturn, assisted by the other Titans, delivered his “ Brothers; but no sooner was he absolute Master,
 “ than he threw all of them down to Tartarus.”

In order to unfold the Meaning of this Fable, we must know that the Greeks look'd upon the Places situated to the East of them, as higher than those that lay Westward; and hence it was they took the former for Heaven, while the other were taken for Hell. According to this Notion they placed their Hell either in Spain, the Residence of Pluto, as shall be said in his History; or in Italy, and lastly in Epirus, or rather Thesprotia, all of them Countries situated to the West of Greece. Now as the Titans, in the several Conspiracies they formed sometimes against Uranus, sometimes against Saturn, had been obliged to retire into Italy and Spain, hence the Poets fabled that they were precipitated into the Gulf of Tartarus. But we are farther to add, that as their Notion of Tartarus was taken from Tartessos, a River in Spain, as we shall prove in the History of the infernal Gods, 'tis no Wonder that the Titans having been defeated near that River, were fabulously said to be plunged headlong into the Tartarian Gulf.

As Jupiter served his Father with the same Measure as he had served Uranus, this Conduct gave rise to a new Fiction, which is the Sequel of the former; for Fables meet us at every Step we advance in the History I am now explaining. I have observed that Jupiter, forgetting the Service which the Titans his Uncles and Brothers had done him, so soon as he became Master of the Empire, threw them bound Hand and Foot into the Gulf of Tartarus (1), which engaged Saturn in a new Conspiracy. Jupiter in great Perplexity, went to consult the Oracle of Themis, whereby he was foretold that he should gain the Victory so soon as he had set his Uncles at Liberty. To fulfil the Oracle Jupiter with his own Hand slew Campe their Keeper, and gave them their Liberty. After which the Cyclops, who were of the Number of those Prisoners, made a Present to their Deliverer, of the Lightning, the Thunder, and Thunder-bolts. They gave also a Helmet to Pluto, and a Trident to Neptune. With these Arms, the three Princes gain'd a decisive Victory over the rebellious Titans, cast them down a second Time into Tartarus; and for fear of their being again released with the same Ease as they had been when Jupiter slew Campe, he put them under the Custody of those terrible Giants called the Hecatonchires, that is with the hundred Hands.
 came

Tho' these new Fictions disguise the History of the Titans, yet they contain nothing destructive of it, nor difficult to be explained. Those of the Titans who were weaker than the rest, retired into Italy or Spain, and then when their Assistance was needed, they were recalled into Greece; and this was to deliver them from Prison, to rescue them from the Depth of Tartarus. Jupiter having a Mind to keep them for ever from returning, appointed some of his best Troops to guard the Passages; and these are the Giants with the hundred Hands, that is to say, Captains who had each fifty Men under his Command, to hinder the Titans, so often rebellious, from being able to make any future Attempts against Jupiter, now absolute Master of the Empire of his Father and Grand-father. As for this Campe, for her Name is Feminine in Apollodorus, whom Jupiter slew before he set his Uncles and Brothers at Liberty, this to me is a Riddle, and I was surpris'd to find that that Thomas Gallus, who has enrich'd the Text of this Author, with excellent Notes, has made none upon this Article.

(1) Apel. loc. cit.

To the Fable now explained was added, that Neptune kept the Titans shut up in their Prison, and hindered them from coming out of it; and the Meaning of this I take to be that Neptune being the Admiral of Jupiter's Fleet, and Master of the Ports of Spain, kept all the Passages block'd up, whereby the Titans might have escaped.

What is the Meaning of the Fable of Neptune's hindering the Titans from escaping out of Prison where they were confined.

No doubt it will be objected, as I have observed from Herodotus (1), that Neptune was a Libyan by Birth; that his Worship had been brought from Africa into Greece, and that the Libyans knew him and worship'd him Time out of Mind; and that by Consequence he had no Connection with the Family of the Titans, Natives of Asia; but may we not answer, First, That the Titans were themselves very powerful in Africa, whereof they possess'd the western Coasts, as it is in Diodorus Siculus (2), and that there is no Contradiction to say that he himself was of that august Race, as well as Atlas who signaliz'd himself so much in the same Country? May we not reckon that Neptune distinguish'd himself there by his Victories over the Titans, who had fled thither for Refuge, and that it was there perhaps he died, and was deify'd and honoured with a peculiar Worship all along those Coasts, whence that Worship pass'd afterwards into Greece? For, in short, the History of the Titans is very ancient, and long before the Time that Herodotus speaks of, that is, the Time of the Pelasgi who came to consult the Oracle of Dodona (a). The other Titans, together with Saturn and Jupiter, were deify'd in Greece itself, or in Crete; as Neptune was in Libya, whence his Worship was propagated to Greece.

But

(1) L. 20.

(2) L. 1.

(a) See Hesiod. Theog. and Lycephron in his Cassandra.

But, Secondly, what if we should say that besides the Libyan Neptune whom Herodotus speaks of, there was another of the Blood of the Titans who commanded Jupiter's Fleet when that Prince pursued the Rebel Titans to the Heart of Spain, where they had retired for Shelter? Were there not many Jupiters, many Apollo's, many Mercury's, &c. and why may there not have been more than one Neptune; is there any Thing in the Passage of Herodotus that can exclude others of the Name?

But be that as it will, I said, in speaking of the Manner how Rhea saved Jupiter, that the Poets had couch'd this Event under the Fable of the mysterious Stone which the Princess presented to Saturn swath'd like an Infant, and which he swallowed. Apollodorus relating this Fiction (1) says, that Jupiter full grown had associated himself to Metis the Daughter of Oceanus, who gave Saturn a Draught which had such Virtue that he had no sooner taken it, than he first threw up again the Stone now mentioned, then all the other Children which he had really destroyed, and who proved so great a Support to him in the War he carried on against Jupiter. Shall we say, with some learned Authors, that this Fable has no other Foundation but that Saturn lost his Children in their Nonage, and that Time, signify'd by his Name Chronos, devoured them, so to speak, just as they were born? But were this Explication to take Place, yet how would we account for it that those very Children proved so serviceable to him in the War he declared against his Son? I am therefore rather inclined to say with Mr. le Clerc (2), whose Conjectures are always ingenious, that this Fiction was founded upon the Custom which Saturn had of banishing or of confining his Children, for fear that they should one Day rebel against him, as he himself had done against his Father; a Custom very ancient, and observed at this Day among the Ottoman Princes and others. The Author now quoted,

to

(1) L. 1.

(2) Note in Hesiod.

to add more Probability to this Explication, says the same Phenician Word, Balah, equally imports to shut up or to devour, and that Hesiod who wrote this History from Phenician Memoirs, had followed that Signification which cast an Air of the marvelous upon a Fact that had nothing very extraordinary in itself: But as that Poet was not extremely exact, speaking of Uranus who ferved his Children with the same Measure, he says, without any Ambiguity, that he confined them and would not allow them to see the Light (a).

As to the Stone which Saturn swallowed, this again is a new Fiction founded upon the double Meaning of the Word Elben, which may either signify a Stone or a Child. Thus instead of saying that Rhea substituted another Child in Place of Jupiter, whom Saturn put in Prison with those of his Children whom he kept close confined, the Poet chose rather to feign that it was a real Stone which Saturn swallowed.

What is the Meaning of the Stone that Saturn swallowed.

To conclude, this Stone became very famous, and was adored as a Divinity, if we may believe Lactantius (b). The God Terminus, says he, whom they worship'd under the Figure of a land March, was it not that mysterious Stone which Saturn swallowed? The Latins, according to Priscian the Grammarian (1), called it Abadir, and the Greeks, if we may credit Hesychius, Bætylos. Denominations certainly derived from the Hebrew or Phenician Language, as the learned Bochart remarks (2).

I might here enlarge upon the Stone called Bætylos; but what could I add to the curious Dissertation of M. Falconet,

(a) In one Passage Hesiod says: Atque quidem eos deglutiebat Saturnus magnus. Theog. Vers. 459. In another; Eos ut quisque primum nascebatur, omnes occultabat, & in Lucem non emittebat. Ver. 156.

(b) Qui Lapidem colunt informem atque rudem, cui nomen est Terminus; is est quem pro Jove Saturnus dicitur devorasse. Div. Inst. L. 1. c. 20.

(1) Upon the Word Βαίτυλος. (2) Chan. 1.

M. Falconet, which is printed in the VI Volume of the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres (1), and to what M. Fourmont has said upon the same Subject (2) in his Reflexions Critiques? I shall therefore content my self, for the Sake of those who don't love long Discussions, with observing that the Bætyli were Stones that were believed to be animated, and were consulted by some Fanaticks as Oracles; a Kind of Teraphims, as you may judge from what we have said of those Idols, in speaking of the Divinities known from the sacred Books. These Stones were round, and of such a Size, that it was easy for one to carry them about with him, either hanging at his Neck, or in some other Way.

Isidorus, as may be seen in his Life written by Damascius, said there were Bætyli of different Sorts; that some were consecrated to Saturn, others to Jupiter, or to the Sun, &c. (a)

Their Origine was very ancient, since, if we may believe Sanboniatbon, Uranus was the Inventor of them. Uranus, says that ancient Author, invented the Bætyli, was the Contriver of animated Stones; Bochart, who could easily see that these animated Stones were but a mere Fiction, thinks it had taken its Rise from an equivocal Word, and that instead of anointed Stones, as the Phenician Author had written, his Translator Philo put animated Stones; and upon this Principle, he supposes the true Original of the Bætyli to have come from that Stone, upon which Jacob having slept, the Night he had the Vision mentioned in Scripture, anointed it with Oil when he awoke; and from that Time the Place was called Bethel, or the House of God. Tho' the two Academicks, whom I have named at the Beginning of this Chapter, reject Bochart's Conjecture, it has however been followed by Huetius (3), by Father Thomasin (4), and others.

The

(1) P. 513. (2) T. 1. p. 162.

(a) See the Abstract of this Life in Photius.

(3) Præp. Evang. Prop. 4. (4) Lecture des Poetes 2 Part, l. 1. c. 12.

The Ancients who have taken Notice of the Bætyli, such as Priscian, the Author of the Etymologicon, and Hesychius, give hardly any other Notion of them, but as the Stone which Saturn swallowed in Place of Jupiter; and this no Doubt is what had given rise to the Proverb against gluttonous People: You would even swallow a Bætylus (1). The Greeks were therefore persuaded that it was a Bætylus Saturn had swallowed; and as this Fiction was built upon a serious History, the least Circumstances whereof ought to be carefully preserved, the Mythologists have let none of them escape. The Scholiast upon Hesiod (2) relates, upon the Authority of Agathocles a Babylonish Author, that Rhea had taken that Stone from the Island of Proconesa; and Stephanus adds (3) that Saturn swallowed it upon Mount Thaumafius. As the Traditions about these and the like Circumstances, were not always very coherent, Pausanias after having delivered himself in his Arcadica as Stephanus does, says again in his Beotica it was upon Mount Petrarchus that Saturn had swallowed that Stone, and that having again vomited it up, it was preserved near the Temple of Delphi, where care was taken to anoint it every Day with Oil, and to cover it with Wool that had grown on the Days of his Festival.

As to the Fable importing that the Gods were provided with Arms by the Cyclops, I take it to have no other Foundation but the commonly received Notion that the Cyclops were excellent Artists; therefore if any Piece of Art was exquisite in its Kind it was ascribed to them. Hence they were said to have built the Walls of Troy, those of Tyrinthia, &c. (4).

But so much now for this Subject; let us go on to consider the other Fictions that were broached in Relation to the Family of the Titans. As what the Ancients relate concerning their Wars, gave rise to the

(1) See Erasmus's Adag. Chil. 4. Cent. 2.

(2) Upon the 485th ver. of the Theogony.

(3) Upon the Word Thaumafion.

(4) See the Article relating to them in the History of Vulcan.

the Fable of the Combat of the Giants, and of their assaulting Heaven ; and this Fable having been more diffused thro' the World than any other of Antiquity, without Exception, there being hardly perhaps a Nation where some Tradition of it has not been found, I thought it deserved a particular Consideration, and to be explain'd at somewhat greater Length.

This Fable offers several Heads to be examined ; were there ever real Giants, such as the Poets represent them ? What is the Meaning of their Assault upon Heaven, which they attempted to besiege ? What Truth is there in the Victory said to be obtained over them by Jupiter, who first thunderstruck them, and then buried them under Mount Etna ? Lastly, are the Titans and Giants the same ?

The Question about the Existence of Explication of the Fable of the Giants. Giants so often examined, would seem at first Sight to be no difficult Problem to resolve. All Antiquity mentions certain Men of an extraordinary Stature, who made their Appearance at sundry Times. The Scriptures make mention of them more than once. The profane Historians, the Travellers and Poets especially, tell us very odd Stories upon this Occasion. And yet when one comes to examine these Testimonies impartially ; to take the Expressions in the inspired Writings in the most natural Signification ; to reduce the Exaggerations of the Poets to a rational Meaning ; to limit the Historians and Travellers to what they either were Eye-witnesses to, or to what they assert only from irrefragable Testimony ; in fine, to follow the wise Conduct of Nature, almost always uniform in her Productions, all the marvellous Circumstances that fill'd our Imaginations before will then disappear.

Authors both ancient and modern, who have thought fit to examine this Question, have form'd very different Sentiments about it from one another. Some thro' Excess of Credulity have partly adopted what the Poets, and several Rabbins have delivered as to the Stature of the Giants ; and if they have not gone quite quite so far as to believe that upon a Time they piled Ossa upon Pelion to scale Heaven, they have at least granted that there was once a Race of Men so monstrously tall that they many Times exceeded the Stature of ordinary Men.

The Abbe de Tilladet, in a Dissertation whereof you have a Copy in the first Volume of the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres, page 125, alledges that there were not only real Giants, but also Nations and Cities of Giants; that our first Parents, and particularly the principal Heads of Colonies mentioned in History, were real Giants, taking that Word in its strictest Sense. In this new Scheme Adam and Eve must have been of a very giantick Size: For, says he, the Fathers and Mothers of the Giants must have been Giants themselves. And indeed how can it be supposed that a Mother who was no more than five or six Foot high, should be able to bear in her Womb a Child, who being of Size to grow up to a Giant, must have arrived at her Dimensions probably in a few Days after his Conception? Who can be persuaded, continues he, that Noah, had he not been bigger than we, would have been capable to build the Ark that saved Mankind, which could not have been capacious enough to contain all the Animals he was commanded to lodge in it; unless we take the Cubits in Scripture that are mentioned in describing its Dimensions, for Cubits of Giants?

M. Henrion, another Academick, proposed a Scheme yet more extraordinary, but nothing of it is publish'd. He brought to the Academy one Day a Kind of chronological Table or Scale, with Respect to the Difference of Mens Stature since the Creation of the World, to the Birth of Jesus Christ. In this Table he assigned to Adam 123 Feet 9 Inches in Height, and to Eve 118 Foot 9 Inches three fourths; whence he fix'd the Proportion between the Statures of Men and those of Women, to be as 25 to 24. This exorbitant Stature soon diminished: Noah's Height fell short of Adam's by 20 Foot: Abraham's was brought down to 28 in all. Moses had only 13, Hercules 10, and so on, still gradually diminishing: So that if Providence had not put a Stop to that prodigious Decrease, hardly should we at this Day have dared to rank ourselves, at least in Respect of our bodily Dimensions, among the Insects that crawl upon the Earth (a).

Other more judicious Writers, not being able absolutely to deny that there have sometimes appeared Men more bulky and tall than those with whom we are conversant, have apply'd themselves to a critical Examination of the Books that speak of them, even those of greatest Authority; and taking with the utmost exactness the Measures they make mention of, such as those we read of in holy Writ with Respect to Og King of Bashan, they have found that those of the most enormous Stature, did not arrive at ten or twelve Foot high: Og's Bed, concerning which many Rabbins have vented so many Extravagancies, according to the express Terms of Scripture, not exceeding nine Cubits, that is to say thirteen Foot and a half (b). What Name shall we then give to the wild Assertion of one of those Doctors who gravely alledges, that the Bone of that Giant's Thigh was so long, that a Stag would take a whole Day to run over its Dimensions, as you may see in Tostat (1), after Lycanus. The same Rabbins make no Scruple to tell us that Giant was 120 Cubits, that is 180 Foot high; and that they may not seem to contradict Moses, who assigns the Dimensions of that Prince's Bed, they tell us that Bed was only his Cradle (c). But to observe some Order in this Article, we shall first begin with the Passages in Scripture where the Giants are mentioned. That which most favours those who not

(a) See his Elogium by M. de Boze, Tom. 5. p. 379.

(b) Monstratur lectus ejus ferreus, qui est in Rabbath filiorum Ammon, novem cubitos habens longitudinis & quatuor Latitudinis, Deut. 3. ver. 11.

(1) In Deut. Q. 27.

(c) See Theodorus Ryckius Orat. de Gigant.

not only hold their Existence, but also believe there was a Race of Giants, is where Moses says: Then the Giants were upon the Earth (a): A Verse which stands between two others where we read of the Marriages of the Sons of God, with the Daughters of Men, of whom Sons were born who are said in the Hebrew Text to have been powerful, or as the Vulgat renders it: Isti potentes a seculo Viri famosi, while the Septuagint has translated this Expression by that of Giants (b).

The Descendants of Anak, who, in the sacred Writings, is called the Father of the Giants, were really of an extraordinary Stature. We have seen what was the Height of Og the King of Basban, whom Moses calls the last of the Giants (c). All the Country inhabited by the Posterity of Anak, to whom the Israelites look'd upon themselves but as Grasshoppers, was peopled by Men of a monstrous Stature: The People whom we have seen, said they whom Moses sent to spy out the Land, are of an extraordinary Stature, we have seen the Sons of Anak, all of them of the Race of Giants, in Comparison of whom we only appear as so many Grasshoppers (1). Their Land was called the Land of Giants (2), and the City of Hebron, the City of Giants, where dwelt Achimani, Sisai and Tholmai, of the Race of Anak.

To these Passages of Scripture, may be added the Testimonies of profane Authors, and 'tis fit we begin with the Poets, who are of greater Antiquity than the Historians. Nothing is more celebrated in their Works than the Attempts of the Giants against Heaven, which they would needs scale by piling the high Mountains of Thessaly above one another. 'Tis needless to quote them all, since they only copy one another: I shall only observe that they give very odd

O 2

(a) Gigantes erant super terram in Diebus illis. Gen. vi. 9.

(b) See what is said on this Subject, Vol. I. B. 2. c. 5.

(c) Solus quippe Og Rex Basan remansit ex reliquis Gigantibus, Deut. 13.

(1) Num. xiii. 33, 34.

(2) Gigantum Terra.

odd Descriptions of the Giants (1). Besides the Enormity of their Size, which made them capable of plucking up Mountains by the Roots, they give some of them an hundred Arms and fifty Heads, and make them roar so loud as to make Heaven and Earth and Sea to tremble. Accordingly they so terrify'd the Gods, as to force them to fly into Egypt, and there lie concealed some under the Figure of one Animal some of another. In fine, to compleat the Portrait of these Monsters, they give them Feet of Serpents. Hesiod, who appears not to have always had a very warm Vein, in a Kind of Poem which did not require much Enthusiasm, yet where he speaks of the Enterprize of the Giants against the Gods, rises into the Sublime, and gives a Description of those enormous Beings, which one cannot read without a certain Horror. What Homer relates of the Alcides and Polyphemus, is not much less extraordinary, for what Sort of Monster must he have been whose Staff was like the Mast of a Ship, and who at a single Meal ate up two of Ulysses's Companions? The same Poet tells us (2) that Titius, when he lay upon the Ground, covered no less than nine Acres.

Had it been only in the Poets we found Descriptions of those Prodigies of Men, we should have Reason to look upon what they say of them as the Product of poetical Enthusiasm that was not always guided by Reason; but the Historians themselves tell us very extraordinary Things of them. Abydenus and Eupolemus, according to Eusebius (3), speaking of the Construction of the Tower of Babel, tell us it was the Work of a Race of Giants, who attempted by Means of this Tower, to get up to Heaven. The ten Kings of Chaldea mentioned by Berosus (4), whom he makes to have lived before the

(1) See Hesiod Theog. Ovid. Met. Virgil, &c.

(2) Odyss. ver. 576.

(3) Præp. l. 9. c. 14.

(4) Apud Euseb. ibid.

the Deluge, were, according to the Chronicle of Alexandria, real Giants.

The Greek and Roman Authors often speak of Mens Bones, and Teeth of an extraordinary Bigness. Phlegon of Tralles (1) tells us, from the Authority of Apollonius the Grammarian, that in the Time of Tiberius, an Earthquake disclosed the Coffins of several Giants, wherein was found a Tooth no less than a Foot in Length, which was sent to that Emperor.

How large then, cries out Ryckius (2) must the Mouth have been which contained thirty two of those Teeth, and what must have been the Size of that Giant's Body, whose Mouth was so wide? The same Phlegon asserts that in a Cavern of Dalmatia were found dead Bodies whose Ribs were more than sixteen Ells in Length, and a Tomb near Athens that was a hundred Cubits long, wherein the Body of Macrofiris had been lodged, as the Epitaph of that Giant set forth. The same Author speaks of some other Discoveries of Giants Bones and Teeth, but none of them more extraordinary than those now mentioned.

Pausanias (3), who undoubtedly had less Credulity than Phlegon, tho' perhaps he has too much for an Historian, says he was inform'd by a Mysian, that he had seen near the Sea the Tomb of Ajax the Son of Telamon, and that to give him an Idea of that Hero's Gigantick make, he had assured him that the Ball of his Knee was like one of the Quoits used by the young Champions at the Olympick Games: Now those Quoits we know were very large and heavy; but, what is yet more extraordinary, the Author adds. "Over against Miletos is the Island " Lade, which divided itself into two other little " Islands, whereof the one goes under the Name of " Asterius, because Asterius has his Tomb there: " He was the Son of Anak, who is said to have O 3 " been

(1) De Mir. c. 14.

(2) Orat. de Gygan.

(3) In Att. c. 35.

“ been the Son of the Earth. The Body of Asterius
 “ is no less than ten Cubits in Length ; but that “ which astonishes me still more, is what I have “ seen in a small Island of Lydia. There a Tomb “ being disclosed by the Injuries of Time laid open “ to view Bones of a prodigious Size, which, had “ they not been of the Shape of human Bones, “ would never have been believed to be such.
 “ The common Tradition of the Country was, adds “ Pausanias, that it was the Body of Geryon Son of “ Chrysaor, and we were shewed a huge Rock on a “ Mountain, which was said to have served him for a “ Throne ; but upon Pausanias’s objecting to those “ who gave this Account, that Geryon lived at Cadiz,
 “ and that his Tomb was no where to be found,
 “ some Lydians more knowing in the Antiquities of “ their Country alledged, that it was the Body of “ Hyllas, the Son of Hercules and Omphale.”

“ A Roman Emperor, says the same Author (1), “ having turned the Course of the River Orontes, “ found in the former Channel a Tomb of Brick,
 “ at least a hundred Cubits long, in which was “ inclosed a dead Body of the same Length, and “ of a human Figure in all its Parts. The Syrians “ having consulted the Oracle of Apollo at Claros, “ to know whose Body it was, were answered that “ it was Orontes a Native of India.” This Fact being so publick, and of unquestionable Truth, our Author thus reasons upon it. “ And indeed, says
 “ he, if in primitive Ages the moist Earth upon its “ receiving the enlivening Warmth of the Sun Beams “ produced the first Race of Mortals, what Spot of “ the Globe was more proper for forming Men of an “ extraordinary Bulk, than the Indies, which at “ this very Day produces such Animals as the “ Elephants?”

I lay no great Stress on what we find relating to this Subject in the younger Philostratus (2), who tells us that Ajax was eleven Cubits, that is near seventeen Feet

(1) In Art. c. 29.

(2) Heroic.

Feet high ; that Aryades, whose Body had been discovered a short Time before, upon the Banks of the Orontes, was fifty five ; that he had seen another Grave on the Promontory of Sigeum in Troas, that was twenty two Cubits in Length ; and that a dead Body had been found in the Island of Lemnos, whose Head was capacious enough to contain more Water than would fill two Pitchers, such as were used in Crete, which we know to have been very large. But what shall we think of Plutarch, that judicious Author, who gravely relates (1), that Sertorius having made himself Master of the City Tingi, and not being inclined to believe what the Inhabitants told him of the enormous Stature of Anteus, saw his Grave opened, and the Body lying in it, which was sixty Cubits Long ?

We learn from Pliny (2), that a Mountain of Crete, being burst asunder by the Shock of an Earth-quake, discovered a human Body standing upright, which was forty six Cubits high. Solinus relates somewhat as extraordinary, but attested by seemingly unquestionable Authority: 'Tis with Respect to a dead Body of a giantick make, being thirty three Cubits or forty eight Foot in Length, which was shown to Lucius Flaccus, and to the Proconsul Metellus, who had look'd upon the Report they heard of it as a Fable.

Fazellus, the best modern Historian for Sicily, relates surprizing Stories upon this Subject. He tells one particular Fact wherein Boccace, in his Genealogy of the Gods, agrees with him, that about 200 Years before his Time, there was discovered in Mount Eryx a Cave wherein was found the dead Body of a Giant sitting, with a Staff in his Hand like the Mast of a Ship, and that the whole mouldered into Ashes so soon as it was touch'd, save three Teeth which were kept by the Magistrates of the City Eryx, who had been called forth to the Spectacle, with a Part of the Scull which contained some Bushels of Sicilian Measure. Fazellus reckons it was the Body of that Eryx who was slain by Hercules. The Author adds, that in his Time there was found a dead Body twenty Cubits long, which was in like Manner reduced to Ashes, except the Teeth, each of which weighed about five Ounces, which he affirms he had seen, as also the Figure of that Giant which was pictured upon a Wall. These Examples and some others related by that Historian, incline him to believe that Sicily had formerly been peopled by a Race of Giants, and in Proof of his Assertion he forgets not Homer's Cyclops and the Lestrigonians.

(1) In Sert.

(2) L. 7. c. 16.

To these Facts that appear so well attested, others might be added, less extraordinary indeed, but still very proper to support the Opinion of those who believe the Existence of Giants. We are told that the Body of Pallas the Son of Evander, having been dug up near Rome, in the Time of the Emperor Henry III. was set up by the Wall of that City, and overtopped it by the Head. 'Tis likewise reported, that in the Time of Augustus there appeared at Rome a Giant named Pusio, who was ten Cubits high, and that in the Time of the Emperor Claudius, there was brought from Arabia into that City the Body of Gabbaon, which was near ten Foot. They add, that the Body of Orestes measured seven Cubits.

Tho' the Accounts of the Celtæ given by some of the Ancients, are not quite so extraordinary as what I have now been relating, 'tis however certain that they reckoned them commonly six or seven Foot high. Some modern Travellers give the same Account of the Patagons, who inhabit the Coasts of Chili, and of those of the Island of Nicobar in the Gulf of Bengal. In fine, Homer, speaking of the Heroes who besieged Troy, says they darted Stones which four Men in his Time would hardly be able even to raise from the Ground. Virgil, the faithful Imitator of the Greek Poet, gives the same Description of Turnus; and these are the Places, in those two Poets, to mention it by the Way, that induced St. Augustin to believe that there had been real Giants.

All

All that we have now said tends to prove that Giants have actually existed ; but before we come to a Decision let us examine these Authorities which appear so positive. In the first Place it will easily be believed that the Poets have greatly exaggerated in their Descriptions of the Giants. There needs no great Penetration to be convinced that there never were Men capable to pluck up Mountains by the Roots, to pile them one above another, nor so large as, when stretched at their Length, to cover nine Acres of Ground ; the Canibal Polyphemus might terrify the Associates of Ulysses, and eat them too, without being so monstrously large as Homer paints him.

The Scheme of the late Mr. Henrion destroys itself: Whence, but from the Rabbins, did he learn that Adam was of so prodigiously large a Size? Does he rely on what some Travellers say of the Print of his Foot engraved upon a Rock on the Island of Ceylon? A Fable which Ryckius (1) is at the Pains seriously to refute. But what Proof can be given of that successive Gradation which at length for so many Ages past has fixed Mens Stature to the Proportion it is in at this Day? For after all there is an uncontested and standing Proof that Men were no larger, than they now are, perhaps two thousand five hundred Years ago. This Proof I fetch from the sepulchral Monument of that King of Egypt, whoever he was, which still remains in the great Pyramid. The Dimensions of this Tomb, which is of the finest Porphyrian Marble, is little more than six Foot, according to the most accurate Travellers (2). Now the Coffins are always larger than the dead Bodies that are to be put into them: Even the Repository where this Tomb is lodged, is no more than sixteen or eighteen Foot in its utmost Extent. Men therefore were no larger than they are at this Day,

(1) Differ. upon the Giants.

(2) See Corneille le Brun, who had seen it, &c.

Day, in the Time of Pharaoh who built the great Pyramid.

The Opinion of the late Abbé Tilladet, is not better supported than that of Mr. Henrion, for granting the Children of Anak, whom the Scripture calls the Father of Giants, and who were the Leaders of some Colonies, to have been larger than the rest of their Contemporaries, can we from thence conclude that all the other Heads of Colonies were Giants?

As to what we read in the Bible that the Giants sprung from the Commerce between the Angels and the Daughters of Men, we have said enough in the former Volume. The very Word which the Scripture applies to them, does not so much denote Men remarkable for their great Stature, as for their Debauchery and Wickedness. 'Tis true, the Sons of Anak whom the Scripture calls the Father of the Giants, were mostly of an extraordinary Size, but far short of those pretended Giants of a hundred or a hundred and twenty Foot, whom we were now speaking of? Moses has left us the Dimensions of Og the King of Baschan's Bed, who was of that Race; but besides that this Bed was only twelve or thirteen Foot long, a Bed which had perhaps been made for Ostentation, was it no larger than its Owner? What we are told in the same sacred Writings concerning Goliath, comes not near the Description of Og, and therefore we have nothing farther to add upon it. 'Tis true the Israelites, whom Joshua sent into the Land of Canaan, reported, as has been already said, that they had seen Giants of the Race of Anak, to whom they themselves appeared but as Grasshoppers; but is not this the Report of People affrighted at the Sight of some Persons more bulky and robust than themselves? And one of the Spies themselves did not dissemble that the Relation was exaggerated.

As to what we are told of the Tombs discovered near the Orontes in Syria, these are so many Relations of a fabulous Nature, and manifestly strained; which holds yet truer of those Caves in Sicily, where,
according

according to the Historians of that Island both ancient and modern, there were found Giants of an enormous Bulk. These Accounts had no other Foundation but the Reports of Artists and Tradesmen, without so much as one Man worthy of Credit who could say he had seen any Thing like them; and had there been no more but that single Circumstance added to each of their Relations, namely, that those enormous Corpses crumbled into Ashes so soon as the Air got into the Caves, this is enough to make us think there is as little Truth in this, as in the Story of the pretended burning Lamp, that was said to have been found in the Tomb of Tullia Cicero's Daughter, which went out that Moment the Air enter'd into the Vault.

As for those monstrous Bones which are said by some Naturalists to be either the Ribs, or the Vertebræ of some Giants, 'tis long since able Physicians have proved them to have been the Bones of Whales, or of some other Sea Monsters, or else the Productions of Nature which often sports in such Imitations.

What I have said of the Corps of Pallas the Son of Evander, is taken from Helinandus, and I look upon that pretty Story as a meer Fiction of that Author, who lived in the twelfth Century, and who relates it above a hundred Years after that rare Discovery, tho' no Author before him ever made the least mention of it. This pious Monk ought to have said that not only Pallas, whom Virgil however calls a Child, was a Giant, but likewise Turnus who slew him, since the Wound which that Monk tells us Pallas had in the Side, and which is still capable of being measured after more than two thousand Years, was four Foot wide; for a Spear that could make such a wide Gash, was portable by none but a Giant.

The Fact concerning Sertorius, related by Plutarch, deserves as little Credit as the rest, 'tis upon the Testimony of Gabinus that he relies; but Strabo, more

more judicious, looks upon the Relation of this Gabinus as an arrant Fable.

In a Word, for perhaps I have enlarged too much upon this Subject, Nature appears too uniform in her Productions, to have ever made such a Difference in Mens Sizes ; and if there have been some few Exceptions, yet the Disproportion was never so considerable. Man is made for cultivating the Ground, and for gathering its Fruits and Herbs, which Men, such as the Giants are described, could not do. The Climate, I grant, makes some Difference in the Sizes of Men and Animals too ; and, generally speaking, the Inhabitants of the temperate Zones are larger than those of the frigid Zones, but that Difference amounts only to a Foot or two. Mankind have always loved to exaggerate ; we are formed by Nature to delight in Objects of Admiration ; This has given a Handle on the one Hand for feigning Giants monstrously large, and on the other Pygmies so diminutively small, that sometimes they are not allowed above one Foot in Height, as it is in Juvenal :

Quorum tota cohors pede non est altior uno.

To conclude, as there are some Inhabitants of the Earth, such as those who live near the Poles, who are only three or four Foot high, so those who have been reckoned Giants might possibly be seven or eight. I doubt if ever there were seen any taller ; and the last who appeared at Paris, exactly measured by the Gentlemen of the Academy of Sciences, without his Shoes and the Ornaments of his Head, was found to be but seven Foot bating an Inch. Thus the exaggerated Stories that impose upon the Bulk of Mankind, no sooner come to be examined, than they vanish into nothing.

To illustrate now what I have said in the History of Jupiter, concerning those pretended Giants, whose Enterprize signifies a War made upon that God, tho' the Substance of the Story has been embellish'd with ridiculously extravagant Circumstances by those who first describ'd it ; there remain three Heads which

I am

I am to examine. The First is what is the Meaning of their Enterprize against Heaven, which they intended to scale? Secondly, what is the Foundation of the Story of the Gods flying into Egypt, where, to screen themselves from the Pursuit of the Giants, they were obliged to lie concealed under the Figure of different Animals? And then Lastly, whether the Giants ought to be distinguish'd from the Titans. The second of these Questions having been sufficiently considered in the History of the Gods of Egypt, with Regard to Typhon (1), I content myself with referring the Readers to it.

First, We have observed in the 2d Article of the former Chapter, that Jupiter destroyed the Robbers that infested Thessaly, and these are the pretended Giants, for we remark'd that in Scripture the Word Nephilim, which is translated Giants, signifies People abandoned to all kinds of Irregularities, Robbers and Ruffians. Jupiter, when he left Crete to visit the other Parts of Greece, dwelt for ordinary upon Mount Olympus, where he had probably built a strong Citadel. This Mount Olympus was afterwards taken for Heaven itself, and the most ancient Poets, especially Homer, give no other Description of it. The Banditti now mentioned, would needs attack that Prince, and besiege him in his Citadel, which afterwards gave Rise to the Fiction of their having attempted to scale Heaven, and made an Assault upon it.

'Tis added, that they had piled Ossa upon Pelion, importing, no doubt, that they had fortified these two Mountains, which are also in Thessaly, and at no great Distance from Olympus, whither they retired after their Excursions, and kept Jupiter's Garrison in awe.

The Adventure of Porphyron, who offers Violence to Juno in Presence of Jupiter himself, no Doubt teaches us that the Captain of the Rebels really carried off that Princess, of whom he was enamoured, amoured, and that Jupiter and Hercules pursued and put him to Death. Nothing was more common in those Times than Rapes, when they could not otherwise obtain the Object beloved. The Story of Polybotes, whom Neptune overthrew in the Island of Cos, imports that that Admiral of Jupiter's Fleet pursued this Polybotes, who probably had the Command of his Enemies Ships, as far as that Island, and there cut him off, in fine, that of Ephialtes and Otus, who detained the same Neptune Prisoner for thirteen Months in the Island of Crete, imports that those two formidable Chiefs had so strongly blocked up Neptune in the Port of that Island, that he could not get out thence till the End of that Period of Time. For we are to remark, by the by, that, in the War which is now in Question, Jupiter appears to have been attack'd both by Sea and Land.

(1) T. 2. B. 6.

'Tis true, most of the Learned of the last Age are of Opinion, that the Enterprize of the Tower of Babel, which may be construed a literal assaulting of Heaven, had given rise to the Fable I am now explaining. Let us build, said the Authors of that mad Project, a Tower that may reach to Heaven (a). Besides, add they, Nimrod who headed that Enterprize, being called by Moses, a strong a mighty hunter before the Lord, must, no Doubt, have been accounted a Kind of Giant: Thus nothing they think is wanting to compleat the Resemblance, and they would have it not to be doubted but that this is the Explication of the Fable. But, besides that no Proof can be given of the Pagans having been acquainted with this Event, I cannot help thinking the Explication which I have given of this Fable natural enough to be adopted.

Secondly, Tho' most of the Ancients have confounded the Giants with the Titans, 'tis however certain that they ought to be distinguished. The latter were of an illustrious Family, and extended their Empire over over one Part of the World ; the others were so many Banditti disperſed up and down Theſſaly, who gave the Titans a great deal of Trouble. Hefiod, in his Theogony, diſtinguiſhes them very plainly from one another, and does not make the Giants to be born till long after the overthrow of the Titans, and after the Wars which theſe carried on againſt the others : And what may have been the Occaſion of confounding them, is that both the Giants and the Titans made War upon the Gods ; with this Difference, that the Titans, tho' of the ſame Race, had often ſeparate Interests ; ſome taking Part with Saturn, and others of them with Jupiter : Whereas the Giants were a Gang of Robbers, who had a Deſign equally upon all the Titans (a).

(a) Venite, faciamus nobis Civitatem & turrin, cujus culmen peringat ad Cœlum. Gen. xi. v. 4.

In fine, what has led ſome Authors to take the Giants and Titans for the ſame is, that both of them paſſ'd for Sons of Heaven and Earth ; but they had not conſidered what Apollodorus ſays (1), that Earth brought forth the Giants only becauſe ſhe was incenſed againſt Jupiter for keeping the Titans ſhut up in Tartarus. Thus the Titans were born long before the Giants.

It has been already ſaid that Jupiter was ſuckled by a She-goat, named Amalthea. Lactantius (2) alledges that what gave riſe to this Fable, was that the Princeſs Amalthea, the Daughter of Melittus King of Crete, took care of Jupiter's nurſing, and ordered Goats-milk to be given him. But tho' it were true that he had really been ſuckled with Goats-milk, like Ægyſtus who from thence derived his Name, there would be nothing in it extraordinary conſidering that the Child was to be brought up ſecretly, and in a ſolitary Place, and that it was ſo much their Interest to conceal him from his Father ; there would be of the She-goat Amalthea.

The Fable

no

(a) We ſay nothing here of the Fable which, according to Apollodorus L. 1. gives the Giants the Limbs and Feet of a Serpent, becauſe it has been explained in the History of Typhon. Vol. I. B. VI.

(1) Tom. II. B. VI.

(2) De fal. Relig.

no Necessity in this Case to have recourse to a pretended Princess whom we know nothing about.

Amalthea was afterwards placed among the Stars, where, as has been already said, she forms the Constellation that bears her Name. Of one of the Horns of this pretended Goat did the Greeks make their Cornu-copia, tho' some Times they say the same Thing of that of the River Achelous, as shall be said in the History of Hercules (1).

But this is not the only Fable that was vented about Jupiter's Nurses, since it was given out that the Pigeons supply'd him with Food, as we see in Homer. The learned Bochart says (2) that this Fable took its Rise from the Resemblance between the two Phenician or Arabian Words Himam, and Hemam, the first of them signifying a Priest and the other a Pigeon. Thus because certain Priests, Curetes or Dactyli, who presided over the sacred Things, took care of Jupiter's nursing, hence the Fiction arose that he had been nursed by Pigeons. From the same Source, according to this Author, sprung the Fable of Semiramis's being nursed by Pigeons.

To the Fable of the Pigeons was added, that of the Eagle which was imployed in furnishing him with Ambrosia, as we have it in Athenæus (3), because that Bird was consecrated to Jupiter, from the Day that having consulted the Augurs in the Island of Naxos, before he enter'd upon the War with the Titans, an Eagle appeared to him, which was a Bird of good Omen ; this he bore always upon his Ensigns ; and it was the same, if we credit Hyginus (4), after some of the Ancients, that was placed among the Stars ; tho' others will have it to be that other Eagle which he employed in the Rape of Ganimede : Which comes to the same, since the Fable of that God's having transformed himself into an Eagle to ravish that young Prince

(1) Vol. VI.

(2) Chan. L. 2. c. 11.

(3) L. 15.

(4) Cæl. Poet. Astr. L. 2. c. 16.

Prince, had no other Foundation but his carrying that Bird upon his Colours.

We mentioned already Jupiter's having been fed by Bees, as Virgil Fable of the Bees has it (a); and I take the Foundation of this Fable to be, that Hives of Bees had been in the Cave where Jupiter was brought up. Antoninus Liberalis tells a tragical Adventure of four Men, who having enter'd into that Cave, and perceived the Hives of Bees, that God made the Noise of his Thunder to be heard, and by darting his Lightning destroyed them in a miserable Manner: Another Fiction importing that some profane Persons had been punish'd for their Presumption, in daring to violate the Sanctity of that Place, which the Pagans held in high Veneration.

Tho' I have already spoke of the Curetes in the former Volume, on Occasion of the Cabiri, whom some Authors take to be the same; yet Antiquity having transmitted to us so many Particularities relative to them; I thought fit to consider them in a separate Article. Strabo has drawn together (i) almost all that can be said upon this Subject: we find however in Photius, Apollodorus, Pausanias and others; some Particularities which are not related by that learned and judicious Historian; from these several Pieces I shall compose their History.

The History of the Curetes to whom Rhea committed the Education of Jupiter.

First Then; I shall not insist upon what we have in Ovid, who tells us that they were produced by the Rain (b), the ordinary Resource of Poets, who made all such whose Original they were ignorant of to spring from the Earth, or from the Hollow of an Oak-tree. As little do I think much Stress is to be laid upon the Etymology given of their Name by Athenæus (2), who relying upon the Authority of

VOL. II.

P

some

(a) Dictæo Regem pavere sub antro.

(1) L. 10.

(b) Largoque sæas Curetas ab imbre. Met. l. 4.

(2) L. 12. c. 6.

some Verses in Æschylus, alledges that they were so denominated from the Care they took of their Hair, which they dressed and curled in a Manner peculiar to themselves ; since the Expressions made use of by that ancient Poet, seem to have no Relation to the Name of the Curetes.

In order to treat with some distinct Method a Subject that is obscure enough of itself, I shall examine the following Questions.. Whether were the Curetes Natives of Crete? or came they from a greater Distance? What is their Original? What was their Religion, their Customs and Employments? What particular Country did they inhabit?

Dionysius of Halicarnassus (1), and after him Don Pezron (2), are persuaded that the Curetes were Natives of Crete, and the latter is of Opinion that they were even of the Blood Royal, and of the Number of the Titan Princes. We have seen in the second Article that they had the Care of Jupiter's Funerals. In Fact, they were the Priests and Astrologers of the Titan Princes. Being addicted to speculative Sciences and mechanical Arts, they came to be frequently consulted. In a Word, they were to the Titans who reigned in that Isle, what the Dryads were among the Gauls, the Magi among the Persians, and the Salii among the Sabines. They were also frequently employed, according to the same Author, in the Education of the Sons of Princes, whom they brought up with great Care, teaching them Physick, Astrology, whatever concerned Religion, and above all the Art of War ; to which they went themselves, and were distinguish'd in it from others by particular Arms, wherewith they made a Sound in Cadence, artfully clashing their Spears against their Bucklers, and dancing with a great many Contorsions, to animate themselves to the Fight, and to excite others to it (3): whence they got the Name of Curetes and of Corybantes (4). By the Noise of that Symphony

(1) Hist. Rom. l. 2.

(2) Ant. de la langue des Celtes.

(3) Apol. l. 2.

(4) This last signifies one who shakes his Head.

Symphony, they brought up the infant Jupiter; not to hinder Saturn, who was then in Phrygia, from hearing his Screams; but rather to prevent any ones discovering him. The Dance, whereof they were the Inventors, was called Dactylos, and for the same Reason perhaps were they themselves denominated Dactyli. Unless you choose rather to be of Opinion with some of the Ancients, that they got this Name from their being only ten, the Number of Fingers on the Hands; the Word Dactylos signifying a Finger.

I am inclined to think that anciently the Curetes were Inhabitants of Crete; that they highly signalized themselves there; practised several Arts, and contributed not a little to polish the Minds and Manners of the Inhabitants of that Island: It was in Crete too that they got the Name of Idæi, because it was near Mount Ida, which is in that Island, that they settled: but they were not Natives of it; the best Authors being agreed that they came from Phenicia. Herodotus (1) tells us that the Phenicians, who followed Cadmus, introduced several Sciences into Greece: For there were among those Phenicians, People called Curetes, who were better versed in the Arts and Sciences of Phenicia than others: Some of them settled in Phrygia, where they were called Corybantes, others in the Island of Crete, where they got the Name of Idæi Dactyli; some of them came to Rhodes, and these were designed Telchines; others again into Samothracia: A Part of them came into Eubæa, where, before the Discovery of Iron, they wrought in Brass, in a City which was called for that Reason Chalcis. Some of them went to Imbros, others to Lemnos, where they found Forges set up: In fine, a great Number of them settled in Etolia and Acar-nania, to which was given the Name of the first Country which the Curetes had inhabited after leaving Phenicia, I mean Crete, a Name which it retained, till Ætolus the Son of Endymion seized upon it, and called it after his own Name. It was during the

(1) L. i.

Abode of the Curetes in Greece, that the hunting of Calydon happened ; which occasioned a bloody War between them and the Etolians, whereof Phenix gives a long Account to Achilles (1), as shall be said in the History of Meleager (2). Pausanias adds (3), to what Homer says, that the Author of the Poem of illustrious Women, and of the Myniad, related that Apollo had sided with the Curetes in that War, and had slain Meleager with his own Hand.

In the mean time a celebrated Event, whence the Chronicle of Paros begins one of its Epochs, gave the Curetes the Hint to work in the Iron Forges. The Forest of Mount Ida took Fire either by Lightning, or some other Accident ; and the Curetes seeing a great Quantity of Iron flow down, which the Violence of the Fire had melted, improved this Discovery, and laid aside their Works in Brass, to apply themselves to those in Iron. The Chronicle now cited, places this Event under the Reign of Minos the first King of Crete, and of Pandion first King of Athens ; that is about the Year before Jesus Christ, 1350.

I am however of Opinion, that the Art of forging Iron is older than the burning of Mount Ida, since Tubal-Cain, as Moses tells us, was the Inventor of it even before the Deluge ; but it might be lost, or perhaps unknown till then in the Island of Crete.

It was also by means of those Artists, whom Cadmus had brought with him, that this Chief of the Colony found out a golden Mine in the Mountain Pangæa in Thrace, and the red Brass at Thebes where he settled : Wherefore the mineral Stone, which is melted down with the red Brass to make yellow Brass or it, is called Cadmia at this very Day.

The Curetes with those Metals made themselves a particular kind of Arms ; and in War, and in the Ceremonies of Religion, they were wont to dance ; and mingling with their own tumultuous Shrieks the Sound of Bells, Pipes, Drums, and of their Swords which

(1) Il. l. 9.

(2) Vol. VI.

(3) In Phoc.

which they clash'd upon their Bucklers, observing a certain Cadence, and appearing to be seized with Enthusiasm; hence they got the Name of Cūrētes and Corybantes. This, according to Solinus (1), is what gave rise to Musick in Greece. “The harmonious Arrangement which the Idæi Dactyli observed in the clashing Sound of their Arms, says that Author, gave Birth to Musick: they transferred it afterwards into Poetry.” (a) In this Isidorus of Seville has followed the Opinion of Solinus.

We must not omit to observe that, according to Diodorus Siculus (2), 'tis to one of the Curetes, or Idæi Dactyli, named Hercules, that the first Institution of the Olympick Games is owing. That Event is thus related by Pausanias (3). “The Inhabitants of Elis, who seem to be well versed in Antiquities, say that Saturn was their first King; and that the Men of the golden Age, set up a Temple to him at Olympia; that so soon as Jupiter was born, his Mother gave the Care of him to the Idæi Dactyli, who were named Curetes; that afterwards five of them, whose Names are Hercules, Pæonius, Epimedes, Jasius, and Ida, came from Ida a Mountain of Crete, into Elis; that Hercules surnamed Idæan, who was the eldest of them, in Memory of the War between Saturn and Jupiter, instituted the Race; and appointed that he who carried the Prize, should be rewarded with a Crown of Olive. There he set up an Altar to Jupiter Olympius, and founded the Olympick Games. He adds that, according to some of the Eleans, Jupiter there disputed the Kingdom with Saturn; and that, according to others, Idæan Hercules instituted those Games in Memory of the Victory obtain'd over the Titans.” The same

P 3

Author

(1) Ch. 11.

(a) Studium musicum inde captum cum Idæi Dactyli modulos crepitu & tinnitu æris deprehensos in versificum ordinem transfulissent.

(2) L. 3.

(3) L. 5. cap. 7, and elsewhere.

Author in his Arcadica (1) says, the Curetes contended for the Prize of running at those Games.

In fine, that nothing might be wanting to complete the Glory and Renown of the Curetes, Temples were erected to them after their Death. Pausanias (2) mentions that which they had in Messenia, where Sacrifices were offered of all Sorts of Animals.

What we are to think of the Division of the World among the three Brothers.

Of all the Fables that occur in the History of Jupiter, none remains to be explained but that of the Partition of the World among the three Brothers. The Empire of the Titans, as has been said, was vastly extensive: Those Princes were in Possession of Phrygia, Thrace, a Part of Greece, the Island of Crete, and several other Provinces (3). Sanchoiathon seems to add Syria too (4): Diodorus adds a Part of Africk and the Mauritanias. Jupiter enlarged it a great deal, and having defeated the Titan Party, he bethought him of sharing his Dominions with his Brothers. To himself he reserved the oriental Countries, as also Thessaly and Olympus. Pluto had the western Provinces, to the extremity of Spain, which is a low Country in Respect of Greece; and Neptune was appointed Admiral of Jupiter's Fleet, and commanded over the whole Mediterranean. This, no Doubt, is what has given rise to the Fable of the Division of the World, and what makes these three Brothers be look'd upon as three sovereign Divinities in their own Dominions. From that time Olympus, where Jupiter dwelt, was taken for Heaven; and Spain, where Pluto set Men to work at the Mines, was never mentioned but as a gloomy Kingdom, overspread with the thickest Darkness, the common Mansion of the Dead.

Several learned Men, I know, are persuaded that it was the Division among the three Sons of Noah, that gave Rise to the Fable of the like Division among

(1) C. 2.

(2) In Messen.

(3) V. Dea Pannon.

(4) L. 3.

mong Jupiter, Neptune and Pluto; but tho' we should grant them that the Pagans were acquainted with this Tradition, which must indeed have been very diffusive, since it was known even in Peru, if we believe Garcilasso de la Vega (1), yet it would not be the less true that those Titan Princes divided their Conquests after the Manner now said.

The learned Father Tournemine, in the Proposal that has been already cited, says that the Pagans, from the Tradition of the Division among the Sons of Noah, imagined that of the whole World among three Divinities, whereof one governed Heaven and Earth, to whom they gave the Name of Zeus, which is an Abbreviation of the ineffable Name Jevo or Jeova: The second Hell, who was therefore called Ades; which imports Loss, or Orcus, dark, or Pluto, God of Riches, because of the Mines that are in the Bowels of the Earth; and the third reigned over the Sea, whom for that Reason they stiled Poseidon, which signifies Ship-dashing, or Napka, Flowing.

I am however of Opinion that, at bottom, and in the better Mythology, Jupiter represented the supreme God who governed at once Heaven, Earth and Hell, under three different Names. This was the Sentiment of Pausanias (2) who, upon Occasion of a Statue of Jupiter in Wood, that was at Argos in the Temple of Minerva, thus speaks: “ That Statue, “ says he, had two Eyes as Nature has placed them “ in Men, and a third in the middle of the Fore- “ head. This is alledged to be the Jupiter Patrons “ who stood in the Palace of Priam, in a Place un- “ covered, and that it was to his Altar that unfortu- “ nate Prince fled for Refuge after the taking of “ Troy. — It may be reasonably conjectured, “ that Jupiter was thus represented with three Eyes, “ to signify that he reigned first in Heaven, as all “ are agreed; secondly in Hell; For the God who,

P 4

“ according

(1) Hist. des incas p. 84 of the last Edition.

(2) In Corinth. c. 24.

“ according to the Fable, holds his Empire in the “ subterranean Regions, is also called Jupiter by “ Homer, according to this Verse,

Infernal Jove and his tremendous Spouse. (1)

“ The third, in short, over the Sea, as Eschilus the “ Son of Euphorion testifies. Whoever therefore made “ this Statue, gave it three Heads, I suppose to “ represent, that one and the same God governs
 “ the three Parts of the World; which others say “ had been shared among three different Divi“ nities.”

ARTICLE IV.

Of the different Names given to Jupiter.

As Jupiter was the great Divinity of the Pagan World, and was universally worship'd from Egypt to the Center of Spain, we need not be surprized at the great Number of Names and Surnames which were given him by the various Nations that had received his Worship. Most of those Names being derived from the Places where he was worship'd, or from what had given Rise to the Temples, Chapels and Altars that were consecrated to him, I should gladly have saved myself the Trouble of recounting them all; but as they occur upon ancient Monuments, in Inscriptions and in most Authors, especially in the Poets, I judged it would be proper to make the Reader acquainted with them as fully as possible; and I hope to make amends for the Barrenness of the Subject, by quoting the historical Passages that gave rise to those various Demonstrations.

The most ordinary Epithet applied to Jupiter, was that of Optimus Maximus: He was likewise stiled by the Greeks and Romans, Pater, Father, because he was accounted the Father of Gods and Men. That of King is appropriated to him by Homer

(1) Il. L. 9. ver. 457.

Homer and Virgil; and the Sacrifices that were performed at Lebadia, were offered up to him under the Title of Jupiter the King. The same Title is conferred upon him twice by Xenophon in his Cyropedia.

He was likewise called Almighty, as we see in Virgil, and other Authors. The Epithet of Victor, or Victorious, was given him, either because he had conquered the Giants and Titans, or because nothing was thought able to resist him. We read in Titus Livius (1) that Papyrius, when ready to engage, vowed a Temple to him under that Name (a). Under the same Denomination had the Romans instituted to him a Festival that was celebrated in the Month of April, as we learn from Ovid (b). Saint Augustin (2) tells us that the same Romans on the Ides of June celebrated a Feast in Honour of him, under the Title of Jupiter the invincible.

As oft as they believed they had received any Benefit from this God, they destined some Ceremony to him, and gave him a new Name: Thus he was called Stator, because he had stop'd the Roman Army in their Flight: Muscarius, or in the Greek Language Apomyius, which is of the same Import, was a Name given him by the Eleans, in Memory of his having driven away the Flies that molested Hercules during a Sacrifice. Pausanias (3) tells us that as Hercules was sacrificing at Olympia, and was greatly incommoded by the Flies, he offered up a Victim to Jupiter Apomyius, upon which the Flies flew away immediately to the other Side of the River Alpheus; from that Time the Eleans performed every Year the same Sacrifice, to be delivered from those Insects. Feretrius, quasi a ferendo, because he had brought

(1) L. 10.

(a) Papyrium in ipso discrimine, quo Tempia Diis immortalibus vovere mos erat, Vovisse Jovi Victori, si Legiones hostium fudisset, sese facturum: Id votum Deis cordi fuit. Tit. Liv. Loc. cit.

(b) Occupat Apriles Idus cognomine Victor

Jupiter, hac illi sunt data Tempia die.

Ovid. Fast.

(2) De Civit. Dei L. 7.

(3) In Eliac.

brought Aid to the Romans; vel a feriendo, because he had defeated their Enemies (a), which comes to the same thing: Pistor, because of the Tradition, that while the Gauls were besieging the Capitol, he had counselled the Garrison to make Bread of all the Corn they had remaining, and throw it into the Enemy's Camp, to make them believe that they had a Prospect of being soon supply'd with Provision; which Stratagem succeeded so well, that the Enemy raised the Siege (1): Lapis, from the Stone which Saturn had swallowed instead of Jupiter himself; and in that Case he was confounded with the God Terminus. The Oath that was taken by this mysterious Name, was very awful, according to Apuleius, as has been said in the second Volume under the Article of Oaths. This is what Cicero calls, Jovem Lapidem jurare (2). Lucerius or Diespiter, because he was the God of Light, as Aulus Gellius informs us (b); and this is the Reason of that God's being often taken for the Air: Pluvius (3), because in Times of great Drought they applyed to him for Rain. 'Twas from this Motive that Trajan's Army, when reduced to Extremity of Thirst, occasioned by an excessive Drought, made a Vow to Jupiter Pluvius; and in a Moment there fell a great Quantity of Rain. In Commemoration of this Event the Figure of Jupiter Pluvius was afterwards put upon Trajan's Pillar; and to express the Fact, the Soldiers were represented receiving the Water in the hollow of their Bucklers. This God is there represented under the Figure of an old Man with a long Beard, and a pair of Wings, stretching forth both his Hands, and the right Hand a little elevated; the Water flows copiously from his Arms and his Beard. The Athenians

(a) Propertius in the Elegy of Jupiter Feretrius thus speaks.

Nunc Jovis incipiam causas aperire Feretri:

Armaque de Ducibus trina recepta tribus.

(1) Tit. Liv.

(2) Epist. ad famil. Ep. ad Trebatium.

(b) Lucerius Dictus Jupiter, quod nos die & luce, quasi vita ipsa afficeret & juvaret.

(3) So called by the Greeks.

nians worship'd him under this Name, as Pausanias remarks (1), and named him Hymetius, from the Altar that they had consecrated to him upon Mount Hymettus. Prædator, was another of his Names, because they consecrated to him a Part of the Spoils; which makes Virgil say:

————— Ipsūque vocamus

In prædam, partemque Jovem (2).

Tropæuchus, because he presided over Triumphs: Hospitalis, because he was the God of Hospitality, as we learn from the Poet now quoted (3); and this is the Name under which he was most revered. Lycæus, because he was believed to have transformed Lycaon into a Wolf. 'Tis proper to remark, in the third Place, that he had other Names given him, such as Father of the Gods, the greatest and best; Ruler, Governour, and several others denoting his Sovereignty over the other Gods. He was stiled Acræus, as much as to say of the Promontory; the Inhabitants of Smyrna adored him under this Name on an Eminence, as is to be seen in two Medals publish'd by Spon (4). The Name of Lord of the Storms and Winds, Tempestatum potens, ventorum potens, which occurs in some Inscriptions, as also that of Jupiter Serenus, agrees to that God in so far as he was physically the Æther. Jupiter Dolichenus occurs on a fine Marble, referred to by the same Spon (5). There he is represented standing upon a Bull, with an Eagle display'd. As he is in Armour, and has a Helmet on his Head, some Antiquaries have taken him for Mars; but the Bull that was sacrificed to him, and the Eagle, leave no room to doubt of its being Jupiter.

The Names of Jupiter Ammon, Jupiter Serapis, and Jupiter Belus, have been sufficiently explained in the second Volume, Book VI. That of Jupiter Stygius, was given him when he represented Pluto,
and

(1) In Attic.

(3) Æn. L. 1.

(5) Ibid. p. 79.

(2) Æn. L. 3. See Servius.

(4) Misc. Erud. Ant. p. 74.

and is to be met with in Inscriptions. One of the most awful Names of Jupiter was that of Sebazius; but of this I have spoke at more length in the Article of Mithras, at the Beginning of this Volume.

There was a great Number of others that were derived from Places where he was worship'd: Thus he was denominated Capitolinus, from the Temple which he had upon the Capitol; Olympius, Atabyrius, Diæus, Idæus, because the Mountains that bore these Names, whereof the first was in Thessaly, the second in Crete, were consecrated to him. Dodonæus, from the Oracle of Dodona; Trophonius for a like Reason; Molossus, because the People of that Name worship'd him in a peculiar Manner. Ithomatus, under which Name he was principally worship'd by the People of Messenia, in the Place called Ithome, where there was a Citadel. As this People pretended that Jupiter had been educated in their Country, they ascribed to him a peculiar Worship, as we learn from Pausanias (1): and while the Festival of Jupiter Ithomatus lasted, they were wont to carry Water into his Temple during the whole Day. The same Author speaks of Games that accompany'd this Festival.

Another of his Names was Laryssæus, because he was worship'd at Larissa; Cenæus, because Hercules, after having ravaged Oechalia, erected a Temple to him upon the Promontory Cenæus in Eubæa. Cithæronius, from Mount Cithæron in Beotia, that was consecrated to him; Casius, from the Mountains of that Name, where he was worship'd. There was one of them at the Entrance to Egypt, from Arabia, and the other in Syria. Pliny, Strabo, and Stephanus mention the Temple which he had upon the Former of these Mountains; and Suidas, that which he had upon the other. Achilles Tatius makes mention of a third Temple dedicated to Jupiter Casius, in the City of Pelzium. The common Figure under which this Jupiter used to be represented, was that of a Rock,

(1) In Meñ.

a Röck, or a steep Mountain, as is to be seen on several Medals quoted by Vaillant (1); on one of which is a Temple with four Columns, with a Mountain in the Middle, and an Eagle upon the Frontispiece, and this Legend,

ZETΣ ΚΑΣΙΟΣ.

Jupiter Madbachus and Selamanes,

An Inscription found near Aleppo in Syria about forty Years ago, lets us know two of Jupiter's Surnames given him by the Syrians, after his Worship had been communicated to them by the Greeks. This Inscription, which is in Greek, contains a Vow which Cratæus the Son of Andronicus accomplish'd for his Father, in Honour of Jupiter Madbachus and Selamanes (a). It was first sent to M. Cuper, and he communicated it to Huetius, begging him to give his Opinion as to the Signification of these two Surnames (b). That learned Prelate in his Answer shews, that altho' Cratæus called Jupiter, Madbachus and Selamanes, the Gods of his Fathers, we are not therefore to make three of them, nor even two different Divinities: That there being two Surnames of the same God, was Reason sufficient for his expressing himself in that Manner. Then examining into those Surnames, whose Original he could not find in the Greek, he traces it in the oriental Languages. You may see all that he says upon it in his Answer to M. Cuper: The Result of his Enquiries is, that by Jupiter Madbachus and Selamanes the Syrians meant much the same Thing as the Latins, when they stiled Jupiter Perfectus & Pacificus. To me it would seem unquestionably certain that the Word Selamanes can indeed have no other signification than Pacatus or Pacificus: It comes from the Hebrew Salman, which mostly signifies pacatus fuit, Pacem

(1) T. i. L. 6.

(a) ΔΙΙ ΜΑΔΒΑΧΩ, ΚΑΙ ΣΕΛΑΜΑΝΕΙ, ΠΑΤΡΩΙΣ ΘΕΟΙΣ. &c.

(b) Dissertation upon various Subjects in Religion and Philology. T. II. p. 97. The Hague Edition, 1714.

Pacem habuit ; hence have been formed the Names of Salma, that is mentioned in the Prophet Hoseab (1), of Salmon the Son of Naasson, and even that of Salmanasar : For the last properly signifies, Pax Ligata, or Pacis Vinculum. The Name of Selamanes was not an Epithet of Jupiter only ; it was also a proper Name used in Syria, for Sozomenes (2) makes mention of a Monk of Palestine, the Disciple of Saint Hilarion, whom he calls Selamanes.

As to Madbachus, this Word appears to me to come from Madbach, in Place of which we commonly read Midbach in a Passage of the Psalms (3) : 'Tis a compound of the Verb Dabach adhæsit, conjunctus fuit, with the Affix ; Madbach is properly adbærere factus ; so that Jupiter Madbachus, must have been the same among the Syrians as Jupiter præsens, adhærens, proximus, among the Latins.

Pausanias (4) says that Jupiter Cappantas was likewise a Name given to the Stone upon which Orestes having sat recovered his Senses ; as to which you may see the Note of the Abbe Gedouyn (5).

The Title of Thundering and Fulminating, was the most applicable to Jupiter, since he was accounted the Lord of Thunder ever since the Cyclops had given it to him, as has been said. It would be needless to quote Authorities to prove that this Title was given him ; since it frequently occurs in Authors, in Poets and Inscriptions. Our ancient Gauls too worshipped him under the same Name ; and this was their Jupiter Taranus, as M. Prydeaux has fully proved. To this Surname I shall add that of Καταβας or Descensor, as you would say, He who descends. Upon this Subject we have a learned Dissertation by M. Burman, to which I refer the curious. It suffices to observe here, that this Name was given him not so much to denote that they believed he came down to the Earth, there to visit his Mistresses, as to signify that he gave Indications

(1) C. 10. v. 15.

(2) Hist. Eccl. L. VI. C. 32.

(3) Pl. 22. 16.

(4) In Lacon.

(5) Translation of Pausanias.

dications of his Presence there, either by the Voice of Thunder and Lightning, or by real Apparitions. Hence the Surname of Epiphanes, He who is present, who appears, which was common indeed to the other Gods, but more especially belong'd to Jupiter; and on this occasion it may not be useless to clear up a Point of Mythology, concerning the pretended Appearance of the Gods, or Theoppsy. Cicero (1) says, that the Gods frequently manifested their Presence; that they often became visible. One of the Pagans, as we learn from Arnobius (2), spoke to this Purpose; “ Let it “ not be imagined that we build Temples to shelter
“ the Gods from Rain, and Wind, from the Heat “ of the Sun, and from other Injuries of the Air;
“ No, 'tis that we may see them present, hold inter“ course and intimate Conversation with them, with “ that Awe and Respect which we owe unto them”. Diodorus Siculus (3), after having told us that Isis had found out several Sorts of Medicaments, adds that what encreased the Veneration for her, was her Presence accompanying the Remedies she gave. Plutarch says (4) that Enguis, a City in Sicily, had grown considerable chiefly by the frequent Apparition of the Mother Goddesses, as shall be more fully explained when we come to these Divinities (5). They were persuaded that the Gods and Heroes appeared especially on the Festival Days that were celebrated in honour of them, and that they never allowed themselves to be seen at any other Time, as we learn from Dion Chrysostom. From this apprehended Presence of the Gods proceeded the Veneration that was wont to be paid to their Statues, because the Gods themselves were believed to be there present, especially when they delivered their Oracles.

If we would trace the Origin of this Fable, we should undoubtedly find it to be founded on what the Pagans had learned by Tradition, concerning God's having.

(1) De Nat. Deo. L. 2.

(2) Adver. Gent. L. 6.

(3) L. 3.

(4) In Marcello.

(5) Under the Article of the Gods of the Gauls.

having manifested himself to Jacob, in that Vision of the mysterious Ladder mentioned in Scripture (1), wherein that Patriarch said he had seen God Face to Face : Jacob vocavit nomen loci illius Phanuel, dicens, vidi Deum facie ad faciem. The Place where the Patriarch had this Vision, became in Fact celebrated enough by the Monument which he set up there, to give them an opportunity of coming to the Knowledge of it. We may farther add, that they may possibly have heard of what happened to Moses on Horeb, and Mount Sinai, where he had seen God Face to Face.

We must not however imagine that the Pagans believed they could see the Essence of their Gods ; but they pretended at least to enjoy their Presence at certain Times, and to be what they called Theopti.

Jupiter was also worship'd under the Name of Invincible, Invictus ; and the Romans, according to St. Augustin (2), celebrated his Festival on the Ides of June ; as also under that of Custos, or Guardian, because, as Seneca has it (3), he was look'd upon as the Guardian of the Universe : We have Medals of Nero, with this Legend, Jupiter Custos ; under that of Latialis, which makes Lucan say (4), Et residens celsa Latialis Jupiter Alba. Under that of Inventor, to whom Hercules raised an Altar, according to Dionysius of Halicarnassus (5), when he had found his Oxen which Cacus had stolen from him. Of Jupiter Fidius, or Sponsor, under which Name a Temple was dedicated to him by Sp. Posthumius.

S. Athanasius is of Opinion that even human Victims were sacrificed to him under the same Name ; under that of Pixius, as we learn from Dionysius Halicarnassus (6), which name answered to that of Sanctus, or of Sanguis, which was given him by the Sabines : Under that of Alifetus, because in a Famine he had taken a particular Care of the Millers, that Meat might

(1) Gen. 21.

(2) De Civ. Dei. L. 7.

(3) Quest. Nat. 2.

(4) Phar. l. 1.

(5) L. 1.

(6) L. 4.

might not be wanting. That of Lucetius, was ascrib'd to him, as the Bestower of Light. Of Viminalis, whence a Mountain took its Name. He was worship'd at Tusculum under the Name of Majus, to intimate his Superiority over all the other Gods, of whom he was reckoned the Greatest and the most Powerful. Arbitrator, a Name under which he was also worship'd at Rome, and in Honour whereof P. Victor tells us there was a Portico of five Columns consecrated to him. Of Assabinus, and this was the Name he bore among the Arabians: Of Ammon, the Denomination given him by the Libyans, among whom he had a famous Temple and Oracle, which we have given some Account of in the first Volume (1). The Romans worship'd him likewise under the Name of Dapalis, because he presided over the Dishes of Meat that were served up at Table. Of Ultor, because he avenged Crimes on the Persons of the Guilty. Of Dictæus, from the Cave in Crete of that Name where he had been concealed: Of Idæus, from Mount Ida in the same Island; of Ægiuchus, because he had been suckled by a she Goat (2): Of Sthenius, as much as to say Powerful and Strong. The Greeks gave him also the Name of Ægyptius and Nilus, in which Case he was confounded with Osiris, whose name had been given to the Nile. That of Tharsus from the City of Tharsus in Cilicia, where he was worship'd in a special Manner. Of Plustios, that is to say Rich, and according to Pausanias (3) he had a Temple under that name among the Lacedæmonians. Of Physicus, and then he was taken physically for the Air or Æther, according to the Testimony of the Ancients: Of Panompheus, because his Praises were in the Mouths of all the World. Of Caræus, as much as to say exalted, as it is explain'd by Hesychius. Of Hecatombæus, whence the first Attick Month derived its Name, tho' some Mythologists will have it that that Name more particularly belong'd to Apollo.

VOL. II.

Q

OF

(1) L. 4. (2) See Lactantius L. 1. (3) In Lacœm.

Of Mæmaetes, as you would say Furious; from the fifth Attick Month, which begins Winter; this at least is the Etymology which Harpocratio gives of this Name. Of Lycæus, from a Mountain in Arcadia, where, according to Pausanias (1), Lycaon was worship'd, and instituted to his own Honour Games that were therefore named Lyceia. Of Labradæus, and then he was represented under the Figure of an Ax, which the Carians adored. Plutarch tells us that this God wears the Ax, in Place of the Thunder or Sceptre, for the following Reason. After Hercules had slain the Amazon Hippolyta, he gave his Ax to Omphale. The Kings of Lydia bore it afterwards, and transmitted it to their Successors, till Candaules thinking it not consistent with his Dignity, gave it to one of his Courtiers to wear. After the Defeat of Candaules it fell into the Hands of the Carians, who made a Statue to Jupiter, and put this Ax into his Hand. Of Expiator, because he was thought to give Men Expiation for the Crimes they committed. Of Martius, because Warriors invoked him immediately before Battle. Of Palæstes, because as we learn from Lycophron, Hercules having offered himself to a wrestling Match, and no body daring to enter the Lists with him, that God had accepted the Challenge, and wrestled with his Son. Of Melissæus, from the Name of one of his Nurses. Of Xenius, that is to say, Hospitable. Virgil invokes him under this Name. Of Hersæus, because his Altars, especially in Princes Houses, stood under the open Air in a Place inclosed with Walls. It was near one of these Altars that Priam was slain in his own Palace, as we learn from Servius (2). Of Mæragetes, because the Destinies were believed to be under his Direction; tho' to say the Truth, this Title agreed better to Fate, whose Decrees they absolutely obey'd, as shall be said in the History of those three Goddesses.

But of this enough; they who would know more of it, may find other Surnames and Epithets of Jupiter,
in

(1) In Arcad.

(2) In Æneid. L. 2.

in Pausanias, and in Lylio Gyraldi: I have only explained such of them as seemed to be most difficult.

ARTICLE V.

After what Manner Jupiter used to be represented, and what Sort of Worship was paid to him.

I. We find in the Ancients, and we see upon such Monuments as are preserved, and particularly upon Medals, several Representations of Jupiter; but the most common Manner of picturing him was, under the Figure of a majestick Man, with a Beard, seated on a Throne, holding the Thunder in his Right Hand, and a Victory in the other, having an Eagle at his Feet, with Wings display'd, bearing away Ganymede: While the God has the upper Part of his Body naked, and the lower Part covered. The Mythologists offer Reasons for this particular Attitude which I cannot omit. The Throne, say they, by its Stability, denotes the Security of his Empire. The Nakedness of the upper Part of his Body, intimated that he was visible to the higher Intelligences and in the celestial Parts of the Universe; as on the contrary the lower Part covered signified that he hides himself from this inferior World. The Sceptre, or the Thunder which he wielded in his Right Hand, intimated his Power over Gods and Men. The Victory, which he held in his Left Hand, signified that he was always Victorious; and the Eagle, that he was Lord of Heaven, as that Bird is of all the feathered Kind. Thus are these Symbols explained by Porphyry, Phurnutus, Eusebius and Suidas.

But this Way of representing this God, tho' the most common, was not Uniform. Pausanias (1) speaking of the Statue of Olympian Jupiter, says, " That God is represented sitting upon a Throne of " Gold and Ivory; and upon his Head he wears a " Crown that imitates the Olive Wreath. In his " Right Hand he holds a Victory, which is likewise

Q 2. " of

(1) In Eliac.

‘ of Gold and Ivory, adorned with Fillets and ‘ crowned ; in his left, a Sceptre exquisitely fine and ‘ glittering with all Sorts of Metals. The Bird ‘ resting upon the End of his Scepter is an Eagle.
 ‘ The Shoes and Cloak of the God, are also of ‘ Gold : Upon the Cloak are engraved all Sorts of ‘ Animals, all Sorts of Flowers, and particularly ‘ Lillies. The Throne of the God is richly sparkling ‘ with Gold and precious Stones : The Ivory and ‘ Ebony, by their Mixture, make an agreeable Con‘ trast ; the Painters Art has also intermixed various ‘ Animals and other Ornaments.”

The Thunder, the most common Symbol of Jupiter, is figured in two Manners upon Medals and ancient Monuments ; the one is a Kind of Fire-brand flaming at both Ends, tho’ in some Images you see only one Extremity on Fire ; the other a Machine pointed on both Sides, armed with two Arrows : The Legion that was called Fulminating, had this last Symbol upon the Soldiers Bucklers. Lucian, who tells us that Jupiter’s Thunder-bolt was ten Cubits in Length, seems likewise to give it this Form, when he very pleasantly introduces Jupiter complaining that having but a little time ago discharged his Thunder upon Anaxagoras, who deny’d the Existence of the Gods, he had mis’d him, because Pericles had diverted the Stroke which had lighted upon the Temple of Castor and Pollux, and reduced it to Ashes ; that his Thunder had been almost broke against the Stone, and the two chief Points of it were so blunted, that he could no longer use it till it was again set to rights.

As for the Eagle, the other common Symbol of Jupiter, besides what I have been now saying of it, Lactantius Firmicus gives this Account of it : that Jupiter, setting out from Naxos to combat the Titans, and offering a Sacrifice upon the Shore, an Eagle flew up to him, which proved a favourable Omen : According to others, the Eagle alighted upon his Head. Servius adds, that in the Combat against

gainst those Titans, the Eagle had put the Thunder into his Hand.

The Inhabitants of Crete represented Jupiter without Ears, to denote that the Sovereign of the World ought not to give a partial Ear to any particular Person, but to be equally propitious to all. The Lacedemonians, on the contrary, gave him four Ears, that he might be represented the more capable to hear Prayers, from whatever quarter of the World they were put up to him. The Inhabitants of Heliopolis, if we may believe Macrobius, represented Jupiter having his right Hand lifted up and armed with a Whip like a Charioteer, and in his left Hand the Thunder and Ears of Corn. Arrian (1), after the Sophist Anaxarchus, tells us, that the Figure of Justice always accompany'd that of Jupiter, whereof the Reason is very obvious. With Justice were sometimes joined the Graces and Hours, to signify that that God was at all Times to lend a gracious Ear to the Prayers of Men. Martianus (2) thus represents Jupiter in the Assembly of the Gods. He has, says he, upon his Head a burning Crown, and upon his Shoulders a Cloak, the Work of Minerva, and over all a white Robe spangled with Stars; holding in his right Hand two Globes, the one of Gold, and the other of Amber, while he leaned with his left upon a Tortoise. On his Feet he had green Sandals, with which he pressed a Nightingale: This Equipage bespeaks, as one sees at first Sight, the Lord of universal Nature; without needing a more particular Explication of the several Symbols. Oft times his Crown was of Oak or Olive. When instead of a Crown he had a Calathus upon his Head, he was then Jupiter Serapis, that God so highly adored in Egypt, of whom we have given an Account in the first Volume, Book VI. And when he appeared with Horns he represented Jupiter Ammon, so celebrated for the Oracle which he had in Libya.

Q 3

We

(1) Hist. 4.

(2) De Nuptiis.

We must not dissemble that most of these Symbols were owing either to the Caprice of the Artist, or to the Fancy of those who caused Statues of him to be made, as we shall shew in a Detail of the Monuments we have now remaining. Let us not omit to this Purpose a fine Passage in Cicero. Cotta, one of his Speakers, explaining the Idea that People formed to themselves of the Gods: “ But if ’tis not “ true, says he, that a God exhibits himself always “ to us under a human Form, will you still persist, “ Velleius, in defending such Kind of Absurdities?
 “ For our Parts, we may sometimes have that No“ tion, because we are apt to image to ourselves “ Jupiter, Juno, Minerva, Neptune, Vulcan, Apollo
 “ and the other Gods, with the Features that are “ given them by the Caprice of Painters and “ Sculptors; and not only with such Features,
 “ but also with such an Age, Habit, and other “ Marks(1).”

We find in the Cabinets of the curious a Jupiter with the Thunder in both Hands; In Tristan, an Infant Jupiter riding upon a She-goat with the Legend, Jovi crescenti. In Bonanni, this God wears a flaming Crown, a Patera in one Hand, and a Roller in the other. The Reverse of one of Beger’s Medals exhibits an Eagle holding in its Bill a Crown, and treading the Thunder with both its Feet. A Figure of the same God, in Boissard, has this Singularity, that Jupiter is there sitting, and above him Mercury’s Hat and Caduceus, to point out that Prudence ought always to accompany Strength and Power: And in another of the same Author he has two Sphinxes at the Foot of his Throne, the Intention whereof, we may plainly see, was to join Sagacity and Penetration to Force and Power. In a Medal publish’d by du Choul, Jupiter is riding upon a Ram; In his right Hand he holds a Sceptre, and represents Jupiter Serapis, as is signified by the Calathus which he has upon his Head. Upon another ther of the same Antiquary, Jupiter appears seated on a Throne with the Eagle and Pike: Above his Head, the Sun, represented by a large Star, is in a Chariot with four Horses, and the Moon signified by the Crescent, in a Chariot with two Bulls. At least it ought to have been so. The Reverse however of the Medal publish'd by du Choul, places the Star by the Side of the Chariot with the two Bulls, and the Crescent by the Side of the Chariot with the four Horses; whether this is an Error of the Coiner, I cannot determine. At Jupiter's Feet are two Men extended at their Length, holding Bundles, after the same Manner as the River-Gods are represented on several Medals; this may be to signify the two inferior Elements, the Earth and Water; so that thus the four Elements would be represented; the Air and the Fire by the two Chariots; the Water and the Earth by the two Men below: After this Manner it is explained by du Choul; I know not how far his Conjecture will please many People. The Circumference of the Medal represents the twelve Signs of the Zodiack: The whole properly denotes that Jupiter is the sovereign Lord of Heaven and Earth, Stars and Elements.

(1) De Nat. Deo L. 1.

Thundring Jupiter is engraved upon several of Beger's Medals, Thunder-striking the Giants; one of them who is overthrown, has Serpents Legs, for which I have given the Reason in the Article of Typhon (1). Another Jupiter upon a Medal of the Brutii, a People in Italy, has behind him the Crescent of the Moon; and in another of the Athenians, seven Stars, probably representing the seven Planets. Upon a Medallion of Antoninus Pius, you see Atlas with one Knee on the Ground, supporting the World upon his Shoulders; which imports that Jupiter was the Lord of the Universe.

The thundering Jupiter, now mentioned, is to be seen in a Monument consecrated by Poplius, and quoted by Boissard, with this Inscription, Bono Deo

Q 4

Brotoni,

(1) Vol. I. B. VI,

Brotonti, for Brontonti, To the Good God the Thunderer (a). The Figures exhibit to us a young Man sitting upon a Rock, half-naked, a Bonnet upon his Head, holding between his Arms a Lyre resting upon his Knees: Two Nymphs present him, the one with a Vase, the other with a Patera, and underneath the young Man is a She-wolf.

I observed before that Jupiter was represented under the Figure of a majestick Man, and full grown; he is however often represented upon Monuments without a Beard. Such is Vejovis, or Vejupiter who is to be seen upon the Medals of the Fonteian and Licinian Families, and the Jupiter Axur or Anxur, upon the consular Medals, and several others, some of which even bear this Inscription Jovi Juveni, To the young Jupiter.

Jupiter appears upon a Medal belonging to M. de la Cbause, with Rams Horns in his Head; and in one of Maffei, with a Radiant Crown, and the Calathus, the Symbols of Jupiter Ammon, and of Jupiter Serapis. But the most singular Image of Jupiter is that which is to be seen in Beger. Upon a Base is a Ram's Head, bearing a Pigeon; which no doubt figures the Oracle of Jupiter Ammon. Tho' I have described the Oracle of that God in the first Volume (1), yet I have not related the Fable which the Greeks delivered with respect to that Name; and therefore to satisfy the curious Reader shall insert it here. They alledged he was so called from the Greek Word, which signifies Sand, because Libya, where his Temple stood, was full of Sands. He was figured with a Ram's Horn, because he was found, said some, among Sheep and Rams, after he had been driven out of Heaven by the Giants; or from having transform'd himself into a Ram for fear of being discovered. Other Mythologists give a different Account of it: According to Hyginus, Bacchus just as he was setting out for the Indies, being ing sore distressed with Thirst, found a Ram that led him where there was Water, and he pray'd Jupiter to give this Ram a Place in Heaven; which Jupiter accordingly granted. Whereupon Bacchus built a Temple to that God, which was called the Temple of Jupiter Ammon.

(a) Brontom is a Greek Word which signifies Thundering, and no where to be found but in this Inscription. (1) L. 4.

Herodotus, of much greater Antiquity, relates this History in a different Manner, Jupiter, says he, being unwilling to shew himself to Hercules, who was exceedingly desirous to see him, and yet not being able to resist his Importunity, bethought him of this Expedient: He cut off a Ram's Head, flead it, and having wrap'd himself up in its skin, shew'd himself to Hercules in that Shape, for which Reason the Egyptians ever since have represented Jupiter with a Ram's Head. The Ammonians, who are a Colony of the Egyptians and Ethiopians, took that Custom from them.

But we are not to regard the Greeks as to the Etymologies of the Names of the oriental Deities, we having more certain Guides, Ammon is plainly Ham, the Son of Noah, as we have said.

The Antiquaries think Jupiter Capitolinus is distinguish'd from the Rest by the royal Wreath, or the Diadem which he wears; however upon the consular Medals, where he is named Capitolinus, he has not that Diadem, so great Variety is there in this Matter. The Jupiter Axur is always represented young and without a Beard: This, according to Servius is the very Reason of his having that Name. Sometimes they have thought fit to represent Jupiter to us by the Eagle alone, holding the Thunder under his Feet, as he appears in a Monument cited by Boissard.

We need not doubt but Jupiter, of all the Gods of Paganism, was Of the Worship
he whose Worship was most solemn. paid to Jupiter.
There must needs too have been an infinite Variety in the Ceremonies of this Worship, since each Nation receiving that God as the Sovereign of the Rest, added to or retrenched at Pleasure
the

the Ceremonies of his Worship, or accommodated it to that of their own Gods whom he came in the Place of. Add to this, that upon every Occasion of giving him so many different Names, they joined some new Ceremonies to the old ones, as to which we learn nothing from History. But to insist upon something more certain and determinate, we may say that no human Victims were offered to him at first, as they were to Saturn his Father, as shall be said in his History. The single Example of Lycaon, who according to Pausanias (1), offer'd up to him a Child, or according to Ovid (2) a Prisoner of War, was not followed: That Prince even drew upon himself thereby the Indignation of all the World. At Length he had Imitators, but Cecrops, upon his Arrival at Athens, abolish'd this cruel Piece of Superstition.

The most common Victims offered to this God were, the She-goat, the Sheep, the white Bull, whose Horns they took care to gild. Oftimes without any Victim, they used to make him an offering of Flower, of Salt and Incense, especially at Rome; for at Athens it was always by the Sacrifice of an Ox: And when he represented Vejovis, or Jupiter the Avenger, the Sacrifice of Attonement presented to him was a She-goat. He had a Temple at Rome, under that Name, near the Capitol, where he was represented with Arrows in his Hand, to signify that he was ready to execute Vengeance upon Crimes; among the Trees the Oak and the Olive were consecrated to him. To conclude, none worship'd him more religiously, if we may believe Cicero, than the Roman Ladies: A Matronis Romanis castissime cultus, says that Author (3).

I have said nothing here of his three Oracles, that of Dodona, that of Trophonius, and that which he had in Libya, having spoken of them in the first Volume (4).

CHAP.

(1) In Arcad.

(2) Met. L. 2.

(3) De nat. Deor. l. 1.

(4) L. 4. c. 1.

C H A P. II.

The History of Juno.

JUPITER, as has been said, married his Sister Juno, who, by this Marriage having become the chief Goddess of the Pagan World, 'tis requisite to give a particular Account of her. She was the Daughter of Saturn and Rhea, and Sister to Jupiter, Neptune, Pluto, Vesta and Ceres; and the Greeks called her simply Hera, the Lady or Mistress (a), or Megale, the Great: Whereas among the Romans the Name of Juno, came from Juvans, helpful, and consequently had the same Derivation with that of Jupiter, Juvans Pater; she was also called the Queen.

Several Countries contended for the Honour of her Birth, especially Samos and Argos, where she was indeed honoured with a peculiar Worship. If we rely upon Homer, she was nursed by Oceanus and by Tethys his Wife; but as there always is a vast Variety as to those ancient Traditions, so there was one which imported that she had been brought up by Eubæa Porcymna, & Acræa, the Daughters of the River Asterion. Others again maintain that the Hours were entrusted with the Care of her Education.

In the Time of the Titan Princes, it was a common Custom for Men to marry their own Sisters; and Jupiter, by wedding Juno, only imitated the Practice of his Father and Grand-father. His marriage too was an Effect of the warmest Affection: He had loved this young Princess from her Infancy, and had employed his Confident to act for him, who performed his Duty so well, as to gain her to a Compliance;

(a) The Philosophers who allegorized all these Histories, as has been so often said, alledged, as we are told by Athenagoras, that this Word by the bare Transposition of Letters, signified the Air, which this Goddess, considered physically, represented.

Compliance; and this is perhaps what gave Rise to the Fable that Jupiter, having made the Air extremely cold, had transform'd himself into a Cuckoo, and that Juno received him into her Bosom, a poetical Figure, which gives us an indirect View of the Success of an Intrigue. Mount Thornax, the Scene of this Adventure, was from that time called the Cuckoo-mount. This Fable, which I have read in the ancient Scholiast upon Theocritus, was in one of Aristotle's Books, which treated of the Temple of Hermione, but is not now extant. At length Jupiter married her with all Solemnity, and the Nuptials were celebrated, according to Diodorus Siculus (1), in the Territory of the Gnostians, near the River Therene, where was still to be seen in his Time a Temple kept by the Priests of the Country. There, continues that Author, they solemnize every Year the Memory of those Nuptials, by a faithful Representation of what pass'd according to the Traditions that remained concerning them: A very authentick Testimony, since nothing is a better Proof of the Truth of a Fact, than these Sorts of Festivals and Memorials. Servius (2) recites a Fable relative to his Nuptials. To make them more solemn, says he, Jupiter ordered Mercury to invite to them all the Gods, the whole human Race, and all Animals. Accordingly all came, except a Nymph named Chelone, who was so disdainful as to ridicule that Match and frame Excuses for not joining in it. Mercury, upon his Return to Olympus, finding Chelone alone absent, went down again to the Earth; and as that Nymph's House stood upon the Banks of a River, he threw her Headlong into it, and transform'd Chelone into an Animal of the same Name, which from that Time was obliged to carry its House upon its back; and, to punish her for her Raillery, he condemned her to eternal Silence. This Animal, is the Tortoise, which the Greeks call Chelone, and 'tis easy to see that the

Resemblance

(1) L. 5. (2) Upon the first Book of the Eneid, Ex Membranis Faldensibus.

Resemblance of Names had given rise to the Fiction and Metamorphosis.

We must not omit to observe, by the by, that the Tortoise from that Time, became the Symbol of Silence, on Medals, both of the Gods and Roman Emperors. Symposius has a pretty Sentiment alluding to the Use that was made of the Shell of that Animal, in the Composition of musical Instruments.

Viva nihil dixi, quæ sic modo mortua canto.

Jupiter, who was a Prince very much addicted to Women, as his very Name Zan imports, had several Mistresses, according to the Custom of that Time, and Juno had frequent Scuffles with him upon that Score. This is the Original of that bad Agreement between them which is so often mentioned by the Poets.

Tho' we cannot take all that they deliver upon this Head for true History, yet as little can we forbear mentioning it, since it necessarily belongs to Mythology. We know what Part Homer and Virgil make her act during the Siege of Troy, of which I have said enough in the Reflections upon the Theology of the Poets (1). Apollodorus (2) says she sent two Dragons, to devour Hercules in the Cradle; that she turn'd him into Madness, in a Word, that she persecuted him all his Life-time; and, to compass this cruel Design, had assumed the Appearance of an Amazon; had sent a Gad-bee among Geryon's Oxen, which that Hero was leading away, to give him the more Trouble in carrying them off; lastly, that she had turn'd Bacchus into Madness. We have Occasion elsewhere to mention the Persecutions she made Io, Calisto, and her other Rivals to suffer.

Juno, says Pausanias (3), was displeased with Jupiter, for what Reason we know not, this only we can learn that she retired into Eubæa in some Disgust. Jupiter, not being able to appease her, went to Citheron who then reigned at Platæa: This Citheron was the wisest Man of his Time. He counselled Ju- piter

(1) V. 1. B. 3.

(2) L. 1.

(3) In Beot.

piter to provide a Statue of Wood, to dress it like a Woman, put it into a Chariot with a pair of Oxen to be drawn thro' the Town, and spread a Report that this was Platæa the Daughter of Asopus, whom he was going to marry: His Counsel was followed. Forthwith the News reach'd Juno, who sets out directly, comes to Platæa, makes up to the Chariot, and in her Fury as she was going to tear in Pieces the Cloaths of the young Spouse, finds it but a Statue. Overjoy'd at the Disappointment, she easily pardon'd Jupiter, for putting the Cheat upon her, and was heartily reconciled to him. In Memory of this Event, that People celebrated a certain Festival, which they called the Dædala, because anciently all wooden Statues went by that Name. But this was not the only Time that these divine Spouses quarrell'd; Jupiter must have been provoked in earnest by his Consort, when, by Way of Punishment, he suspended her between Heaven and Earth by a golden Chain, and with a Blow of his Foot drove Vulcan from him, for offering to set her at Liberty. I am not ignorant of the physical Explications given to this Fable, nor of the Sense which M. Dacier puts upon it (1). But all that is said of it is unsatisfactory. The bad Humour of this Goddess towards Jupiter made Porphyry (2) allow her a Place only among the evil Genii: These malevolent Genii whom that Author paints in such lively Colours, that the Apologists for the Christian Religion could not have given a more hideous Representation of them.

The Ancients are not agreed as to Juno's Children. Hesiod (3), after having told us that she was the last of Jupiter's Wives, for he had actually been married before to Metis, Themis, &c. that Author, I say, gives her four Children, Hebe, Venus, Lucina and Vulcan; these same four Children, according to later Mythologists, have not all Jupiter for their Father. Apollodorus gives this Goddess only three Children,
Hebe,

(1) Transl. of the Iliad.

(2) De abf. L. 2.

(3) Theog.

Hebe, Illithyia, and Arge: Others add to these Mars and Typhon, as has been said in the first Volume, upon the Authority of the Hymn attributed to Homer (1). It further appears that the Mythologists have allegorized these Generations; since they tell us that this Goddess conceived Hebe by eating Lettices; Mars by touching a Flower, and Typhon by Means of Vapours which she made to arise from the Earth, which Vapours she received into her Womb; Mysteries of Nature whereof it would be equally useless and unpracticable to attempt an Explanation. Mythologists even assert that Jupiter's Rage against her was not without Foundation, since, not to mention her bad Humour, she was accused of some Intrigues with the Giant Eurymedon, and with some others.

We may observe, by the by, that the Statues of Juno did not always represent a single Goddess, but had a Relation to several: Thus they had somewhat of those Pallas, Venus, Diana, Nemesis, of the Parcæ and other Goddesses; so that they might be reckoned of that Kind of Statues, which were called Panthæa. However the more common Way of representing her was under the Figure of a Woman sitting upon a Throne, holding in one Hand a Sceptre, and in the other a Spindle, and having upon her Head a radiant Crown. According to some others of the Ancients, it was Iris that encircled her head, for Iris, the Daughter of Tbaumas, was look'd upon as her Messenger; a Circumstance celebrated in the Poets, but to be referred to Juno, only in so far as she was a physical Divinity, and taken for the Air, whose Serenity is declared by Iris, or the Rainbow.

Cicero informs us (2) in what Manner they represented Juno of Lanuvium, different from that wherein she was represented at Argos and Rome. “Your “ Juno, says Cotta to Velleius, never manifests her“ self to us, not so much as in a Dream, but with “ her Goats-skin, her Javelin, her little Buckler,
“ and her Sandals, crooked at the Point before.”

Whence

(1) V. I.

(2) De nat. Deo. L. 1.

Whence that Author concludes, that the Idea they had formed of Juno, must have been different, as to those of Lanuvium, from what it was at Argos, and at Rome. Pausanias (1) thus describes the Juno of Argos. As you enter into the Temple, says he, you see upon a Throne the Statue of that Goddess, of an extraordinary Bigness, all of Gold and Ivory. Upon her Head she wears a Crown, over which are the Graces and the Hours. She holds in one Hand a Pomegranate, and in the other a Sceptre, at the End of which is a Cuckoo. I have already spoke of this Bird : As for the Pomegranate, it alluded, no Doubt, to some scandalous Mystery, as to which the Author says he chooses to be silent.

Around the Goddess's Throne were the three Graces. But we must observe that this Statue of Juno was modern ; that is to say, in the Time of Polycletes who had made it. This Author says, that near the Statue of Hebe, which accompanies that of Juno, there is one of that Goddess very ancient, which stands upon a Column ; but he adds, the most ancient of all is one made of the Wood of the wild Pear-tree. It is of a moderate Size, and the Goddess is there represented sitting. But, with that Author's leave, there were more ancient ones ; and Clemens of Alexandria (2), from the Authority of the ancient Poets, says that Goddess was represented at Argos by a simple Column, and indeed the first Statues of the Gods were nothing but Misshapen Stones, Pyramids or Columns, as has been said in the first Volume (3).

As some peculiar Attribute was given to every God, Juno had for her share Kingdoms, Empires and Riches ; accordingly this is what she offered to Paris, if he would adjudge to her the Prize of Beauty. She was also believed to have a particular Care of the Dress and Ornaments of Females ; and for this Reason you see her represented in her Statues with her Hair elegantly adjusted. Hence it came to be a proverbial

(1) In Cor. 42.

(2) Strom. L. i.

(3) B. 3.

bial Phrase, that the Attire-Women presented the Mirror to Juno.

To come now to the Names that were given to this Goddess; besides those we have already mentioned she was called Sospita, because she watched over the healthful State of the Air, whose Intemperature is the Cause of Diseases. This Goddess had three Temples under this Name; one at Lanuvium, and the other two at Rome; and Cicero informs us (1) that the Consuls, before they enter'd upon their Office, were obliged to offer a Sacrifice to her.

Another of her Names was the Queen, under which Name she had a Statue at Veii, that was transported to the Aventine Mount, under the Dictatorship of Camillus, where it was consecrated by the Ladies of the City (a). So much was it revered, that none but her Priest could touch it. When she presided over Women in Child-bed, and was confounded with Diana, she got the Name of Lucina, and was represented as a Matron holding a Cup in her right Hand, and a Spear in her left, with this Inscription, Junoni Lucinae. Sometimes she was represented sitting upon a Chair, holding in her left Hand a Child in swadling Cloaths, and in the Right a Flower pretty much resembling a Lilly; or else a Whip and a Scepter, the Whip signifying a happy Delivery. Accordingly, when they who celebrated the Lupercalia run thro' the City with a Whip in their Hand, the big-belly'd Women threw themselves in their Way to be beat by them, believing this would procure them a happy Delivery, as we have said in the Description of that Festival. Others derive the Name of Lucina, from the sacred Grove, where she had a Temple, as we learn from Ovid:

Gratia Lucinae dedit hæc tibi nomina lucus, Vel quia principium, tu Dea, lucis habes.

VOL. II. R Accordingly

(1) Pro Murena.

(a) See what we have said of the Transportation of this Statue, and of the Fable delivered about it by Titus Livius and Plutarch, in the 3d Book, Vol. I.

Accordingly we have remark'd in the first Volume (1), that these sacred Groves were called Luci a Lucendo, as Servius has it. It was upon occasion of this Name, as we are told by Lucius Piso (2), that Servius Tullius, in order to know the Number of those who were born in the City, who died there, or who took on the manly Gown, made a Law that for each a Piece of Money should be carried into the Temple of Illitbya, who, according to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, was the same with Lucina. For the same Reason she was called Egeria and Natalis, because she presided over the Day of the Nativity, as we learn from Tibullus:

Natalis Jūno! sanctos cape thuris acervos.

When she was taken for the Goddess who presides over Marriage, she had the Name of Juga and Pronuba, as it is in Virgil (3); and under this Name she had an Altar in the Street called Jugaria. The Epithet of Pronuba had the same Original, and all who enter'd into Wedlock offered to her a Victim, from which they took away the Gall and threw it behind the Altar.

Accordingly she was the Goddess whom they invoked in Marriages, whence again she got the Surname of Domiduca, because she had the Care of conducting the Spouses Home, of Unxia, Cinxia, and among the Greeks of Gamelia, and Zygia.

She was denominated Calendaris, because the Calends of each Month were consecrated to her, and at that Time Sacrifices were offered up to her. Novella or Februata, because the Pontiffs paid her a peculiar Worship on the first Day of February. Quirita, under which Name Dionysius of Halicarnassus informs us (4) that a publick Banquet was prepared for her in each Curia. Pliny says, that she had a Temple adorned with fine Paintings under the Name of Juno Ardia, and an Altar under that of Lucinia, where the Ashes that remained from the Sacrifice

(1) B. 3. . . . (2) Annal. 1. . . . (3) Æn. L. 4.

(4) L. 2.

Sacrifice continued immoveable, whatever Wind blew.

Women in Childbed invoked her under the Names of Opigenia, and of Populonia, which last was given her on Account of the publick Prayers that were put up to her by the People. That of Matuta, under which she had a Temple at Rome, is well enough known from the Antiquaries : That of Juno Conservatrix, is represented by a Stag, in a Medal of Saloninus ; because that of five Hinds with golden Horns, and larger than Bulls, which Diana one Day pursued in the Plains of Thessaly, she took only four, and the fifth which was saved by Juno, became the Symbol of that Goddess under the Name of Conservatrix.

Juno, stiled Moneta, had a Temple at Rome, and she is represented upon Medals with the Instruments of Coinage, the Hammer, the Anvil, the Pincers, and the Die, with the Latin Word Moneta. Others however will have it, that this Name comes from the Verb Moneo, I warn, advise, because, a little before the Galls besieged Rome, she had warned the People to buy a Sow big with young ; which Etymology is supported by Cicero's Authority : Junonem illam appellatam Monetam, a moneo videlicet Verbo, denominatam. Bunea, from one Buneus, the Son of Mercury, who raised a Temple to her at Corinth, as it is in Pausanias (1).

The Original of the Name Tropæa, given her by Lycophron, is owing to her presiding over Triumphs. The Sabines worship'd her under that of Curis, and represented her with a Spear in her Hand. We have, in Boissard, a fine Monument dedicated by Claudia Sabbatis to Juno the Gracious or the Benign, Junoni Placidæ ; where this Goddess appears sitting between Vesta who holds a lighted Torch in her Hand, and Mercury who bears a Branch of Laurel.

To this Goddess were given other Names and Surnames, some of them taken from the Places where she was worship'd, and others from some Attributes that were peculiar to her. In the first Class we reckon that of Samia, because the City Samos was distinguish'd for the Worship it paid her, as may be seen in Virgil (1); of Imbrasia, from the River Imbrasus, which is in the same Island; of Lacinia, from a Promontory in Italy, where she had a Temple; whether this was the Name of the King who built it, or of a Robber whom Hercules slew, as Servius remarks. Strabo and Titus Livius (2) give the Description of this Temple, venerable for its Sanctity, and celebrated for the rich Presents wherewith it was adorn'd: Inclytumque Templum divitiis etiam, non tantum sanctitate sua, says the last of these Authors.

(1) In Corinth.

She had likewise the Names of Candarena, from a Town in Papblagonia; of Citheronia from Mount Citheron; of Rescintbis, from a Mountain in Thrace of that Name; of Ammonian, from an Altar that was erected to her Honour in the Sands of Libya, in like Manner as to Jupiter Ammon: Of Acrian, because she was worship'd in Acropolis, or in the Fortrefs of Corinth; of Albana, because she was worship'd at Alba; of Cypra, a Name which she had upon the Coasts of Italy; Dirphya, from the Mountain Dirphy; of Gabia, from Gabium a Town in Italy; of Lacedæmonia, from Lacedæmon; Olympica from Olympia; Pelasgia, from the Pelasgi; Pharygea, from Pharygis; Prosymma, from an Argolick City; Telchinia, from Telchinos; Tethla, from a Town in Platea.

Those of the second Sort are, Ægophage, because they used to sacrifice to her Goats; Aerian, because she was taken for the Air; Boopis, a Name given her upon Account of her large Eyes. Caprotina, which had the same Original with Sespita, upon Account of the Skin and Horns of the Goat which she wore on her Head; Equestris, in Elis; Heno- nochia,

(1) Æn. L. 1.

(2) L. 5.

nochia, as you would say who holds the Reins; Opi-gena, because she was the Daughter of Ops or Rhea; Parthenos, or Virgin: They had a Notion that this Goddess by bathing herself every Year in the Fountain called Canathos, which was at Nauplia, recovered her Virginity; a Fable founded, according to Pausanias (1), upon the secret Mysteries that were celebrated in Honour of this Goddess. The Epithet of Teleia, referred to the Time when she became marriageable: She was likewise denominated Chera, the Widow, upon Account of her Differences with Jupiter. In fine, Pausanias calls her Prodromia, as much as to say, Juno over the Vestible.

Of all the Divinities of the Pagan World, there was none whose Worship was more solemn, and more universal than that of Juno. The History of the Prodigies she had wrought, and of the Vengeance she had taken upon Persons who had slighted her, or who had in any Sort compared themselves to her, had so struck People and inspired them with so much Awe and Dread, that no Means were omitted to appease and mitigate her, when she was thought to be offended; so that Authorities are not wanting to prove that her Worship was still more solemn and more extensive than that of Jupiter himself. It was not confined to Europe alone, but found its Way into Asia, especially into Syria; and into Egypt and other Parts of Africk. Which, however, must be understood with Regard to an Affinity of Religion that was between the People of Asia and of Europe, which we have taken Notice of more than once: So that when I say the Syrians worship'd Juno, whom they named the Syrian Juno, the Egyptians her who was called the Egyptian Juno, and the Libyans, the Ammonian: I mean that their Worship was addressed to Astarté, and to Isis, under the same Ceremonies which the Greeks used towards their Juno.

There were every where thro' Greece and Italy, Temples, Chapels, or Altars dedicated to this Goddess,

R 3

(1) In Corinth. c. 38.

deſs, and in Places of Diſtinction there were ſeveral of them. Moſt of thoſe Names whereof we have given the Liſt, declared the Places where theſe Temples and Chapels ſtood, or carry'd ſome Alluſion to the Occaſions of their being built; and there is no doubt but upon each of thoſe Occaſions ſome new Ceremony was added, tho' Hiſtory ſeldom mentions it.

Among the more celebrated Towns, there were three that paid a more particular Worſhip to this Goddeſs than others, namely, Argos, Samos and Carthage, Quam fertur Juno, terris magis omnibus unam, Poſthabita coluiſſe Samo (1).

The Priſteſſes of Juno of Argos were highly reſpected in Greece; and their Priſthood ſerved to diſtinguiſh the principal Eras of the Grecian Hiſtory.

Among the Honours paid to this Goddeſs, we muſt not forget what Pauſanias ſays (2), that the Priſteſſes of Argos took care to adorn her Altar and Statue, and to make Garlands for her of the Herb Aſterion, ſo called becauſe it grew in the River of that Name, which was in the Neighbourhood of the Temple. Theſe ſame Priſteſſes drew the Water which they made uſe of in the Sacrifices and ſecret Myſteries, from the Fountain Eleutheria which was but a little Way from the Temple.

From among the Birds, the Hawk, the Goffin and above all the Peacock, were ſacred to her. The laſt frequently accompanies her Statues, and it was from her ſuperior Love to it, that ſhe placed in its Tail the Eyes of Argus after Mercury had put him to death. If we credit *Elia*n (3), the Egyptians conſecrated to her the Vultur. Dittany and the Poppy, were the Plants which the Greeks offered to her, when they took her for Juno Lucina: Laſtly, among the Animals none was more peculiarly conſecrated to her than the Ew-lamb, which was the moſt

(1) Virgil. Æn. L. 1.

(2) In Corinth.

(3) De Animal.

most common Victim offered to her in Sacrifice: However it was also usual to offer up to her a Sow on the first Day of each Month. These Sacrifices were commonly offered by the Wife of this Goddess's high Priest. Pausanias observes that the Elians, when they sacrificed to the Goddess whom they called the Mistress, that is to say, to Juno, used no Wine in her Libations, and he adds they sacrificed in like Manner to Juno Ammonia. The Priestess now mentioned was called the Queen, as her Husband was denominated the King (a).

We may easily judge what high Veneration must have been paid to Juno, especially by the Women, since, as has been elsewhere observed, their Guardian Deities were called from her Junones, as those of the Men were denominated Genii. Statius (1) gives Juno of Argos the Thunder.

Disjice; & in Thebas aliud, potes, excute fulmen.

But none of the Ancients were of his Opinion, since Servius assures us (2) upon the Authority of the Tuscan Books, where the whole Ceremonial of the Gods was regulated, that none but Jupiter, Vulcan and Minerva had that Power.

Apuleius (3) sums up the Honours that were paid to Juno in one comprehensive Idea by telling us, she was worship'd as the Queen of the Goddesses. But nothing proves so much the profound Veneration they had for her, as the Story which Solon told Cresus, which is related by Herodotus (4) and Plutarch (5). “ Cresus, in the Height of his Prosperity, “ asked Solon if he knew any Man happier than “ he was. Solon answered, he had known one of his “ Fellow-citizens named Tellus, who, thro' the whole “ Course of his Life having enjoyed a full Supply “ of his Wants, left Children behind him all of “ them virtuous, and finished his Days in Honour

R 4

after

(a) See what has been said upon this Subject, Vol. II. Book IV. in the Article of the Priests.

(1) Theb. l. 4. v. 69.

(2) Upon the first of the Eneid.

(3) Miles. 6.

(4) In Clio.

(5) In Solon.

“ after he had signalized his Valour in fighting for “ his Country, and put its Enemies to flight.” After this Tellus, replied Cresus, do you know any one happier than I? I knew two more reply’d Solon, Cleobis and Biton, two Brothers remarkable for their filial Duty to their aged Mother. When she was to have gone to pay her Devotion in Juno’s Temple, the Oxen that were to have drawn her Chariot could not be got ready in due Time; upon which the pious Youths, submitting their Necks to the Yoke, took up the Chariot, drew their Mother in it for the Space of full forty Furlongs, and set her down at the Temple-gate. While all the Spectators congratulated the happy Mother of such pious Children, she sent up a secret Prayer to the Goddess that she would bestow upon them what was the greatest Blessing to Men.
 After this Prayer they sacrificed, took the usual Repast, and fell asleep in the same Temple, but never more awoke; the Goddess in Sleep having set their Souls at Liberty by Death, as the greatest Good that comes to Mortals. The People of Argos, where this Event happened, erected Statues to their Memory, which were sent to Delphos. Pausanias tells us that at Argos was to be seen this very Story represented in Marble, where Cleobis and Biton yoked in the Chariot, were drawing their Mother to Juno’s Temple (a).

There is great Probability that this is the Story represented on two Marbles publish’d by Beger: However, here the Sons are not yoked in either of the two Chariots, but the two Oxen. The Mother is standing upon one of the Chariots, and the two Sons by the two Animals, conducting them, and looking attentively if they move fast enough to arrive in Time; for there are some of the Ancients who assure us that the Oxen were yoked to the Chariot, but not going fast enough, the two Brothers put themselves in their Place. In the other Monument the two Brothers are lying dead before Juno’s Temple, the Mother holding a Torch in either Hand seems to be praying for her Sons

(a) This Story is told by Cicero: Tusc. 1. 47. And Virgil, it is thought, alludes to it: Geo. 3. 531.

Sons the Happiness of the other Life, as Euripides tells us Medea did for hers. In a third Monument, Aurora appears in a Chariot with two Horses, whose Bridle is held by Biton and Cleobis, and their Figure is thus represented: They are both kneeling like young Children before their Mother, who embraces them, or, as others conjecture, before Juno herself, who is conferring Happiness upon them; but these are Singularities, as to which we forbear to offer our Conjectures.

The Greeks and Romans having always reckoned Juno the Goddess of Marriage, whence she got the Name of Pronuba, 'tis proper to subjoin to her Article what relates to the other Gods whom these two Nations believed to preside over that State.

Hymen, or Hymenæus, Thalassius, and other Gods of Marriage.

As the Greeks had their God Hymenæus, so the Romans had their Thalassius and some other Gods whom they invoked in Marriages. The former also gave the Name of Hymen to the Union of the two Spouses, and that of Hymenaia to the Festival that was celebrated in Honour of the God who presided over Marriages (1); and 'tis in this Sense we are to understand that Expression in Ovid, Hymenæa canunt. Mythologists, in tracing the Original of the Word Hymenæus, have offered several Conjectures not worth while to repeat: The most probable is that which derives the Word from the Cohabitation of the married Parties; but if the Story related by Lactantius the Grammarian, and by Lutatius (2) be true, all these Etymologies turn to nothing. There was at Athens, says he, a young Man of surpassing Beauty, but extremely poor, and of obscure Birth, whose Name was Hymenæus. At that Time of Life when it is easy for a young Man to counterfeit the other Sex, he fell in Love with a young Athenian Lady; but she being of a Family far above his, he durst not disclose to her his secret Passion, but contented himself with following

(1) Suidas.

(2) In Theb. 8.

following her wherever she went. One Day as the Ladies of Athens were going to celebrate the Feast of Ceres upon the Sea-Shore, and his Mistress was to join them, he disguised himself like a Woman; and, tho' unknown, his handsome Appearance gain'd him easy Admission into that devout Assembly. In the mean Time some Pirates leaving their Ship came Ashore, and carry'd off the whole Procession; and having travelled with them a great Way, were so fatigued that they lay down to rest themselves upon the Sea-Shore where they fell asleep. Hymeneus now resuming Courage, exhorts all his Companions to kill their Ravishers; which accordingly they did with him: Then after promise of a speedy Return, he went to Athens, where having assembled the People, he declared who he was, and what had happened, adding that if they would allow him to marry the one of the ravish'd Ladies whom he loved, he would deliver up to them all the Rest. His Proposal being accepted, he married his beloved Mistress; and upon Account of so happy a Marriage the Athenians for ever after invoked him at their Marriages, and celebrated Festivals to his Honour (a).

The Poets finding this God made to their Hand, took care to give his Genealogy; but their Notion as to this being without Foundation, they don't agree together. For while Catullus says he was the Son of Urania, Asclepiades gives him Calliope for his Mother and Apollo for his Father: Others say he was brought forth by Clio. If we may believe Seneca (1), he had Bacchus to his Father; and as this Poet Names not his Mother, some will have her to be Venus (b).

Tho' the Romans had adopted this Divinity of the Greeks, and invoked him as well as they, in their Marriages, yet they would needs have also a God for Marriage

(a) Servius upon the first of the Eneid, and Donatus upon the Adelphi of Terence, relate the same Story with some Variation.

(1) In Medea.

(b) See the Descriptions that are given of him by Catullus, Seneca and Claudius.

Marriage of their own making, and having found in their History an Event in some Manner correspondent to that which we have now related, they sought no more. At the Time when the Romans committed a Rape upon the Sabine Women (1), a Troop of Soldiers were carrying off a Virgin of Make and Beauty far surpassing the Rest. Some Officers attempting to force her from them, they fell a crying that she was destined to Thalassius, who was a young Roman of distinguish'd Merit; upon which they gave them back their Prize, and even joined in Company with them, repeating aloud the Name of Thalassius, who thus received her to Wife and proved the happiest of Husbands: From that Time they sung Thalassius at Nuptials, as the Greeks did Hymenæus.

Titus Livius and Servius tell this Story much the same Way: Plutarch, from whom I have taken this Recital, adds, however, that Sestius Sylla of Carthage, a Man equally favoured by the Muses and Graces, had formerly said that Thalassius was the Word which Romulus gave his Soldiers in the Rape of the Sabines; that all those who seized any of them cried out Thalassius, and that hence the Custom was kept up in the Celebration of Marriages. We have yet another Account very different from this: For Juba, followed herein by several other Historians, said the Word Thalassius, was nothing but an Exhortation given to the married Women to be Lovers of Work, which consists in spinning Wooll, called by the Greeks Thalassia: Upon which Plutarch observes, that if it was really so that the Romans at that Time used the Word Thalassia in the same Sense with the Greeks, a very probable Account might be given of this Custom: For the Sabines actually insisted upon this, as an Article of the Peace between them and the Romans, that their Daughters should not be obliged to do any Thing else in their Husbands Houses but spin Wooll: 'Tis therefore very probable, concludes that Author, that in all the Marriages since made, the

(1) Plut. in Rom.

the Wife would be sure to cry Thalassius, to remind her Husband of the only Service she was bound to perform.

Jugatinus was another God who presided over Wedlock, as his Name, purely Latin, sufficiently implies. When the young Spouses had plighted their Faith in Presence of their Relations, they again invoked another God, whom they called Domiducus, whose Function was to conduct them to the House where they were to dwell; and then in the Evening they put up a Prayer to the Goddess Prema who presided over the Consummation of Marriage; as Virginienfis, another Divinity invoked on this Occasion, loosed the Bride's Girdle, which Function the Greeks gave to their Lyfizona. I say nothing of Perfica, Pertunda, and Subigus, mentioned by Arnobius, lest I should be led to transgress the Bounds of Modesty.

Plutarch still reckons up other Gods of Marriage, among the Romans. They invoked, says he (1), Jupiter Teleius, or the Adult, Juno Teleia, Venus, Pitbo or Persuasion, and Diana. As these Gods were five in number, so it was not permitted in the Nuptial Ceremony, to light either a greater or smaller Number of Torches. Saint Augustin (2) makes mention of these five Gods of Marriage, and thence takes Occasion to address the Pagans in this Manner. "Where was the Use of recommending the Spouses to the Gods of Marriage, that they might be well married?" But, with that pious Doctor's good leave, the Romans acted consistently enough; for since they acknowledged Gods who presided over Marriage, they were bound to invoke them; however wrong they were in the Principle, they were right in the Consequence.

It might indeed be proved against them that their Gods were vain Phantoms; but while they accounted them the Objects of Adoration, it was incumbent upon them to pay them a religious Worship.

CHAP.

(1) In Caus. Rem.

(2) De Civ. Dei L. 3.

C H A P. III.

The History of Saturn.

TH O' we have already spoke of Saturn, yet as it was only in Relation to Jupiter, we shall now finish his History without repeating what has been said. Since he was of the illustrious Family of the Titans, which furnish'd Greece with so many of their Gods; it will be proper to observe, in the Entry, 1st, That there were two Sorts of them known to the Orientals, and three Sorts acknowledged by the Greeks. The Titans known to the Former were first those primitive Architects mentioned by Sanhoniathon, in the eighth Generation before the Deluge. That ancient Author speaking of the Personages who signalized themselves in it, says: "One was called Agros, the other Agrotes; who are thus distinguish'd: First as to Religion, the Image of the Latter is venerated in Phenicia: He has a very magnificent Temple at Byblos, and is there called the greatest of Gods: And then as to Arts, these two Brothers adorn Houses, from their Porticoes &c. And the Men of that City are denominated Agrotai, or Errants of the Field, and the others κυνηγοί, Hunters with Dogs. They were likewise called Aletai and Titanes." Here are, no doubt, the first Titans. The second were the Sons of Tith or Titæa, who made War upon the Gods, and who consequently lived in the Time of Chronos or Saturn, and of Zeus or Jupiter.

The Greeks admitted three Sorts of them; the Titans, Sons of the Earth, that is to say, the first Men; the Titans who made War upon the Gods, and the Titan Architects, to whom they ascribed the building of several Cities, as Tyrinthus, Troy, &c. These three Kinds of Titans are in Reality but two, since those were the Sons of the Earth who made War upon the Gods; and the two other Kinds that remain remain are plainly the same with those mention'd by Sanboniatbon, the Tradition which he had followed having been carried into Greece by the Phenicians, and copied by Hesiod, Homer, and the other Greek Poets.

These Titans having built Cities and Fortresses, no wonder that they extended their Conquests and subdued several Nations, which for want of a Retreat and Sanctuary against Force, were easy to be reduced; hence undoubtedly is the vast Empire whereof the Greeks make mention.

We are to observe in the second Place, that Diodorus Siculus, in the third Book of his History where he treats of the Titans, having delivered the Tradition of the Nations in the western Parts of Africa, as has been said when we were upon the Theogony of the Atlantides (1), comes in the fifth Book to that of the Cretans, which is undoubtedly the best vouched; For if the Titans were known in Africa, it was not till after the Conquest of it, since they really came from Asia, whence they spread themselves thro' several Countries, and particularly thro' Crete.

According to the Atlantides, Titea had by her Husband Uranus eighteen Sons, who from the Name of their Mother were called Titans: According to the Tradition of the Cretans, this Family consisted only of six Sons and five Daughters; and, to shew that the same Persons are meant in both Traditions, the Cretans give these Children the same Father and Mother, namely, Celus and Terra; that is Uranus, and Titea. The Six Sons were Saturn, Hyperion, Cæus, Japetus, Crius, and Oceanus; and the five Daughters Rhea, Themis Mnemosyne, Phæbe, and Tethys. All of them bless'd Mankind with some useful Discovery, which wrought upon their Gratitude and won from them an eternal Recompense, as shall be said in the Sequel.

To come now to Saturn, Diodorus Siculus (2) tells us: " This Prince when he came to the Crown, propagated

(1) V. 1. B. 2.

(2) L. 3.

propagated his Fame and Renown to different Places of the Earth, by polishing and improving his Subjects who led a savage Life before. He establish'd Justice and Equity every where, and the Men who lived under his Empire, were reckoned humane and of a Beneficent Disposition, and by Consequence extremely happy. He reigned chiefly in the western Countries, where his Memory is still in Veneration. Accordingly, the Romans, the Carthaginians while their City stood, and all the People of those Provinces instituted Festivals and Sacrifices, in Honour of him, and several Places were consecrated to him by their very Names. The Wisdom of his Government had in some Sort banish'd Vice, and gave Men a Taste of an Empire of Innocence, Peace and Felicity. The Poet Hesiod gives a happy Description of it to this Effect.

These were the Subjects of old Saturn's Reign :
 Like Gods they liv'd, with Bosoms void of care,
 To Toil and Pain estrang'd. Cold Age ne'er shook
 Their vigorous Limbs ; but in eternal Feast
 They pass'd the joyous Time : Then, full of Days,
 As if o'ercome by gentle Sleep, they dy'd.
 In Life each Good was theirs ; the fruitful Earth,
 Spontaneous, pour'd perpetual Harvest round ;
 Which, in glad Ease, they quietly enjoy'd.
 And when, descending to the Grave, in Dust
 They shrouded lay, their Souls, by Jove's high Will,
 Were Guardian Genii made ; in airy Forms,
 To wander Earth, and bless the Kindred Just ;
 Unseen, observing every Deed of Man,
 Of Wealth and bless th' Awarders here below. *

ALL

* 'Οι μὲν ἐπὶ Κρόνῳ ἦσαν, ὅτ' ἔσαν ἑμβασίλευεν.
 Ὡς τε θεοὶ δ' ἔζων, ἀκηδέα θυμὸν ἔχοντες,
 Νόσφιν ἄτερ τε πόνων καὶ οἰζύος· ἐδ' ἐτι δειλὸν
 Γῆρας ἐπ' ἦν· αἰεὶ δ' ἐπόδας καὶ χεῖρας ὅμοιοι
 Τέρποντ' ἐν θαλίῃσι, κακῶν ἔκτοσθεν ἀπάντων·
 Θνήσκον δ' ὡς ὕπνω δαδμημένοι· ἐσθλα δ' ἐπάντα
 Τοῖσιν ἔην· καρπὸν δ' ἔφερε ζείδωρος ἄρεα
 Ἀυτομάτη, πολλὸν τε καὶ ἄφθονον· οἱ δ' ἐθέλημοι
 Ἥσυχοι ἔργα νέμοντο, σὺν ἐσθλοῖσιν πολέεσσιν.

Ἄντδ

All the Latin Authors are unanimously agreed that Saturn reigned in Italy after Janus, who had receiv'd him into his Dominions, upon his being dethroned by Jupiter, as shall be said in the following Chapter. He governed this new State with so much Justice and Equity, that he made himself to be adored by his Subjects, and hence that Period wherein he reigned came to be accounted the Golden Age. The Truth is, that Prince putting all his Subjects upon a level left no Room for one to be in Servitude to another ; no body possessed any personal Property ; all things were common, as if the World had been but one Patrimony. 'Tis on this Article that Ovid's Talent of versifying peculiarly shines.

To keep up the Memory of that happy Period of Time, during the Festival of the Saturnalia that were celebrated in Honour of him in the Month of December, the Servants, as has been said under the Article of the Greek Festivals, sat at Table with their Masters, or according to other Authors, they were served by the Masters themselves. The Mountain, afterwards called the Capitoline Mount, in old Times went under the Name of the Saturnine Mount ; and if we believe Dionysius Halicarnassius and Justin, all Italy was named Saturnia ; a Proof of Antiquity that may better be relied upon than even the Testimonies of Authors, who not being contemporary to the Facts, have not so much Authority as those Names that were given in the very Time.

Cicero, in his Books on the Nature of the Gods, where he brings in two Philosophers speaking on this Subject, seems to have considered Saturn's History only in a physical Light, when one of his Speakers says he was that God who governed the Course of the Times and Seasons; agreeable

to

Ἀλλὰς ἐπεὶ κεν τὐτο γένος κάλα γαῖα κάλυψεν,
Τοὶ μὲν δαίμονες εἰσι, Διὸς μεγάλῃς δ' αἰ βελᾶς, Ἑσθλῆι, ἐπιχθόνιοι, φύλακες θνητῶν ἀνθρώπων.
οἱ ῥα φυλάσσειν τε δίκας, καὶ σχέτλια ἔργα,
ἥερα ἑσάμενοι, πάντῃ φοιτῶντες ἐπ' αἶαν,
Πλεῖστοτάι. Καὶ τὐτο γέρας Βασιλῆϊον ἔσχον.

Hesiod. Oper. & Dies. L 1. v. 101.

to what his Name signifies in Greek: For Cronos which is the Greek Name of Saturn, if you give it the Aspiration, is the same with Chronos, Time. Thus, according to Cicero, when it was said Saturn devoured his Children, it was a plain Allegory taken from Time which devours and consumes all things: Tempus edax rerum, as Horace has it. In like manner the Name of Saturn, which the Latins gave him, signify'd according to that Author, one who is full of Years: Quod Saturatur Annis. Other Philosophers considered only the Planet that bears the Name of Saturn, which is the greatest and highest of all. And from that Planet the same Philosophers drew also several Allegories; thus, according to them, what the Poets say of the Prison of Saturn, where he is chained up by Jupiter, signifies merely that the malignant Influences emitted from the Planet Saturn were corrected by the milder Influences that proceed from Jupiter. In like manner they believed that Saturn, as a Planet, being Cold and Dry, over-ruled Persons of a melancholy and splenatick Disposition. As to the Seasons of the Year, the same Planet presided over Autumn; and in the Week over the seventh Day. The Platonicks, according to Lucian (1), fancy'd that Saturn, as being nearest Heaven, that is to say, the most distant from us, presided over Contemplation. But let us wave these vain Subtilities, to come to something more solid.

Gerard Vossius (2) justly distinguishes several Saturns: 'Tis even thought, as we find in the Book of equivocal Names, which some learned Men ascribe to Xenophon, that in the earliest Times most Kings took this Name; but not to vouch for a Fact which is nowhere to be found but in that Work, whose Author is uncertain, the most ancient Saturn, according to Vossius, is Adam himself: the second is Noah; the third is he whom Sanchoniathon speaks of, under the Name of Il, which Eusebius takes to be only a con-

VOL. II.

S

traction

(1) De Astrol.

(2) De Idolis. l. 1.

traction of the Name Israel or Jacob. The fourth is the Moloch, whom we have discoursed of at full Length in the History of the Gods of Syria; and he again appears to be Abraham, from the Affinity we have observed to be between the one and the other. The fifth is the Titan Prince who reign'd in Italy, whom some have even confounded with Janus whose History we are coming to, giving the one two Faces as well as the other.

Virgil (1) has told the Story of this latter Saturn in such fine Verses, that I can't choose but quote them here.

*Primus ab æthereo venit Saturnus Olympo
Arma Jovis fugiens, & regnis exul ademptis.
Is genus indocile, & dispersum montibus altis
Composuit, legesque dedit, Latiumque vocari
Maluit, bis quoniam tutus latuisset in oris:
Aureaque, ut perhibent, illo sub rege fuere
Sæcula, sic placida Populos in pace regebat.*

To say something now of the Worship of Saturn, we are to observe in the first Place, that this Worship was neither so solemn nor so extensive as that of his Son Jupiter; and it would seem that his cruel Manner of using his Sons, made him lose that Superiority which undoubtedly he would otherwise have had over the rest of the Gods; whereas Rhea his Wife, for the zealous concern she had to save her Children from the Cruelty of her Husband, preserved hers, and was worship'd all over the Pagan World as the Great Mother of the Gods.

However several Places are distinguished for the Worship paid to Saturn; but it was chiefly among the Carthaginians that he was particularly honoured. Our ancient Gauls and the neighbouring Nations were also distinguish'd Votaries of Saturn. No body doubts but human Sacrifices were offered to him, as well as to Moloch, especially in the Gauls and at Carthage; and this barbarous custom continued in that City till the Romans made themselves Masters of

(1) Æn. 8. 319.

of it. It was also practised in Italy tho' it did not subsist there long. Dionysius of Halicarnassus (1), who was better versed in the Antiquities of Italy than any other Author, tells us that Hercules, upon his Return from Spain into Italy, abolish'd it entirely; and having erected an Altar to that God upon the Saturnin Mount, offered to him those Sorts of Victims which the Greeks call Τύματα ἀχνα, which, according to the Scholiast on Thucydides (2), were of Paste figured like Animals; or, if we may believe Dionysius Halicarnassus, in the Similitude of Men (3).

The same Author makes mention of the Places and Cities where Saturn was worship'd. Tatius, A. Sempronius, M. Minutius, and Atracinus, dedicated Temples to him, and appointed Festivals and Sacrifices to his Honour, as we learn from the same Dionysius Halicarnassus (4). Macrobius informs us that Tullus Hostilius likewise consecrated a Temple to him, and that under that Prince were the Saturnalia founded. This God had likewise a Temple upon the Brow of the Capitol, which Valerius Poplicola made the publick Treasury, because in Saturn's Time, that is in the golden Age, no Thefts were committed. Lastly, Suetonius makes mention of a Temple which Munatius Plancus had built in Honour of him.

The Ancients observe that the Custom was to sacrifice to this God, with the Head uncovered, while it was veiled during the other Sacrifices made to the celestial Gods. The Statues of Saturn commonly wore Chains, to represent those with which he had been bound by his Son, which were taken off on his festival Day, to teach us that Liberty and Happiness had flourish'd in his Reign, as we learn from Lucian.

I have enlarged a little upon the Worship that was paid to this God, to shew how little Solidity there is in the Sentiment of a learned Author above named, who

S 2

(1) L. 1.

(2) In L. 1.

(3) Εἰδωλα, ἀνδρείκελα.

(4) L. 1.

who will have the dethroning of Saturn by his Son to mean the entire abolishing of his Worship.

As to what remains, few Monuments of Saturn are to be found in the Antiquaries. Boissart, however, gives us an Image of him, which represents an old Man, leaning upon a Trunk of a Tree, round which a Serpent wreaths itself. He is also to be seen upon the consular Medals, where appears the Head of an old Man, with a Scythe behind. He was generally drawn old and stooping, with a Scythe in his Hand, to denote that he presided over Agriculture, which he had taught the Latins.

If he was sometimes represented with his Feet chain'd, it was to signify, says Apollodorus, that the Seeds of the Earth, over which he presided, are bound, and, as it were, inanimate till the Time of his Festival, when they begin to grow and sprout forth; but I have already said oftner than once, how little Regard is to be had to those Allegories, which the Philosophers had invented only that they might not be thought to follow with the Vulgar, a Religion of such palpable Absurdity, and to worship like them meer Men, most of whom had led a very irregular Life. But vain was this Resource. Nothing has more the Air of a true History than all that we have now been reciting of the Titan Princes. It sets before us consistent Genealogies, Atchievements that made a great Noise in the World, the taking and founding of Cities, Battles, Victories, &c. And if there are intermix'd with it some Circumstances that lean towards the marvellous, where are not like Instances to be met with? And is it not easy with the least Attention, either to explain them, or else to reject them as overstrained Flatteries or Ornaments wherewith it was thought proper to embellish the Recital of this History.

C H A P. IV.

The History of Janus.

THE History of Janus has too close a Connection with that of Saturn, not to be inserted here. All the Roman Historians agree that this Prince reigned in Italy in the Time that Saturn was there, and that this God succeeded him; Picus the Son of Janus, being then too young to wear the Crown.

All the Ancients are also unanimously of Opinion that Janus was not a Native of Italy, but that he came thither from the Country of the Perrhebi, a People in Thessaly, who, according to the Ancients, dwelt along the River Pineus. The Author of the Original of the Romans, says he had arrived there before Saturn, whom he received into his Dominions; and that this is the Reason why he was first named in the Sacrifices, and was honoured with the Appellation of Father. The learned Don Pezron, whom I have already cited in the History of the Titans, is the only one, as I know, who has advanced that Janus did not reign in Italy, and that he was only one of Saturn's Lieutenant Generals; but the general Voice of Antiquity agrees that he was King of the Latin Territory, that he had come thither before Saturn, who did not reign till after his Death.

Theodorus Rickius, in the ingenious Dissertation he has made upon the ancient Inhabitants of Italy, has not omitted the Arrival of Janus in that Country, and has fixed the Date of it, in the Manner that shall be mentioned hereafter. If we credit Aurelius Victor, this Prince's Original is thus. “ ’Tis said that “ Creusa the Daughter of Erechtheus King of Athens, “ a Lady of surpassing Beauty, was surprized by “ Apollo, and had a Son by him who was sent to “ Delphos, there to be nursed and educated: That “ her Father not knowing any Thing of what had “ happened, gave her in Marriage to one Xipheus;

“ he not likely to have Children by her, went to “ consult the Oracle of Delphos, and ask’d how “ he might become a Father. The God answered “ him that he must adopt the first Child whom he “ should meet the next Day. The first he found was “ Janus, whom Apollo had got upon Creusa, and him
 “ accordingly he adopted. Janus being grown up “ equipp’d a Fleet, landed in Italy, there made “ Conquests ; and having taken Possession of a Moun“ tain, built there a City which he called after his “ own Name, Janiculum. In the Time of his Reign, “ Saturn, banish’d his own Country, landed also in “ Italy ; Janus gave him a kind Reception, and “ made him his Associate in the Empire. Saturn “ built a Fortrefs near Janiculum and called it “ Saturnia.”

This Prince having set sail for Italy, as has been now said, drew to his Party a good many of the Oe- notrians and Ausonians, and with their Assistance made himself Master of a part of the Country which lies between the River Liris and the Tyber ; this is what has been since called Latium, because it was Saturn’s Retreat (1) ; or Saturnia, because that Prince there took up his Abode (2). Before this Retreat, it was named the Country of the Aborigines, importing that it was possessed by Nations of different Original.
 Further, Janus, who was their first King, was said to have two faces, only to figure that he commanded two Nations ; or because upon his sharing the Kingdom with Saturn, he caused Medals to be struck, representing on one Side a Head with two Faces, to signify that his Power was divided between Saturn and himself, and that his Dominions were to be governed by the Counsels of both (3). Plutarch however assigns another Reason for it (4) : It was, says he, to teach us that this Prince and his People, had by the Counsels of Saturn, pass’d from a wild and rustick Life, to a Life of Politeness and Humanity.
 And

(1) Latium a Latitando.(2) Virg. En. l. 8.(3) Or. fast. l. 1.(4) In Numa.

And indeed, that Titan Prince taught them to cultivate the Ground, and to live in Peace; and this is perhaps what made that happy Period pass for the golden Age, when Italy, under Saturn's auspicious Sway, applied itself during a profound Peace, to the improvement of Arts and Sciences, and to Agriculture. Accordingly Janus was since that Time look'd upon as the God of Peace, and his Temple was never shut but when the whole Roman Empire enjoyed a Cessation from War, as happened especially in the Time of Augustus. This Temple was shut only thrice; under Numa the Founder of it; after the second Punick War; and after the Battle of Actium.

'Tis very certain that Janus received divine Honours; but he, no more than Saturn, never was rank'd among the great Gods, or the Gods of Council, whose Names are preserved to us by Ennius in two Verses, which we have quoted elsewhere; thus we are only to look upon him as a Home-made God, or as one of their Gods Indigetes, just as Eneas who after him received the same Honours in the Latin Country.

Tho' the Passage in Macrobius, which I am going to quote, is very long, yet it contains so many Particularities which that Author had collected from the Ancients, that I could not help transcribing it in its full Length. "According to Mythologists says he, " (1), every Family in the Time of Janus was full " of Religion and Sanctity. Therefore divine Ho- " nours were ascribed to him, and to him all the " Passages from or to the Houses were consecrated. " Xeno says he was the first who built Temples, " who instituted the Ceremonies of Religion, and " that this is the Reason why since that Time they " were usher'd in with mentioning his Name. Some " alledge he was called Bifrons, that is to say " double faced, because he knew the Past and " foresaw the Future. Others would have it that " Janus was the same as Apollo and Diana, and that " both these Divinities were comprehended in that “ single God. And indeed Apollo, according to “ Nigridius, was called by the Greeks Θυγάιος, that “ is to say who presides over the Gates. They set “ up his Altars before the Gates, to denote that he “ directs the going in and coming out. They call “ him likewise Ἀγυιεύς, as much as to say the Pre“ fect of the Streets; for among them the Ways that “ lead to Cities are called Ἀγυιαί. Just so Diana,

 “ who is called Trivia, has Power over the Ways.
 “ The very Name of Janus, signifies with us that he “ presides over all the Gates, which are called “ Januæ, which comes to the same with Θυγάιος.
 “ He is likewise drawn with a Key and a Rod,
 “ to signify that he is the Keeper of the Gates and
 “ the Prefect of the high Ways. Nigridius affirms “ that Apollo is Janus, and Diana Jana. Diana was “ formed from Iana, by the Addition of a D, which “ is frequently put before the I, to soften the Pro“ nunciation; as in these Words reditur, redbibetur, “ redintegratur, &c. Some undertake to prove Janus
 “ to be the Sun, and that he is represented double,
 “ as being Master of both the Gates of Heaven,
 “ because he opens the Day when he rises, and shuts
 “ it when he sets. They say he is first invoked
 “ when Sacrifices is made to any other God, that
 “ by his Means Access may be obtain’d to him
 “ for whom the Sacrifice is designed, as if it were “ thro’ his Gate that the Prayers of Suppliants must “ be allowed to pass to the other Divinities. His “ Statues are often mark’d on the right Hand with “ the Number three hundred, and on the left with “ sixty five, to signify the Measure of the Year, “ which is the Sun’s principal Effect.

“ Others will have Janus to be the World or Hea“ ven, and that he is so called ab eundo, because the “ World is always in Motion, revolving upon its “ own Center. Cicero, says Cornificius, in his third “ Book of Etymologies, calls him not Janus, but “ Eanus, ab eundo. Hence the Phenicians figure
 “ this Divinity by a Dragon which turns itself in a “ circular

“ circular Motion, and bites and devours its own “ Tail, to signify that the World nourishes and sup“ ports itself, and turns upon its own Axis. ’Tis for “ the same Reason that among us he is represented “ with four Sides, as appears by his Statue brought “ from Falerii. Gavius Bassus, in his Book of the “ Gods, says he is drawn with two Faces, as being “ the higher and lower Porter ; and that he is figured
 “ also with four Faces, as he whose Majesty compre-“ hends all Climates. In the ancient Poems of the “ Salii, he is stiled the God of Gods, Marc. Mes- “ sala the Consul, Colleague of Cn. Domitius, who “ was Augur fifty-five Years, began his Discourse “ upon Janus thus : He who forms and governs all,
 “ united together the Nature of Water and Earth, “ which by their Gravity always tends downward, to “ that of the Fire and Spirit, which by their Lightness “ mount nimbly upwards, and these he has confined to “ the Heavens ; and to these Heavens he has annexed
 “ such an attractive Force as unites and binds together “ different Natures and Qualities. In the Worship
 “ we ascribe to this God, we invoke Janus Geminus, “ or double faced, Father Janus, Janus Junonius, “ Janus Consivius, Janus Quirinus, Janus Patulcius,
 “ and Clusivius. We have already given the Reason “ why we invoke him under the Name of Geminus, “ or double faced : We call him Father, as being “ the God of Gods : Junonius because he keeps the “ Entrance, not only of January, but of all the other “ Months, and all the Kalends are under Juno’s Do“ minion ; ’tis for this Reason that Varro (1) says “ twelve Altars were consecrated to Janus, for just so “ many Months. We call him Consivius, a confe- “ rendo, that is because of the Propagation of Man“ kind whereof Janus is the Founder ; Quirinus, for “ his warlike Virtue : This Name is taken from the “ Spear, which the Sabines call Curis. We call him “ Patulcius and Clusivius, because his Folds are “ open in Time of War, and shut in Time of Peace :
 The

(1) Book fifth of divine Things.

“ The Rise of which Denomination is as follows.
 “ In the War, we are told, which the Sabines made “ upon the Romans to be revenged for the Rape of “ their Daughters, the Romans made Haste to shut
 “ the Gate which was at the Foot of the Hill called “ Viminalis, since named Porta Janualis, from “ that Rape, because the Enemies used their utmost “ Efforts to make themselves Masters of it : But after “ it was shut it opened of itself, and the same Thing “ happening three Times, many of the Soldiers not “ being able to shut it quite, stood in Arms at the “ Entry to keep it. And as at the same Time there “ was a very bloody Engagement on the other Side,
 “ the Report spread that the Romans were overcome
 “ by Tatius. Then those who guarded the Entry “ fled, and when the Sabines were like to be Masters “ of that Gate, ’tis said that from the Temple of “ Janus issued Torrents of boiling Water, which dis“ charging itself thro’ that Gate, suffocated one Party “ of the Enemy by their Heat and drowned the other.
 “ From that Time a Law was made that this Gate “ should be opened in Time of War, as it were to “ give Admission to that God who came to the As“ sistance of the Romans.

Draco, in Athenæus (1), has followed another Tradition, tho’ at Bottom it returns to the same. We are told, says he, that Janus had two Faces, the one before, the other behind, he gave his Name to a River and to a Mountain on which he had settled. He is said to be the first who invented Crowns, Ships and Barges, and the first who coined Money of Braís.
 Hence it comes that several Towns in Greece, Italy, and Sicily coin Monies with a double Head, with a Barge on the Reverse, or a Crown, or a Ship.

What gives a great deal of weight to the Opinion of these two Authors, is that the Monuments of Janus we have now extant, perfectly agree to it.
 And indeed, he was always represented upon them with two Faces, or with two Heads Back to Back, and
 com-

commonly each of them with a Beard. He often appears in this Manner upon Medals, with a Prow of a Ship upon the Reverse, as may be seen in those publish'd by Beger, Voillant, Bonanni, and other Antiquaries. The Difference that is found among them is but inconsiderable: Sometimes the two Heads are crown'd; sometimes they are without a Beard; sometimes they carry a Flower which separates them; sometimes too you find Janus upon Monuments with four Heads, and then he was called Janus Quadri-frons: For which you may consult the learned Dissertation of M. de Boze. As to the Key and Club which Macrobius speaks of, they are not to be met with upon any Monument, no more than the Dragon or Serpent, that form'd itself into a Circle, and bit its Tail, as we have it in the same Author.

The Ancients give the Reason of all these Representations. Plutarch (1) tells us that he was drawn with two Heads, either because being a Greek originally, and a Native of Perrhebia he had come from thence into Italy, or because finding himself among Barbarians in Comparison of the Greeks, he had changed his Language and Manner of Life: Or rather because he taught his new Subjects Politeness and Arts, especially that of cultivating the Ground. It was for much the same Reason, as shall be said in the sixth Volume, that Cecrops was called Διφρωνς, as you would say of a double Nature, because he reigned over two Sorts of People, the Egyptians whom he had brought with him, and the Athenians into whom he infused the Manners and Politeness of the Egyptians.

Other Authors think that by these two Faces was intended the Knowledge of the past and of the future, or, as he presided over January, that he was represented as having equally a Respect to the past and to the ensuing Year. Those who took him for the Sun, alledged that it was designed to signify the Sun

(1) Quæst. Rom.

Sun rising and the Sun setting ; others that he was thus represented as the higher and lower Porter.

However as Janus had reign'd jointly with Saturn, some Authors have maintained that the two Heads represented, the one Janus and the other Saturn ; and that when there are four Heads set back to back, it is Janus, Saturn, Picus and Faunus, the first Kings of the Country : In Place of the two last, some Authors put Romulus and Numa Pompilius. Others with more Probability alledge that Janus with the four Heads, denotes the four Seasons of the Year. We were told just now from Gavius Bassus, quoted by Macrobius, that these four Heads denote that he comprehends all Climates.

As the Name of Janus is evidently Latin, 'tis thought that he was called Oenotrus, and that he had given his Name to the Colony which he conducted into Italy.

The learned Ryckius, speaking of that Colony, makes the Date of Janus's Arrival in Italy to fall in the 150th Year before that of Eneas in the same Country, and by Consequence the 146th Year before the taking of Troy ; Æneas having landed in Italy four Years after the Destruction of that City. Janus set out from Perrhebia in Thessaly and came by Sea into the Latin Territory ; and tho' Draco in Athenæus did not positively say it (1), yet the Prow of the Ship which we see upon some of his Medals, would leave no room to doubt of it. 'Tis likewise certain that he came from Thessaly. As he descended from Deucalion by Ion his Son, who settled in that Country in the Neighbourhood of Perrhebia, it was doubtless from thence he set out when he conducted his Colony. There arises however a great Difficulty from what is declared by the general Voice of Antiquity that he received Saturn into Italy ; for the Chronology by no means answers to this. Theophilus of Antioch assures us, from the Authority of Tallus (2), that Chronos, whom the Latins called Saturn, lived 321 Years before the taking of Troy, which supposes

(1) Loc. cit.

(2) L. 3. adv. Ant.

supposes more than an Age and an half between him and Janus, and indeed, Minos the first of the Name, lived two hundred and twenty five Years before the Trojan War, about the thirtieth Year of Pandion the first. This Minos was the Son of Jupiter, and Grandson of Saturn. He had a Son named Lycastus, who was Father to Minos the second, whose Son assisted at the Siege of Troy; which makes much about the hundred and fifty Years between Saturn and Janus. Whence we ought to conclude, either that Saturn never came into Italy, or that he arrived there long before Janus's Time. But as all Antiquity attests that these two Princes were contemporary, we may suppose that another Saturn is there designed, and that he who was contemporary with Janus, was Sterces, the Father of Picus, who, after his Apotheosis, was denominated Saturn: Janus, who succeeded him till Picus came to be of Age to wear the Crown, having deify'd him, as he found the Athenians had done to his grand Father Erechtheus, as we learn from Cicero (1).

Saint Augustin (2) confirms this Opinion: “ The “ Assyrian Monarchy, says he, was still subsisting;
 “ and they reckoned Lampares their twenty third “ King, when Picus first reigned over the Lauren- “ rentins. It belongs to the Worshippers of these “ Gods to see what they will make of Saturn the “ Father of this Picus, for they will not allow him “ to have been a Man. Others have written that “ he reigned in Italy before Picus, and Virgil speaks “ of him to this Purpose (3): He joined in Society
 “ a dissolute untractable Race, gave them Laws;
 “ and called the Country Latium, because he had there “ found a safe Retreat from the Fury and Persecution
 “ of his Son; His Reign is said to have been the golden “ Age. But let them treat this as other poetical “ Fictions, and say if they will, that the Father of “ Picus was called Sterces, and that he was so named, “ because

(1) De nat. Deor. l. 3. c. 19.
 (3) En. L. 8.

(2) De Civ. Dei L. 18. c. 15.

“ because being an excellent Husbandman, he had “ taught Men to improve Ground by Dung, whence “ some call him Stercutius. Be that as it will ; this “ however is the Reason for their making him the “ God of Agriculture.”

Ryckius judiciously observes upon this Subject, that the ancient Latins, being destitute of the Use of Letters till the Time of Evander, who arrived in Italy but a few Years before the War of Troy, seeing in that Country so many Places called by Saturn's Name, took him for the antient one who had reigned there.

It has been already observed that under the Reign of Janus and Saturn, be he who he will, was the golden Age, on which the Poets gave so much Scope to their Imaginations: Not to mention others, I shall only quote the Description given of it by Ovid. “ Then, says he, were the Rules of Faith “ and Justice practised without the constraint of “ Laws. Men were not influenced to their Duty by “ Motives of Fear ; nor were Punishments known
 “ in those Days. There was no need, in that happy Age, for engraving upon Tables of Brass “ those menacing Laws that have since been used as “ a Curb to Vice. Criminals were not then to be “ seen trembling before their Judge ; nor was the “ Security of human Life owing to the Force of “ Laws. The Trees were not yet form'd into Ships
 “ to visit an unknown World : nor did Mortals expose themselves to the Fury of the Sea, but dwelt “ contentedly in their own native Land. Cities “ unfortify'd and without Walls were perfectly secure. Trumpets, Helmets and all the Instruments
 “ of War were then unknown, and there was no “ Occasion for Soldiers to secure the Peace and “ Tranquillity of the Citizen. The Earth, without being torn up with the Plough spontaneously “ supply'd all Sorts of Fruits ; and her Inhabitants, “ satisfied with the Food which she yielded them “ without Culture, lived upon wild Fruits, or the “ Acorns

“ Acorns that drop’t from the Oaks. A perpetual “ Spring reigned all the Year round ; the soft Ze-“ phirs with their warm Gales cherish’d the Flowers
 “ that sprung up without Seed : The Harvests suc“ ceeded one another, without ploughing or sowing.
 “ Rivers of Milk and Nectar flowed every where ;
 “ and Honey distilled in Abundance from the hol“ low Oak (a).”

As nothing is more celebrated in Antiquity than this golden Age, I shall consider what may have given rise to it. The ancient Inhabitants of Latium led a savage Life, without Laws and almost without Religion, when Janus arrived there. That Prince softened the Ferocity of their Manners, brought them to live together in Cities and Villages, gave them Laws, and the Subjects under his Reign enjoy’d a Happiness they never knew before : Which made them look upon the Time of his Reign, as halcyon Days and the golden Age. For to make it continue as long as Saturn’s Life, is an Opinion not tenable. Never was Age more full of Wars and Blood-shed than his, and never did Crimes with more Fury, over-run the Earth. Saturn dethroned his Father to make way for himself : And Jupiter his Son served him precisely with the same Measure as he had done his Father, and this Prince fortify’d his Throne by the Defeat and Overthrow of all his Relations.

Eusebius (1) having quoted the fragment of Sancho- niathon makes much the same Reflection. Here then, says he, we see the History of Chronos or Saturn, here what Truth is in that happy Life, which is placed under his Reign, a Life so celebrated in the Works of Greek Authors : These are the Men whom they call πρώτων γενέσεσιν τὸ γένος ; the first Race of Mortals, the Race of the golden Age, who, according to

(a) Aurea prima fata est ætas, quæ vindice nullo, Sponte sua, sine lege, fidem rectumque colebat, Poena metusque aberant, &c. Ovid. Met. L. 1. F. 3.

(1) Præpar. L. 1. c. 10.

to Authors lived so happy in the primitive Ages of the World.

We may add however that this Idea of the golden Age was undoubtedly taken from the Tradition importing that our first Parents, or at least the human Race from Noah, till the Dispersion under Peleg, had enjoyed all Things in common, and led a happy Life, in Comparison of the succeeding Ages.

C H A P. V.

The History of Atlas, of the Pleiades his Daughters, and of the Hesperides.

FEW Persons in Antiquity are more celebrated than Atlas. All the Ancients agree that he gave his Name to that Mountain or rather that Ridge of Mountains which run across one Part of Africa from East to West, as far as the Extremities of that Continent; as also to the Ocean, and the Island Atlantis.

According to Hesiod (1), Atlas was the Son of Japetus, and of Clymene the Daughter of Oceanus, and Brother to Mencæti, Prometheus, and Epimetheus, all of them Titan-Princes, whom we shall speak of hereafter. “Atlas, says that Poet, bears the Heavens upon his Shoulders, at the Extremities of the Earth, in the Country of the Hesperides; such was the Doom allotted to him by Jupiter.” Apollodorus (2), Diodorus Siculus, and all the Ancients in like Manner, make Atlas to have been the Son of Japetus; but the Former of these two Authors gives him for his Mother Asia the other Daughter of Oceanus.

Our Moderns, always guided by Etymologies taken from the eastern Languages, have receded from the Opinion of the Ancients, and make Atlas come from Phenicia, or the neighbouring Countries in the Extremity of Africa. Thus it is that Bochart
and

(1) Theog.

(2) L. 1.

and Vossius (1) speak of him. M. Fourmont the elder who is persuaded that Abraham is Saturn, takes Atlas to be the same with Lot. But without entring here into Discussions that may be seen to more Advantage in the Works of those learned Writers, I think we may hold to the Opinion of Diodorus Siculus, who thus relates the History of this celebrated Titan.

“ After the Death of Hyperion, the Sons of Uranus divided the Kingdom among them. The “ two of greatest Renown were Saturn and Atlas.
 “ The maritime Places having fallen to Atlas’s lot
 “ this Prince gave his Name to the Atlantes his Subjects, and to the highest Mountain in his Country.
 “ He is said to have excelled in Astronomy, and to “ have been the first who represented the World by “ a Globe. This is the Reason of its being alledged “ that Atlas prop’d the Heavens with his Shoulders;
 “ a Fable plainly alluding to his Invention. He “ had several Sons; but Hesperus distinguish’d “ himself most by his Piety, his Justice, and Generosity. He having gone up to the highest top of “ mount Atlas, to observe the Stars, was suddenly “ carry’d away by an impetuous Wind and never “ more seen. The People much moved with his “ Fate, and calling to mind his Virtues, decreed to “ him divine Honours, and consecrated his Name
 “ by giving it to the brightest of the Planets.
 “ Atlas was also Father of seven Daughters, who “ were all called Atlantides, but their proper Names
 “ were Maia, Electra, Taygeta, Asterope, Merope, “ Alcyone, and Celæno. They were beloved by the “ most illustrious of the Gods and Heroes, and had “ Sons by them who in after Times became as renowned as their Fathers, and were the Founders “ of many Nations. But the eldest of all had by “ Jupiter a Son called Mercury, who was the Inventor of several Arts. The other Atlantides had “ also illustrious Children; for some gave Rise to “ several Nations, and others built Cities: And

VOL. II.

T

“ therefore

(1) De Idol. L. 1.

“ therefore not only some Barbarians, but even several Greeks make their ancient Heroes descended from the Atlantides. They are said to have been very intelligent, and this is the Reason why Men look’d upon them as Goddesses after their Death, and placed them in the Heavens under the Name of the Pleiades. These Atlantides were also called Nymphs, because all Women were so designed in their Country. ”

The same Author adds in his fourth Book (1):
 “ The Mythologists gave out that in the Country called Hesperitis, lived old Atlas and Hesperus, two Brothers, both very famous: That Hesperus having got a Daughter named Hesperis, gave her in Marriage to his Brother Atlas, and that from this Daughter had the Country Hesperitis taken its Name. Atlas had by Hesperis seven Daughters who were called Atlantides, from the Name of their Father, or Hesperides from that of their Mother. They are said to have been of such extraordinary Beauty and Wisdom, that their Fame reached Buſiris King of Spain, and induced him to form a Design of making himself Master of them, commanding Pirates to enter into their Country, to carry them off and bring them to him. These Pirates finding the Daughters of Atlas diverting themselves in a Garden, seized upon them; and flying precipitately to their Ships, put them on board with them: But Hercules having surprized them while they were taking a Repast near the Shore, and being informed by the young Virgins of the Misfortune that had befallen them, he slew all their Ravishers and returned the Atlantides to their Father Atlas. That Prince in Gratitude to Hercules (a) made him a Present of the Apples which he had come in Quest of.”

The same Author had said in the preceeding Chapter, “ The Mythologists are very much divided
 “ as

(1) Ch. 7.

(a) We shall speak further of this Voyage of Hercules, and of the Garden of the Hesperides in the History of that Heroe. Vol. VI.

“ as to those Apples; for some say that there ac“ tually grew golden Apples in certain Gardens of “ Africa, which belong'd to the Hesperides; but “ that they were kept by a dreadful Dragon which “ never slept: Others alledge that the Hesperides
 “ were possessed of such fine flocks of Sheep, that
 “ by a poetical License the Surname of golden “ was given them, as it had been to Venus upon “ Account of her Beauty. Some, in short, have “ written that those Sheep were of a particular Co“ lour inclining to Gold. These last added too, that “ by the Dragon we were to understand the Shepherd
 “ that kept those Sheep, a Man of great Strength “ and Courage, who used to put to Death such “ as attempted to force from him any of his “ Flock.”

Atlas not only gave Hercules the Present which Diodorus mentions, but also taught him Astronomy. That Science he himself had studied with great Assiduity and Application, and became a vast Proficient in it. As Hercules was the first who brought into Greece the Knowledge of the Sphere, he too acquired great Reputation by this Means, and hence it was feigned that Atlas rested upon his Shoulders the Burthen of the World; which, as the Author now quoted observes, is only a fabulous Manner of relating a true Matter of Fact.

After what has been now said, we may easily judge that Atlas was a Man distinguish'd by his Talents; that he addicted himself to the speculative Sciences, and especially to Astronomy; and that his making use of the Sphere whereof he was the Inventor, together with the Height of the Mountains on which he had made his Observations, was Foundation enough for the Fable of his bearing the Heavens upon his Shoulders; and of his being transformed into the Mountain, which was called Hatlba, or Talab, from the Hebrew Word which signifies to be suspended, merely upon Account of the huge Rocks that hang from Mount Atlas, which is so high that it seems to touch the Skies, and whose Summit is even rarely to be seen by Reason of the Snows and Fogs that encompass it (a). We may add, that, in all Probability, Atlas united together the vagrant disjointed People of that Extremity of Africa, that he reigned over them, gave them Laws, and polished their Manners. Herodotus (1) speaks of these People whom he calls Atlantes, the only People, according to him, who had no particular Name, being only known under that of Atlantes. That Author, and after him Pomponius Mela, gives a Description of Mount Atlas, which the Inhabitants of the Country called the Pillar of Heaven.

The Pleiades.

To return to the Daughters of Atlas, who form the Constellation of the Pleiades in the Bull's Head, the Fable of their Transformation had no other Foundation but that their Father was the first who discovered those Stars, and gave them the Name of Pleiades after his own Daughters, who had that Name from their Mother, called Pleione, according to some of the Ancients; or rather those Stars were named Pleiades because they appear in the Month of May, a proper Season for Navigation (2). The Latins call them Vergiliæ, because they rise in the spring Season; and as there is one of them that has not been visible for a long Time past, namely Merope, she is said to hide her self for Shame that she had married a Mortal, while her Sisters had been married to Gods: Where 'tis easy to see Astronomy mixed with History; for 'tis true enough that six of Atlas's Daughters match'd with Titan Princes, who were commonly look'd upon as Gods, and that Merope married Sisyphus, who was not of that Family.

But, according to a Tradition better vouched by the Ancients, this Pleiad was Eleëtra the Wife of Dardanus, (a) Father Pezron derives the Name from the Word Altus, by the Transposition of a single Letter, and this Derivation is conformable to the other Name of that Prince who was called Telamon, which in the Celtick Language imports a Man of a high Stature.

(1) L. 4. ch. 184.

(2) Πλέω Navigo.

Dardanus, who had disappeared at the Time of the Trojan War, that she might not be a Spectator of the Misfortunes of her Family. Be that as it will, I shall give you the Fable as it is related by the Poets. We reckon, says Ovid in his Fasts, seven Stars in the Constellation of the Pleiades, tho' there are only six of them seen.

Quæ septem dici, sex tamen esse solent.

Because Electra the Wife of Dardanus, one of those seven Nymphs, the Daughter of Atlas, hid herself that she might not behold the sad Catastrophe of Troy (a).

Hyginus, Contemporary with Ovid, relates the same Fable ; but with Circumstances that will help us to find out the historical Fact that may have given rise to it. “ Electra, says he, being grieved to see the “ unseasonable Dancing of her Sisters at the Time of “ Troy's Disaster, left the Zodiac, and withdrew “ towards the Arctic Pole, moving in the Disorder
“ of a Person overwhelm'd with the most lively Sor“ row ; upon Account of her dishevelled and neg“ lected Hair she got the Name of Comet (b).”

The Latin Scholiast upon Aratus says the same :
Electram dissolutis crinibus propter luctum ire asserunt,
Et propter comas, quidam Cometem vocant. To the Circumstances related by Hyginus, Avienus, upon the Authority of Smythæ, added that Electra shew'd herself again to Mortals from Time to Time, but always with the Apparatus of a Comet (c).

T 3

I

(a) ———— Trojæ spectare ruinas

Non tulit, ante oculos opposuitque manum.

(b) M. Freret, in a curious Dissertation printed in the tenth Volume of the Memoirs of the Academy of Belles Lettres, has improved what the Ancients say of the Progress of this Star, as a Proof that it is meant of a Comet, which having first appeared in the Sign of the Bull, near the Pleiades, moved on towards the Pole : But this belongs not to my Subject.

(c) Non nunquam Oceani tamen istam surgere ab undis

In convexa Poli, sed sede carere Sororum,

Diffusamque comas cerni, crinisque soluti

Monstrare effigiem ; diros hos fama Cometæ

Commemorat

I ought not to omit the Reflections, rather ingenious than solid, of Olaus Rudbeck in his Atlanticks. This Author attempts to prove that Atlas and his Successors reigned in the North, which Country he will have to be the true Atlantick mentioned by Plato in his Timæus and Critias; that these Princes were there very powerful, and extended their Conquests in Process of Time into Greece, Italy, the Gauls, Asia Minor, and Egypt; and that what gave a Handle for the Fable of Atlas's bearing the Heavens upon his Shoulders, is that his Empire reach'd over all the Earth.

The Hyades.

The Hyades are also said to have been Daughters of Atlas, and we have the Names of six of them, Eudora, Ambrosia, Prodice, Coronis, Phileto, and Pollis. Others add a seventh, Tbione; but 'tis probable these pretended Hyades, a Word signifying in Greek, rainy, are nothing but so many poetical Personages, whose Names were given to certain Stars that Atlas had discovered; unless we will say that the great Atlas had the Children of all the rest who bore that Name father'd upon him. They are commonly reckon'd three in Number, the first was King of Italy, the second reign'd in Arcadia; and the third is he whom we are now upon: I am also of Opinion, that his Successors frequently bore the same Name: Hence we find the Name of Atlas in the History of Perseus, and in that of Hercules, both of them later than that of the first Titan Princes.

Atlas, as has been said, had a Brother who also came and settled in the West; which probably procured him the Name of Hesperus, whence the Greeks called all the Countries to the West of Greece, Hesperia. M. le Clerc, however, derives this Name from a Hebrew Word that imports beautiful, unde Vesperugo, pulcherrima Stella, the beautiful Star. Hence the celebrated

*Commémorat tristi procul istâ surgere formâ,
Vultum ardere, diam persunderè crinibus Æthram, Sanguine sub pingui, ratiloque rubere cruce.*

celebrated Gardens of the Hesperides his Daughters, because the Gardens in Mauritania Tingitana were very fine of their kind ; and abounded with Orange Groves and Citrons, which the Poets have taken the liberty to call Golden Apples, as they have to represent the Mastive Dogs that watch'd them, under the Figure of Dragons (1).

C H A P. VI.

The History of Japetus, Prometheus, Epimetheus, and Pandora.

THAT Prometheus and Epimetheus are of the Titan Family is a Truth attested by Hesiod, and adopted by several of the Ancients, especially by Lucian. They were the Sons of Japetus and Clymene, as Hesiod tells us (a). Japetus, says he, married the fair Clymene, the Daughter of Oceanus, by whom he had the great Atlas, the illustrious Mencæti, the crafty Prometheus, and the foolish Epimetheus.

Japetus had settled in Thessaly, where he became very powerful ; but being a wicked Man, and of a mischievous Disposition, he gained a greater Reputation by his Children than by any Deeds of his own. The Greeks, however, look'd upon him as the Founder of their Race, and were not able to trace farther back than him : Accordingly they usually called decrepid old Men Japets, as we are told by Hesychius and Suidas (b).

Prometheus became exceeding famous by means of the Fable I am going to relate. Being a Man of a subtle and crafty Genius, he attempted to put a Cheat upon Jupiter

T 4

in

(1) See the History of Hercules, V. vi.

(a) Theog. v. 508. Others give him for his Mother a Nymph named Asia.

(b) We shall prove, in the Beginning of the sixth Volume, Japetus to be the same with Japhet the Son of Noah, whose Sons Javan and Gomer, and their Descendants, peopled the North and West to the inmost Parts of Spain.

in a Sacrifice, and thereby to find out whether or not he was really worthy to be reckoned a God. Having for this Purpose slain two Oxen, he stuffed one of the Skins with the Flesh, and the other with the Bones of the Victims. Jupiter was out-witted by Prometheus, and made choice of the latter. The God, resolv'd to be reveng'd upon all Mankind, took away from them the Use of Fire: But Prometheus, with the Assistance of Minerva, whose Advice had already been of use to him in forming the Body of a Man of temper'd Clay, got up to Heaven, and approaching the Chariot of the Sun, stole from thence the sacred Fire, which he brought down to the Earth in a Ferula (a). Jupiter, incensed at this strange and audacious Enterprize, order'd Vulcan to form a Woman endued with all Perfections; whence she got the Name of Pandora. The Gods loaded her with Presents, and sent her to Prometheus with a Box full of all kinds of Misery. This Prince suspecting the Trick, would have nothing to do with her; but Epimetheus, to whom she offered herself, was so captivated with her Charms, that he took her to Wife, and had by her Pyrrha, the Wife of Deucalion. His Curiosity too led him to look into the fatal Box, which he no sooner had opened, than there issued out of it that Deluge of Miseries, which have since over-run this Earth. He shut it up again in haste, but all was gone but Hope, which had not Time to get off, and this of Consequence is the only Blessing that remains with wretched Mortals.

Jupiter at length, extremely vex'd that Prometheus had not been taken in this last Snare, order'd Mercury to carry him to Mount Caucasus, and bind him fast to a Rock, where an Eagle (1), the Daughter of Typhon and Echidna, was eternally to prey upon his Liver; for Hesiod tells us, it sprouted up as fast every Night (2), as the Eagle devour'd it by Day. This

Author

(a)

—— Audax Japeti genus
Ignem fraude mala gentibus intulit.

HORAT. Od. 3. L. 2.

(1) Others say a Vulture.

(2) L. 1. C. 1.

Author limits no Time to Prometheus's Punishment, he says on the contrary, it was to be eternal, αἰώνιον; other Authors, however, limit the Time to the Space of thirty thousand Years. Nor does the same Author say that Jupiter borrow'd the Assistance of Mercury, but that he himself bound that unhappy Wretch, not to a Rock, but to a Pillar.

Hercules however delivered him some Years after, or, according to others, Jupiter himself, as a Reward for his Service, in revealing to him the Oracle of the Destinies, who had foretold that the Son of Thetis should be mightier than his Father, and that consequently he ought to lay aside his Design of marrying her, for fear of being one Day dethroned. But as he had sworn to keep Prometheus bound to Caucasus for the Space of Time now mentioned, that he might not violate his Oath, he order'd him always to wear upon his Finger an Iron Ring, to which should be fastened a small Fragment of Caucasus, that it might be true in a certain Sense, that Prometheus still continued bound to that Rock: And this, according to the Ancients, is the Original of the first Ring. Pliny(1), who relates this Fable, has not troubled himself to seek after the true Meaning of it. But we are not to imagine that those Fictions were transmitted down to our Times in an uniform Manner. This same is related very differently by the Ancients. Durius of Samos alledges that Prometheus was banish'd Heaven for aspiring to marry Minerva; and this is given as the Reason why this Goddess is so much the Subject of the Fable. Nicander of Colophon will have Prometheus's Crime to have been, that he persuaded Men to make over to the Serpent the Privilege that had been conferred upon them by the Gods of renewing their Age. Others, in short, far from thinking that he had rejected Pandora, assure us that he had debauch'd her after she was married to his Brother.

Whatever be in this, these Fictions undoubtedly contain some ancient History, tho' exceedingly disguised:

(1) Lib. 13.

guised : There we may see a vast many Allegories ; the very Name of Prometheus furnishes us with several ; it imports one who foresees Futurity ; as that of Epimetheus signifies one who knows what is past. This Fable may likewise glance at some traditional Circumstances of the Fall of our first Parents, and of Adam's being seduced by his Wife Eve ; for there is hardly any thing but one may find in it. M. Reland, in his Dissertation, says it derives its Original from a Tradition that was current among the ancient Persians, importing, that the Heroes of the earliest Ages had vanquish'd certain evil Genii, and bound them to Mount Cas. Other learned Men go higher, and think the Pagans had couch'd under this Fable the History of the Fall of the Angels, who were condemn'd to Chains, not on Mount Caucasus, but in the Gulph of Hell, as we read in Scripture. For my part, as I am persuaded that the Fables may be explained without having recourse to Suppositions, that cannot be proved, I take this now before us to contain nothing any ways mysterious, but to be only a Continuation of the History of the Titans, told after the manner of those Times, that is to say, with somewhat of the marvelous Stile accompanying those ancient Narrations ; and I explain it in the following manner.

Prometheus, Jupiter's Cousin-German, in all Probability was not exempt from the Persecutions with which he harrassed the other Titans ; this is easily accounted for from the mere Ambition of the Cretan Prince, without supposing another Motive, which some Authors assign, namely, his being the Son of Juno by Eurimedon. As Prometheus returned into Scythia, which he durst not quit so long as Jupiter lived, that God is said to have bound him to Caucasus, by Mercury's Means, because Jupiter made use of him to distress Prometheus, and to keep him from removing. This Prince, solely addicted to Astrology, frequently retired to Mount Caucasus, as to a kind of Observatory, whence he contemplated the Stars, and was, as it were, prey'd upon by continual poring, or rather rather Vexation, for being obliged to lead so melancholy a Life, and to spend his Days in so uncomfortable a Situation ; and this, to mention it by the by, is what had given rise to the Fable of the Eagle or Vulture that prey'd upon his Liver, which was said to sprout up again every Day, because Prometheus had continual Matter of Vexation.

We must not however forget to take Notice, that Herodotus explains this particularity otherwise, alledging this Prince was put in Prison for not being able to stop the over-flowing of a River, which, from its Rapidity was called the Eagle ; or at least that he was obliged, upon that Account, to fly with a Part of his Subjects to the Mountains, to escape the Inundation, till a Traveller, represented by Hercules (a), undertook to dam it up by a Mound, and to kill the Eagle, as one may say, by making its Course regular and uniform ; thus that Hero delivered Prometheus out of his Prison, or from his Retreat.

The Inhabitants of Scythia were at that time extremely savage, and lived without Laws, either written or traditional : Prometheus, a polite and knowing Prince, taught them to lead a more human Life, instructed them in Agriculture, Physick (b), &c. This is what had given rise to the Hyperbolical Expressions of his having form'd a Man, whom Minerva, the Goddess of Sciences, had animated (1). But we find another Explanation of this Fable in Lactantius (2), without having recourse to Allegories, for he takes it to have no other Foundation, but that Prometheus was the first who taught the Art of making Statues of Clay ; whence, by an Hyperbole not unusual, he was said to have formed Man, as it was afterwards fabled of Dedalus, that he had made his Statues to walk, because

(a) We are not to ascribe this Adventure to the Theban Hercules, as the Poets do, but to the Phenician, or some other, since Prometheus lived several Ages before Amphitryo.

(b) Eschilus, in his Prometheus, makes this Prince the Inventor of all Arts.

(1) Hyginus, Poet. Astron. l. 2. Ovid. Met. l. 1.

(2) L. 2. c. 10.

because he first shaped the Legs distinctly, as shall be said in his History.

This last Explanation is not a little confirmed by a fine Monument that has escaped the Injury of Time, and is to be seen in the first Volume of Montfaucon's Antiquities ; it represents Prometheus forming a Man, and there you see him working with a Chissel, a plain Indication that the Art of Statuary is intended by it. This Image, besides, is very singular ; Minerva there appears, because, according to Lucian, it was she that animated the Work of Prometheus. There you likewise see Psyche with her Wings, riding in a Chariot, because she was the Symbol of the Soul. 'Tis plain that all this was intended to signify to us, that Prometheus's Statues were so perfect, that they wanted nothing but a living Soul to be self-moved.

But unless we give into this Explication, how shall we account for what Ovid says at the Beginning of his Metamorphoses, that, Man being cut off from the Earth, Prometheus mixed Clay, and moulded him anew, since he was a Man himself, and Antiquity gives us the History of his Father and Ancestors.

To explain now the Fable of Prometheus's Theft, some Authors tell us, that what gave rise to it, was his having taught Man the Use of Fire (a) : But is it probable that this was a Thing so long unknown, even among the most barbarous Nations ? On the contrary, 'tis undoubtedly as ancient as the World itself ; (b) whether it was brought upon the Earth by Lightning, or that the Winds had set some Forests on Fire, by putting the Branches of the Trees into violent Commotion,

(a) Pausanias, in Corinth. says it was the Opinion of the Ancients, that Phoroneus, and not Prometheus, had invented the Use of Fire ; which may be true, in the Apprehension of the Greeks, who knew nothing prior to this Phoroneus.

(b) A Festival generally spread among all Nations, and still kept up at this Day in China, at Mexico, and in several other Places, which is called the Feast of Lamps, the Ceremony whereof consists in lighting by Night a great Number of Lamps and Torches, is, no doubt, a Tradition of the universal Joy that was expressed, for the Use of Fire, which Adam probably found out, and Noah preserved.

motion, or that Fire was made accidentally by striking two flint Stones against one another. Diodorus Siculus (1) says the true Sense of this Fable is, that Prometheus had discovered combustible Materials fit for kindling and maintaining Fire; but is it to be imagined that the Use of Fire being once introduced, Mankind would have continued ignorant till Prometheus's Time of what was, or what was not proper to kindle it, and keep it alive? Upon the whole therefore, I am of Opinion, that the Origin of this Fiction was, that Jupiter having ordered all the Shops where Iron was forged to be shut up, lest the Titans should make use of it against him, Prometheus, who had retired into Scythia, there establish'd good Forges; hence came the Calybes, those excellent Blacksmiths (2); perhaps too Prometheus, not thinking to find Fire in that Country, brought some thither in the Stalk of the Ferula, wherein it may easily be preserved for several Days.

M. de Tournesort, in his Voyage to the Levant, discovered this Plant, which the Greeks called Narthex, and the Latins, Ferula: Its Stalk is five or six Foot high, the Rind of it is very hard, and the Inside is full of a kind of Pith, which Fire is slow in consuming. The Sailors make use of it to transport Fire from one Island to another. This Custom is of the earliest Antiquity, and may serve to explain a Passage in Hesiod (3), who speaking of the Fire that Prometheus stole from Heaven; says he carried it in a Ferula, ἐν κοίλῳ νάρθηκι, since the Foundation of this Fable undoubtedly is owing to what Diodorus Siculus tells us of Prometheus, that he was the Inventor of the Steel, τὸ πυρρῆον, wherewith Fire is struck from the Flint (4). Semina flammæ abstrusa in venis silicis. In all Probability that Prince made use of the Pith of the Ferula instead of Tinder, and taught Men to preserve Fire in the Stalk of that Plant. These Stalks are strong enough to serve for a Support,

but

(1) L. 5. (2) M. le Clerc upon Hesiod, v. 563.

(3) Op. & Die, L. 1. v. 52.

(4) Diod. Sic. L. 3.

but too slight to wound those who are beat with them : Hence we are told by Diodorus Siculus (1), that Bacchus, whoever he was, one of the greatest Legislators of Antiquity, enjoin'd primitive Mortals, when they drank Wine, to use these Ferula Canes, because they frequently broke one another's Heads with those they used to wear of another kind.

As for the two Oxen, which Prometheus is said to have slain, that he might impose upon Jupiter, I take this Fable to be founded upon Prometheus's being perhaps the first who opened Victims, to draw Omens from the Inspection of their Entrails. As for the Metamorphosis of Epimetheus, who is said to have been transformed into an Ape, this, according to Lucian, figures that he, like his Brother, was an able Statuary, and imitated Nature to Perfection.

We must not however forget that the famous Bochart (2), and after him M. le Clerc (3), take Prometheus to be the same with Magog ; and it must be owned the Parallel answers pretty exactly, as it is drawn by the former. Prometheus is the Son of Japetus, and Magog the Son of Japhet, and Grandson of Noah. Magog, as well as Prometheus, came and settled in Scythia : The first invented or improved the Art of founding Metals, and of forging Iron, which the Poets likewise attributed to our Prometheus ; and Diodorus too says he invented several Instruments proper for making Fire. The Fable setting forth that Prometheus was devoured by an Eagle, takes its rise from the Import of the Name Magog, which signifies to be eaten up with Vexation (a). M. le Clerc adds, that Epimetheus is the same with Gog, whose Name signifies burning ; which, according to him, agrees to that Prince, whose Passion for Women was designed to be figured by the Story of Pandora. He adds other Conjectures, which at most only prove that the History of those two Princes was embellish'd with

(1) Diod. Sic L. 3. (2) Peleg. L. 1. C. 2. (3) Upon Hesiod.

(a) Magog, as much as to say tabescere, liquefcere. Bochart. Loc. Cit.

with those of Gog and Magog, who before them had practised in Scythia the Art of forging Iron. Lastly, according to other Authors, Prometheus is the same with Noah; and the Parallel which they draw between them wants not Probability; so easy it is to find a Resemblance between Persons who lived in Times so remote.

If the Opinion of Sir Isaac Newton were supported with any Authority, we would be better acquainted with Prometheus, and might determine exactly at what time he lived. According to him, Prometheus was Nephew to the famous Sesostris, whom he makes to have lived about the Time of the Argonauts, a few Years before the Trojan War. As that Prince had accompanied his Uncle in his Expeditions, he was left by him upon Mount Caucasus (1), with a Part of his Troops, to preserve the Conquests he had made in Scythia, as those he had made in Colchis were committed to Ætes. If this was the Case, Prometheus would be an Egyptian originally, and we might fix the Time when he lived, and his Deliverer would be Hercules the Argonaut, or the Son of Alcmena; but, as has been said, this Opinion wants Proofs, and according to the Ancients, whom I have quoted, and Hesiod himself, Prometheus was of the Race of the Titans.

Prometheus, weary of his melancholy Retreat in Scythia, quitted it at length to pass the Remainder of his Days in Greece, where he died, and the Argives shew his sepulchral Monument. Pausanias indeed says (2), he believed they were mistaken, and that the Opuntians gave an Account of it in a manner more conformable to Truth; but this still proves Greece to be the Country where he was reckoned to have died. Then it was too that divine Honours were paid to him, since the same Author, in his Phocica (3), says that in the Way to Panopea, there is to be seen a Chapel built of Brick, quite unconcocted, and in this Chapel a Statue of the Marble of Mount Pentelicus, which, according to some, represents Esculapius, culapius, and according to others Prometheus. The latter, adds this Author, prove their Assertion from Stones of an immense Bigness, that are in the Neighbourhood, alledging these to be the Remains of the wrought Clay, wherewith Prometheus had formed Mankind. I believe few will think this to be a very conclusive Argument; but what leaves no room to doubt that Prometheus received divine Honours, or at least such Honours as were destined to the Heroes, is what we are told by the same Pausanias in his Atticks, namely, that Prometheus had an Altar in the Academy itself, and that Games were instituted to him, which consisted in running from that Altar to the City, with Torches that were to be kept from going out. He who would gain this Victory must keep his Torch burning; if he who runs first lets his Torch go out, he gives place to the second, the second to the third, and so on; but if all the Torches go out, no body gains the Victory, and the Prize is reserved for another time.

(1) Chron. of the ancient Kings, P. 234. (2) In Corinth. (3) C. 4.

We shall close this Article by observing that Time has preserv'd to us a fine Bas-Relief (1), which represents Prometheus delivered by Hercules. The Fable is admirably engraved upon this Marble; at the Extremity whereof you see on one Side an old Man between the Branches of a Tree, who is the Image of Mount Atlas, according to Bellori; but it is more probably Mount Caucasus, where Prometheus was delivered. Hercules, with his Bow bent, ready to shoot at the Eagle, has left behind him his Club, and the Skin of the Lion of Nemea. Prometheus bound to a Rock, bears upon his Knee the Bird that preys upon his Entrails. Lastly, Mercury appears in a proper Attitude to assist Hercules.

(1) Admir. Rom. Ant.

C H A P. VII.

Of the other Titans.

TH O' Rhea or Ops, Oceanus, Tethys and Pluto were celebrated among the Titans, that I may not however deviate from the Order I have proposed to follow, I shall speak of them only in the History of the Gods of the Sea, of the Earth and Hell. Those I am to speak of in this Chapter, tho' less noted, deserve however to be mentioned, since all the Titans, generally speaking, had contributed to the Happiness of the World. Accordingly Diodorus Siculus remarks (1), that all of them had signalized themselves.

“ The Mythology of Crete, says he, takes Notice “ that the Titans were born while the Curetes were “ but young. They first inhabited the Country of “ the Gnosians, where are still to be seen the Founda“ tions of Rhea's Palace, and an ancient Wood.
 “ The Family of the Titans was composed of six Sons “ and five Daughters, all of them Sons of Cælus and “ Terra ; or, according to others, of one of the Cu- “ retes and Titæa, thus deriving their Name from “ their Mother. The six Sons were Saturn, Hyper- “ ion, Cæus, Japetus, Crius and Oceanus (a): And “ the five Daughters were Rhea, Themis, Mnemosyne, “ Phæbe and Tethys. All of them blest'd Mankind
 “ with some Discovery or other, which made them
 “ be remember'd by them with eternal Gratitude.
 “ Hyperion, the second of the Titans, for we have al“ ready spoke of Saturn, by his assiduous Observa“ tions, discovered the Course of the Sun, Moon, “ and other Luminaries ; by them he regulated the “ Times and Seasons, and transmitted that Know“ ledge to others. Hence he has been called the Fa-
 Vol. II. U ther

(1) L. 5. C. 11.

(a) Hesiod adds Mencæti, whom Jupiter with a Thunder-bolt threw down to Tartarus, as a Punishment for his Wickedness.

“ther of the Stars, and he must at least be allowed “to have been the Father of Astronomy.” This, no doubt, is what made him pass for the Father of the Sun and Moon, as we shall observe presently.

H Y P E R I O N.

Hyperion according to Hesiod (1), having married Theia, became the Father of the Sun and Moon (a). Diodorus Siculus, in the Theogony of the Atlantides, agrees with this Poet, that Hyperion was the Father of the Sun and of Phæbe or the Moon; but by another Wife. Where 'tis proper to remark, that altho' the Sun has been often confounded with Apollo, and the Moon with Diana, yet in the ancient Mythology they were plainly distinguish'd, as I shall prove in the History of Apollo.

M N E M O S Y N E.

To the Titanide Mnemosyne is ascribed, continues Diodorus, the Art of Reasoning, and the giving of Names suitable to every Being, so that we can describe them and converse about them without seeing them; an Invention, however, which others ascribe to Mercury: But Mnemosyne is generally allowed to have been the first who used Helps to assist the Memory in recalling things occasionally, and so much is intimated in her Name.

T H E M I S.

Tho' Themis is accounted only an allegorical Personage whose Name in the Hebrew Language (2) imports perfect or upright, and her pretended Marriage with Jupiter is but an Emblem of Justice which produces Laws, and regulates the Conditions of Men, yet I take her to be a real Personage and one of the principal Titanides. Hesiod, (3) who gives her Genealogy, says she was the Daughter of Cælus and

(1) Theog. v. 371. She is called Thea in Hesiod.

(a) Some before Hesiod, had called Phæbe the Daughter of Cælus and Terra.

(2) Than. (3) Theog.

and Terra or of Uranus and Titæa. “Terra, says he, “by her Commerce with Cælus, had Oceanus who dwells deep ingulf’d, and with him, Thea, Creus, “Hyperion, Japetus, Rhea, Themis, Mnemosyne, “Phæbe, Tethys and Saturn.” Whence we may see that she was elder than Saturn, and Aunt to Jupiter, and hence the Fiction of her pretended Commerce with that God falls to the Ground, since she was even elder than Saturn who was her Brother. Thus tho’ we are told by some of the Ancients that Jupiter, having been in Love with her, and pursued her as far as Macedonia, at Length offered Violence to her, and had by her three Daughters, Justice, Law and Peace; yet this is either a mere Allegory, or to be understood of Carmenta, who pass’d for Themis, and, according to Eusebius (1), had by Jupiter the three Children now named.

Themis distinguished herself by her Prudence and Regard to Justice; and if we may rely upon Diodorus, she was the Foundress of Divination, Sacrifices, the Laws of Religion, and whatever serves to maintain Order and Peace among Men. No wonder then that she has always been accounted the Goddess of Justice; and those Persons stiled from her Thesmophylaces and Thesmothetæ, whose Business it is to preserve the Worship of the Gods and the Laws of human Society. Hence also it comes that when Apollo delivers Oracles, he is said to do the Office of Themis, because she is the Inventress of Divination, as has been now said.

Themis had for her Lot a Part of Thessaly, and, according to the Practice of those Times the Office of administering Justice; wherein she acquitted herself with so much Integrity and Judgment, that she was always look’d upon afterwards as the Goddess of Justice, whose Name was therefore given her. As she had been addicted to Astrology, with the other Titans, she became very expert in the Art of Prediction; and after her Death she had Temples where Oracles were delivered. Ovid (1) mentions that which she delivered upon Parnassus, at the Time of her grand Nephew Deucalion's Deluge, which happened not till several Years after that Princess's Death.

(1) Præp. Evang. L. 3.

We may remark by the by, First, That this Fable is not very consistent with itself, for since it informs us that Terra had delivered Oracles in the same Place before Themis, how is it possible that she was the Inventress of Divination? we may observe in the second Place, that, according to Festus, Themis was she who commanded Men to ask from the Gods what was just and reasonable: That she presided over the Pactions that are made between them, and kept a strict Eye over the Observance of them.

As for the Worship of this Goddess, no Account of it is preserved to us in Antiquity, except what we learn from Pausanias (2) that she had a Temple at Athens, pretty near the Citadel. Nor have we any Monument or Statue of this Goddess remaining; we only know from the Author now quoted (3), that in the Temple which Juno had in Elis, and upon the same Throne where were the Statues of Jupiter and Juno, were likewise exhibited those of the Hours, and that of Themis their Mother.

C H A P. VIII.

An Examination into the Time when Saturn, Jupiter, and the other Titans lived, and when Men began to pay them divine Honours.

WE have already said that several Persons bore the Name of Jupiter, and we have fixed the Dates of some of them who were best known. The present Question therefore is only about the Titan Prince who went by this Name; and tho' Antiquity has left us few Lights as to the Time when he reigned,

(1) Met. L. 1.

(2) In Attic.

(3) In Eliac.

reigned, I presume however it may be deduced from Deucalion's Genealogy. The Marbles of Paros place his Reign in Lycoria near Parnassus in the ninth Year of Cecrops. This is their Account of it, contrary to what is said by Pausanias who takes Lycoria not to have been a Province, but a Town situated upon the Top of a Mountain. This date is very considerable, because it will serve to determine the Time when the Gods of Greece, Uranus, Chronos, and Zeus, lived, since Deucalion was their very near Relation according to the Genealogy of Apollodorus.

With the Help of this Date we may determine nearly the Age of Jupiter, who having reigned sixty two Years, may be reckoned to have begun his Reign 1842. Years before the vulgar Era, and to have died 1780. Years before the same Era, sometime before Inachus. Deucalion, no doubt, taking advantage of the Weakness or Indolence of the Sons of Jupiter's Successors, drew near to the Frontiers of Thessaly, and founded a new Settlement in the Neighbourhood of Mount Parnassus about 1573 Years before the vulgar Era.

To establish this Epoch we may borrow some Assistance from the Testimony of Tallus, who according to Theophilus of Antioch (1), expressly says that Chronos, or Saturn lived 321 Years before the taking of Troy, as has been already said (2); which is not far from the Date that I have now deduced from Deucalion's Genealogy; and agrees pretty well with the Opinion that is most commonly gone into by the Learned, who make Saturn to have lived in the Time of Abraham, about the Year 1914 before Christ, and Jupiter in the Time of Isaac; as also with profane Authors, who make Belus and Saturn contemporary.

The Memory of Noah, and of his Children was then recent enough, as well as the Tradition of their Partition of the World among them and of their Dispersion; and this is what makes the History

U 3

of

(1) L. 3. Adv. Ant.

(2) Hist. of Janus.

of the Titan Princes appear to be embellish'd with the Adventures of Noah's Offspring. The Strokes of Resemblance that are to be found between them seem so considerable to the famous Bochart (1), that he took the Family of the Titan Princes to be the same with that of the Patriarchs; making Saturn the same with Noah; and his three Sons, Shem, Cham and Japhet, Jupiter, Neptune and Pluto; the Cruelty that Jupiter practis'd upon his Father, only a bad Imitation of Cham's indiscreet Curiosity (a); the Division of the World between the Sons of Noah, the same with that which happened between the Sons of Saturn; in a Word, he makes the Parallel between the one and the other to hold exactly in almost every particular. Gerard Vossius, Father Thomassin of the Oratory, M. Huet, and lastly M. Fourmont the elder, have found other similar Characters of Resemblance between the Patriarchs and those first Gods of the Pagan World, as may be seen in their Works. The last, especially in the Parallel he draws between Saturn or Moloch, and Abrabam, which we have quoted in the second Volume (2), seems to have improved upon the Rest. But not to insist that nothing is so easy as to find some Strokes of Resemblance between Persons tho' ever so different, I can never be persuaded that the History of our first Parents was so well known to the Infidels as to be a Model for them to form their Gods and Heroes upon, as has been said in the eleventh Source of Fables. Thus all we can grant those learned Authors is, not that the Family of the Patriarchs is the same with that of the Titan Princes, since they cannot be confounded without overturning the most celebrated Remains of ancient profane History; but only that the Greeks might have learned from the Orientals, some Particularities of the History

(1) Pelag. L. i. c. i.

(a) He alledges that the same Phenician Word, signifying demonstravit patris nuditatem, imports also, Patrem castravit.

(2) B. 8. History of Moloch.

History of the Patriarchs, which they adapted to that of Saturn and Jupiter.

Such is the History of the first Gods of Greece. Those whose History is to be the Subject of the following Chapter, are descended from them and almost all of them claim Jupiter for their Father.

The End of the Third Volume of the Original.

The CONTINUATION of the HISTORY of the CELESTIAL GODS.

* C H A P. IX.

The History of Minerva or Pallas, and of Bellona.

I Begin the History of the Gods of this second Race with that of Minerva, the noblest of Jupiter's Productions. We shall first relate the Greek Mythology concerning her, then examine into her true Original. Cicero finds five Goddesses of this Name. " I have already, says he, mentioned
" one Minerva the Mother of Apollo. Another, the " Offspring of Nilus, is worship'd at Sais a Town in " Egypt. A third was the Daughter of Jupiter, as " has been said. A fourth, born of Jupiter and " Coryphe the Daughter of Oceanus, named by the " Arcadians Corea, to whom is owing the Invention " of Chariots drawn by four Horses. A fifth, who " is pictured with winged Shoes, was the Daughter U 4 " of

* Here begins the fourth Volume of the Original.

“ of Pallas, whom, we are told, she put to Death,
 “ because he offered Violence to her (a).”

St. Clement of Alexandria, who of all the Fathers was best acquainted with profane Antiquity, and had read a great Number of Authors whose Works are now lost, admits also five Minervas; but as to their Parents he differs somewhat from Cicero. The first, says he, was Athenian, and the Daughter of Vulcan; the second Egyptian, the Daughter of Nilus; the third, the Offspring of Saturn, invented the Art of War; the fourth, the Daughter of Jupiter; the last was the Offspring of Pallas and Titanis, the Daughter of Oceanus, who, after having put her Father to Death, slew him and covered herself with his Skin.

What first occurs here is the Mystery of this Goddess's Birth. Jupiter, we are told (b), after the War of the Titans, being now by the consent of the other Gods, Lord of Heaven and Earth, married Metis who was accounted the wisest of her Sex; but when she was ready to be delivered, having learned from Calus that she was to bring forth a Daughter of consummate Wisdom, and a Son who was fated to be one Day Sovereign of the Universe, he devoured her; and sometime after feeling a violent Pain in his Head, he applied to Vulcan, who with a Stroke of his Ax cleft his Brain asunder, whence sprung Minerva in compleat Armour, and already full grown; insomuch that she was in a Capacity to assist her Father in the War with the Giants, where she highly distinguish'd herself (1). Jupiter, according to some Authors, was already married to Juno; and what made him think of bringing forth Minerva

was

(a) Minerva prima, quam Apollinis Matrem supra diximus: Secunda orta Nilo, quam Ægyptii Saitæ colunt: Tertia illa quam Jove generatam diximus: Quarta Jove nata, & Coryphe Oceani Filia, quam Arcades Coriam nominant, & quadrigarum Inventricem ferunt: Quinta Pallantis, quæ Patrem dicitur interemisse, Virginitatem suam violare conantem; cui pennarum talaria affingunt. De Nat. Deor. L. 3. c. 192.

(b) See Hom. Hymn. to Pallas. Hesiod. Theog. Philostr. Picture of the Birth of Minerva, and Lucian's Dial. of Jupiter and Vulcan.

(1) See what has been said upon that War.

was Juno's Barrenness. This Fiction has always appeared Mysterious, and very different Explanations of it have been offered. Some of the learned Moderns have been of Opinion that it veiled some of the sublimest Truths in Philosophy, and even the Mystery of that Word (1) whereby all Things were created; that is to say, the eternal Ideas in the divine Mind, which had been the Model of whatever omnipotent Wisdom brought into Being (a); that the tremendous Egis (2), given her by the Poets, which no other God but herself was able to carry, was intended to figure her being equal in Power with her Father; and that her being called the Goddess of Arts and Sciences, was only a figurative way of saying she was the Intelligence of her Father; in fine, that the Reason of consecrating to her the Owl, the Serpent, and the Cock, was to denote her Vigilance and to teach us that true Wisdom is eternally awake. But if these Authors be ask'd, where the Poets had got such high Conceptions of the most sublime Theology, they tell you it was from the Books of Mercury Trismegistus, that celebrated Author who seems to have discovered the Mystery of the Trinity; but there is too much Reason to think these Books spurious. Others say (b) the Poets borrowed those Ideas from the Books of Moses, the Knowledge whereof was brought into Greece by Colonies from Egypt, and other neighbouring Nations; and that a confused Idea of the eternal Word, was the Foundation of the Fables relative to this Subject. Father Tournemine is of this Opinion, since in an excellent Piece of his inserted in the Memoirs of Trevoux, for November and December 1702, he says the Name of Athena or Thena comes from an Hebrew Word that signifies Knowledge; and he finds a great Affinity between that Goddess and the

(1) Λόγος.

(a) Called by S. Paul figura substantiæ ejus. See S. Augustine, de Civ. Dei. L. 7. from Varro.

(2) Hom. Il. B. 6.

(b) Father Tournemine, Scheme of the Explication of the Fables; Journal de Trevoux, November and December 1702.

the divine Word produced in the Way of Knowledge. Further, continues he, the Arcadians said Minerva was the Daughter of Coryphé, because that Word signifies the Crown of the Head. Triton, in like Manner, in the Eolian Dialect, signifies the Brain; For the same Reason her Father was said to be called Cranus. This learned Author goes yet farther, and is persuaded that the Serpent carried in Procession by the Virgins devoted to the Service of Minerva, was a Figure of that which had seduced Eve. But I can never give into these Notions; for how is it to be thought that the Pagans had the most distant Idea of these ineffable Mysteries?

M. le Clerc, in his Notes upon Hesiod, says this Fable is founded upon Jupiter's having adopted Minerva, and taken care of her Education. For my own Part, keeping to Hesiod who makes her spring from Jupiter's Brain, I would only remark that the Subject of that Fable is not, as is commonly thought the wise Minerva, but the warlike Pallas; since the Epithets he gives her agree to no other but her. That God, says he, hatch'd from his Brain the blue-ey'd Tritonian Goddess; she is active, violent, untractable, that takes Delight in bloody Broils, the Din of War and Battles.

Eusebius takes the Fable of Minerva to have risen from the Story of a Virgin, who appeared upon the Banks of the Lake Triton, and grew famous for her Works in Wooll; and as fine Arts are the Productions of the Mind, it was just to say that she sprung from the Brain of Jove. Pausanias (1) seems to confirm this Tradition followed by Eusebius, when he says; As for the Goddess, she is Blue-ey'd, which I take to be founded upon a Fable current among the Libyans, for they say Minerva was the Daughter of Neptune and Tritonis the Nymph of a Marsh, and that she was therefore represented with blue Eyes like her Father.

However, as Antiquity varies not a little in all these Matters, the same Pausanias tells us that those

(1) In Att. c. 14.

those of Aliphera in Arcadia valued themselves for having Minerva born and brought up among them: Lastly the most common Opinion is that Minerva was the Daughter of Cecrops (a), and as she distinguish'd herself in the Belles Lettres, and perhaps in Arms, so she came to be accounted after her Death the Divinity who presided over them; and the Reason assigned for her being reckoned the Issue of Jupiter's Brain is only that her Name, according to the most natural Etymology, signifies either Counsel, or Wisdom, or Wit (1). All the Learned however are not agreed as to this Etymology. Others derive the Name Athene, either from Atbanatos, immortal, or from Thanai, Knowing, or from Athrena, Sharpsighted, or lastly from Thena Knowledge: And that of Minerva, anciently Menerva, is derived from μένω, or from minuere, to diminish, or from minari, to threaten, or from monere to warn (2).

But I reckon there was a Minerva more antient than those we have now mentioned, who was worship'd at Sais in Egypt, long before Cecrops; that this Prince who was a Native thereof, introduced her Worship into Greece, and that it was only in after Times this Goddess was confounded with his Daughter Athené, to whom he had given that Name to consecrate her to the Divinity who was worship'd in his Country. This Minerva of Egypt was called Neitis, according to Plato (3) and Eratoſthenes; and the Former adds that she was the Foundress of Sais, whence the Greeks had the Ceremonies of her Worship. And as the Kings of Egypt according to Lucian, often took the Names of their Gods, that of Nitocris the famous Queen, who during the Course of her Reign, distinguish'd herself no less by her glorious Deeds than by the Monuments she erected, signifies Victorious Minerva,

According

(a) This Conjecture is the more probable, that Cecrops is perhaps Jupiter King of Athens, whom ancient Mythology makes be the Father of Minerva.

(1) Cælius Cælo Poet. Astro. in Geminis.

(2) Consult likewise Lyllo Gyraldi.

(3) In his Timæus.

According to others of the Ancients, this Minerva of Egypt was called Ogga, or Onka; and it must be owned that their Opinion is better grounded than that of Plato and Eratosthenes. For indeed we have several Writers of Antiquity to attest that the most ancient Name of Minerva was that of Ogga or Onka. Euphorion, in Stephen of Byzantium, is positive on this Head; and Hesychius says in so many Words; Athene was called Onka at Thebes. The Scholiast upon Pindar, who mentions a Village in Thebais named Onka, is of the same Opinion with Hesychius: Now the City of Thebes in Greece was a Phenician Colony. Eschilus is the first from whom we learn this Name of Minerva; Etbeocles says in one of the Tragedies of that Poet; “First of all Onka, Pallas, “ that Goddess who vouchsafes to dwell near us at
“ the Gates of this City, &c.”

The Scholiast on that Poet hence concludes that Pallas was worship'd among the Thebans under the Name of Onka: Now whence had the Thebans that Name but from the Egyptians or Phenicians whom Cadmus brought into Beotia? I say from the Egyptians or Phenicians, because the Ancients were divided as to the Country whence Cadmus came, as we shall see in his History.

But what is the Derivation of this Name Ogga or Onka? As to this the Learned are not agreed, as may be seen in Seiden (1) and Bocbart (2). M. Fourmont (3) seems not so much at a Loss about it as the Rest. Onga, says he, which is the Phenician name of Pallas, must be in the Family of Chronos; now Chronos or Saturn according to him, is unquestionably Abraham. This Name imports a young Maid, or a Maid-servant: It is therefore the same Name, only taking away the r with that of Agar, the Mother of the Warlike Ismael; but I refer to the Author himself, for the Proofs of this Sentiment.

From

(1) De Diis Syriis.

(2) Geogr. sacr. L. 2. c. 24.

(3) Reff. Crit. 8, at Sect. 2.

From what has been said, I presume Cicero must be in a Mistake; when he says in the Passage before quoted, Minerva Secunda, orta Nilo, quam Ægyptii Saitæ colunt; and what proves her Antiquity, is that among the Egyptians she was the Wife of Vulcan, the most ancient of all their Gods: Wherein as has been already remark'd, the Greek Mythology that made her a Virgin Goddess, differed very much from that of Egypt. The Libyans, who as we learn from Herodotus had received from the Egyptians the Worship of this Goddess, changed her whole History (1), making her the Daughter of Neptune and the Lake Tritonis, that she had given herself to Jupiter, who adopted her for his own Daughter. &c.

I ought to observe from the same Author, that the Libyans, who lived about the Lake Tritonis, celebrated every Year a solemn Festival in Honour of Minerva; during which the young Virgins divided themselves into two Bodies, and fought together with Stones and Sticks, and reckoned those not true Virgins who died of their Wounds: An ancient Festival according to those People, which they said was transmitted to them from their Ancestors. The same Author (2) likewise mentions a Festival celebrated at Sais in Honour of the same Goddess; but of that we have said enough in the History of the Gods of Egypt.

Pallas, Minerva and Athene, among the Greeks were but one and the same Divinity, with this sole Difference, that Minerva was properly the Goddess of Arts and Sciences; and Pallas, who had got her Name from the Giant Pallas her Father, was she who presided over War, whence she is sometimes confounded with Bellona, whom we shall speak of in the Sequel of this Article; but here the Poets often vary.

Several Cities were distinguish'd for the Worship they paid to Minerva; amongst others Rhodes and Athens;

(1) L. 1. c. 180.

(2) L. 2. c. 59.

Athens ; but in that Sais rivalled all the Cities in the World ; there this Goddess had even a magnificent Temple, whereof you may see the Description in Herodotus (1). The same Author speaks also of Temples which this Goddess had in several Cities of Greece ; but it seems the Island Dio, or Naxos, tho' consecrated to Bacchus, was more remarkable for the Worship of Minerva, as may be proved by three Medals of that City, on which she is represented. One of these Medals is in the King's Cabinet, and has been explained by Father Hardouin ; and the other two are in the Thesaurus Britannicus. But now that I have mentioned Rhodes, I shall explain by the by the Fable which imports that on this Goddess's Birth-day, a Shower of Gold was seen to fall in that City (2) ; which has no other Foundation but that the City Rhodes, which had come under the Protection of Minerva, excelled in the Art of making fine Statues. To this Fable was added that the Goddess, offended with them for having once omitted to bring Fire to one of her Sacrifices, forsook that Island, and retired to Athens ; which means no more but that the Rhodians having neglected the Worship of that Goddess, and their former Care in improving the fine Arts, the Athenians began at that Time to distinguish themselves therein, and to take her for their Patroness. Accordingly they dedicated to her a magnificent Temple under the Name of Parthenos, the Virgin. Phidias adorned it with a Statue of Gold and Ivory, which was a Master-piece. But what made the Worship of Minerva still more solemn, was the Festival which the Athenians celebrated to her Honour, the Pomp whereof invited Spectators from all Greece. This Festival, accurately described by Meursius (3), whom I shall only copy, was called Athenaia, and had been instituted by Erichthonius, the third King of Athens. Afterwards when Theseus had united the twelve Towns of Attica, to form them into one

(1) L. 2.

(2) Pindar 7. Olym. and Claudian.

(3) Meurs. Panathenæa.

one City more considerable, and when this Festival was celebrated by all these People, it took the Name of Panathenaia. At first it lasted only one Day; but to add to the Solemnity of it, it was continued afterwards for several Days. It was at that Time the Panathenæa came to be distinguish'd into greater and less: The greater were solemnized every five Years, on the 23d of the Month Hecatombæon, which answers to our June; and the lesser ones every Year, on the 20th of Targelion that is of the Month of Aprile. The Games or publick Exercises that accompany'd this Festival, were the foot Race, with Flambeaus and lighted Torches, as in the Festivals of Vulcan and Prometheus: Then about the Time of Plato, when the Use of Horses was introduced into this Exercise, it became a Horse-race. The second Exercise was the Combat of the Athletæ, and the third a Trial of Musick; there the Poets too disputed the Prize, and exhibited four Pieces of Poetry, that were called Tetralogiæ. To these Games was added the Dance, especially the Pyrrick, and it was performed by the Youths. The Reason they gave for this Custom, was that Minerva herself, after the Defeat of the Titans, had practised this Dance. When the Romans became Masters of Athens, they added to them also the Combat of the Gladiators. They who presided over these several Games were called Athletethi; they were ten in all, according to the Number of the Tribes of Athens, and their Function lasted four Years. The Victor's Prize was an Olive Crown, and a Vessel full of Oil, which he might dispose of as he had a Mind, provided he did not carry it Home, and he was obliged to give an Entertainment to those who had been his Antagonists.

After these Trials of skill followed the Sacrifices, for which every Village of Attica was obliged to furnish an Ox, and on the Remains they kept a publick Feast.

As the great Panathenaia were more rarely celebrated, so they were likewise more solemn. To the Exercises

Exercifes and Sacrifices now mentioned, was added a Proceffion, in which the Peplus of Minerva was carried about. This Peplus was a white Robe without Sleeves, and all worked with Gold, on which were represented the Combats and great Atchievements of Minerva, Jupiter and the Heroes. In this Proceffion were joined People of all Ranks and Ages, and of either Sex, with this Distinction that the Youths led up the Rear; the old People carried an Olive Branch in their Hands, the young Virgins Baskets, and the blooming Boys crowned with Millet, fung Hymns known by the Name of Pæans, while thofe whom they called Rhapsodists recited Verfes of Homer. The Proceffion advanced from the Ceramicus to the Temple of Ceres Eleufina. This Peplus was faften'd to a Barge which was moved along by Machinery.

Antiquity makes mention of the Quarrel and Conteft between that Goddefs and Neptune, about giving a Name to the City Athens. The twelve great Gods were chofen Umpires of the Difference, and agreed that the one who produced a Thing of moft Ufe to the City, fhould have the naming of it. Neptune with a Stroke of his Trident, made a Horfe fpring from the Earth; and Minerva produced an Olive-Tree, which procured her the Victory, and accordingly ſhe gave the Name of Athene to the City of Cecrops (a).

S. Auguſtin (1) informs us from Varro, that what gave riſe to this Fable was, that Cecrops, in building the Walls of Athens, found an Olive-tree and a Fountain; and that the Oracle of Delphos being conſulted ſaid, Minerva and Neptune had both a Right to name the new City; upon which the People and Senate had aſſembled and decided in Favour of the Goddeſs.

But,

(a) Apollodorus, l. 3. relating this Fiction, ſays Neptune the firſt who arrived at Attica, had made a Sea to ſpring out of the Earth, and that Minerva in Prefence of Cecrops, had planted an Olive, which was ſtill to be ſeen in his Time in the Temple of Pandora, one of the Daughters of Cecrops.

(1) De Civ. Dei. l. 8.

But according to some Authors, this Fable is only founded upon the Change which Cranæus made, in transferring the Name of his Daughter Athene to that City, instead of that of Posidonia the Name of Neptune which it had before; and as the Areopagus confirmed this Change, they have fabled that Neptune had been cast by the Judgment of the Gods.

Tho' these two Explications are not without Probability, an ingenious Critic (a) has found out another which is still more satisfactory. The ancient People of Attica, says he, the Posterity of Cethin, a Savage and ferocious Race, dwelt only in Caves, and minded nothing but hunting. The Pelasgi, who made themselves Masters of their Country, taught them the Art of Navigation, and made Pirates of them. Cecrops, a Native of Sais in Egypt, led a Colony thither, abolish'd the barbarous Manners of that People, taught them to cultivate the Ground and to propagate Olives, for which the Soil was proper: Of Olives, says he, whence Sais derived its Name (1). He taught them likewise to worship Minerva, who was called Athene; highly adored at Sais, and to whom the Olive-tree was consecrated. The Athenians from that Time look'd upon that Goddess as the Protectress of their City, and called it after her Name. Athens became famous for its excellent Oil (2): The Profits that accrued from thence suggested a Project of reclaiming the People from Piracy, to apply them solely to the Culture of the Ground. The more effectually to promote this Design, they invented a Fable, (which was the ancient Way of proposing any Thing to the Populace) wherein Neptune was supposed to have been overcome by Minerva, who, even in the Judgment of the great Gods, had made a more useful Discovery than Neptune. This Fable was composed in the ancient Language of the Country, which was the Phrygian, blended with several Phœnician Words: And as in these two Languages the same

VOL. II.

X

Word

(a) Father Tournemine, Journal de Trevoux, January 1708.

(1) Zanth, An Olive-tree.

(2) See Herodotus.

Word signifies a Horse and a Ship (1), those who interpreted this Fable, took the Word in the former Signification, and substituted a Horse in Place of a Ship, which was the Emblem of the Fable, whose End was to reclaim the People from Piracy. Had it not been for this Mistake, adds that learned Father, would Neptune have got the Name of Ippius (2), and would they ever have made a Horseman of the God of the Sea? Or, to say it in a Word with Vossius (3), it was a Contest between the Seamen, who owned Neptune for their Head, and the People who sided with the Senate governed by Minerva, that gave Rise to the Fable. The People, by the Judgment of the Areopagus, carry'd it, and the Country Life was preferred to that of the Pirates; which made them say Minerva had got the better of Neptune.

How probable soever these Explications appear, I am of Opinion that a more natural one may yet be given, such a one as may suit with the other Fables, that are of a similar Kind; for this Quarrel among the Gods is not the only one that Antiquity mentions. Pausanias tells us the Corinthians alledged that the Sun and Neptune had a Contest for their Country, much like this between Neptune and Minerva for Athens, and that they chose Briareus to decide the Difference, who adjudged the Isthmus to Neptune, and the Promontory which commands the City to the Sun; and from that Time Neptune continued in Possession of the Isthmus.

The Argives, according to the same Author (4), had another Fable among them, conform to these two now related. Neptune, they said, had flooded a great Part of their Lands, when the River Inachus and the other Arbiters pronounced Sentence that the Country ought to belong to Juno and not to Neptune. Juno upon this pray'd Neptune to stop the Inundation; the God granted her Request, and at the

(1) Consult the Place now cited.

(2) ἵππεύς, a Horseman.

(3) De Idol. L. 1. c. 15.

(4) Loc. cit. c. 22.

the Place where the Waters of the Sea retired, the Argives, in Commemoration of this Event, built a Temple to Neptune, whom they surnamed Proclystius (1). Thus I am of Opinion that these and the like Fables, which the same Author speaks of, refer to the Introduction of the Worship of those Gods into those Countries, and to the Opposition that was made upon that Occasion. Arbiters were then chosen, and that God whose Worship was establish'd in Preference to the other, was reckoned to have gained the Victory: Which is plainly the Case, especially in the two first Examples. Thus the Athenians who at first preferred Agriculture to maritime Commerce, paid more Honour to Minerva than to Neptune; and the Corinthians situated between two Seas, preferred the Worship of Neptune to that of Apollo, that is maritime Commerce, to the fine Arts and Sciences.

This was not the only Contest that Minerva had. Arachné the Daughter of Idmon, of the City Colophon, disputed with her the Glory of working better than she in Cloth and Tapestry. The Challenge was accepted; and the Goddess seeing the Work of her Rival exquisitely beautiful, threw the Shuttle at her Head, which so provoked Arachné that she hanged herself in Spight; but the Gods in Pity transformed her into the Spider, as we are told by Ovid (2).

Bochart thinks this Fable has no other Foundation but the Word Arach, which signifies to Spin, and tells us that the Scripture uses the same Word to signify the Webs which that Insect works; but with due Respect to that learned Author, we may well suppose that the Vanity of an ingenious female Artist who had pretended to surpass Minerva herself, and her having come to a tragical End had given a handle to the Invention of the Fable now related. Pliny (3) who gives the History of Arachné, says she hang'd herself, without telling the Reason of her Despair.

X 2

The

(1) From the Greek Word Περικλύειν, to dry up.

(2) Met. L. 1.

(3) L. 11. c. 24.

The Contest of this Goddess with Tiresias was very soon ended. He having had the Presumption to look upon her when she was bathing herself, was deprived by her of the Use of Sight, as shall be said in the sixth Volume.

I shall dwell but little upon the Adventure between Vulcan and Minerva, it suffices to observe that he by Jupiter's own Permission, having offered Violence to her, met with such stout Resistance, that tho' he became the Father of Eriethonius by her, yet her Chastity did not suffer (1). The Goddess having taken the Infant who was lame and deformed, shut him up in a Basket, and gave the Daughters of Cecrops the Charge of nursing him; but I shall explain this Fable in the sixth Volume, when I come to speak of that Prince.

It only now remains that I speak of the Names that were given to this Goddess, and of the Manner in which she was represented.

These Names she derived either from her Qualities, or the Places where she was worship'd. That of Alalcomene given her by Homer, was derived according to some, from the Name of him who had erected her Statue, or, according to others, from her giving Assistance to her Favourites, as to Hercules, whose great Protectress she was against Juno: And it was, according to Pausanias (2) in the Attitude of a Woman ready to defend that Heroe, she was represented by the Megareans in the Statue of her which they had placed in the Temple of Olympian Jupiter. She was called Musica, or the Musician, a Name given her from the Statue of her which Demetrius made, where the Serpents of the Gorgon, when they were struck, resounded like a Lute. The Name of Tritonea, or Tritogenia, came from the River Triton, near which she was born, and where she had been seen for the first Time. That of Gigantophontis, from the Aid she had given Jupiter against the Giants. That of Parthenia, because she preserved her

(1) Paus. in Att.

(2) In Eliac.

her Virginity ; that of Cæſia, becauſe ſhe was Blue-ey'd : She was called Ippia ; that is to ſay the female Cavalier, and then ſhe was taken for the Daughter of Neptune ; Sthenias, or Robuſt ; Poliuchos or Polias, as you would ſay the Patroness of the City ; this is the Name ſhe went by at Athens, and it is to be ſeen upon a Medal of that City, as to which you may conſult a Diſſertation in the Memoirs of the Academy of the Belles Lettres (1). Under this ſame Name ſhe had a Statue at Athens, according to Strabo, all of Ivory, done by Phidias. She bore likewiſe the ſame Name in the other Cities where ſhe was ſpecially worſhip'd. She was called Ellotes, for Reaſons to be given when we come to the Hiſtory of Europa ; Coriphagena, becauſe ſhe ſprung from Jupiter's Brain ; this Epithet is given to her by Plutarch. She was denominated Lyndia, from the City of that Name in the Iſland of Rhodes ; Ergane, or the Inventress, becauſe to her was aſcribed the Invention of ſeveral Arts, ſince beſides that of the Art of War, Lucian aſcribes to her that of Architecture ; the Art of Spinning, of making Cloth, Tapeſtry, Silk and Woollen Stuffs, is alſo aſcribed to her by the Ancients. In fine, ſhe was reckoned the firſt who had taught to plant and cultivate the Olive. She is alſo honoured with the Invention of Chariots and of the Uſe of Trumpets and the Flute, &c.

A great many other Names of this Goddeſs are to be found in Pausanias and Lylio Geraldi, who may be conſulted ; 'tis enough that I have explained the Chief of them.

Minerva is commonly repreſented with a Helmet on her Head, a Pike in one Hand, and a Buckler in the other, with the Egis upon her Breſt. The Egis, according to the Etymology of the Word, was a Goats Skin that ſerved for a Cuirasſ to the Goddeſs, whereon was engraved the Head of Meduſa (2). Minerva's Helmet is differently figured

X 3

upon

(1) Tom. 3.

(2) See the Hiſtory of Perſeus.

upon the Monuments we have now extant, as may be seen in the Antiquaries; but Pausanias is the only one I know who says (1) that the Elians surmounted the Helmet with a Cock, because that Animal is very courageous, or because it was consecrated to her under the Name of Ergané. Pausanias in his Atticks speaks of a Statue of Minerva with a Sphinx in the Middle of her Helmet, and Griffins on either Side. In a Medal belonging to the Queen of Sweden's Cabinet, the same Helmet is surmounted with a Chariot and four Horses; in another from the Cabinet of M. Maffei, is a Serpent, or Dragon with winding Spires, marching before her. 'Tis thought that this is probably the Minerva Polias, worship'd on the Athenian Rock, which was kept by a Dragon; besides we know that the Animals consecrated to this Goddess were the Dragon and the Owl. Accordingly we see, on Numbers of Minerva's Statues, Dragons upon her Helmet and Breast-plate, as also the Owl upon several Medals of her: In the Cabinet of M. de la Cbause, is a Minerva holding in the left Hand a Rod wreathed about with a Serpent, such as is to be seen in the Images of Esculapius, and which was the Emblem of Medicine: Montfaucon (2) was in the Right to say, that this was Minerva Medica, who had a Temple, or a Pantheon at Rome. She was also worship'd among the Greeks under the Name of Hygieia, which signifies Medica, or Goddess of Health. But I have no mind to explain all the Monuments we have of this Goddess, nor all the Singularities that therein occur, these I leave to the Antiquaries.

I must not however forget that the Inhabitants of Teutbis, a Village of Arcadia, had, according to Pausanias (3), a Statue of Minerva, wherein the Goddess was represented with a Wound in the Thigh, for which this Reason is given. "Near to Thisoa, says that Author, there is a Village named Teutbis, "anciently it was a City, which as we are told, "raised

(1) In Eliac.(2) Diarium.(3) In Arcad.

“ raised Troops at its own Expence for the Siege of “ Troy, and sent them under the Command of a “ particular Captain named Teuthis, others say, Or- “ nythus: This Captain, while the Greeks were de“ tained in Aulis by contrary Winds, quarrelled “ with Agamemnon, and would needs return with “ his Arcadians. They add that Minerva having “ assumed the Similitude of Melas, the Son of Ops, “ endeavoured to dissuade Teuthis from his Purpose;
 “ that Teuthis transported with Anger, struck the “ Goddess with his Javelin; and wounded her in the “ Thigh; after which he set out with his Troop, but “ upon his coming home had a Vision, where he “ thought he saw Minerva pointing him to her “ Wound; the Effect of which was that he instantly “ fell into a languishing Distemper, whereof he died;
 “ that the Land where he dwelt was cursed, and for “ that Reason was the only Canton of Arcadia which “ produced no kind of Fruit. Afterwards the In“ habitants came to consult the Oracle of Dodona, “ who advised them to appease the Goddess; with “ this Intention they erected to her a Statue, where “ she is represented with a Wound in the Thigh:
 “ I have seen that Statue, one of the Thighs has still
 “ a Ligature of a purple Colour.”

I said Minerva appeared almost always upon the Monuments we have now extant, with her Egis; and shall now give the Reader a more particular Explanation of this Piece of Armour.

Tho' this Word in its natural Signification signifies a she-goat, and the Egis is commonly thought to have been the Skin of that Animal, yet some Authors are persuaded that it was that of a Monster named Egis, that vomited Fire, and is said to have made vast Havock of old, in Phrygia, Phenicia, Egypt and Libya. This Monster Minerva destroyed, and wore its Skin upon her Buckler (1). There she also had engraved the Gorgon's Head, entwined with Serpents;

X 4 and

(1) Diod. L. 3. c. 35.

and this dreadful Buckler made all who looked upon it to quake and tremble (a).

Anciently all the Bucklers of the Gods, especially that of Jupiter, covered with the Skin of the Goat that had suckled him, and whose Name he took (1) were called Egides; but from the Time of Minerva's Victory, this Name was appropriated to her Buckler alone. 'Tis probable that Minerva destroyed some famous Robber who laid Waste the Country; and that this gave Rise to the Fable. But as the Greeks had always fabulous Reasons to alledge for their ancient Ceremonies, I choose rather as to this Article to rely on Herodotus (2), who says the Greeks borrowed from the Libyans, the Habit and Buckler with which they adorn Minerva, who is very much honoured in that Country, especially about the Lake Triton, where she is thought to have been born. The very Name of Egis sufficiently denotes that this Sort of Buckler came from Libya, where the Inhabitants wear upon their Cloaths Skins of Goats dress'd, which the Greeks name Egides. But as they pretended their Country was the Birth Place of Minerva, to obscure the Tradition which set forth that her Worship had come from Egypt and Libya, whence Cecrops had brought it, they invented the Fable concerning this Monster, and the Victory of the Goddess. Hear how Homer paints this formidable Egis (3). “ Minerva
“ the Daughter of Jupiter Ægiobus, sheathes herself
“ in Armour; her Shoulders she covers with the Egis,
“ the tremendous Egis, encompassed round with “ Terror, φόβος; Discord, Ἔρις; Force, Ἀλκή; Assault, “ ἰσχύς: In the Middle was the Gorgon's Head, the “ dire portent of Jupiter Ἀργιόχαιρ the awful Egis- “ bearer.

Virgil

(a) Tho' the Egis ordinarily signifies the Buckler of Minerva, this Goddess however frequently bears Medusa's Head upon her Cuirass.

(1) L. 2.

(2) L. 4.

(3) Iliad.

Virgil the faithful Imitator of Homer, gives the following Description of it (1).

*Ægidaque horrificam, turbatæ Palladis arma,
Certatim squammis serpentum, auroque polibant,
Connexosque angues, ipsamque in pectore Divæ
Gorgona, defecto vertentem lumina collo.*

BELLONA.

I have already said that Bellona, whom the Greeks named Enyo, was sometimes confounded with Pallas; however in the better Authors of Mythology, they are often distinguish'd from one another. Accordingly Hesiod calls Bellona the Daughter of Phorcys and Ceto, which was never said of Minerva. Varro adds that she was the Sister of Mars, and that she was anciently named Duelliona (a); there are even Authors who make her his Wife.

The Poets vied with one another in painting her as a Warlike Divinity who prepared the Chariot and Horses of Mars, when he set out for War, as may be seen in Statius (2); According to Virgil (3) this Goddess armed with a Whip animated Warriors to the Battle.

*Et scissa gaudens vadit Discordia pallâ,
Quam cum sanguineo sequitur Bellona flagello;
Or in Lucan's Stile (4):*

Sanguineum veluti quatens Bellona flagellum.

She was represented, further, with her Hair dishevelled, holding a Torch in her Hand.

*Ipsa facem quatens, ac flavam sanguine multo
Sparsa comam, medias acies Bellona pererrat (5).*

Bellona had a Temple at Rome in the ninth Region, near the Porta Carmentalis, and in that Temple the Senate

(1) En. L. 8.

(a) These two Names Bellona, and Duelliona, originally Latin, differ not from one another, both of them signifying the Goddess of War.

(2) Theb. L. 2. v. 1718.

(3) En. l. 8. v. 703.

(4) Phars. l. 3. v. 568.

(5) Sil. Ital. Punic. l. 5. v. 221.

Senate gave Audience to the Embassadors, who were not allowed to enter the City, as also to Generals who returned from War. At the Gate was a small Column called the Warlike Column, against which they threw a Spear whenever they declared War.

Servius says this Goddess had her Rank among the Gods who were called Common, and was reckoned equal in Power to Mars, the God of War. The Priests of Bellona called Bellonarii, received their Priesthood by Incisions that were made upon their Thighs, the Blood whereof they received in the Palms of their Hands, as we learn from Tertullian; but Eleanus Lampridius, in the Life of Commodus (1), tells us this Incision was made in the Arm: Bellonæ servientes vere exsecare Brachium præcepit, studio crudelitatis. These poor Wretches, after having thus drawn Blood from themselves by those cruel Incisions, made a Sacrifice of it to the Goddess. This Cruelty in latter Times however was only counterfeited. These Priests were Fanaticks, who in their Fits of Enthusiasm predicted the taking of Towns, the Defeat of Enemies, and boded nothing but Blood and Havock; which makes Juvenal say (2):

— — Sed & Fanaticus æstro

Percussus, Bellona, tuo divinat, &c. (a)

The Worship of Bellona, tho' celebrated at Rome, was yet much more so at Comana: There were two principal Cities of that Name, where she was honoured with a peculiar Worship, as has been said at more Length in the first Volume.

Bellona is represented upon some Monuments, and upon the Medals of the Bruttians, together with Mars, armed with a Pike and Buckler; but 'tis very difficult to distinguish her from Pallas, as has been said in the first Volume.

C H A P.

(1) C. 9. (2) Sat. 4. v. 124.

(a) You may consult Rosinus, Ant. Rom. L. 4. Ch. 10. and Casaubon upon Lampridius, Loc. cit.

C H A P. X.

The History of MARS and of VICTORY.

TO Bellona and the Warlike Pallas 'tis natural to join the God of War. Mars, called Ares by the Greeks, was, according to Homer (1) and the other Greek Poets, the Son of Jupiter and Juno; and 'tis only among the Latin Poets we find the ridiculous Fable setting forth that Juno, to be reveng'd on Jupiter for having got Minerva without her Concurrency, had conceived Mars by touching a Flower in a Meadow, which the Goddess Flora had shewed her: A Fiction unknown to most of the Ancients, and which probably had only an allegorical Meaning, which it would be very needless to dive into; or which was invented, as an ancient Mythologist pretends (2), only upon Account of Mars's ferocious Character, whom they could not conceive to be the Son of so polite a Prince as Jupiter. 'Tis true Apollodorus says in his Bibliotheca, that Juno brought forth Mars, without the Assistance of a Man; but he says nothing of the Rest of the Fable.

Whatever be in it, Lucian informs us (3) that Juno gave the young Mars to be educated by Priapus, who according to the same Author, was one of the Titans, or of the Idæi Dactyli; who taught him Dancing and other Exercises, as the Preludes of War; and that of a rustick and clumsy God he made him a great Captain (a). The Bythinians, adds the Author now quoted, tell us that this was the Reason why the Tithe of the Spoils consecrated to Mars, used to be offered to Priapus.

If

(1) Il. L. 1.

(2) Boccace, Gen. of the Gods, L. 19.

(3) Dial. of the Dance.

(a) As Mythology varies a great deal as to these ancient Fictions, several Authors alledge it was Mars who taught Priapus Dancing and War. Accordingly Homer gives Mars the Epithet of Dancer.

If we would fully unravel the History of this God, we must distinguish several Princes of his Name. The first, to whom Diodorus attributes the Invention of Arms, and the Art of marshalling Troops in Battle, is undoubtedly Belus whom the Scripture calls Nimrod, that mighty hunter before the Lord (1), who, after having practised his Skill upon wild Beasts, turned it against Men; and having subdued a great Number of them, declared himself their King. Justin ascribes to Ninus, and the Chronicle of Alexandria to Thutas, one of his Descendants, what Diodorus Siculus says of Belus. We learn from Hyginus (2) that the Name of Belus was given to that ancient King because he was the first who waged War with Animals (a).

The second Mars was an ancient King of Egypt: The third was King of Thrace named Odin, who signalized himself so much by his Valour and Conquests, that he was promoted by that Warlike People to the Honours of being their God of War, and this is he whom they call the Hyperborean Mars. This undoubtedly is he whom Pausanias makes (3) to have been nursed by a Thracian Woman named Thero, who was perhaps his Mother.

The fourth is called the Mars of Greece, surnamed Ares; the fifth and last is the Mars of the Latins, who enter'd into the Prison of Rhea Sylvia, and begat upon her Romulus and Remus: And this was Amulius Numitor's Brother. In fine the Name of Mars was given to most warlike Princes, and every Country valued itself on having one, as well as a Hercules. Accordingly we find one among the Gauls under the Name of Hesus; and that ancient People, if we may believe Lucan, and after him Lactantius (b) sacrificed to him Human Victims (c).

We

(1) Gen. c. 5.

(2) Fab. 274.

(a) Belus a Belluis; but are we to rely upon a Latin Etymology derived from a Word that to be sure has no Relation to it?

(3) In Lacon.

(b) Galli Hesum & Teutatem Sanguine humano placabant Deos. Lact. l. 1. c. 21.

(c) Et quibus immitis placatur sanguine cæso

Teutates, horrendæ feris altaribus Hesus. Phars. l. 1.

We find him also among the Scythians, who honoured him under the Figure of a Sword, and among the Persians, under the Name of Orion, who, if we may credit Vossius (1), was the same with Nimrod, whose name was changed at the Time of his Deification. In fine, Julian the Apostate makes mention of a Mars of Edessa, surnamed Azifus (2).

The Greeks threw into the History of their Mars the Adventures of all those I have now named. What we know particularly concerning him is the Adventure that happened to him with Allirrotius the Son of Neptune. That young Prince, as we learn from Apollodorus (3), Pausanias (4), Demosthenes and Plutarch, being in love with Alcippe, the Daughter of Mars, but not being able to gain her Affection, offered Violence to her, which so highly incensed her Father against the presumptuous Youth, that he put him to Death. Neptune, enraged for the Death of his Son, had Mars summoned in Judgment, and the gravest Athenians being assembled upon so serious an Affair, declared him innocent; and acquitted him in the usual manner. The Place where this famous Judgment was pronounced, was called the Areopagus, a Name formed from that of Mars named Ares, and the Word Pagos, because the Assembly was held upon an Eminence; or, which comes to much the same, from Ἀρεῖς πάγος, Martis Rupes, the Rock of Mars; and this, by the by, is the Origin of the famous Tribunal of Areopagus, so known afterwards.

This celebrated Event, which makes a considerable Era in the Greek History, happened according to the Chronicle of Paros, under the Reign of Cranæus, that is, in the Year 1560. before Jesus Christ (a). As they seldom wrote the Transactions of those early Times without some Embellishments, it was given out that Mars had been absolved by the Judgment of the twelve great Gods, because the Judges employ'd

in

(1) De Idol. l. 1. c. 16.

(2) Orat.

(3) Bibl. l. 3.

(4) In Atticis.

(a) See the Interpreters of this Chronicle.

in his Process were in Number twelve, chosen from the first Families in Athens.

Servius gives another Account of this Adventure ; but he grants that it gave rise to the Erection of the Court of Areopagus. Allirrotius, according to that Author, to avenge the Defeat of his Father, whom Minerva had got the better of, resolv'd to cut down all the Olive-Trees round about Athens, because they were consecrated to that Goddess ; but the Ax having drop'd out of his Hand, he was wounded by it, and died some time after. Neptune his Father accused the God Mars, his Enemy, of his Son's Death ; but he was absolved by the Judgment of the Areopagus.

The Poet Eschylus must have been ignorant of these two Traditions, when he composed his Tragedy of the Eumenides, since he makes Minerva say that the Place where the Court of Areopagus was held, had got that Name when the Amazons had offered Victims there to the God Mars ; and that the first Cause try'd there was that of Orestes ; but we know from Apollodorus (1), that Cephalus had been judged there long before, and condemned to perpetual Exile, tho' the Murder of Procris his Wife had been involuntary ; and that Dedalus, for having flung his Nephew Talus from the Top of the Citadel of Minerva, after having been in like manner condemned there, was obliged to fly to Minos's Court, as shall be said in his History. Now Cephalus and Dedalus lived before the Trojan War, and Orestes's Acquittance was not till after the taking of that City.

Arnobius, when he is proving to the Pagans that the Mars of Greece was only a deify'd Man, acquaints us with several Particularities of his History. He reproaches them in the first place with knowing that he was born at Sparta, or according to others, in the Extremities of Thrace ; that he had lived thirteen Months in Arcadia in a Prison, where the Aloides kept him in Confinement (2) ; that in Caria Dogs

were

(1) Bibl. 1. 3. (2) See the History of the infernal Regions.

were sacrificed to him, and among the Scythian Affes (a).

It only remains now that we explain the Names which the Ancients gave to this God, whose History we are now upon. The Greeks call'd him Ares, Mischief, because of the Ills which flow from War; but 'tis probable that this Name comes from the Hebrew Arits, which imports strong, terrible. The Latins derived their Name of Mars from Mares, Males, because Men are employ'd in War. They called him likewise Gradivus & Quirinus, between which Names they put this Distinction, that the former expressed Mars in time of War, and the other in time of Peace. They had even two Temples dedicated to this Divinity under these two Titles, the one in the City, and the other without the Gates. The Romans, in Romulus's Apotheosis, gave the first King of Rome the Name of Quirinus, to support the Fable of his Birth, which made him pass for the Son of Mars. We learn from Dionysius of Halicarnassus (1) that the Sabines gave the same Name to their God Enyalius, and tho' he is doubtful whether it was Mars himself, yet as that Author adds that the same People called a Spear Cæres, whence the Latins formed the Name of Quirinus, 'tis very probable that these two Divinities were the same, and that the Spear among them was his Symbol, as the Sword among the Scythians. The same Sabines, according to the Testimony of Varro, called Mars Mamercus, which Name was afterwards given to the Family Emilia. The name of Enyalius, was derived to him from Bellona, and seems to confirm the Opinion of those who will have her to have been his Mother. That of Thurius, denotes his Impetuosity in Battle.

The

(a) Quis Spartanum fuisse Martem, nonne Epicharmus autor vester? Quis in Thraciæ finibus procreatum, non Sophocles Atticus? — Quis mensibus in Arcadia tribus & decem vinctum? Non Milo fluminis filius? Quis ei Canes a Curibus, quis a Scythiis afinos immolari? Non principaliter cum cæteris Apollodorus? Quis dum genitalibus insultat alienis, hæsisse in laqueis involutum, non commentarii vestri, non Scenæ? Arnob. l. 4. adver. Gent.

(1) L. 2.

The Greeks and Latins often gave Mars the Epithet of Common God, as may be seen in Homer, Cicero, and in Servius upon the eight Eneid; and 'tis to be observed that this Appellation was given to the Gods who equally favoured both Parties. The Romans and the other Latin Nations gave him also the Name of Pater, Father. He was likewise stiled Sylvestris, and was invoked according to Cato, for the Preservation of the Fruits of the Field. The ancient Latins called him Salisubfulus, from the warlike Dances, as shall be said afterwards when we come to his Priests. Sometimes he got the Epithet of Cæcus, as you may see in Virgil, Cæco Marte resistunt. We find in Homer that of resisting, and in other Poets that of Corithaix, as you would say waving his Helmet; of Sanguinarius, Crudelis, terribilis, &c. Epithets which perfectly agreed to his character.

A great many Fables were delivered relating to this God, which will not detain us long, their Sense being easily discovered; as when it was said that his Chariot was drawn by Bellona; that his Horses engendred by Boreas and Erynnis, were called Terror and Dread; that he was wounded at the Siege of Troy by Diomedes; that upon his Cuirass were several Monsters represented; that the Ornaments of his Helmet were Fury and Wrath; that Fame was his Harbinger wherever he came; and that Fury marched before him, &c.

Tho' Mars was worship'd in several Places, yet no where was he in so high Veneration as at Rome, where he had several Temples, among which that dedicated to him by Augustus after the Battle of Philippi, under the Name of Mars the Avenger, was one of the most celebrated. Among the sacerdotal Colleges, that of the Salii, the Priests of Mars, who were set apart for keeping the Ancilia, or sacred Bucklers, owed its Institution to Numa Pompilius; who founded it upon an Occasion related by Dionysius of Halicarnassus.

A Shield having fallen from Heaven, the Haruspices were consulted about this Prodigy, and they answered, that the Empire of the World was destined to that City, where this Shield was preserved. Numa Pompilius, for fear of its being stole away, ordered several to be made quite similar, that the true one might not be known, and put them all in the Temple of Mars. Plutarch adds, “ That King Numa fore“ told Wonders as to that Buckler, which he said he “ had learned from Egeria and the Muses. This Ancilium, said he, was sent for the Preservation of the “ City, and designed to be kept with eleven others “ of the same Figure and of the same Size, that the “ Difficulty of knowing it might prevent its being “ stolen away. Mamurius was he who forged these “ Shields, and had no other Recompence for his Labour, but the Glory of the Workmanship.”

Thanks to the Monuments now extant, for letting us know the Form of these Shields; and the Description given of them by the Author last quoted comes nearest the Truth. They are arched, says he, in Form of a Scollop Shell, and therefore not quite round; they would rather be Oval did not the Arching on both Sides put them out of that Form: Their greatest Length appears to be two Foot and a Half.

Numa Pompilius restricted the Number of the Salii to twelve, Tullus Hostilius doubled that Number, as well as that of the Ancilia. To conclude, the Ceremony of carrying these Shields in the publick Festivals, was performed in this Manner. They were removed from their Place, and the Salii carried them in Procession thro’ the City, leaping, dancing, and singing Verses that had a Relation to the Solemnity. The Festival lasted thirteen Days, and began on the Calends of March, Mars’s Month. During that whole Time no Affair of great Consequence was allowed to be done, such as marrying, undertaking a Journey, or a military Expedition: Which Custom was religiously observed in the most early Times; but afterwards it was somewhat abated.

The ancient Monuments represent Mars in a pretty uniform Manner under the Figure of a Man armed with a Helmet, a Pike and a Shield, sometimes naked, sometimes with the military Dress, even with a Cloak about his Shoulders: Sometimes bearded; but for the most part without a Beard; sometimes, in short, with the Rod of Command in his Hand. Mars the Conqueror appears carrying a Trophy, and Mars Gradivus is represented in the Attitude of a Man walking with a quick pace. Sometimes he has upon his Breast the Egis with Medusa's Head.

The Scythians, as has been said in explaining their Gods, worship'd Mars under the Form of a Sword; and the Romans, according to the Testimony of Varro quoted by Clemens Alexandrinus, represented him under that of a Spear, before they had found out the Art of giving a human Figure to their Statues; a Custom which they learned from the Sabines.

V I C T O R Y.

To Mars and Bellona we shall join Victory (1), an imaginary Being whereof the Greeks had made a Divinity, whom Hesiod makes to be the Daughter of Styx and Pallas, or of Acheron if we may believe Phurnutius. The Ancients add that she assisted Minerva in the Battle of the Giants. Pausanias informs us that this Goddess had several Temples in Greece, and Titus Livius speaks of those which she had at Rome. When the Romans brought from Pessinus the Phrygian Goddess, they carried her Statue into the Temple of Victory, till they got one of her own built for her. But the Temples she had at Rome were not the most ancient ones of Italy, since Dionysius of Halicarnassus informs us that the Arcadians upon their Arrival in that Country, erected one to her upon the Aventine Mount. Sylla, according to Cicero, instituted Games in Honour of this Goddess.

Victory, as appears from Medals and Marbles, was always represented with Wings, flying thro' the aerial

(1) The Greeks called her Nixē.

aerial Regions, and holding a Crown in her Hand, or a Palm: But the Egyptians represented her under the Figure of an Eagle, a Bird always victorious in the Combats it has with the Rest. The Romans in representing her, sometimes used the Laurel, or Palm-Branch. Sometimes she was to be seen mounted on a Globe, to teach us that she rules over all the Earth; and thus it is she appears upon the Medals of the Emperors, because they reckoned themselves the Masters of the World. When they would design a naval Battle, she was drawn mounted on the Prow of a Ship, and when she holds a Bull by the Muzzle, it points out the Sacrifices that were offered after any Advantages won.

This Goddess had several Names given to her, as all the other Gods of Paganism. Plutarch tells us, that the Egyptians called her Napthe, without letting us know the Signification of this Name. The Sabines, as we learn from Varro, called her Vacuna, and from this Name came the Festival which the Ancients called Vacunalia. The Greeks gave her the Epithet of ἀπτερος, which imports without Wings; and Pausanias says the Athenians represented her thus to induce her to fix her Residence with them. A Victory at Rome, whose Wings were burnt with a Clap of Thunder, gave rise to a pretty Epigram: Rome great Queen of the World, thy Glory shall never Fade, since Victory now stripp'd of her Wings, can never fly away. Piso informs us that this Goddess had the Name of Vitula; and tho' several Etymologies of this Word be given, I hold to that which derives it from voce lætari, to shout for Joy, because of the Joy that accompany'd the Sacrifices offered to her.

It will be easy to understand the Epithets that were given her, such as Eteralcea which Homer makes use of, to intimate that she inclined to both Sides; that of Præpes and Volucris, to denote her Swiftnefs; that of Cæligena given her by Varro, because Victory comes from Heaven, and so of the Rest.

In fine, it appears from the Ancients that no bloody thing was offered to her in Sacrifice, but only the Fruits of the Earth.

C H A P. XI.

The History of Venus, Cupid, Psyche, and the Graces.

There are few Subjects in fabulous Antiquity on which the Wits of Greece gave more Scope to their Imagination, than what I am to treat of in this Chapter ; and consequently there is none wherein they have more obscured the ancient and true Tradition. Hesiod makes Venus spring from the Foam of the Sea, and from the Blood of the manly Parts of Cælus which Saturn had thrown into the Sea. From this hideous Mixture sprung, as this Poet tells us, the most charming of the Goddesses, in the Neighbourhood of Cythera, whence she came into Cyprus. The Flowers sprung up under her Steps ; and accompany'd by her Son Cupid, by Sports and Smiles, and all the wanton Train of Love, she became the Author of Joy and Happiness both to Gods and Men. The Poets getting hold of this agreeable Idea, vy'd with one another who should refine most upon the Description of this Goddess : The Painters and Sculpters imitated the Poets, and the Goddess always appeared accompany'd with whatever is lovely in Nature. “ Look with Attention upon this Venus, “ the Work of the skilful Apelles, says Antipater of “ Sidon : See how that excellent Master has express’d “ to the Life that watery Foam, which flows down “ her Hands and Hair, without hiding any of their “ Graces: Accordingly no sooner had Pallas surveyed “ her Charms, than she thus address’d herself to “ Juno : Let us resign, O Juno, let us resign to this “ rising Goddess all the Prize of Beauty.”

This

This ancient Tradition, which makes Venus spring from the Sea, was best received in Greece, and almost all the other Poets have followed it. Homer, however, of no less Antiquity and full as good Authority as Hesiod, has followed another, since according to him Venus is the Daughter of Jupiter and Dione. If we may rely upon Cicero, there were four Venus's. The first was the Daughter of Cælus and the Day. The second was she who sprung from the Sea-foam, the Mother of Cupid. The third was the Daughter of Jupiter and Dione; this is the Wife of Vulcan and Mars's Mistress, by whom he had Anteros or the Counter-Cupid. In fine the fourth was Astarté, born at Tyrus in Phenicia, who wedded Adonis (a).

Pluto, in his Banquet, allows only two, the one the Daughter of Cælus, and the other of Jupiter. “ Sure I am, says that Author, speaking of two “ Cupids, no Body is ignorant that Venus is never “ without Cupid; but because there are two Venus's “ there must be two Cupids. Now who can deny “ that there are two Venus's? Is there not that ancient “ Venus, the Daughter of Cælus, whose Mother is “ not known, and whom we call the celestial Venus; “ and that other modern Venus, the Daughter of “ Jupiter and Dione whom we call the vulgar Venus?”

Epimenides seems to acknowledge one different from those of Plato, since he says this Goddess was the Daughter of Saturn and Eronyme.

Pausanias distinguishes three of them: One Celestial, who presided over chaste Loves; one Terrestrial, or popular, who was the Goddess of Marriages; a third, whom they named Apostrophia or the averting Venus, who banish'd infamous Passions. “ The Thebans, “ says

Y 3

(a) Venus prima, Cælo & die nata, cujus Elide Templum vidimus. Altera spuma procreata, ex qua & Mercurio Cupidinem secundum Natum accepimus. Tertia Jove nata & Dione, quæ nupsit Vulcano; sed ex ea & Marte, natos Anteros dicitur. Quarta Syria, Tyroque concepta, quæ Astarte vocatur, quam Adonidi nupsisse traditum est.

“ says he, have also several Statues of Venus, and so “ ancient, that they pretend they were consecrated “ by Harmonia, and that they were made of the “ Beaks of those Ships that carry’d Cadmus; which “ Beaks were of Wood and not of Iron. Be that as it “ will, one of those Statues is Venus Urania or the “ Celestial; the other the vulgar Venus, and the “ third is the Venus Apostrophia: These Names were “ given them by Harmonia herself, to distinguish
 “ the three Sorts of Love; the one celestial, that is “ to say, chaste and detached from all sensual “ Commerce; the other vulgar, which is attached
 “ to Women, and corporeal Pleasures; the third,
 “ inordinate, which leads Men to Unions incestuous
 “ and abominable. There was therefore a Venus “ called Apostrophia or guardian Goddess, because to “ her Men addressed their Prayers to be guarded
 “ from those irregular Desires.” But in another Place, this Author admits only two of them, the celestial and the popular.

Such is the Variety that we find among the ancients with Respect to Venus, which is indeed so great, that it is impossible to determine how many of them they acknowledged: For to say with the Author of a Dissertation printed in the seventh Volume of the Memoirs of the Academy of the Belles Lettres (1), that their Number may be reduced to seven, is what cannot be maintained, since here we have reckoned ten of them compleat, which ten could not however be brought down to seven, should we even unite those that seem to be the same.

Among the Moderns, the celebrated Newton (2) seems to own no other Venus but Calycopis alone, the Mother of Eneas, and Daughter of Otreus King of Phrygia, whom Thoas surnamed Cinyras, married (a), and erected Temples to her at Paphos, at Amathus in the Island of Cyprus, and at Byblos in Syria; instituted

(1) M. Fourmont the younger.

(2) Chronology.

(a) This Thoas, according to him, was the same with Vulcan, which Opinion we shall examine in the History of that God.

instituted Priests to her Honour, a sacred Worship, and the scandalous Feasts called the Orgies: For which Reason she got the Name of the Cyprian and Syrian Goddess. This Author relies solely upon the Authority of Tacitus (1): who thus speaks of her: “ We are told that Cinyras consecrated an ancient Temple to Venus of Paphos, the landing Place of this Goddess who sprung from the Foam of the Sea.” The Opinion of this Author, may well enough be reconciled to what Lactantius quotes from Eubemerus’s sacred History, namely, that this was a Woman of Cyprus who by her Behaviour encouraged Gallantry, and gave Rise to the Fable of Venus.

’Tis not possible to draw any rational Conclusion from what the Greeks say of this Goddess, since all their Narrations are blended with Physiology, Morality and History. They look upon Venus, sometimes as a debauched Woman, sometimes as a Goddess: Now they will have her to be a Planet, and then one of the Passions. Hence those figurative Expressions in Homer, Orpheus and other Poets, who speaking of the Power of Venus, say it was she that formed the World, and subjects Gods and Men to her Empire.

’Tis certain several Persons had the Name of Venus; and without insisting upon the various Etymologies of the Name, should we hold to that of an ingenious Author (2) who derives it from Vener, which in the Celtick Language signifies fair, we may presume it was given to most of the fine Women, especially when they became famed for Gallantry as well as Beauty: But this Derivation is as little supported as those which fetch it from venire, or convenire, since they are only taken from the Latin Name of this Goddess, a Name unknown to the Greeks who named her Aphrodite.

To give my Judgment of this Fable, I reckon the Origine of it must be traced in Phenicia. And indeed

Y 4

there

(1) Hist. L. 2. c. 3.

(2) Don Pezrom Ant. of the Language of the Celtæ, there never was another Venus worship'd among the Orientals but the Venus Celestis, that is to say the Planet of that Name, as has been said in the first Volume ; and Astarté the Wife of Adonis, whose Worship was intermix'd with that of the Planet, or which comes to the same, that Syrian Venus, the fourth in Cicero, so celebrated in Antiquity. The Phenicians, in conducting their Colonies into the Islands of the Mediterranean Sea and into Greece, introduced thither the Worship of this Goddess. They stop'd first in the Island of Cyprus, which lies next the Coasts of Syria ; and there the Worship of this Goddess was generally received. From thence they went to Cythera, an Isle near the Continent of Greece : There the Greeks began to traffic with them, and to get some Knowledge of their Religion ; and this is the Reason of their giving out, that it was near this Island the Goddess was seen for the first Time, because it was there they came to hear of her first. A very convincing Proof that the Worship of Venus was establish'd in that Island, before it pass'd into the Continent, is that the Temple of Cythera was accounted the most ancient of any that Venus had in Greece, as Pausanias remarks (1).

From Cythera the Worship of this Goddess pass'd into Greece ; and as those who had brought it thither came by Sea, the Greeks who endeavoured to give every thing a marvellous Dress, say she had sprung from the Sea, and gave her the Name of Aphrodite, a Word which imports Foam (a) : This, no doubt, is the true Explication of this Fiction, and 'tis needless to search into it for any other Mystery. Here it is proper to make a transient Remark, that Hesiod is mistaken as to the Course which he makes that Goddess

(1) In Lac.

(a) Aristotle gives another Derivation of the Word Aphrodite, and Didymus thinks she was so called upon Account of her Softness ; but the one I have given is the most natural, and is the same, according to Plutarch, with the Epithet of Saligena, which was given to that Goddess, as having sprung from the Sea, whose Water is Salt.

Goddeſs take, when he brings her from Cythera into Cyprus, whereas it would be more natural to have put the Caſe as it is, that ſhe came from that Iſland into Cythera, and from thence into Greece. We might add, in order to confirm this Explication, that if the Greeks have given Venus both Sexes, it is, according to Selden (1), upon Account of the Fable of Dagon, or Atergatis, who was confounded with Venus, and who among the Philiftines and Phenicians, was a Divinity who partook of both Sexes.

But will this Account enable us to explain what the Greek Poets have fabled concerning their Venus? As to that 'tis not neceſſary, nor indeed is it poſſible to explain all that they have ſaid either in this or the other Fables. 'Tis well known, when they had the Management of a Subject, they embellish'd it according to their Fancy. Thus they had heard of Aſtarte's having been paſſionately in Love with Adonis (a), and they took care to apply this Circumſtance to their Venus. Nor did they ſtop here; they conſidered Love as the Son of this Goddeſs, and gave her the three Graces for her Daughters. In fine, they form'd that Love-ſyſtem, whereof the Ideas have ſerved, in after Ages, to embellish the Works of their Brother-poets. A young Virgin riſes out of the Foam of the Sea, and appears upon a Shell-fiſh; ſhe ſits down on Mount Cythera, where the Flowers ſpring up under her Feet; the Hours charged with the Care of her Education, conduct her to Heaven, where all the Gods, charmed with her Beauty, make Love to her; ſhe matches with Vulcan the moſt deformed of all; ſhe diſgraces herſelf by her Gallantries with Mars and Mercury; by the one ſhe has Cupid (b), and

(1) De Diis Syr. Syn. 3. c. 3.

(a) I ſay nothing here of this Fable which is fully explain'd in the History of the Phenician Gods. Vol. III. B. 7.

(b) This is Cupid II. for the firſt, according to Hefiod, was the Son of Chaos; or of the Night, according to Ariſtophanes; or of the God of Plenty, or the Goddeſs of Poverty, if we believe Plato.

and by the other Anti Cupid ; Bacchus is her 'Squire ; in fine, she presides over Marriages, and Gallantry ; and therefore has a mysterious Girdle given her, called the Cestus of Venus, which not only makes herself amiable, but has Virtue to kindle the Flame of an extinguish'd Passion (1), &c.

This was not all, they foisted into the History of the Goddess Venus, most of the celebrated Pieces of Gallantry. Some Beauty being surpris'd in an Intrigue, gave Rise to the Adultery of Mars with Venus, and to the Stratagem of Vulcan ; and perhaps it will not be disagreeable to know the Origin of this Fable. Palæphatus (2) says Sol the Son of Vulcan King of Egypt, designing to put strictly in Execution the Law of his Father against Adulterers ; and having been informed that one of the Court-Ladies had an Intrigue with a Courtier, enter'd by Night into her House, and having surpris'd her with her Gallant, punish'd her severely ; which gain'd him the goodwill of his People. 'Tis, says that Author, the double-meaning of the Word Sol, that gave rise to the Fable which Homer set forth to the Greeks under a Veil, and to which Ovid joins Reflections not very proper to raise an Abhorrence to Vice.

I lay no great Stress upon this Explication of Palæphatus, who has often invented new Fables to explain the old ones. I say the same of that of Father Hardouin, no less ingenious than singular. That learned Jesuit (3) is surpris'd that Homer has been censured for employing an hundred Verses, in the eighth Book of his Odyssey, to make Ulysses sing this Fable, which appears no ways morally instructive ; but, says that Author, they censure what they did not understand. 'Tis by no means, says he, the History of an Adulterer which that Heroe sings, 'tis the War of Troy itself. Mars and Venus, that is to say, the Genius of War, and the Trojans who supported Paris's Amours, resolv'd to unite in Vulcan's can's House, and to defile his Bed ; that is to use the Arms that were kept in the Arsenal, but which ought to have been better employed.

(1) Iliad.(2) In fragm.(3) Apol. d'Homere, p. 200.

Mars and Venus formed this Design with all Secrecy ; but the Sun beheld them and revealed the Secret to all the World. Vulcan, famed for his Art, made chains to bind Mars and Venus, the Genius of War, and Troy that countenanced Paris's Amours, in such a Manner that whenever they embraced one another, they should not be able to extricate themselves : Which means no more, but that the Trojans, when they took up Arms, which they ought not to have done in such a Cause, were so blocked up within their City, that they were no longer able to get out. Vulcan then complains that Venus is not virtuous ; which signifies that the Trojans were in the wrong to draw their Swords in so dishonourable a Cause. Mercury on his Part tells Apollo that he would heartily side with Venus, that is the Body of the Trojan Merchants, tell the Cross-bow Men, that they will bear the Charges of this War. They were laughed at by the Gods ; Neptune alone laughed not ; he intreated Vulcan to set Mars at Liberty, and he would repair his Loss. This is the Grecian Fleet, that acted vigorously, and at last obliged the Trojans to lay down their Arms, after which Mars went into Thrace there to make War ; and Venus, or the Love of Women into Cyprus. This, continues the Author, is the true Sense of the Fable which modern Criticks had not understood. I may well add which Ovid as little understood ; for to be sure what Mercury says to Apollo, has a much less serious meaning in the Poet, than what is put upon it by that learned Jesuit.

This is not the only Piece of Gallantry has been laid to Venus's Charge. Anchises, to screen himself from the Jealousy of his Wife, gave out that he had begot Eneas upon that Goddess, and so others. In the mean time, whatever bad Idea they entertained of Venus she was still look'd upon as one of the greatest of Goddesses ; and as she patronised scandalous Passions, sions, she was worship'd in a Manner worthy of her. Her Temples open to Prostitution, taught the corrupt World, that in order to pay due Honour to the Goddess of Love they were to have no regard to the Rules of Modesty. The Virgins prostituted themselves publickly in her Temples, and there the married Women shew'd as little Reserve. Amathus, Cythera, Gnidos, Paphos, Idalia, and the other Places especially consecrated to this Goddess were distinguish'd by the most infamous Abuses.

Farther, as there were several Venus's, her Worship was not every where the same. In some Places they only burned Incense upon her Altars ; elsewhere they made her an Offering of sweet Odours, one Ingredient whereof was the Flesh of a Sparrow ; in other Places they sacrificed to her a white Goat. The Women had also a Custom of consecrating their Hair to this Goddess, for which you may consult in the second Volume the History of Berenice, whose Tresses, that she had vowed to Venus, were placed among the Stars.

Among the Flowers the Rose was particularly consecrated to this Goddess, because this Flower had been tinged with the Blood of Adonis, whom one of its Thorns had wounded, which changed it into red from white, which it was before this Adventure (1). The Myrtle too was dedicated to her, because it commonly grows upon the Borders of the Water where this Goddess was born. The Swans and Sparrows were peculiarly consecrated to her, but above all the Pigeons, from the Fable which sets forth, that while this Goddess was one Day playing with Cupid, the little God would needs wager to gather more Flowers than she, and a Nymph named Peristera, having assisted the Goddess, she won the Wager, with which Cupid was so provoked, that he transformed the Nymph into a Pigeon. But, by the by, this Fable is founded upon a mere Quibble ; for in Greek the Name of the Nymph signifies a Pigeon (2) ; tho' Theodotius

(1) See Vol. II. the History of Adonis.

(2) Περίστέρα, Columba.

dontius (1) alledges, that Peristera was a Coquette in Corinth, who was said to have aided Venus, only because she imitated her Character.

As for the Names of Venus, they were derived like those of the other Divinities of the Pagan World, either from the Places where she was worshipped, or from particular Circumstances that had given rise to her Worship. I shall explain the chief of them. Those of Cytherea, Paphian Goddess, Queen of Gnidus, &c. were given her from the Cities of those Names; that of Urania, or Celestial, because she was believed to have dropp'd down from Heaven to Paphos on one of her festival Days, under the Form of a Star. The Name of Aphrodite was given her, because she had sprung from the Sea; that of Pandemos, or Popular, as she is called by Theocritus, was given her by way of distinction from the celestial Venus: That of Verticordia, because she turned Men's Hearts towards, or from Love.

The Romans gave her the Name of Murtia, from the Myrtle that was consecrated to her (a). They called her Astarte, when she was confounded with the Syrian Goddess; Anaitis, is a Name under which she was adored by the Persians and Cappadocians, as we have related in the History of their Gods; Amathusia was given her from the City Amathus in the Island of Cyprus; Dione, or Dionea, from the Name of her Mother. Migonitis, because she presided over Marriage. Calypiga, upon account of her Beauty. Philomedeia, in Allusion to her Original. Speculatrix, is the Name which Phedra gave to the Temple she consecrated to this Goddess, whence she might view Hippolitus performing his Exercises in the Plains of Trezene. Anosia, and Androphonos, as much as to say Impious and Manslayer; a Name which was given her when Lais was wounded to Death with Needles in one of her Temples by the Thessalian Virgins. Armata, because because the Lacedemonians, who worshipp'd her under this Name, represented her armed in her Temple. We have to this purpose in the Anthologia, an Epigram which Ausonius has turned into Latin Verse (a). Barbata and Mascula, because as she was believed to have both Sexes, she was sometimes represented with a Beard. The Romans, as Macrobius tells us, worshipped her under the Name of Genitrix, or the Mother; the Greeks under that of Colias, from a Promontory of that Name in Attica (1). According to Pausanias, she had a Temple in Greece, where she was worshipped under the Name of Praxis; and under that of Hortensis, when her Statue was in Gardens; for which Lucian may be consulted (2); under that of Elicopis, that is to say, the black-ey'd Beauty; of Nicophoros, as you would say, who brings Victory; of Byblia, when she was confounded with the Goddess of Syria; of Symmachia, because she was thought to assist Warriors, which was the reason of her getting the Name among the Romans of Victrix, or Victorious: Elephantina is a Name she had from a Town of that Name in Egypt; Arbitis, a Name under which, according to Macrobius, she was worshipped by the Assyrians: Erycina, from Mount Eryx in Sicily, where Eneas built a Temple to her when he landed in that Island (b): Argynnis, from the Name of a young Man who was drown'd in the River Cephissus, and from the Temple which Agamemnon built to this Goddess under the Name of Venus Argynnis. She was likewise called Zerynthia, from the Cave named Zerynthion, where were celebrated the Mysteries of Hecate, and of the Corybantes.

(1) Apud Bocc. Gen. Deo.

(a) Ara vetus fuit Veneri Myrtæ quam nunc Murtiam vocant. Plin. l. 25.

The Egyptians sacrificed to her under the Name of Nephtis, as much as to say the End, or Death, or, according

(a) Armatam Venerem vidit Lacedæmone Pallas :

Nunc certemus ait, Judice vel Paride.

Cui Venus; armatam tu me temeraria temnis,

Quæ, quo te vici tempore, nuda fui.

(1) Paus. in Attic.

(2) De Imag.

(b) ————— Erycino in vertice sedem

Fundabat Veneri Idaliæ, &c. En. l. 5.

according to others, Victory; and the Romans, under that of Libitina, because she presided over Sepulchres. She was worshipped by the Tarentines, a People in Italy, under that of Basilis, whence came the Name of a Game in use among them, which consisted in making one of their number King to command the rest during his imaginary Reign: By the Albenians, under that of Etaira, or Mistress, because she presided over the Union of Hearts: Under that of Pelagia, or the Sea-Goddes, because she sprung from the Sea: Under that of Aurea, used by Homer and Virgil, in praising the Beauty of her Feet. But I have no mind to run over all the Epithets which were given to this Goddes by the Poets.

From what has been now said it is obvious to conclude, that she was represented in a thousand different Ways; either holding a celestial Globe in her Hand, as is to be seen in Maffei, to denote the Venus Urania or Celestis; or armed, as she is to be seen on some Medals of Gorléus and of Beger; or sitting upon a Dolphin, holding a Pigeon in her Lap; or with Adonis accompany'd by his Dogs; or with Cupid and the three Graces; but more frequently rising up from the Sea, seated upon a Shell born by two (1) Tritons; or upon a Chariot drawn by two Sea-horses; or by a female Sea-goat, or rather by a He-goat; since, according to Pausanias, her Statue made by the famous Statuary Scopas, was upon that Animal; and in that Case she is accompany'd by Nereids and Cupids, mounted upon Dolphins; only one of her Nereids, holding a Lute in her Hand, is mounted upon a Sea-Centaur: But still more frequently her Chariot is drawn by Swans, or by Pigeons, Birds that were consecrated to her. Sometimes she appears herself supported by a Triton, having a Buckler in her Hand, on which is represented a Head. Sometimes mounted upon Sea-horses, she seems to skim over the Waves of the Sea, her Head cover'd

(1) Admir. Rom. Antiq.

cover'd with a Veil which swells in the Wind, and Cupid swimming at her Side. An Oar at the Foot of the Goddess seems to design the Venus Pelagia, or Marine. That Figure where she holds in her Hand a Cornucopia, marks the Blessings produced by maritime Commerce.

Of all these Statues the finest, without doubt, is the Venus of Medici: But the most singular are those that seem to be made for the Sake of that Verse in Terence, Sine Cerere & Baccho frigit Venus; and that of Maffei, where this Goddess, accompany'd with two Cupids, and crown'd with Ears of Corn, holds a Thyrus wrapp'd about with Leaves and Clusters of Grapes; and as she carries in her Hand three Arrows, she seems to teach us that her Arrows fly more unerringly, when Ceres and Bacchus concur. The lighted Torches which this Goddess and Cupid bear, in a Monument of Boissart, mark the Flames which either of those Divinities kindle in the Heart. She appears triumphant for her Victories, in an Image publish'd by Beger, in a Chariot drawn by two Lions. She holds a large Veil over her Head, and an Arrow in her left Hand. A Cupid flies fluttering above to crown her; Laurels drop down upon her as it were of themselves, without any thing to move them: A naked Man walks before with his Lyre, on which he is playing to grace the Solemnity. Two Men are walking by the Lions, each with a Torch over his Shoulders to usher the Company. A Satyr marches up behind the Chariot, playing upon his Flute, and closes the whole Scene.

We shall end with the Description of two Statues of this Goddess mentioned by Pausanias. That Author tells us he had seen in Elis a fine Statue of Venus Urania or Celestial, whose Feet were resting upon a Tortoise's Back; and another of terrestrial Venus, placing her Feet upon a He-goat; but he frankly owns that he knows not the Signification of these Mysteries, and this Acknowledgment is doubtless more to the Purpose, than what some Mythologists logists say upon this Occasion, namely, that all this was intended to represent to us that God, designed under the Name of Venus Urania, was the Author of universal Harmony, signified by the Tortoise, which was the Symbol of that Harmony.

LOVE or CUPID.

As Venus was always accompany'd with Cupid her Son, and the Graces, 'tis proper to exhibit what the Greek Mythology teaches us as to those two Articles. 'Tis obvious that we are not to reckon Love a real Personage, but a Being who has no other Original but in the Imagination of the Poets; and to what a Degree have they embellish'd this Subject in their works? with what sparkling and wanton Ideas has it supply'd them? Not that they have allowed Cupid to be without Parentage, for the Ancients never were at a Loss as to the Affair of Genealogy; and when we come to examine them nearly, we must needs own that they admitted several Loves or Cupids. Accordingly we can reckon about thirteen of them. First of all Cicero admits of three; the first was the Son of Mercury, and of the first Diana; the second of Mercury and the second Venus; and the third whom he calls the Anticupid, or Anteros, the Son of Mars and the third Venus (a).

Plato (1) reckoned there were two of them. He laid down as a Principle, as we have seen above, that since Venus was never without Cupid, and since there are two Venus's, we must therefore necessarily acknowledge two Cupids.

Hesiod, in the Beginning of his Theogony, seems to acknowledge but one produced at the same Time with the Chaos and the Earth. But Tzetzes, in his Commentary, explaining the first Verses of that Poet, admits a second: Three things, says he, were created

VOL. II.

Z

at

(a) Cupido primus Mercurio, & Diana prima, natus dicitur: Secundus, Mercurio & Venere secunda: Tertius quidem est Anteros, Marte & Venere tertia. De Nat. Deor. L. 3.

(1) In his Banquet.

at first; the Chaos, the Earth, and the Celestial Cupid, who is the God; but there is one more modern, the Son of Venus: Which agrees with what we are told by Pausanias (1) that at Elis in the Temple of Neptune, was to be seen Cupid receiving into his Arms Venus rising out of the Sea, on whose Head Pitbo or Suada was putting a Crown; which supposes one Cupid ancienter than Venus.

The same Author remarks further in his Beotica, that Olenus of Lycia, the most ancient Poet of Greece who composed Hymns, had said in one of these Hymns in Honour of Lucina, that this Goddess was the Mother of Cupid.

Sappho had too much Gallantry to be ignorant of Cupid's Parentage; and it was doubtless in order to adjust Delicacy of Sentiment to the Effects of this Passion, that she imagined two Loves; the one, the Son of Heaven; the other, the Son of Earth.

Acusilaus would needs have it that there was another Cupid born of Night and Ether: Alceus too thought to have introduced one the Offspring of Discord and Zephyrus: According to Orpheus, there was one the Son of Saturn. In fine, if we regard Plato's Authority, this God was the Son of Porus, the God of Riches, and of Poverty. Diſtimus, one of the Speakers in his Dialogue intitled the Banquet says, while the Gods were celebrating a great Feast, Porus, who had drunk too hard, falling asleep at the Gate of the Hall, Penia or Poverty, who had come thither to gather up the Remains of the Feast, having made up to him, he had a Son by her who was Cupid.

These are the several Cupids that are spoken of in ancient Authors. 'Tis evident that all their Genealogies have no other Foundation but the Fancy that invented them; and that it were easy to reduce them to a small Number; since the Ancients, whom we have now mentioned, give them frequently either the same Father, or the same Mother. But not to dwell on frivolous Disquisitions, we may affirm

(1) In Eliac. L. 1.

affirm that there never was another Cupid but he of whom Sanchoiathon and Hesiod speak ; I mean that physical Principle which served to unite together the disjointed Parts of Matter that formed the Chaos. And to be sure in the History of the true Venus, or Astarté, we find nothing of that wanton System of a blind Infant Cupid armed with Darts to wound the Heart ; the Product of the leizure Hours of the Greek Poets. 'Tis true Ovid tells us Cupid wounded Venus, who became desperately in Love with Adonis, which seems to agree only to the Astarté of the Phenicians ; but this is but a mere Fiction of that Poet, who has confounded the Venus of Phenicia with that of Greece.

But not to insist on this, the different Manners in which Cupid was represented were nearly these following, as appears from the Monuments now extant. First, he was figured as a young Child blind, or with his Eyes covered with a Fillet, leaping, dancing, playing, toying, clambering up Trees : He is represented in the Air, upon the Earth, the Sea, and sometimes in the Fire. He rides upon Animals, manages Chariots, plays upon Instruments ; in a Word, he is made to personate every Character. 'Tis no Rarity to see him sporting with his Mother Venus : Sometimes Venus holds her Quiver high in the Air ; Cupid trys to leap up and catch it, and has got hold of one of her Arrows ; at other Times she hugs him in her Bosom and between her Arms. Sometimes he plays upon a Horn, sitting before his Mother who shews him an Arrow. Sometimes with one Foot in the Air he seems meditating some Trick ; or seated upon a Base, holds in his Arms some Instrument which Time has defaced ; or sounds the Trumpet, with his Face turn'd up to Heaven. Sometimes he holds a Fowl which seems to be a Swan, and embraces it. You see him also playing upon Pan's Flute ; or asleep with the Bow and Quiver at his Feet ; sometimes he marches in a triumphant Attitude, with a Helmet on his Head, the Pike over his Shoulder, and the Buckler on his Arm, to denote that Mars disarm'd surrenders himself to love.

Planted at other Times before a flaming Altar, he is playing upon the Flute with many Holes; the Question is whether this be to intimate that even the Exercises of Religion are no Security against his Attacks: Doubtless it has an allegorical Meaning, as well as in another Representation where, under the Shade of a Palm-tree he embraces a Ram, that looks towards a flaming Altar. Engaged in a boxing Match with a Cock, he is represented superiour even to that most amorous Animal.

He is seated upon a Centaur, to teach us that he Rules over every Creature that Breathes, even over Monsters. We find in the Antiquaries a Venus sitting and playing upon a Harp, and before her a Cupid holding at the End of two Rods a Mask, which represents Sport or Focus. Each of these Figures has its Inscription, Venus, Cupido, Focus; a Statue that seems made upon these two Verses of Horace.

Sive tu mavis Erycina, ridens Quam Focus circum volat & Cupido.

He is sometimes riding on a Dolphin, to shew his Empire over the Sea; and what proves the Truth of this Conjecture, Neptune appears by him with his Trident, as it were to do Homage to his Power. Lastly, he is planted about the Chariot of Pluto carrying off Proserpina, to signify that his Empire extends even to Hell itself.

But we should never have done, were we to follow the Imaginations of the Poets, Painters, and Sculptors, who gave free Scope to their Invention, in Relation to a God, whom Heaven, Earth, Sea, and the Empire of the Dead were all thought to obey.

We need not doubt, but after worshipping Venus, they would also pay religious Homage to her Son.
Accordingly

Accordingly as their Temples and Altars were the same, so were the Vows, Prayers, and Sacrifices offered in them. Plato however who brings in Socrates so often speaking of this God, introduced into his Banquet Phædrus complaining that no Poet has sung Hymns and Pæans in Honour of so great a Divinity: Which is only to be understood with respect to Feasts, during which it was a Custom to sing those Hymns in Honour of Bacchus, and the other Gods. For were the Proposition to be understood in general, we might say that Phædrus is mistaken, since the Poets have not forgot Cupid in their Works: As he is certainly in an Error when he asserts that they had never given the Parentage of that God, the contrary whereof has been already made appear. After all, the single Authority of Pausanias would decide the Question, since he says this God was honoured at Thespis with a particular Worship.

A N T E R O S.

Anteros (a) or the Counter-Love, was the Son of Venus and Mars. The Account given of his Birth is to this Effect.

Venus, say the Ancients, complaining to Themis that Cupid her Son continued always a Child, this Goddess answered, he was ever to be so till she had another Son. This was a sufficient Hint to a Goddess who had so good Inclination to Gallantry: She entertained the Passion which Mars had for her, and Anteros was the Offspring of their Embrace. Cupid however grew never the Bigger, he and his Brother continued always Infants, and we find them thus represented with Wings and a Quiver, Arrows and a Baldrick. You see them upon an old Bas relief sporting together, and striving to pull

Z 3

to

(a) This Name is composed of two Greek Words, Eros Love, and Anti against.

to them a Palm Branch, which each draws with all his Might; and what is singular in the Monument which Beger has inserted in his Treasure of Brandenburg, it appears to be the same which Pausanias speaks of. The same Author (1) makes mention of another Figure of Anteros, where he holds two Cocks at his Breast, and is provoking them to peck his Head.

Anteros shared divine Honours with his Mother and Brother, since Pausanias (2) speaks of an Altar which the Athenians had erected to him.

P S Y C H E.

Tho' the Fable of Psyche contains no historical Fact, and only resembles our fairy Tales; however as it is connected with that of Cupid, or Love, I cannot forbear giving it a Place here. A King and a Queen, says Apuleius, had three Daughters, of whom the youngest was the greatest Beauty, in the Formation of whom Nature seemed even to have surpass'd herself. The Fame of her Beauty having spread on all Hands, People came in Crouds to her Father's Court, and so soon as they had seen her, from admiring they were led to adore her. Venus jealous of this rising Beauty, for whom Gnidos, Paphos, and Cythera were deserted, order'd Cupid to wound Psyche with one of his Darts, and to captivate her Heart with an Object unworthy her Charms. Cupid instead of executing his Mother's Orders, fell desperately in Love with her himself. In the mean time her Sisters less handsome than she, were married to Sovereigns, while no Body durst aspire at gaining her. The Oracle of Apollo, consulted about the Fate of this young Beauty, answered that she was not to look for a mortal Spouse, but a God formidable to all the Gods, even to Hell itself; adding that she must be expos'd upon a high Mountain on the Brink of a Precipice, dressed in funeral Ornaments.

The

(1) In Att.

(2) Loc. cit.

The Oracle was obey'd, and no sooner was Psyche come to the Place mark'd out by the Oracle, than a Zephyr embrac'd her and carry'd her away into the Middle of a Wood, where was a stately Palace glittering with Gold and Silver, and its Pavements of precious Stones. The Palace appeared uninhabited, but she heard Voices inviting her to make this her Place of Residence. Tho' she saw not the Nymphs who served her, yet she wanted for nothing. She was regaled with sumptuous and elegant Repasts, to which succeeded harmonious Consorts of Musick. And in this Manner was she entertained from Day to Day, Pleasure still following Pleasure in a perpetual Circulation: Soon as Night arrived, she was visited by the destined Spouse, who withdrew from her at the Approach of Day, for fear of being discovered; thus he continued for several Nights successively.

In the mean time the King and Queen anxious for their Daughter, sent her Sisters in quest of her. Cupid, informed of this, at first prohibited Psyche to see her Sisters, but upon this observing her sad and pensive, he at last allowed her to speak to them, on Condition she should not follow their Counsel. The same Zephyr who had conducted her into this enchanted Palace, was also the Conductor of her Sisters. Psyche after having told them she was the happiest of Mortals, and that her Husband young and Handsome loved her extremely, dismiss'd them loaded with Presents. These two Princesses envying the Happiness of their Sister, resolved to dispatch her, and hearing at a second Interview, that she never saw her Husband, they put her in Mind of the Oracles of Apollo, which had spoke to her confusedly of some Monster or other; and made her believe that her Spouse was a Serpent, who at last would put her to a miserable Death. Psyche affrighted with this Discourse, and not being able to find out the Reason son why her Husband chose to continue invisible, told them she was disposed to follow their Advice, if they knew how to extricate her from her Perplexity; they advised her to keep a lighted Lamp somewhere concealed, and together with it a Razor; and when the Monster fell asleep, to view him by the Help of the Lamp, and with the Razor to cut off his Head. Psyche followed her Sisters Counsel; and no sooner had got out of Bed, and taken up her Lamp, than instead of a Monster she discovered Cupid asleep, known by his Vermilion Complexion, his waving Wings and his white Tresses. Seized at once with Astonishment and Remorse for having questioned her own Happiness, she resolved to cut her own Throat with the Instrument she had prepared against her Husband; but it drop'd out of her Hands, and the Sight of so charming an Object calmed her Perturbation. In the mean Time while she is examining Cupid's Bow, and Quiver, that were at the Foot of the Bed, she wounded herself in the Finger, in trying the Point of one of his Darts; but neglecting so slight a Wound, she continued to feed her Eyes with the lovely Object, when a Drop of Oil, dropping from her Lamp upon Cupid's right Shoulder awaked him.

Forthwith he wings away: Psyche takes hold of his Foot, but Cupid raises her up from the Ground, and at Length lets her fall down. Then alighting upon a Cypress, upbraids her bitterly for the little Confidence she had put in his Counsels, and upon this quite disappeared.

Psyche in Despair precipitates herself into a River, but the Waves from their Respect to the Spouse of Cupid, immediately threw her out upon the Banks. She meets the God Pan who condoles with her, and tells her nothing now remained for her but to make her Peace with Cupid. In her wanderings thro' the World, she arrived at the House of one

one of her Sisters, to whom she recites her Adventure, and tells her that Cupid as a more signal Revenge had threatened to marry one of her Sisters. Her Sister swelled with vain Hope, abandons her Father's Court, repairs to the Rock which led to Cupid's Palace, and fancying the Zephyr would support her as he had done before, let herself drop down, and perish'd by a miserable Death. Psyche took the same Way to revenge herself upon her other Sister, who was caught in the Snare. In the mean while, Venus apprized that Cupid suffered cruel Torment, endeavoured to find out Psyche, to chastise her for her Presumption.

Psyche was still in search of Cupid, and arriving near a Temple, made up a Sheaf of some loose Ears of Corn that lay scattered in the Field, which she offered to Ceres, begging to be taken under her Protection; but the Goddess answered her that all she could do in her Favour was, not to deliver her up to her Enemy. Juno whom she met in one of her Temples gave her much the same Answer. Psyche however still retains some Hope: She resolves to have Recourse to Venus, hoping to find Cupid with her, and so to make her Peace. Accordingly she found out Venus; but the haughty Goddess, without seeming to vouchsafe her the smallest Regard, ascended Olympus, and prayed Jupiter to send Mercury to seek out Psyche over all the Earth, and bring her to her, she having declined to keep her when she had her in her Power, because she had appeared before her as a Suppliant. While Mercury is in quest of this unfortunate Lover, she meets with Custom, one of Venus's waiting Maids, who dragging her by the Hair brings her to Venus. The incensed Goddess flies at her Hair, tears her Robe, gives her Blows upon the Head; and then having made up a great Heap of Grains intermixed, Wheat, Barley, Millet, Poppies, Wood-pease, Lentils, and Beans, she orders her her to separate all these Grains, and that before Night, leaving for her Companions two of her other Attendants, Sorrow and Anxiety. Psyche remain'd as one thunderstruck and quite insensible, but officious Ants separated the Grains, and extricated her out of this Difficulty. Venus next commanded her to bring her a Tuft of golden Wooll, from certain Sheep that fed beyond a River, in Places inaccessible; but instead of thinking to execute the Goddess's Orders, she went to drown herself in that River, when a Reed whisper'd some articulate Sounds that taught her how to come at the Wooll, which she carried to the Goddess. Venus, not appeased with such prompt Obedience, order'd her further to fetch her a Pitcher of a blackish Water that flowed from a Fountain kept by Dragons. An Eagle took the Pitcher, filled the Water into it, and gave it her to deliver to Venus. An Order still harder to be obeyed succeeded these many Labours. Venus regretting that some of her Beauty had been lost in dressing Cupid's Wound, orders Psyche to go down to Pluto's Kingdom, and demand from Proserpine a Box with some of her Charms. Psyche believing there was no other Way of visiting the Dead but by dying herself, was going to throw herself headlong from a high Tower, when an audible Voice taught her the Way to the infernal Regions, by bidding her go to Tenarus, near Lacedemon, where she would find a Way that led thither; but that she was to fortify herself with two Cakes, one in each Hand, and two Pieces of Money, which she was to hold in her Mouth: That Charon would convey her into his Boat, and to him she was to give one of her Pieces of Money, which he himself must take out of her Mouth; and that upon meeting the huge Dog that kept Proserpine's Court, she was to give him one of the Cakes. That at last she should come up to Proserpine and receive from her a gracious Reception; be invited by her to a sumptuous Feast she was to prepare for her; but that she was to decline her Offer, sit down upon the Ground, and eat nothing but brown Bread: that at last the Goddess should give her the Box, but that she was to beware of opening it. All these Directions given her by the Voice, Psyche followed, and received from Proserpine what Venus demanded.

by

After she had got out of the infernal Regions, she had the Curiosity to open the Box, with a Design to take some of the Beauty it contained to herself; but she found nothing there besides an infernal and soporiferous Vapour, which seized her in an instant, and made her sink down to the Earth fast asleep. She never had risen again, if Cupid now cured of his Wound had not got out at his Mother's Palace Window to go in Search of his beloved Psyche. He found her fast asleep, waked her with the Point of an Arrow, put back the Vapour into the Box, and bid her carry it to his Mother. Cupid flew away to Heaven, and appeared before Jupiter, who assembled the Gods, and ordered him to keep his Psyche, and that Venus should no longer oppose his Marriage with her. At the same Time he commanded Mercury to carry her up to Heaven. Psyche now admitted into the Society of the Gods, drank Ambrosia, and became immortal. The nuptial Feast was prepared, there every God played his Part, and even Venus danced. Thus were the nuptials solemnized, and Psyche soon after was delivered of a Daughter who was named Pleasure.

This Fable, as we see, is entirely allegorical, and denotes the Evils that Concupiscence, figured by Cupid, entails upon the human Soul under the Symbol of Psyche. It would be needless to attempt an Explanation of all its Circumstances, since many of them are merely the Product of their Imagination who invented it. I shall only observe observe that the Ancients represented Psyche with the Wings of a Butter-fly, as we see on some Monuments, and Intaglios, and that the Butter-fly, and the Soul, in the Greek Language were both called Psyche; but where was the Necessity of loading this Fiction with so many childish Circumstances, for the Sake of a trite vulgar Moral?

The GRACES.

Among the many Divinities invented by the Ancients, none were more amiable than the Graces, since it was from them the Rest borrowed their Charms, Sources of every Thing agreeable and smiling in Nature. They gave to Places, Persons, Works, and to every thing in its kind, that finishing Charm which crowns all its other Perfections, and is as it were the Flower of its Excellence: In fine, it was only from them a Person could derive that Talent, without which all other Qualifications are lost; I mean the Talent of pleasing. Accordingly of all the Goddesses, none had a greater Number of Adorers than they. To them all Ranks, all Professions, Persons of every Age and Character address'd their Vows, and offered Incense. Every Science, every Art had its tutelar Divinity in particular; but all the Arts and all the Sciences acknowledged the Empire of the Graces.

As the Abbé Maffieu has left a Dissertation in the Memoirs of the Academy of the Belles-Lettres (1), wherein that learned and ingenious Academic has omitted little or nothing material with Respect to these Divinities, I cannot do better than take him for my Guide. I shall therefore inquire with him, but in few Words, into the Origine of the Graces and their Number, the different Names that were given them, their Attributes, the Worship that was paid them, and lastly what Blessings they were thought to be the Dispensers of.

Some

(1) Tom. 5. p. 2.

Some Ancients believed them to be the Offspring of a legitimate Marriage, and that they were the Daughters of Jupiter and Juno; but Hesiod asserts that they were the Offspring of that God and of the fair Eurynome, the Daughter of Oceanus, whom Onomacritus names Eunomia, and Laëtantius, the old Commentator on Statius, Harmione. According to Antimachus a very ancient Poet, their Mother was called Eglé, and according to others, Eurymedusa, or Antinome. In fine, the most general Opinion is that they owe their Birth to Bacchus and Venus.

The Ancients were not more agreed about the Name and Number of the Graces, than about their Original. The Lacedemonians admitted only two of them, whom they worship'd under the Names of Clito and Phaenné. The Athenians allowed no more, but they called them Auxo and Hegemone. Hesiod, and after him Pindar, Onomacritus, and most of the other Poets, fix the Number of the Graces to three, and name them Eglé, Thalia, and Euphrosyne. What perplexes some People is that Thalia is commonly reckoned one of the Muses: But where is the Inconsistence in a Muse and a Grace having both the same Name? Homer changes the Name of one of the Graces, and calls her Pasithee (1) wherein he is followed by Statius (2).

Notwithstanding the Authority of Hesiod and Homer, there were several Places in Greece, where four Goddesses of this Name were acknowledged, and then they were confounded with the Hours, or rather with the four Seasons of the Year; this was the Reason of representing them crown'd, one with Flowers, another with Ears of Corn, the third with Vine-branches and Grapes, and the Fourth with a Branch of Olive, or of some other of those Trees that preserve their Verdure even in Winter. It was also for the same Reason that Apollo was sometimes represented

(1) Il. l. 14.

(2) Theb. l. 2.

represented supporting with his right Hand small Figures of the four Graces. This is all the Certainty Antiquity gives us as to their Number. For as to the Expression of Aristenetus, who says that the Graces fluttered by Hundreds around Cydippe: And that of the Author of the Poem upon the Loves of Hero and Leander, who asserts that when Hero vouchsafed to smile, her Eyes alone displayed more than an hundred Graces; and lastly that of Nonnus, who, in the Poem he has made in Honour of Bacchus, says there were no less than three Hundred of them in his Train; all these are of the Nature of such hyperbolical Expressions as impose upon no Body. The Case is otherwise as to what is said by Pausanias (1), that some Authors reckon the Goddess of Persuasion in the Number of the Graces, insinuating thereby, that the great Secret of Persuasion is to please.

At first these Goddesses were represented only by mere Stones that were not cut; and such were the ancient Statues, as has been already remark'd elsewhere. But they came very soon to be represented under human Figures, clad in Gauz in the early Times, and afterwards quite naked. Pausanias owns (2) that he could not trace the Time when the Custom of giving them Drapery came to be laid aside. They were thus represented, to signify that nothing is more amiable than simple Nature; and with a thin plain covering of Gauz, to intimate to us that if sometimes Art be induced to assist Nature, foreign Ornaments ought to be employed only discreetly and with Reserve. They were painted young, because Charms have always been considered as the Lot of Youth. They were commonly thought to be Virgins, Homer however marries one of them to the God of Sleep, and the other to Vulcan. Further, the Graces were represented in the Attitude of Persons dancing; which makes

(1) In Bect.

(2) Loc. cit.

makes Horace say (1), Alterno terram quatunt pede: Add to this, that they held one another fast by the Hand, Segnesque nodum solvere gratiæ. (2)

Pausanias tells us that there were to be seen at Elis the Statues of three Graces, where they were represented, one holding in her Hand a Rose, the other a Die to play with, and the third a Branch of Myrtle: Symbols which the Author himself explains. 'Tis says he because the Myrtle and the Rose were particularly consecrated to Venus and the Graces; and as for the Die, 'tis a Mark of the Inclination of Youth, the Age which the Graces peculiarly love, to Sports and Pastimes. But what shall we say of a Custom among the Ancients of representing the Graces in the midst of the most ugly Satyrs? Inasmuch that even the Statues of the Satyrs were often made hollow, so that you could open and shut them; and when they were opened, you discovered within them little Figures of Graces. What could be the Meaning of such an odd Assemblage? was it to point out to us, that we must not judge of Men by Appearance, that the Deformities of Shape may be rectify'd by the Charms of the Mind; and that very often great internal Endowments lie concealed under an ungraceful Outside?

We may easily judge that such lovely Divinities would neither be without Altars nor Temples. Etheocles, King of Orchomenos in Beotia, is reckon'd the first who erected any to them, and who regulated the Ceremonies of their Worship; which has made some Ancients say that he was their Father. The Lacedæmonians however ascrib'd the Glory thereof to Lacedæmon their fourth King, alledging that the Temple which he had built to them upon the Banks of the River Tiasis was the most ancient one of Greece. According to Pausanias they had Temples at Elis, at Delphos, at Perga, at Perinthus, at Byzantium, and in several other Places of Greece and Thrace. Ordinarily narily the Temples consecrated to Cupid, were also consecrated to the Graces. It was also the Custom to give them a Place in those of Mercury, to teach us that even the God of Eloquence had need of their Assistance. But above all, the Muses and the Graces had commonly but one and the same Temple, and 'tis easy to perceive the intimate Union that must have been between these two Sorts of Divinities: Accordingly Pindar invokes the Graces almost as often as he does the Muses.

(1) L. 1. Od. 4.

(2) Hor. L. 3. Od. 21.

Tho' Festivals were celebrated to their Honour thro' the whole Course of the Year, the Spring however was principally consecrated to them, as to Venus their Mother. But it was not only at certain stated Times that the Ancients signalized their Devotion to these Goddesses, there was hardly a Day that was not distinguish'd by some piece of Homage that was paid them. They took few Repasts without invoking the Muses and the Graces: With this Difference, that in order to procure the Favour of the Muses they drunk nine Glasses, whereas those who would be favoured of the Graces drank only three.

All Greece was full of Monuments consecrated to these Goddesses. Their Figures were to be seen in most Cities, done by the greatest Masters. There was at Pergamus a Picture of them, drawn by Pythagoras of Paros (1). Another at Smyrna, which was by the Hand of Apelles. Socrates had made their Statues in Marble, as Rupalus did in Gold. Pausanias speaks of several other of their Statues, where the Richness of the Matter vied with the Beauty of the Workmanship. Demosthenes in his Oration for the Crown, tells us that the Athenians having aided the Inhabitants of the Chersonesus in a pressing Exigence, these to eternise the Memory of so signal a Service, had erected an Altar with this Inscription, An Altar consecrated to that Grace who presides over Gratitude. And
to

(1) Paus. in Beot.

to conclude with Monuments of another Kind, there were a great many Medals on which the Graces were represented; whereof several are transmitted to us. Such is a Greek Medal of Antoninus Pius, struck by the Perinthians; one of Septimius Severus, by the Inhabitants of Perga in Pamphilia; another of Alexander Severus, by the Flavian Colony in Thrace; and lastly one of Valerian, the Father of Galian, by the Byzantines.

Lastly, As to the Favours that were look'd for from these Goddesses, they were thought to dispense to Men not only a good Grace, Gayety, Equality of Temper, but also Liberality, Eloquence and Wisdom, as we are told by Pindar; but the most noble of all the Prerogatives of the Graces was, that they presided over Kindnesses and Gratitude; insomuch that, in almost all Languages, their Names are made use of, to express both Gratitude and Favours.

We shall close with the Allegories that have been found in the Names of those Goddesses and their Attributes. First they were called Charites, a Name derived from the Greek Word that signifies Joy, to denote that we ought to have an equal Pleasure in doing good Offices, as in shewing Gratitude to those from whom we have them. They were young, to teach us that the Memory of a Favour ought never to decay; sprightly and nimble, to shew that we must be prompt to oblige, and that a Favour ought not to be long deferred. Accordingly the Greeks had a Way of speaking, that a Favour which comes lingering ceases to be a Favour. They were said to be Virgins, to give us to understand, first, that in doing good, our Views ought to be pure, the Want of which marring the Favour; and in the second Place, that the Beneficent Disposition ought to be accompany'd with Prudence, Reserve and Discretion. It was for this second Reason that Socrates seeing a Man who lavish'd away his Favours without Distinction upon every Object: May the Gods confound thee, cry'd he, the Graces are Virgins, and you would make them common Prostitutes. They were linked in one another's Hands, to signify that we ought by mutual Acts of Kindness to bind the Cords of Love that unite us to one another. Lastly, they danced in a Circle, to intimate that there ought to be among Mankind a Circulation of Kindnesses; and moreover, that by Acts of Gratitude, the Favour ought, according to the Order of Nature, to return to the same Source from whence it was derived.

C H A P. XII.

The History of Vulcan.

TIS proper to join the History of Vulcan to that of Venus and the Graces, since according to the Ancients, he had married either the Mother of Cupid herself, or according to Homer, one of these three Goddesses. If we believe Cicero (1), there were several Vulcans; the first, was the Son of Cælus; the second, of Nilus; the Egyptians who acknowledged him their Protector, called him Opas; the third was the Son of Jupiter and Juno, or of Juno alone, according to Hesiod, who is followed by the other Poets. The fourth was the Son of Menalius; this is he who inhabited the Vulcanian Islands. We may find another Vulcan even more ancient than all these: That is the Tubal-cain of the Scripture, who having apply'd himself to the forging of Iron, as Moses informs us, became the Model and Original of all the Rest.

Mythologists give several Derivations of Vulcan's Name Hephaistos. Phurnutus derives it ἀπὸ τῆ ἡφθαι, as you would say Burning. Plato in his Socrates, says it comes from φαῖς ἐστῶς, He who presides over
the

(1) L. 3. de Nat. Deo.

the Light. Servius alledges that he was called Vulcanus quasi Volitanus, to signify that the Sparks of Fire fly in the Air in the forging of Iron. But what Stress is to be laid upon an Etymology of a Name given to that God by the Latins, and which was unknown to the Egyptians who introduced his Worship into Greece? That of Pburnus is no doubt more rational, since the Greeks called that God Ephæstos: But without insisting any longer on these Etymologies, we observe that the Greeks reckoned Vulcan the God of Blacksmiths, and a Blacksmith himself; and this is the Idea given of him by Diodorus Siculus, when he says (1) “Vulcan is the first Founder of Works in Iron, Brass, Gold and Silver, in a Word, of all fusible Materials. He also taught all the Uses to which the Artists and others can imploy Fire; for this Reason all those who work in Metals, or rather Men in general, call Fire by the Name of Vulcan, and offer Sacrifices to that God, in Acknowledgment of so useful an Invention.”

There is a great deal of Probability that the second Vulcan was an ancient Egyptian King, as we shall prove at the End of the History of this God; or rather he was the most ancient Divinity of the Egyptians, since we find him in Herodotus, Syncellus, and other Authors, at the Head of the Divinities of that People; unless we will trace back to Tubal-cain, or to some one of the Kings of those Countries, who signalized himself in the Art of forging Iron.

As for the third Vulcan, in whose History the Greeks have inserted that of all the Rest, we may take it for granted that he was a Titan Prince, the Son of Jupiter, or at least one of his Relations, who having been disgraced, was obliged to retire into the Island of Lemnos, where he establish'd

A a 2

Forges.

(1) L. 5.

Forges. Sir Isaac Newton, who confounds him with Tboas King of Lemnos, explains the Fable of his Fall from Heaven very ingeniously. Tboas, says he (1), wedded Colicopis, the same Venus who was reckoned the Mother of Eneas, and Daughter of Otbreus King of Phrygia. Tboas got the Name of Cinyras from his Dexterity in playing upon the Lyre, which gave a Handle to say that he had been beloved by Apollo or Orus. Bacchus falling in Love with the Wife of Tboas, was surprized in an Intrigue with her, but he found a Way to appease the Husband by making him drink Wine, and made up the Affair by creating him King of Byblos and Cyprus; after which he pass'd the Hellspont with his Army, and conquered Thrace. 'Tis to all these Events, subjoins the Author now quoted, that the Poets allude, in feigning that Vulcan fell from Heaven into the Island of Lemnos, and that Bacchus after having pacified his Wrath by making him drink Wine, got him to be recalled to Heaven. He fell from the Heaven of the Gods of Crete, when he departed from Crete to Lemnos to forge Metals; he was reinstated in Heaven, when Bacchus made him King of Byblos and Cyprus; for the Courts of the Princes of those Times, in Imitation of that of Jupiter, were look'd upon as Heaven. Tboas reigned to a great Age, lived to the Time of the Trojan War, and grew immensely rich (a).

Thus it is that the Greeks by ingenious Fictions had disguised a History, which of itself was very simple and natural; and to find some Pretext for the Removal, or if you please the Expulsion of Vulcan, they gave out that Jupiter seeing him very ugly, or rather being jealous that Juno had brought him

(1) Chronology.

(a) Newton cites for Authorities, Clem. Alex. Admon. ad Gen. Apollodorus, Pindar. Pyth. Od. 2. Hesychius in χινύρας. Steph. in Ἀμείβης.

him forth without his Concurrence, had kicked him down from Heaven to Earth with a Blow of his Foot, and that he would have inevitably been killed, had it not been for the Assistance of the Inhabitants of Lemnos who received him into their Arms ; that however he suffered the Loss of a Leg whereof he remained lame ; or according to another Tradition adopted by Pausanias (1), but as frivolous as the Former, it was Juno who expelled him Olympus. This Author adds that Vulcan not having forgot this Injury, made a golden Chair with a concealed Spring, and sent it to Heaven. Juno having no Diffidence of her Son's Present, would needs sit down upon it, and was catch'd in it as in a Trap ; and Bacchus was forced to fuddle Vulcan before he could bring him to set Juno at Liberty, who had given the Gods abundance of Mirth by this Scene : But as these Fictions, which every Poet had a Right to invent, are not consistent with one another, Homer tells us that this God incurred Jupiter's Displeasure, for having extricated Juno, whom he had suspended in the Air with a Chain, because she had raised a Storm to destroy Hercules.

The Island of Lemnos, being very subject to Earthquakes and Vulcanos, as is proved by the learned Bockart (2) from Eustathius and others, hence Vulcan was said to have fallen into this Island, where he fix'd his Residence and his Forges ; or, according to others, because it was in this Island the Art of forging Arms was invented. In order to gain credit to this Fable, the Thumps of the Hammers of the Cyclops his Blacksmiths were said to be heard at a very great Distance, which was in truth the Noise of the Fire struggling to get vent. The Forges of this God were also establish'd in Mount Ætna for the same Reason ; and in the Vulcanian Islands, whereof Liparos is the principal, and which were afterwards

A a 3 called

(1) In Attic. c. 20.

(2) Chan. L. 2, c. 12.

called Eolian, from the Name of Eolus their King: In a Word, in all Places where any Vulcano was to be seen. As the Greeks, when any one signalized himself by his Works, took Pleasure in setting off his History with every wonderful Circumstance which they thought proper to embellish it; so the Poets placed to the score of their Vulcan all the Works that pass'd for Master-pieces in the fabulous World, such as the Palace of the Sun (1), the Armour of Achilles (2), that of Eneas (3), Hermione's Necklace, Ariadne's Crown, the famous brazen Dog which Jupiter gave to Europa, and which she gave to Procris; Pandora, she who was the Cause of all the Evils that have over-run the Earth: In fine, those brazen Symbols whereof he made a Present to Minerva, who gave them to Hercules, and at whose Sound that Hero raised from a Wood the Birds named Stymphalides, which he afterwards slew with his Arrows, as shall be said in his History.

Tho' we have nothing very certain about Vulcan's Children, we know however that Protheus and Erichthonius were look'd upon as such, as also those who were distinguish'd in the Art of forging Iron and Metals, as Olenus, Albion, and some others. Several Names were also given him. He was called Lemnius, because Lemnos was the Place where he fell, upon his Expulsion from Heaven; Junonigena, because he was Juno's Son; Mulciber, or Mulcifer, because he had taught the Art of softening Iron by the Heat of the Forge; Ætneus, because his Forges were under Mount Ætna; Amphiguneis, because he was lame of both Feet, according to Hesiod, who gives him this Epithet; and Kullopodien, by those who took him to be lame only in one Side: This is the same Epithet with that of Tardipes, given him by Catullus.

Of all the ancient Nations, the Egyptians adored this God most; he had at Memphis that magnificent Temple, and colossal Statue, seventy-five Feet high, whereof whereof we have given the Description in the first Volume ; tho' his Statue which was in the Temple bore so little Proportion to that Colossus which was without, that it provok'd the Scorn of Cambyfes, who threw it into the Fire. His Priests were in so great Esteem among the Egyptians, that one of them, named Sethos, ascended the Throne. This God was also highly honoured by the Romans. Tatius, according to Dionysius of Halicarnassus (1), built him a Temple, and Romulus consecrated to him Chariots of Brass drawn with four Horses, as we learn from the same Author. It was the Custom, in his Sacrifices, to consume the whole Victim by Fire, reserving nothing for the sacred Feast, so that they were real Holocausts ; thus Tarquinius the elder, after the Defeat of the Sabines, burnt their Arms and Spoils in Honour of this God.

(1) Ovid Met. L. 2. (2) Homer. Il. (3) Virg. En. L. 6.

Among the Animals, the Lion, who in his Roarings seems to dart Fire from his Mouth, was consecrated to him ; and Dogs were set apart for keeping his Temple. He had several of them at Rome, but the most ancient one, built by Romulus, was without the Bounds of the City ; the Augurs being of Opinion, that the God of Fire ought not to be within the City itself. But what was the highest Mark of Respect paid by the Romans to this God, according to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, those Assemblies were kept in his Temple, where the most important Affairs of the Republick were debated : The Romans thinking they could invoke nothing more sacred, to confirm the Decisions and Treaties that were made there, than the avenging Fire whereof that God was the Symbol.

As it was their Opinion that Vulcan had taught all the Uses which Artists and others make of Fire, so all those who worked in Metals, or, more accurately speaking, all Men in general offered to this God Sacrifices, in Acknowledgment of so useful a Discovery, as we learn from Diodorus Siculus (2).

A a 4

There

(1) L. 2.

(2) L. 5.

There were also Festivals instituted in Honour of him, the principal whereof was that where it was the Custom to run with lighted Torches, that were to be carried to the Goal without letting them go out, under Pain of Disgrace ; he who out-run another had, according to Pliny (1), his Torch for his Reward.

Ancient Monuments represent this God in an uniform manner ; there he always appears with a Beard, his Hair somewhat neglected, half covered with a Habit that comes only down to above his Knee, wearing a round and pointed Cap, in his right Hand an Hammer, and Pincers in the left. As People have always been fond of finding mystical Reasons for such Representations, Eusebius tells us (2), that the Name of Ephæstos points out the Force of Fire, and that the Cap which was given him, being of a blue Colour, figured the Circuit of Heaven, where Fire makes the more subtile Part.

Tho' all the Mythologists unanimously say that Vulcan was lame, yet none of his Images now remaining represent him with that Defect : Cicero however, in his first Book of the Nature of the Gods, thus speaks of one of his Statues : “ We admire that “ Vulcan of Athens, made by Alcámenes, he is stand“ ing, and cloath'd, and appears lame, but without “ any Deformity.” Most of the Medals of the Island of Lemnos represented this God with the Legend, Deo Vulcano.

From all that has been now said, we may conclude that there were three Vulgans ; the first, and the most ancient, is the Tubal-cain mentioned by Moses, who places him in the tenth Generation from Cain, and who was really the first that invented the Art of forging Iron. Sanchoiathon, who reckons him in the seventh Generation, tells us that besides that Art he invented the Fisher's Bait, the Fishing-line and Boat, and that after his Death he was honour'd as a God, under the Name of Diamithios. 'Tis true that ancient

(1) L. 18.

(2) Præp. Ev. l. 3.

ancient Author calls him likewise Chrysaor, and it has puzzled Authors not a little to find Ephæstos, or Vulcan, in this Chrysaor, whom the Greeks make to spring from the Blood of Medusa, as shall be said in the History of that Gorgon; but M. Fourmont the elder thinks he has found the true Original of this Name in a Phenician Word, which imports one who works by or in the Fire.

The second Vulcan was an ancient God, or King of Egypt; and in fine, the third was one of the Titans, who out of some Discontent retired into the Island of Lemnos.

C H A P. XIII.

The History of Mercury.

OF all the Gods of the Pagan World, none had so many Employments and Occupations as Mercury. The Greeks called him Hermes, which signifies Interpreter, or, according to Proclus, Messenger. His Latin Name, if we may believe Festus, came from a Word signifying Merchands, or rather Merchandize, Mercurius, a Mercibus. Interpreter, as he was, and faithful Minister of the other Gods, and of his Father Jupiter in particular, he serv'd them with indefatigable Zeal, even in Employments not very honourable. It was he had the Charge of conducting the Souls of the Dead into the internal Regions, and of bringing them back. He was, besides this, the God of Eloquence, and of the Art of speaking well; the God of Travellers, Merchants, and even of Pick-pockets. He acted as Ambassador and Plenipotentiary of the Gods, was concerned in all Treaties of Peace and Alliance. Sometimes he was seen accompanying Juno, either as her Guard, or to watch over her Conduct. Sometimes Jupiter sends him to conduct an Intrigue with some new Mistress. Here you have him transporting Castor and Pollux to Pal-lene; lene : There accompanying Pluto's Chariot, when he carries off Proserpina : The Gods, nonpluss'd with the Difference arisen between the three Goddesses about Beauty, send him along with them to the Shepherd Paris. So many different Functions have made it be believed, that there were several Mercurys, and that to the Son of Jupiter alone had been ascribed the Attributes which ought to have been shared among several Gods of the same Name.

Mythologists accordingly reckon more Mercurys than one. Lactantius, the Grammarian, enumerates four of them ; one the Son of Jupiter and Maia ; the second of Cælus and the Day ; the third of Liber or Bacchus, and Proserpina ; the fourth of Jupiter and Cyllene, who slew Argus, and then fled for it, say the Greeks, into Egypt, where he communicated to the Egyptians the Knowledge of Letters. He whom most of the Ancients acknowledge, and to whom the Poets attribute all the Actions that pass under the Name of Mercury, is the Son of Jupiter and Maia ; 'tis to him chiefly that Temples were built, Altars and Statues set up.

According to Cicero there were five of them : “ One
 “ the Son of Cælus and the Day (1) ; another the Son “ of Valens and Phorenis ; 'tis he who dwells under “ the Earth, and is called Trophonius. The third is the “ Son of Jupiter and Maia ; this Jupiter is the third “ in Order of those that are reckoned ; 'tis of this “ Mercury, and Penelope, that Pan is said to have “ been born. The fourth is the Son of Nilus, whom “ the Egyptians think it a Crime to name. The “ fifth, whom the Pheneates worship, who is said to “ have slain Argus, and for that reason to have ob“ tained the Egyptian Empire, and given Laws to “ the Egyptians, and the Knowledge of Letters (a)”.

(1) The Day is put in the Feminine for Dies. Without

(a) Mercurius unus (inquit Cicero) Cælo patre, die matre natus, cujus obscœnius excitata natura traditur quod aspectu Proserpinæ commotus sit : Alter Valentis & Phoronidis filius, is qui sub terris habetur, idem Trophonius. Tertius Jove tertio natus & Maia,

Without troubling ourselves to consider in what manner we might reduce to a smaller Number so many Mercurys, some of whom appear to have either the same Father, or the same Mother ; we presume it may be affirmed that there never were but two of them ; for as to him who had Pan by Penelope, whom Herodotus makes to have lived eight hundred Years before him, that is about the time of the Trojan War, 'tis very probable that it was some Priest of that God who had seduced that young Princess. I allow therefore of none but the ancient Mercury, the Ihot, Thaut, or Taautus, of the Egyptians, who was Contemporary with Osiris ; and him who, according to Hesiod, was the Son of Jupiter and Maia ; these are the two whose History I am now to give.

There is no Personage, without Exception, in profane Antiquity, more famous than the Egyptian Mercury. He was the Soul of Osiris's Counsel (1), who employ'd him in the most critical Affairs ; and who, before his Expedition to the Conquest of the Indies, left him with Isis, whom he had named Regent of the Kingdom, as the most proper Person to serve her in the Administration. Not content merely with giving Counsel to the Queen, he, like a faithful Minister, apply'd himself to make Arts and Commerce flourish thro' all Egypt. By studying the most sublime Sciences, he acquired profound Knowledge in the Mathematicks, especially in Geometry, and taught the Egyptians the way to measure their Lands, whose Limits were frequently disturbed by the Overflowings of the Nile, that every one might know the Portion that belong'd to him. In fine, there were few Sciences wherein he did not make great Proficiency ;

Maia, ex quo & Penelopa Pana natum ferunt. Quartus Nilo patre, quem Ægyptii nefas habent nominare. Quintus, quem colunt Pheneatæ, qui Argum dicitur interfecisse, ob eamque causam Ægypto præfuisse, atque Ægyptiis leges, & literas tradidisse. De Nat. D. L. 2.

(1) See Herod. Diod. Sic. l. 1. &c.

ciency; and it was he in particular invented the Use of those mysterious Letters called Hieroglyphicks, which were used afterwards only in Matters that concerned Religion. To these Particulars Diodorus Siculus adds (1): “ That Osiris put a great deal of Honour upon him, because he saw him endued with an extraordinary Talent for every thing that was conducive to the Welfare of human Society. For Mercury was the first who form’d an exact and regular Language of the rude and undetermined Dialects that were in use before. He gave Names to a vast many things, that till then had none. He invented the first Characters, and regulated the very Harmony of Words and Phrases. He instituted several Rites concerning Sacrifices, and the other Parts of the Worship of the Gods; and communicated to Mankind the first Principles of Astronomy. Next he exhibited to them by Way of Amusement, Dancing and Wrestling, and made them understand what Strength and even what Grace the human Body might derive from these Exercises. He invented the Lyre, to which he gave three Strings, in Allusion to the three Seasons of the Year: For these three Strings giving three Sounds, the Grave, the Sharp, and the Mean; the Grave answers to Winter, the Mean to Spring, and the Sharp to Summer. ’Tis he who taught the Greeks Interpretation or Elocution, and was therefore called Hermes, or the Interpreter. He was the Confident of Osiris, who communicated to him all his Secrets, and highly esteemed his Counsels. Lastly, it was he, according to the Egyptians, that planted the Olive-Tree, which the Greeks ascribe to Minerva.”

As for that great number of Books upon Theology, Astronomy and Medicine, I know Marsham (2) ascribes them to the second Mercury, the Son of Vulcan, who, according to Eusebius (3), lived a little after

(1) L. 1.

(2) Chron. Sac. 1.

(3) In Chron.

after Moses, that is, about fifty Years after the Israelites came out of Egypt: And this learned Author, relying upon the Authority of Manetho, cited by Syncellus, reckons that this second Mercury is he who was surnamed Trismegistus, or thrice-great. These Books, according to Clemens Alexandrinus (1), were to the number of forty-two; and it was impossible for the Egyptians to carry their Veneration for them higher than they did. They were carried in their Processions with a great deal of Ceremony and Respect. First of all appeared the Chanter, who had two of them in his Hands, one containing the Hymns in Honour of the Gods, and the other Rules according to which the Kings were to govern. Next came the Horoscopus, this is the Name given by Clemens of Alexandria to that Minister (2) who carried the four Books of Astronomy, one treating of the fixed Stars, another of the Eclipses of the Sun and Moon, and the two last of the rising of these two Luminaries. Then appeared the sacred Scribe, with ten Books that treated of Cosmography, Geography, the Description of the Nile, &c. Then follow'd the Stolist, with other ten Books upon the Subjects of Religion; namely, Sacrifices, Prayers, Festival-Days, &c. The Prophet came up after, likewise with ten Books, which were named sacerdotal, and treated of the Laws of the Gods, and of Ecclesiastick Discipline. Thus, concludes the Author now quoted, there were forty-two Books in all, whereof thirty-six comprehended all that belonged to the Egyptian Philosophy; and the other six regarded Medicine, and treated of Anatomy, Medicaments, of the Diseases of the Eyes, of those of Women, &c.

'Tis from these Books, to mention it by the Way, which however are long ago lost, for the Pimander of Mercury is a spurious Work, that Sanchoniathon had taken the Theogony whereof we have given the Abstract in the first Volume.

I

(1) Strom. 1. 6.

(2) ὁ Ὠροσκόπος.

I say, they have been long ago lost ; accordingly Galien reckoned spurious the Books of Medicine that pass'd for Mercury's in his Time ; and the same Opinion we are to have of those mentioned by Saint Cyril (a).

The second Mercury, I mean the Son of Jupiter and Maia the Daughter of Atlas, became famous among the Titan Princes. After his Father's Death (1), Italy fell to his Lot, with the Gauls and Spain (b) where he reigned absolute after the Death of his Uncle Pluto ; and the Mauritanæ, after that of his Grand-father Atlas. He was a Prince of great Artifice, Cunning and Diffimulation: He travelled more than once into Egypt to inform himself in the Manners and Customs of that ancient People, and to learn their Theology, but above all the abominable Science of Magick which was then in very great Vogue, and wherein he himself afterwards excelled ; accordingly he was reckoned the great Augur and Soothsayer of the Titan Princes, who were perpetually consulting him. Jupiter himself in his lifetime had often employed him in that Science ; and this is what had given the Poets a Handle to make him the Interpreter of the Gods.

Some Authors, not understanding literally what I have been now relating, will have it that Mercury was accounted the Interpreter of the Gods, only because he taught his People the Worship which they required. His Travels into Egypt were of great Use to him for that Purpose, having got himself initiated into all the Mysteries of the Egyptians, and having learned their Ceremonies.

Jupiter likewise found great Advantage from the Eloquence of this young Prince, having employed him in several Negotiations during the Wars which he

(a) Fabricius has given the Titles of the forty two Books in his Bibliotheca Græca. L. 1. c. 11.

(1) Don Pezron Antiq. de la Lang. des Celtes.

(b) See Euhemerus, Don Pezron, Ant. de la Langue des Celtes, after Lactantius and others.

he had with the Princes of his Family; delegating him to several Places to treat with them; and this, no doubt, is what made him pass for the Messenger of the Gods. As he frequently reconciled them to one another, he was taken for the God of Peace and Alliances. Jupiter employed him as his Confident in conducting some of his Intrigues, and let him into the Secret of all his Gallantries.

Add to this, that he contributed not a little by the Force of his Eloquence, and the Politeness of his Manners, to cultivate the Minds of his People, to make them docile, uniting them together by Society and Commerce, and curbing Vice by wise and severe Laws. This Prince in his Life-time had invented and improved several Arts. The Gauls, who worship'd him under the Name of Teutates, and offered to him even human Victims, as we learn from Lactantius (a) and Lucan (b), looked upon him as the Inventor of all the fine Arts (c): Accordingly to him is ascrib'd the Invention of the Lyre, of Medicine, Letters, Musick, Commerce, Wrestling (d), Magick, and several other Arts (e). In fine, we may say no Prince ever gained greater Reputation for excellent Qualities, nor was more beloved by his People than he. Yet he has his Blemishes, and was one of those who have nothing in Mediocrity; which obliged the other Sons of Jupiter, dissatisfy'd with his artful Conduct and factious Humour, to make War upon him; in which having been vanquish'd several

(a) Galli Hefum atque Teutatem humano cruore placabant. Lact. L. 1. c. 21.

(b) Et quibus immitis placatur Sanguine diro Teutates Pharf. l. 1.

(c) Deum maxime Mercurium colunt Galli; hunc omnium artium inventorem ferunt. Cæsar Comm. l. 6.

(d) Some Mythologists say it was not Mercury, but his Daughter Palæstria that invented Wrestling; but who sees not that this is only a figurative Generation, that reckons Wrestling his Daughter, because he was the Inventor of this Kind of Combat.

(e) See Joan. Nicolai Traët. de Mercur. p. 56.

ral Times, he at last thought fit to retire into Egypt, where he died. Others think he ended his Days in Spain, where his Tomb was even to be seen (a).

Such is the History of Mercury, the Titan Prince, much disguised by the Greeks and blended with several Fables: For, first, it appears that his Name was given to the Princes who had some of his Qualities; thus we need not be surprized that so Contradictory Accounts should be given of one and the same Person, nor at the numerous Expeditions he is said to have made, and the many Wives and Children that are given him.

It was disguised in the second Place, by a Number of Allegories that have a Relation to his great Qualities; as for Example, that of the golden Chain which came out of his Mouth, and was fastened to the Ears of those whom he would conduct, signified that he chained down the Heart and Soul by the Sweetness and Power of his Eloquence. If he was represented with the one half of his Face clear, and the other black and clouded, it was owing to the Opinion that he conducted Souls into Hell, and consequently that he was sometimes in Heaven or upon the Earth, and sometimes in Pluto's Realm. If the Egyptians represented him with a Dog's Head as has been said in the History of Anubis, this was, according to Servius, to denote his Vigilance and Sagacity. But what was then the Foundation of the two Fables mentioned by Homer, and after him by Virgil (b); the one that he conducted Souls into Hell with his Caduceus (1); the other that Persons never died till Mercury came and broke the Bonds that united the Soul to the Body? is it because that (a) See Don Pezron, Ant. de la Langue des Celtes. The Chronicle of Alexandria, and Suidas upon the Word φῆρρος, the same, according to that Author, with Mercury, say he died in Egypt.

(b) ——— Hec animas ille evocat Orco

Pallentes, alias sub tristia Tartara mittit.

Æn. l. 4.

(1) Odyss. l. 10.

that Prince in his Life-time led some Colonies into Spain, the Kingdom of his Uncle Pluto, a Country that was accounted Hell? Or rather was it not an Egyptian Ceremony that had given Rise to this Fable? This last is what we learn from Diodorus Siculus (1). The Egyptians, says he, carried the dead Body of Apis to a certain Spot of Ground, and then put it into the Hands of one to conduct it to the Place of Burial; which Custom Orpheus, who had travelled into Egypt, taught the Greeks, and then Homer accommodated it to Mercury. Or else because this Prince was the Founder of an ancient Egyptian Law, which ordered that the Dead were not to have Burial, till it was first judged whether they were worthy of it. The Judges appointed for that Purpose took Informations that were publicly read upon the Banks of the Lake Acherusia, as shall be said when we come to the Poetical Hell. Thus we may reckon this Prince assisted at these Trials in Person, to make the Law the better observed; which gave a Handle to Fable afterwards that he himself conducted the Souls into Hell. We may add from La Cerda (2) that this Fable perhaps derives its Original from a Custom practised among the Athenians. When they had condemned several Criminals to death, they executed them on several Days, and he who went first to Execution was called Mercury, because he shewed the Rest the Way to Pluto's Kingdom; but I take this Fable rather to have been the Consequence than the Original of the Fable, and that the first executed Criminal was called Mercury, only in Allusion to the Function of Mercury, who conducted Souls to Hell.

As the Caduceus was the Instrument that Mercury made use of in conducting Souls to the infernal Regions, and in bringing them back, we shall give a Description of it. The Caduceus was a Rod round which, at one Extremity, were two Serpents twined,

VOL. II.

B b whose

(1) L. 1.

(2) Upon the fourth Book of the Eneid.

whose Spires were Arched in the Form of two Semi-circles, while their Heads reached beyond the Rod. The Mythologists who have inquired into the Original of this Symbol peculiar to Mercury, have offered many Conjectures about it.

Athenagoras says Jupiter being enamoured of Rhea, she changed herself into an Adder ; upon which the God instantly assumed the Figure of a Serpent ; and that these are the two Insects which Mercury bears upon his Caduceus. According to others of the Ancients, Mercury having found two Serpents fighting together, appeased their Fury by beating them with his Rod, round which they twined themselves, and this, say they, is the Reason that the Caduceus has ever since been look'd upon as the Symbol of Peace. We are told further, so easy is it to give mystical Explanations, that Mercury was the Inventor of a Kind of Musick, which by its Sweetness was capable of stilling the Senses, the peculiar Virtue of the Caduceus, which lulled those asleep that were touched with it. Lastly, we find Authors of Opinion that Mercury practised Necromancy, or the Art of recalling Souls from the Dead, and that the Caduceus was the Rod he made use of in this Operation. For my Part, I am persuaded that there is no other Mystery in it, but that as Envoys and Embassadors wore always a Branch of Olive in Form of a Rod, so such a one was given to Mercury the great Embassador of the Gods ; and had joined to it the two Serpents as the Symbol of Prudence, which ought always to accompany Negotiations.

As Mercury was the God of Merchants and Thieves, so several Sorts of sharpening Tricks have been laid to his Charge ; and we learn from Lucian (1) that when yet a Child he had stolen Neptune's Trident, Apollo's Arrows, the Sword of Mars and the Girdle of Venus ; Fables founded upon his having been a skilful Sailor, expert at handling the Bow, brave
in

(1) Dial. of Vulcan and Apollo.

in fight, and that to these Qualities he had joined all the Charms and Graces of Eloquence.

Notwithstanding so many good Qualities and so many Services done to Jupiter, Mercury was not always in the good Graces of that God, having been by him expelled from Heaven; and this is a new Fiction which must be explained.

Boccace in his Genealogy of the Gods, asserts upon the Authority of Theodotion, that this Adventure does not relate to our Mercury; but to him who was called Stilbo, and who lived a long time after him, being contemporary with Phoroneus. But saving that Author's Pleasure, there never was a Mercury of that Name: Stilbo a Greek Word importing to shine; being only an Epithet of the Planet whose Name this God bears. I am therefore apt to believe that, for some Adventure whereof we are ignorant, Mercury being banish'd from Olympus where his Father dwelt, was forced to keep Flocks for some Time; the pastoral Life not being at that Time unworthy even Kings Sons. As Apollo was disgraced at the same Time, and led the same Kind of Life, so we are told that Mercury stole his Oxen, and that the Shepherd Battus, the sole Witness of the Theft, after promise not to reveal it, having broke his Word to him, was transformed into the Touch-Stone, as we are told by Ovid (1); a Fable which has no other Foundation but that Mercury had hid Apollo's Oxen near the Tomb of the Shepherd, who was the Inventor of the Touch-Stone.

The Ancients, as has been said, give so many Employments to Mercury, that he could never enjoy a Moment's Repose as is pleasantly said by Lucian: (2) As Messenger and Confident of the Gods, he had the Care of all their Affairs, whether relating to Peace or War; as also of the Inside of the celestial Palace which he was obliged to keep in good Order; to serve and supply the Gods with Ambrosia,

B b 2

to

(1) Met. l. 2.

(2) Dial. of Maia and Mercury.

to preside over Games and Assemblies, to hear and answer publick Harangues, &c. Which inclines me to think that he was the Superintendant of all Jupiter's Affairs, his Minister of State, and his grand Master-Household; nor ought this Notion to appear odd, since 'tis certain that the Poets under the sublime Ideas of Gods, of Heaven, and Olympus, have only laid before us the History of the Titans.

The Worship of Mercury had nothing peculiar, except that the Tongues of the Victims were offered to him (1), as a Representation of the Eloquence of this God: For the same Reason they presented to him Honey and Milk (2). Sometimes too they sacrificed to him Calves and Cocks. He was especially worship'd in the Gauls (3), and in Egypt where the Priests consecrated to him the Stork (4), the Animal that was most renowned among them next to the Ox. It was chiefly in the Month of May that they celebrated the Festival of Mercury, and worship'd him in a more solemn Manner than in the Rest of the Year.

We must not forget that the learned Bochart (5) thinks the History of Mercury had been composed upon that of Canaan; and here he draws a very ingenious Parallel. Both of them, says he, passed for the Sons of Jupiter, or Ammon, who was the same with Cham; the one took his Name from Merchandise: Mercurius a Mercatura; and Chanaan in Hebrew has the same Signification. The same Reason that made Chanaan be called the Servant of his Brethren, made Mercury be taken for the Messenger of the Gods. This God had the Charge of the Highways, for no other Reason but because the Phenicians or Chanaanites of the Race of Canaan, were great Travellers, and settled Colonies every where. The Wings of this God are the Sails of the Phenician Vessels.

The

(1) Homer.

(2) Cesar Com. l. 6.

(3) Phaleg. l. 1. c. 2.

(2) Antigonus.

(4) Kercher. Oed. Ægyp.

The Reason of Mercury's passing for the God of Eloquence and the Inventor of Letters, was, that the Phenicians brought the Use of them into the West. John Nicolai (1), on the contrary, is of Opinion that Mercury is the same with Moses, and compares the miraculous Rod of that Legislator to the Caduceus of this God. Huetius is of the same Mind (2).

M. Fourmont, so little do Parallels cost our Literati, makes Mercury the same with Eliezar, as may be seen in his Reflexions Critiques. But not to insist on the Principles I have laid down as to this in several Places of this Work, that Diversity of Sentiment alone among so learned Men, is but too convincing a Proof how little Solidity is in their Conjectures.

There are few pagan Divinities of whom we have a greater Number of Figures remaining than of Mercury. I have no Mind to go over them all, since they are to be met with in the Antiquaries, and particularly in Montfaucon (3). All these Figures agree well enough in representing this God after the Manner now said.

As he was the God of Merchants and Thieves, he is commonly drawn with a Purse in his Hand. In Quality of grand Negotiator of Gods and Men, he wears the Caduceus, the Symbol of Peace: If he has Wings to his Cap, at his Feet and Caduceus, 'tis to denote his Swiftness in executing the Orders of the Gods, especially that of conducting into Hell, or into the Elysian Fields the Souls of the Dead, and of bringing them back again when the Case required it. The Vigilance requisite to so many Offices, is the reason of giving him a Cock for his Symbol. As the Shepherds took him for their Patron, you see him sometimes upon Monuments with a Ram. He was thought to have been the first Inventor of an Instrument

B b 3

(1) Traët. de Mercurio.

(2) Demo. Eva. pro. 4.

(3) Ant. expliq. tom. 3.

ment of Musick called Testudo, or the Tortoise ; and therefore you see him sometimes represented with a Tortoise. He is figured like a young Man of a beautiful Countenance, an easy Shape, sometimes naked, sometimes with a Cloak over his Shoulders, but which covers only the half of his Body. We find likewise Monuments where Cupid is fitting Wings to Mercury's Heels, and other Singularities which are often but the Result of the Artist's own Imagination (a).

We shall close this Article by singling out, from the various Names that were given to Mercury, such as may recal to our Minds some Passages of History or Geography. The Greeks called him Hermes, that is, Interpreter ; the Latins Mercurius, a Mercatura ; Cyllenius, either because he was born upon a Mountain of that Name, or because he lulled People asleep with his Caduceus ; Nomius, either from the Laws of Eloquence which he founded, or because he was the God of Shepherds ; Camillus, that is to say the Messenger of the Gods ; and the Carthaginians call'd him Sumes for the same reason ; the Egyptians, Phine (1), and the ancient Germans Erminful, or Irminsus (b) ;
The

(a) Virgil gives an admirable Description of this whole Equipage of Mercury.

Ille patris, inquit, magni parere parabat
Imperio—& primum talaria nescit
Aurea, quæ sublimem alis, sive æquora supra,
Seu terram rapido pariter cum flamine portant.
Tum virgam capit ; hac animas ille evocat Orco,
Pallentesque alias sub tristia Tartara mittit ;
Dat somnos, adimitque, & lumina morte resignat :
Illa fretus agit ventos, & turbida frænat
Nubila. Æneid. quarto.

We say nothing here of the Figures called Hermes, because we have said enough of these in the first Volume, under the Article of Statues ; I only add that every Traveller laid a Stone at the Foot of these Statues, believing he did Honour to that God by clearing the Highways, or to make those Statues more remarkable.

(1) Kirker in Prod. c. 16.

(b) We shall speak of him in the History of the Gods of that People.

The Alexandrians, Thot; the Gauls, Theutates; and all these Names were given him to denote his Eloquence. He was named Vialis, because he presided over the Highways; Quadratus, from being represented anciently under the Figure of a square Stone; Triceps, because he was equally among the Gods in Heaven, Earth, and Hell; Agonios, because he presided over the Games Agonalia, whereof he was the Inventor. The Athenians honour'd him particularly in the Citadel under the Name of Profanus, that is to say uninitiated, as Phavorinus tells us. The Poets, chiefly Homer and Orpheus, have given him the Epithet of Argicida (1), not so much for having killed Argus, as because he presided over Eloquence, which is frequently pernicious. He has likewise the Epithet of Harpedophorus, from the Scythe he had made use of in killing Argus (2). He is named sometimes Agoræus, or the God of the Market, and that for an obvious reason. He had at Phares in Achaia, a Statue under this Name, which delivered Oracles: This Statue, according to Pausanias (3), was of Marble, of a middle Size, a square Form, and standing upon the Ground without a Pedestal: The Inscription imported, says this Author, that the Statue had been set up there by Simylus the Messenian. He sometimes got the Epithet of Chthonius, which, according to several Interpreters, signifies Infernal Mercury, and, according to others, Terrestrial Mercury. That of Criophoros, Ram-bearer; accordingly he had a Statue at Lefche, where he was worship'd under this Name, representing him bearing a Ram upon his Shoulders, to denote, as we have it in Pausanias, after Homer and Hesiod, that he was the God of Shepherds. The Tanagreans worship'd him also under the Name of Promacos, because he had appeared to them in Battle fighting in their Behalf, as we are told by the same

B b 4

Pau-

(1) Ἀργεσπορτες.
(3) In Phoc.

(2) See Ovid, Hyginus, &c.

Pausanias. Several other Names were likewise given him, which are easy to be explain'd,

I R I S.

As Mercury was the male Messenger of the Gods, and Iris the female, this is the proper Place to speak of that Goddess; and we may remark in the first place, as it was mostly Jupiter that made use of the Ministration of Mercury, so it was Juno employ'd Iris as her Envoy upon Earth. I presume it will not be expected I should find any thing historical with relation to Iris, who is a Divinity purely physical; however, as the Greek Mythology personify'd every thing, so it made Iris, or the Rainbow, a young Woman cloath'd in a Habit of different Colours, always seated by the Throne of Juno, and ready to execute her Orders. They have framed a Genealogy for her too (1), and we are told that she was the Daughter of Tbaumas, a poetical Personage whose Name is derived from a Greek Word that imports to admire (2); which, after all, is proper enough to denote the Quality of the Meteor they designed to describe, there being nothing more admirable than that Bow, which is formed by the Drops of Water in a Cloud opposite to the Sun;

Mille trabens varios averso sole Colores (3).

As nothing attracts our Admiration more than the Rainbow, I am not surprized that a Divinity had been made of it: “And truly, says Cotta in Cicero (4), if the Moon is a Deity, the Morning Star, the other Planets, and all the fix'd Stars must be of the same Rank; and why not also the Rainbow? that Iris, I mean, so beautiful, so admirably beautiful, that she has been justly called the Daughter of Tbaumas?” The Name of Electra, who was said to be the Mother of the Rainbow,

(1) Hesiod. Theog.

(2) Θαυμάζειν, to admire.

(3) Virgil.

(4) De Nat. Deor.

bow, and which signifies the Splendor of the Sun; and that of Aello given for her Sister, importing Tempest, agreed to her perfectly well; since in fact that Meteor cannot be formed unless the Sun shines, and the Weather be disposed for Rain or a Storm.

Iris attended so close upon Juno that she never left her, and Callimachus tells us, that when she wanted Rest she leaned against the Throne of that Goddess. 'Tis still Juno who employs her, and thus Apollonius Rhodius (1) informs us she sent her to Thetis; and Ovid (2) tells us the same Goddess, when she would inform Alcyone of the Shipwreck of Ceyx her Husband, ordered her to go to the Palace of Sleep. However, she was sometimes, tho' rarely, the Messenger of Jupiter, as appears from Homer (3), and Valerius Flaccus (4); but her most important Office was to cut the fatal Hair in Females who were dying; for they were persuaded that as Mercury by Jupiter's Orders was necessarily to separate from their Bodies the Souls of Men at Death; so it was thought as necessary that Iris should be commissioned by Juno to deliver the Souls of Women. Accordingly we see Virgil, who was perfectly Master of the Theology of the Greeks and Romans, says Juno sent her to cut that fatal Hair of Dido, after she had stab'd herself (a).

However, as Iris was not always taken up in such Occupations, in her leizure Hours she had the Care of her Mistress's Apartment, whose Bed Theocritus says she made. When Juno returned from the Infernal Regions to Olympus, Iris was to purify her with Perfumes, as we learn from Ovid (5).

Such

(1) Argon. L. 4.

(2) Met. L. 6.

(3) Il. L. 8.

(4) Argon. L. 4.

(5) Met. L. 4.

(a) Tum Juno omnipotens longum miserata dolorem, Difficilemque obitus, Irim demisit Olympo,
Quæ luctantem animam nexosque resolveret artus.
Nam quia nec fato, merita nec morte peribat,
Sed misera ante diem, subitoque accensa furore,
Nondum illi flavum Proserpina vertice crinem
Abstulerat, Stygioque caput damnaverat orco.

Such is the Idea the Poets give of this Goddess, an Idea which has no other Foundation but a common Phenomenon in Nature, considering Juno as the gross Air where the Meteor of the Rainbow is formed.

C H A P. XIV.

Apollo, the Sun, Phaeton, the Muses, &c.

IN this Chapter I shall take in these several Subjects, which have a great connection with one another; but to avoid Confusion, I shall make of each a separate Article.

ARTICLE I.

The Sun named Helios by the Greeks.

It cannot be refused that the Greeks have often, or to speak more accurately, have almost always confounded the Sun with Apollo. It would perhaps be needless to multiply Authorities in proof of so notorious a Fact; however I shall cite that of Plato, who in his Cratylus asserts that Apollo is the same with the Sun; that of Cicero, who tells us that the Sun and the Moon are two Divinities, the one of them called Apollo, and the other Diana; lastly, that of Plutarch, who informs us that almost all the Greeks took Apollo to be the same with the Sun; and yet in ancient Mythology these two Divinities are distinguish'd from one another, as I hope to prove beyond Contradiction.

I am not ignorant that I have great Adversaries against me; that Selden (1) says, even Children know that the Sun is the same with Apollo; that Macrobius (2), after having maturely examined this Question, decides it in the Affirmative; that Vossius

(1) De Diis Syriis Synt.

(2) Sat. L. i. c. 17.

sius (1) employs all his Erudition in Proof of it, as well as Alexander in the Explication of the Isiack Table; but notwithstanding these Authorities I maintain, that they were reckoned in one Sense different Divinities, tho' in another they were confounded together. I explain myself: The Pagans owned, as has been said, Physical Gods, such as the Heavens, the Earth, the Stars, &c. and animated Gods. Now I affirm that they never took the Son of Jupiter and Latona, who being banish'd Heaven was forced to keep Admetus's Flocks; the Father or the Protector of the Muses, the God of Oracles; in one Word Apollo, to be the same with the Son of Hyperion and Thya, that God who enlightened the World, that Luminary which diffused Heat and Fruitfulness over all, which was named the Sun. Tho' the Philosophers, who refined so much upon the establish'd Religion, confounded them; yet the Vulgar, that is the authoris'd Religion, always distinguish'd them: My Arguments are these, which will not easily be answered. This Distinction takes place in that celebrated Treaty we have between the Magnesiens and the Smyrneans (2); there these two People swear by the Earth, by the Sun, by Mars; &c. and by Apollo. Spon quotes an Inscription dug up at Utrecht, which is conceived in these Terms: To Jupiter the greatest and best, to the invincible Sun, to Apollo, &c. Varro, in St. Augustin (3) naming twenty Gods whom he calls the select Gods, makes two of the Sun and Apollo. Artemidorus ranks the one among the celestial Gods, the other among the etherial. We read in an ancient Greek Epigram, Pythius, that is to say Apollo Pythius is worship'd at Delphos; the Rhodiens are under the Protection of the Sun; or as it is in Sidonius Apollinarius, who seems to have seen this Epigram: The Sun is propitious to Rhodes, Delius or Apollo to Thymbra

(1) De Ido. l. 2. c. 12.

(2) Marm. Oxon. init.

(3) De Civ. Dei. l. 7. c. 7.

Tymbra (1). Medals and other Monuments represent these two Divinities differently (2), Jovi O. M. summo, exuperantissimo; Soli invicto; Apollini, &c. On one of Lucius Valerianus, Apollo appears under the Figure of a young Man holding his Bow in his Hand, and upon another of Antoninus, he bears his Lyre and a Patera; whereas in those of Hadrian and the two Gordians, of Aurelian and other Emperors, the Sun appears with his Head encircled with Rays, holding a Globe in his left Hand; which is never to be observed as to the Figures of Apollo,

To all these Proofs, which I am furnished with by the learned Bishop of Hadria (3), I shall join others still stronger.

Homer, whose Testimony here is of great Weight, really distinguishes them in more Places than one of his Poems. Lucian makes likewise two Divinities of them, since he says the Sun was one of the Titans, therein agreeing with Diodorus Siculus, who, in the Passage where he speaks of the Atlantides (4), says the Sun was the Son of Hyperion and of the Queen, that is to say, of that Daughter of Urania and Titaia who was always called the Queen (a). 'Tis true as ancient Mythology varies prodigiously with Respect to these Subjects, it sometimes confounds the Sun with Hyperion himself; but still it agrees that the Sun was not the same with Apollo. As these two Divinities were distinguish'd by their Genealogies so were they by their Children. Esculapius, for Example, not to mention others, was always reckoned the Son of Apollo; as Æetes, the King of Colchis, was looked upon as the Son of the Sun; and tho' Venus, an inveterate Enemy to the Posterity of the Sun, who had

(1) L. 2. c. 35.

(2) Spon. Misc. sec. 3. p. 72.

(3) De Is. de Bel. p. 276

(4) L. 3. c. 29

(a) See what has been said of her in the Theog. of the Atlantides. Vol. 1. B. 2.

had discovered her Adultery, persecuted them so far as to betray Pasiphae the Daughter of Æetes, and Phedra his Grandchild into the most shameful Prostitution, yet she never wreaked her Spight upon the Children of Apollo.

The Marbles, and all the ancient Monuments, likewise distinguish and represent them differently. We may add further that, in the antique Monument where the Adultery of Venus and Mars is represented, Apollo appears, with the other Gods called to this Spectacle, surprized as all who were there present, while it was the Sun who informed Vulcan of this Intrigue. But what further proves the Distinction which I would establish, is the Extent and Universality of the Worship of the Sun, the great and first Divinity of all the idolatrous Nations, as has been proved in the first Volume. The Egyptians, the Arabians, the Phenicians, Persians, and Cappadocians, not to mention other Nations, adored the Sun, before the Greek Apollo had been heard of. We may add that the Temples of either of them were distinguished, as well as the Ceremonies of their Worship.

I said the Monuments we have now remaining represented the Sun otherwise than Apollo. Accordingly they shew us the Sun under the Figure of a young Man almost naked, having nothing but a Kind of Cloak about his Shoulders, with a radiant Head, and mounted on a Chariot drawn by four Horses, which he lashes forward with his Whip. Sometimes he appears cloathed; and with the Rays that encircle his Head, is seen the Calathus, the Symbol of Serapis, who was often taken for the Sun, bearing in one Hand the Cornucopia, which denotes the Plenty which he procures the World by moving round it every Day. On other Monuments you see him coming out of a Cave, mounted upon his Chariot, to figure the rising of that Luminary just setting out in his Career.

Mythologists

Mythologists remark that the Horses which draw the Chariot of the Sun, are not abreast, but that they are sometimes turned towards the four Quarters of the World ; and thus it appears in a Monument publish'd by M. de la Chaussée, and in a Medal of Beger ; but yet in another Medal of the same Author, they are abreast. On both these Medals, we read the ordinary Legend of Soli invicto, to the invincible Sun (a), and upon another Medal of Heliogabalus, that of Sancto Deo Soli. That Emperor, we know, gloried always in having been Priest of the Sun in Syria, and his Name bears an Allusion to that Dignity : but we ought not to forget that he consecrated at Rome a Temple to the Sun, into which, in order to command the more Respect, he transferred the Worship of Cybele or of Vesta, the Palladium and the Ancilia. He would needs even join with these the Worship paid to the true God by the Samaritans, Jews and Christians (b). Herodian has transmitted to us the History of the Worship offered to the Sun in this Temple. Heliogabalus, says he, erected a magnificent Temple to that God (the Sun) and there set up several Altars, whereon he sacrificed every Morning Hecatombs of Bulls, and a great Number of Sheep ; and having shed there a profusion of sweet Spices, he made Libations of the richest old Wines ; so that you would have seen Streams of Wine and Blood flowing on all Sides. Quires of Musick ranged around the Altars added to the Solemnity of the Worship. Phenician Women with their musical Instruments, such as Cymbals and Tambrets, danced in a Ring ; and the Entrails of the Victims, as well as the sweet Spices, were carried about in Basons of Gold, thro' the most honourable Places of Rome.

But

(a) The Persians, as has been said in the first Volume, gave the same Epithets to their Mithras who was the Sun.

(b) Ant. Varius, according to Lampridius, built also in the same City a Temple in Honour of the Sun, but less celebrated than that of Heliogabalus.

But a yet greater mark of Distinction between the Sun and Apollo is, that according to the same Author, the Former, whose Worship was much celebrated at Rome, especially in the lower Times of the Empire, was not always represented by a Statue made by human Art, like the latter, but his Figure was only a huge Stone round at the Bottom, and which rose like a Pyramid. Thus he appears upon the Medal of Heliogabalus, which represents a Chariot drawn by four Horses, on which instead of a human Figure, is a Stone round below, and rising into a Point. The Rhodians, whose great Divinity was the Sun, and for whom they had made that magnificent Colossus, which we have described in the Article of Statues (1), represented on their Medals the Sun, sometimes encircled with Rays, and sometimes only with a large Face. In fine, in an Intaglio from M. de la Chaussée's Cabinet, the Sun appears having his Head encircled with Rays, with two Wings, long Hair, curled and falling down in Ringlets, a Trident, a Crescent and Instrument of Musick. The Antiquaries take this Stone to figure the Sun rising, the Trident shewing us that he rises out of the Ocean; the Crescent seems to intimate that the Moon disappears when the Sun rises; the Instrument of Musick denotes the Harmony of the Spheres so much celebrated by Pythagoras, and the Wings, the Rapidity of the Course of that Luminary.

Antiquity has transmitted to us the Names of the four Horses that drew the Chariot of the Sun. Ovid (2) calls them Eous, Pyrois, Æthon and Phlegon, Greek Names whose Etymology marks their Qualities: Fulgentius the Mythologist (3) calls them Erythous or the red, Acteon, the Luminous, Lampos the Resplendent; and Philogæus, the Earth-Loving. The first denotes the Sun rising, whose Rays are then

(1) V. 1. B. 4.

(2) Met. 1. 2.

(3) L. 2.

then reddish. Acteon represents the Time when the same Rays, shot thro' the Atmosphere, are more clear, that is to say about the ninth or tenth Hour of the Morning. Lampos figures noon Day, when this Luminary is in all his Strength and Glory; and Philogæus represents the setting Sun that seems to kiss the Earth.

ARTICLE II.

The Explication of the Fable of Phaeton, of the Heliades his Sisters, and of Cygnus.

What has been now said of the Sun leads us to the Fable of Phaeton: This Fable related by Ovid (1) at great Length, amounts to this. Phaeton having had a Quarrel with Epaphus the Son of Jupiter and Io, the latter reproached the other that he was not the Son of the Sun, as he pretended to be, and that Clymene had propagated that Story only to cloak her Amour with some Gallant. Phaeton stung with this Reproach went and complained to his Mother, who ordered him to go to the Palace of the Sun, and ask of him as a Proof of his Original, to have the guiding of his Chariot for a Day. Phaeton executed his Mother's Order, and after having let his Father know the Occasion of his coming, conjured him to grant him a Favour, without specifying what it was. The Sun, not suspecting that the Youth could ask a Thing so far above his Abilities as the Guiding of his Chariot, swore by Styx, that he would refuse him nothing; upon which Phaeton desired he might be allowed to enlighten the World. The Sun having bound himself by an irreversibile Oath, after using his utmost Efforts to dissuade his Son from so difficult and dangerous an Enterprize, and seeing him inflexible, granted his Request; the headstrong Youth

(1) Met. l. 2.

Youth mounts the Chariot of the Sun, but the Horses not finding the Hand of their Master, turned out of their ordinary Course, and sometimes mounting too high threaten Heaven with unavoidable Conflagration, or descending too low, scorch the very Fountains and Rivers. The astonished Earth addresses Jupiter, and implores his Aid. That God moved with the just Complaints of the Goddess, overthrows young Phaeton with a Thunderbolt, who is drown'd in the Eridanus. The Heliades his Sisters abandon themselves to obstinate Melancholy and are transformed into Trees. Cygnus his Brother grieves himself to Death, and him the Gods Metamorphose into a Swan.

Those who consider Fables only as Depositories of ancient Physiology and Morals find no great Difficulty in explaining this, by saying it is the Emblem of a Person headstrong and rash, who forms an Enterprize quite unequal to his Abilities; but where was the Need of all this Apparatus to teach us so trivial a Piece of Morality? I own 'tis no easy Matter to trace this Fiction to its true Original; but the Ground of it is not the less Historical, and it certainly refers to real Personages whose Genealogy Antiquity has transmitted to us. According to the common Opinion, Phaeton was the Son of the Sun and Clymene, whether under the Name of the Sun was designed Orus King of Egypt, for the Story seems derived from that Country, as shall be said hereafter; or some other Person among those who were taken for that Luminary. Some of the Ancients give him for his Mother the Nymph Rhoda, the Daughter of Neptune and Amphitrite, and Hesiod says he was the Son of Cephalus and Aurora, a Genealogy that has been adopted by Apollodorus, and made use of by Eusebius after Julius Africanus, to fix the Era of Cecrops. According to that Author, Herse the Daughter of this first King of Athens, was the Mother of Cephalus ravish'd by Aurora; that is who relinquish'd Greece and came and settled in the Levant. Cephalus had a Son named Tithonus, who begat Phaeton. According to this Genealogy, Phaeton, claimed Cecrops for his Grandfather in the third Degree; thus we may reckon that he lived 150 Years after that first King of Athens, who reigned 1582 Years before the Christian Era, and near 400 Years before the Siege of Troy, as may be proved from Dionysius Halicarnassensis (1) and Censorinus (a).

After having traced the Pedigree of this Prince, and determined the Time when he lived, we must now see what may have given Rise to the Extraordinary Fable that is propagated concerning him. 'Tis obvious that, making Allowance for the marvellous, it carries an Allusion to some excessive Heat that had happened during his Reign. Aristotle (2) reckons, upon the Authority of some of the Ancients, that in the Time of Phaeton there fell from Heaven Flames that consumed several Countries, and Eusebius (3) places this Deluge of Fire, in the same Age with that of Deucalion (b). We may confirm this Opinion of Aristotle from the very Name of Phaeton, which being derived from the Word φαέτω, fulgeo, may signify burning or luminous. Those who first wrote this Event, employed some lively and emphatick Figure, and undoubtedly said that the Sun on that Day must have entrusted his Chariot in the Hands of some Headstrong Youth, who not having Skill enough to manage it, had burnt up the Earth.

We may reckon, that either the burning of wicked Cities, or perhaps the Prodigy that happened in Time of Joshua, or that of Hezekiah, gave a Handle for

(1) L. 5. de Die Nat. c. 27.

(a) This is the Order of his Genealogy, Cecrops, Herse his Daughter, Cephalus, Tithonus, Phaeton.

(2) In Meteor.

(3) In Chronic.

(b) Ovid insinuates that this Event happened before the War of Troy, by these Words, Arsurusque iterum Xanthus.

for this Fiction. 'Tis certain the Chaldeans observed the Retrogradation of the Sun, which happened under the Reign of that King of Judab; and that they sent an Embassy under Pretext of congratulating him upon the Recovery of his Health, but in Reality to be thoroughly informed of so extraordinary an Event.

All these Conjectures have their Foundation in Antiquity, and celebrated Authors have advanced them. Saint John Chrysostome proposes another. According to him the Foundation of this Fable was the Chariot of the Prophet Elias, whose Name has so much Affinity with that of Elios given to the Sun by the Greeks. Vossius alledges it refers to an Egyptian Fable; and that learned Author confounds the Mourning of the Sun for the Loss of his Son, with that of the Egyptians for the Death of Osiris; as also the Tears of the Heliades with those which the Prophet Ezekiel saw shed by the Women who were mourning for the Death of Thammus. Ovid seems to give Countenance to this Conjecture so well founded, when in this Fable he speaks of the Difference between Phaeton and Epaphus King of Egypt. This Idea has suggested to me another which throws a new Light upon the Subject. The Greeks in ancient Times being little acquainted with foreign Countries, often confounded them together. They placed, for Example, in the East or in Ethiopia the Scene of several Events that happened in Egypt; thus we may suppose they were mistaken as to the Country of Phaeton. I am persuaded it was Egypt; there Orus had reigned, whose Worship was afterwards confounded with that of the Sun. The Worship of Osiris, who was the Jupiter of the Egyptians, was also famous there: Perhaps Phaeton had one of these two Kings among his Ancestors. As Epaphus owed his Birth to the second, so these two young Princes might have some Quarrel, wherein Phaeton had the Disadvantage. Satyre, we may suppose, hatched the Rest of the Fable in Honour of him who got the Victory. But whatever be in this, the History was greatly embellish'd, and blended with Physiology and Astronomy, as is easy to perceive in reading Ovid. For, not to enter here into too long a Detail, 'tis obvious that when the Poet says Phaeton, at the Sight of the Sign of the Scorpion, quitted the Chariot, he designed to intimate to us that the Event in Question happened in the Month when the Sun is in that Sign.

Lastly, if none of these Explications is Satisfactory, we may hold to that of Plutarch (1) and Tzetzes, who tell us that there was really a Phaeton who reigned over the Molossians, and was drowned in the Po; that this Prince had applied himself to Astronomy, and had foretold the great Heat which happened in his Time, and which desolated his whole Kingdom.

These two Authors undoubtedly followed the Opinion of Lucian, who, after agreeably rallying this Fable in one of his Dialogues, says very seriously in his Treatise of Astronomy, what had given rise to this Fiction was, that Phaeton had been much addicted to Astronomy, and had especially studied the Course of the Sun: But that having died very young, he had left his Observations unfinished; which gave some Poet a Handle to say that he was not able to guide the Chariot of the Sun to the End of his Course.

Antiquity has left us some Monuments of this Fable: The first, which is taken from the Cabinet of Chevalier Maffei, represents Phaeton dead and stretched on the Ground, while the Chariot still entire is in the Middle of the aerial Regions. There are two Things very singular in this Monument: One that the Chariot is only drawn by two Horses, contrary to the common Opinion which makes them four. The Ancients, as we are told by Tertul-
lian

(1) In Pyrrho.

